Crimson Rivers

Posted originally on the Archive of Our Own at http://archiveofourown.org/works/39760044.

Rating:	Explicit
Archive Warning:	Graphic Depictions Of Violence
Categories:	M/M, Other
Fandom:	Harry Potter - J. K. Rowling
Relationships:	Regulus Black/James Potter, Sirius Black/Remus Lupin, Minor or Background Relationship(s)
Characters:	Regulus Black, James Potter, Sirius Black, Remus Lupin, Marlene McKinnon, Dorcas Meadowes, Pandora Lovegood, Bartemius Crouch Jr., Fabian Prewett, Gideon Prewett (Harry Potter), Peter Pettigrew, Evan Rosier, Euphemia Potter, Fleamont Potter, Mary Macdonald, Tom Riddle, Albus Dumbledore, Horace Slughorn, Minerva McGonagall, Lily Evans, various OCs, some others im probably forgetting to list
Additional Tags:	Alternate Universe - Hunger Games Setting, Murder, injuries, Descriptions of Blood, Heavy Themes about Death, Minor Character Death, People will die be warned, its a hunger games au so there's really no way around that sorry, but rest assured that no one who gets a POV will die, Mentor Sirius Black, James and Regulus as Tributes, Romance despite all the angst, Complex Family Dynamics, Complex Friendship Dynamics, Complex...Everything pretty much, this is going to be a long one and a lot happens so i can't possibly tag it all, But overall, Angst, Jealousy, Death, depictions of mental illness, depictions of ptsd, Flirting, Fluff, Humor, sometimes Dark Humor, Falling In Love, Hurt/Comfort, Angst with a Happy Ending, good friendships, good family dynamics, basically you're gonna suffer but you'll be happy about it, Semi-Explicit sexual content, depictions of war, Depictions of grief, heavy uses of foreshadowing, repeated use of metaphors (i will beat you over the head with them), medical and technological inaccuracies (we're blaming it on hp world stuff shhh go with it), i just needed to update these tags, more in depth warnings for each chapter still used i promise, i took some tags away bc they got so long but they still apply!, victory but in a pyrrhic victory type of way, Do Not Re-upload or Repost Anywhere
Language:	English
Series:	Part 2 of Crimson Rivers Universe
Stats:	Published: 2022-06-22 Completed: 2023-02-14 Words: 865,000 Chapters: 75/75

Crimson Rivers

by bizarrestars

Summary

Regulus Black was fifteen the first time his name was called at a reaping. He's twenty-five when it happens to him again. A lot has changed in that time, and one of them is that he's ready to do whatever it takes to make it home. Nothing or no one will stop him, not even James Potter.

James Potter has no plans to stop Regulus Black from making it home. In fact, his plans revolve around the opposite. He has his reasons, but he's made his choice to get Regulus out of the arena, even knowing it'll be the last thing he ever does.

Sirius Black was sixteen when he volunteered to take his little brother's place in the arena. At twenty-six, without the option to do it again, he has no choice but to be a mentor to his brother and best friend, knowing that only one of them can make it back out.

Two names called, a mentor on the verge of falling apart, and more secrets and grief between all of them than they know how to handle. None of them are prepared for what comes next, or how far they'll go to make it through.

Notes

Alright, so this one is going to be heavy, and long. You're gonna want to strap in for this one. So, let's get into it.

Firstly, you don't technically need to have read the Hunger Games trilogy, or watched the movies, to be able to read this. There are some similarities, but I've changed a lot of things. If you have read or watched it, then you'll see the similarities and differences with ease; if not, then it won't really change much for you.

To be clear, I haven't read the books in years, and it's been a while since I watched the movies myself, so it won't exactly be the same. I basically just took the plot and loosely used it for these characters and their dynamics. For example, I can't remember the exact ages for people being reaped in the books, but in this fic, it's set between thirteen and twenty-five. Another thing is, it's not divided up by gender, and I have gender neutral characters in this as well. Men, women, and anyone of any gender can be (and are) reaped.

In this, Sirius is a mentor because he's already been to the arena. Because we see his POV, we see how this affected him, dealing with things such as PTSD, mental illness, and references to past addiction.

This fic deals with themes of death in every way there is to depict it, up to and including murder (referenced and described), suicide (referenced and described), mercy killing (referenced and described), and just as a background part of the story because of, ya know, the whole thing where people are thrown into an arena and forced to kill each other.

There's also in-depth explorations of power dynamics, grief, and complicated relationships. This fic can get dark and heavy at times, and it will, but I will always provide proper warnings to the best of my abilities for every chapter. However, that being said, there are a lot of light and fluffy moments, as well as a lot of humor, despite the setting. And this fic WILL have a happy ending, because I really can't write anything else.

I didn't tag for Major Character Death because no character that gets a POV will die. I DID tag for Minor Character Death because people will, in fact, die in this fic. Characters that you will recognize, and probably some that you'll even like, and even those that you won't like. Not everyone will die, obviously, but not everyone will survive either.

This fic isn't for everyone, and that's okay. Absolutely do not read it if you're expecting a happy story from start to finish. I have a happy, long fic with queer characters and no death, but this isn't going to be that. This will be angsty, and complicated, and there will be gallows humor that not everyone will be comfortable with, as well as rough relationships and harsh realities paired with this setting. It gets brutal at times, so just be warned and prepared for that. Take care of yourselves first and foremost.

Warnings for this first chapter: references to death, references to murder, references to child abuse (yeah, Walburga and Orion are shit in any universe), a very brief reference to suicide (blink and you miss it), references to addiction, and plenty of angst.

If it's any comfort to you at all, this chapter has Regulus, James, and Sirius POV, so at least you know they won't be dying. Hope that helps!

Enjoy???

[please do not post my works on any other platform, or any other format. do not create typesets for people to download and use to bookbind through profit means; do not put my works anywhere near websites such as amazon, lulu, or etsy; do not put my works on goodreads or wattpad. any and all pre-existing translations/podfics are only acceptable on ao3 with proper credits, and im asking now that there aren't more made in the future]

See the end of the work for more notes

Misfortune

The 84th annual reaping is supposed to be Regulus' last.

He's twenty-five, and he'll be twenty-six before the next, which means he'll age out. His birthday takes place two days before the reaping each year, so he has a rather fortunate stroke of luck in that regard.

James Potter doesn't, as it turns out. He's only two months away from twenty-six, and if only he was born just a few months earlier, he could have escaped his fate.

His name is the first that's called, and Regulus can't stop himself from looking through the crowd to watch James slowly push out into the open. His parents are quietly weeping. A lump forms in Regulus' throat as he drags his gaze from James to the stage, where Sirius is already standing, his jaw clenched as he nods at James when he climbs the steps up.

There is no doubt in Regulus' mind that Sirius is going to do everything in his power to make sure James survives the arena. He'll beg, borrow, and steal; he'll teach James everything he needs to know; he'll be the best mentor their district has ever seen, and he'll get his best friend home. Whoever the other tribute turns out to be, Regulus preemptively feels sorry for them, because there is no life Sirius will put above James'.

"Regulus Black!"

That's the second time Regulus has heard his name called at a reaping—and here he was, daring to think he was lucky.

The first time he heard it, he was fifteen, only just, and he'd felt his whole body go cold as soon as he did. He hadn't even moved at first, too terrified to, unable to fathom how it had happened to him. It had to happen to someone, but no one ever thinks it's going to be them, until it is.

Regulus had gotten two steps out of the line when Sirius burst out and volunteered in his stead, only sixteen and ready to throw himself on the pyre so Regulus wouldn't have to.

Sirius had gone to the arena, and Regulus didn't think he was going to come home. He watched, day after day, as his brother fought for his life. He watched, day after day, as Sirius ran, starved, and murdered just to make it back. He watched, on that last day, as Sirius broke down when he was announced the Victor, laughing like a madman on the screens.

He was never the same after that.

Ten years later, and it's happening again. There is no one to volunteer in his stead this time, because Sirius is a Victor, and he can't. No one else would, and maybe even if he could, all these years later, neither would Sirius.

Regulus—just like last time—finds himself frozen, a horrible dread crawling through his veins like ice. The only thought he has is why, why me, why this? Whispers break out through the entire courtyard, and Regulus knows the reason behind it, what they're all saying. It's no secret that James is Sirius' best friend, and no one could ever forget that Regulus is his little brother. Oh, they're going to love this in the Hallow.

Next to him, Barty nudges his shoulder, looking at him with his lips pressed into a thin line, and so Regulus moves. He forces himself to, putting one foot in front of the other, feeling untethered from his body as he makes his way to the stage. As he climbs the steps, his gaze lifts to meet Sirius', and Sirius looks back for all of five seconds before his eyes sink shut, like if he's not looking, then it's not real.

Regulus wishes it was that simple.

It isn't.

He looks away from his brother, and he finds his gaze crawling to James next. For a long moment, they just stare at each other, and then they both look away all at once.

~•~

James is pretty sure he's about to throw up. The only reason he doesn't, he thinks, is because his parents are here. Despite all of this, Effie's hands cradling his face grounds him.

"Oh, love," Effie whispers, her mouth twisting.

"Mum," James croaks, his eyes stinging. He drinks the sight of her in, as well as his dad, darting his gaze between them both. He's never going to see them again, after this.

Effie swallows harshly. "Don't look like that, James. You can win. Do you understand? You can."

She would know. As the winner of the 44th hunger games forty years ago, at the age of a mere thirteen years old, she would know. It was her first reaping, one slip in the bowl, and no one thought she would survive—but she did. She doesn't talk about it, she never talks about it, and Sirius knows more about it than James does. Effie was his mentor, after all, and she helped him get home. And then, when he was eighteen, her duties as a mentor could be over, if Sirius stepped up to take her place, which he did.

James has lived in the Victor's Village his entire life, and Sirius has been his best friend since he was eleven, when he snuck over the wall behind the village and tumbled down an incline, right into Sirius. They had seen each before, of course, from afar, but they lived different lives at the time. James had personal tutors—a perk of being in the Victor's Village—and Sirius went to school. When they properly met, the first thing they did as children was fight (because they both snuck out and thought the other would get them in trouble), and less than twenty minutes later, they promised to be best friends forever—and it's a promise neither of them have broken.

When Sirius volunteered for Regulus at only sixteen years old, James had felt like something in him shriveled and broke off, never to be found again. He remembers that, remembers fighting so hard to see Sirius before he left, and he only got a few seconds to hug him before he was being dragged away, right out of James' arms. The last thing Sirius had said to him was a plea. Take care of Regulus, James, please, he'd begged.

James tried to, but Regulus was a hard person to take care of then at fifteen, and still is at twenty-five, James presumes. He's not sure what it is, but Regulus stopped liking him at fifteen. James didn't need him to like him, not to look after him, but Regulus dodged him at every turn. He took care of himself, mostly, no matter how much James tried. Really, there was only so much James could do. The only time Regulus didn't avoid him was the days they gathered together in the courtyard to watch Sirius in the arena. Just once, James remembers that Regulus had reached out to grab his hand, clinging to it as they both watched Sirius get attacked and then brutally murder his attacker.

When Sirius and his family moved into the Victor's Village after he returned from the arena, sixteen years old with war in his bones and ghosts in his eyes, James was the one who took care of him. Certainly not his parents, who have only ever been neglectful and abusive. Regulus—well, he couldn't take care of Sirius. It wasn't that simple. Sirius wasn't the same as he was before he went into the arena, and it was James who was talking him through the hallucinations; it was James who got him to laugh for the first time after he made it home; it was James who made sure he ate, who pulled him back from the brink of addiction, who held him when he was falling apart.

James is his best friend, and he made a promise, and that's only part of the reason he looks at his mother and smiles sadly before whispering, "I'm not coming home, Mum."

"James," Monty says gruffly, his eyes shining. James' dad is a quiet man, despite his stature. A gentle giant, Effie has always called him, when she's not calling him Flea to tease him, purely for the irony. Fleas are tiny; Fleamont Potter is the opposite. He's a simple man, overall, a homebody and a scholar, happy to be with his family, a loving husband, and the best dad James could ask for. He looks heartbroken. "Son, don't—don't say that. If you fight —"

"I'll fight," James cuts in quietly. "I will fight. But, when it's the end, and it's me and him… I won't fight him."

Effie's eyes sink shut, her lips trembling before she tucks them in and ducks her head. She slides her hands from his cheeks to grip his shoulders, squeezing them. A horrible sound escapes her throat, and she sounds broken as she whispers, "Please."

"I'm sorry," James breathes out, swallowing harshly. Monty looks away, his jaw working as his tears fall. A shuddering breath leaves Effie, and she lifts her head to stare at him, her face sagging with sadness. James tries for a smile, but it trembles on his face. "Mum, Dad, I'm sorry. I can't do it. I won't do that to Sirius. I'm going to make sure Regulus gets out. That's what I'm going to be fighting to do."

"There are—countless ways to die in the arena, James," Effie says hoarsely. "You want to fight to get Regulus out? Fine, but if—just if he doesn't make it, if something happens, you fight with everything you have in you to get home, do you understand? Your heart—you have such a big heart, so full of love, and I never want you to lose that, but in there? You can't let that get in the way of your survival."

James nods tentatively. "Alright, Mum. Alright, but that's not going to happen, because I'm getting him out, even if it kills me." He pauses, then cracks a weak smile. "Well, it will kill me, actually, so really—"

"James, don't make jokes right now," Monty cuts in.

"This is how I want you to remember me," James whispers, and they stare at him, stricken. "This, right here, because what happens in there, before I'm gone… That's not what I want you to remember. Would it be too much to ask to not watch?"

"Yes," Effie says firmly. "You're our son, James. There is nothing you could do in that arena that would change how we see you, or how much we love you. We—we love you so much."

"I love you too, Mum. I love both of you," James rasps, feeling like he hasn't explained enough, like his words are inadequate to properly express how grateful he is to have them.

Effie draws him into a tight hug, and Monty moves over to wrap his arms around them both, and James closes his eyes and lets his parents hold him. Most people don't know when they'll get to hug their parents for the last time.

James does.

~•~

Sirius paces back and forth, listening to the quiet murmurs of his parents through the door. He can't hear Regulus respond, which means he isn't. Sirius can guess what their parents are saying without having to hear it, just clipped orders to come home, or not die a death that shames the family. No different than they told Sirius ten years ago.

Sirius came home, after doing shameful things to get back, things that still live under his fingernails and behind his eyelids to this day. He didn't die a death to shame the family, but since coming back, he's lived a life that sure has.

Well, that's how his parents see it, in any case. Sometimes it's hard coming from an extended family of Victors, only more so when you're a Victor yourself. Sirius finds it ridiculous, really, because it's not as if Walburga or Orion have ever been to the arena. Just Alphard, Cygnus, Bellatrix, and Narcissa—all who were Victors. Alphard hadn't handled the aftermath of the arena well and made many public scenes before eventually, essentially killing himself on booze and bad health. Cygnus had handled it well and raised three daughters who would too, if they ever found themselves in that situation. And, when Bellatrix and Narcissa did, they proved it.

After her games, Narcissa went off to marry someone in the first district, closest to the Hallow. Being a Victor, she could, and she could also take her sisters with her when she went. Bellatrix left with her, but Andromeda did not. She stayed behind to settle down with a man named Ted, who the family didn't approve of at all. She's estranged from the family now, but not Sirius, who is always sneaking off to go see her and little Nymphadora, the cutest baby he's ever met. Walburga and Orion gave up on Sirius years ago now, and they haven't spoken to him or acknowledged him for a long time, despite happily using the benefits they get because he's a Victor. They still control Regulus, though, so they forbid him from seeing Andromeda, and Regulus listens.

Of course Regulus listens, because if he doesn't, it never ends well. Sirius can understand that, even if it drives him mental, because he never listened. Expecting the same out of Regulus is pointless. Regulus only does what he's willing to do.

It's going to get him killed.

Sirius' stomach twists. He remembers when he volunteered for his little brother, the first person to volunteer in decades, at least in their district. He had to, though, because as soon as he heard Regulus' name called, he knew his little brother would die. Regulus—at that age—would never survive the arena.

Frankly, Sirius wasn't sure he would survive the arena, but he did. Sometimes he wishes he hadn't. Sometimes he hates Regulus for being someone he loves so much that he would go for him. But never—not once—has Sirius regretted it. He will never regret saving his little brother's life.

This feels like being spit in the face. Like he was just putting off the inevitable. Because here Regulus is, his name still echoing in Sirius' ears, and Sirius can't save him this time.

And then there's James.

Just thinking about it makes Sirius' stomach lurch. His best friend. Fuck, his best friend is going to the arena, too, and Sirius can't take his place either. James is—he's Sirius' whole world, honestly. Without him, Sirius wouldn't be alive right now. Without him, Sirius wouldn't know what to do.

James is going into the arena with Regulus. How is that fair? What does Sirius even do with that? It makes him want to scream, to bang against the walls of some inner enclosure, to collide his fist into whatever is closest until his mind is quiet. He can't do this. He can't—he doesn't know how he's going to do this. He doesn't have a fucking choice.

Sirius is meant to train them. To prepare them. To teach them. He's meant to give them every trick, tip, and tool to survive, then watch them go face down death. Sirius has never brought a tribute home, not once in the last eight years, and now his little brother and best friend are going to be looking to him for help. He doesn't know how to tell them that there's no help for them, that really, at the end of the day, it comes down to a person's desperate need to survive.

He can put weapons in their hands, teach them how to keep from dying of dehydration or starvation, make them memorize poisonous plants, and give them the general do's and do not's to better their chances—but the truth is, they'll only survive if they want to badly enough. Sirius won his games by strangling a man to death with his bare hands—not his first kill, or even his most gruesome—but he was starved out of his mind, halfway dead from dehydration, and bleeding out. The man had a knife, and Sirius had a stab wound. The man had the upper hand, and Sirius had the will to survive.

The man should have lived, and Sirius made sure he didn't.

It's strange, because Sirius thinks—and has always thought, since winning—that dying in the arena is a kindness, really. But that was before people he loved became tributes. Maybe it's selfish, because whether it's a kindness or not, he wants them both to survive anyway, and they can't. Not both.

This is like trying to ask Sirius to choose between his heart and his lungs. The heart stops beating if the lungs won't work, and the lungs won't work if the heart stops beating. They have to coexist; he can't survive the loss of either.

The door opens up as Walburga and Orion step out, and they both pause to look at him for a moment as he wrenches to a halt. All his mother says is an order, "Bring him home."

With that, and nothing else, they leave.

Taking a deep breath, Sirius moves forward and slips through the door, his heart clenching when he sees Regulus. He looks so small, despite being twenty-five, but maybe that's because Sirius is looking at him and seeing him as he was when he was only fifteen. Just his little brother. Always his little brother.

They don't talk the way they used to. They're too different, and at the same time, too much alike. Sirius has been through too much, and Regulus has distanced himself. Regulus is still in that house with their overbearing parents, and maybe they don't beat either of them now that they're older, but that doesn't mean their parenting has improved. Sirius hasn't been back home since he was sixteen, since he properly left and moved in with the Potters just up the street. He'd asked Regulus to come with him once. Regulus refused.

"I have the worst luck," Regulus declares dryly, and Sirius stares at him for a long moment before huffing out a weak laugh and shutting the door. To anyone else, Regulus would likely look unruffled, just vaguely annoyed, but Sirius can see the fear flickering dimly in his eyes.

He's trying to cover it, but Sirius has seen too much of that in his life to miss it now, no matter how distant they are. "I mean, I'm literally the only person in the world who has been reaped twice."

"Yeah, that's just shit," Sirius admits. He leans back against the door and lets his head hit it with a dull thunk.

Silence falls between them, heavy and thick. Sirius remembers when it was him as a tribute. Regulus had waited until they were alone before holding onto him and crying, begging him not to go, begging him to come back. Sirius remembers when he did come back, and everything felt—warped. The entire world was, and he thinks Regulus may have hugged him again when he returned, but he can't remember that. His memories are like a kaleidoscope, just fractured light, sometimes impossible to make out, and always shifting.

The memories set before the arena are faint, and they feel like something directly from another life. The memories set right after the arena, even a year after, are like wisps; he can barely make them out, and he doesn't know what's there. That's an entire year of his life, at least, that he can't even recall. If not for James, he likely would have lived that way forever.

The thing is, Sirius went into the arena and fought so hard to come home, completely unaware of what he would be bringing back with him when did. You bring pieces of the arena with you if you live long enough to get out, and those pieces still stay with Sirius to this day. James or Regulus will understand that, if they survive. One or the other, but it can't be both.

Sirius doesn't know how he's supposed to live with that.

"Have you been to see James?" Regulus murmurs. His voice it quiet, stilted with some unspoken tension. Most likely has something to do with James, if Sirius had to guess. There was a time, years ago, when Regulus didn't despise James, but Sirius can't really remember it. Not fully. Not completely. That tenderness has been fractured by time, too.

"He's with his parents," Sirius replies, blinking at some fixed point over Regulus' shoulder. "I wanted to give them time."

Regulus scoffs. "So you came to see me first. What an honor."

"Don't," Sirius says firmly, snapping his gaze to Regulus, meeting his eyes. "Don't do that, Regulus. Your resentment, your bitterness, whatever it is—that can't matter anymore, do you understand? There's no space for anything else but your will to survive. Listen to me—no, shut up." Regulus' mouth snaps shut from where he started to speak, to protest no doubt, but Sirius has never been more serious in his fucking life. "You leave all of that here. Anything that could make you falter, that could get in the way of your survival, you let it go right here and now. It can't exist in the games."

"The games haven't started yet," Regulus whispers.

"The games started the moment your name was called, and they don't end until you're dead," Sirius corrects bluntly.

"Do you think I'm going to die?" Regulus asks.

Sirius' breath catches, his heart clenching violently in his chest at the mere thought. Regulus holds his gaze steadily, waiting, and Sirius doesn't know. He doesn't know if his little brother is going to die. He doesn't know if his best friend is going to die. He doesn't know how he's going to try to help them survive, knowing only one will.

Exhaling shakily, Sirius can only say, "You have a one in twenty-four chance, Regulus."

"Your best friend is one of those twenty-four," Regulus reminds him. "Are you going to ask me not to kill him?" He waits again, but Sirius doesn't know how to answer that. He doesn't know what he's doing. "Because I will, if I have to. I'm not going to spare his life and sacrifice my own just because he matters to you. I might not go out of my way to kill him, but if that's what it comes to, Sirius, I won't hesitate."

And, if it were anyone else other than James, Sirius would be relieved to hear that, to know that Regulus plans to fight to survive. But it is James, so Sirius' lungs feel like they're being squeezed, and dread sinks down in his stomach like lead.

"Are you planning on coming home, Reggie?" Sirius rasps.

"Yes," Regulus says firmly.

"Well," Sirius whispers, working his jaw, then he gives a tight nod and reaches for the door, "I suppose I should go see him, then, since you're so willing to send him to his grave."

"Are you willing to send me to mine, for him?" Regulus retorts sharply, a muscle in his cheek twitching as he clenches his jaw. His eyes are cold. They always are, these days.

Sirius turns around, opens the door, and walks out.

James isn't too far away, and Sirius arrives just as Effie and Monty are being escorted out. They've both been crying profusely, that much is obvious, and Sirius wants to go to them, call out for their attention, and find some way to make this better. He can't, though, so he stays back, letting them sweep away without noticing him.

As soon as James looks up to see Sirius, he moves forward to snatch him into a hug. It takes everything in Sirius not to break down crying, but he refuses, because it's not him about to be thrown into the arena—just two of the people he loves most in this world. James holds onto him like he'll never get another chance, and Sirius… Sirius knows what that means.

"No," Sirius croaks as he backs away, as if he's been stung. He shakes his head, unwilling to face it. "No, James, don't you fucking dare. Don't—"

"Stop," James cuts in gently, reaching out to grab his shoulders and meet his gaze. "It's not up for debate, Sirius. I'm going to get him home, do you understand?"

Sirius hears the whimper that falls out of his mouth, and the worst part is, this isn't even all that surprising. Of course James would do this. Of course he would, because he's selfless and golden, because he's good. Not necessarily out of the kindness of his heart—even if there's plenty in there—but just because he knows what he will and won't be able to live with. His morals, his sense of what's right—he'll die for them.

In the arena, there is no sense of what's right, or morals. It's survival, and that's it. You have to do what it takes to survive, even when what it takes is the worst thing you can imagine. One split second of hesitation because you want to be good is how you die in the arena. Good doesn't exist there, and if it tries to, it's quickly snuffed out. James isn't—he isn't cut out for things like that. He's bright and loving, despite this shithole of a world, and he cares about things and people more than anyone Sirius has ever known.

That's going to get him killed.

Helplessly, Sirius thinks about the difference between James and Regulus, how one didn't hesitate to tell him that he wouldn't sacrifice himself, while the other didn't hesitate to tell him the exact opposite. Sirius can't stomach it.

"James," Sirius chokes out.

"I said it wasn't a debate, and don't—" James takes a deep breath, then slowly lets it out. "He's your little brother."

"You're my best friend."

"Exactly. It's one of the reasons I've made this decision."

Sirius flinches. "You can't—"

"I said one," James interrupts, holding his gaze. "Just one among many, Sirius. This isn't on you, alright? And we're not going to talk about it. You're going to get me ready, and I'm going to go in there and get Regulus home, and that's it. Don't for a second think I'll regret this. It's my choice, and you're going to respect it, do you understand? That's all I'm asking you to do. Just respect it."

I can't, Sirius thinks. Thank you, Sirius thinks. I want both of you to come home, Sirius thinks. I don't know how I'm supposed to do this, Sirius thinks. And, in the end, Sirius says nothing.

James pulls him back into a hug until, for the second time in a role-reversal Sirius could have never prepared himself for, he's being yanked right out of James' arms.

The Hallow

Chapter Notes

hello again!

warnings for this chapter: general themes and topics of death (considering the whole arena thing), references to torture, and im pretty sure that's it. this chapter is fairly mild and mostly just character introductions. you're about to see some familiar faces ;)

enjoy!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

"Well, at least there are perks," James says with faux cheer, reaching out to pluck a tiny lemon tart off the table that's full of food that's surely exquisite.

Regulus resists the urge to roll his eyes. Of course James would try to look on the bright side. He's so annoyingly positive, Regulus hates him. He's hated him for years.

Not all of them, admittedly, but years nonetheless.

Sirius looks tired. He's not eating, and neither is Regulus. The train continues on, and the only one who has spoken is James. Regulus looks at him and wonders how he can manage to act like things are fine. Does he look at Regulus and wonder if he'll have to kill him, the way Regulus looks at him and wonders if he even can? Nothing about this is fine.

"No, really, you have to have one of these," James declares with his mouth full, eyes wide as he waves the tart at them.

"Well, this is all very...somber," Pandora says as she comes sweeping into the train car, her lips pursing. She's a Hallow through and through, her eccentric style loud and dramatic. Her voice, despite being the one to call his name at the reaping—the reaper, if you will—is very soothing.

Regulus leans back in his chair and says, flatly, "Well, death is a somber subject, generally, except to the Hallows, I suppose. James and I are going to be knocking on death's door soon enough, so you'll forgive us for being a bit...maudlin."

"Death is a somber subject to us, too," Pandora tells him with a frown, her eyebrows tugging together, clearly affronted by the insinuation that it's not.

"Oh, how shocking," Regulus replies, tilting his head in mock confusion. "I thought you Hallows thrived on that sort of thing, but only when it's people like us, right?"

Pandora presses her lips into a thin line, looking ridiculously hurt, and Regulus doesn't regret it. She sniffs in offense and narrows her eyes at him. "You know, with your attitude, I don't really expect you to get many sponsors, Regulus."

"Well, that's more Sirius' job than mine," Regulus mutters.

"You have to give me something to work with, Reg," Sirius says wearily, his gaze fixed on the window as he watches the world outside whip past them. "I can't present something to the sponsors if you won't give them something to like."

"I don't really care," Regulus admits, because he doesn't.

Sirius' gaze snaps over to him. "You need to care. Sponsors can save your life in the arena. I would be dead if it wasn't for the sponsors I had and Effie's brilliant management of them, but I was charismatic. You…" Sirius makes a face, and Regulus scowls. Sirius snaps his fingers and points at James. "Now, him? It'll be easy to get sponsors for him. He's charming, he's kind, he knows how to make people like him. It'll be like taking candy from a baby. But you? I mean, you never smile, and you're just—you're really fucking mean, and grumpy, and miserable. People aren't going to like that."

"So, what I'm hearing is, to get sponsors, I'm not allowed to be...myself?" Regulus asks in disbelief.

"Yes, exactly," Sirius replies promptly, the prick. "Be like James."

Regulus glares at him. "I'm nothing like James."

"Yes, as we've established, which is the problem," Sirius tells him, utterly oblivious to the way those words are a knife sinking into Regulus' gut. Regulus knows that already. Regulus has known that for a long time.

"I think—I don't know," James mumbles, looking down at the plate of tarts. "I mean, I would sponsor him."

"You would sponsor everyone," Sirius says, heaving a sigh. He tips his head towards Regulus. "Even the least desirable ones."

"Oh, and James is desirable?" Regulus retorts sardonically.

James plants his elbow on the table and leans closer to Regulus, lips curling up. "Are you claiming I'm not? You wouldn't say I'm desirable?"

"I'd say the only desire I feel is for you to go away," Regulus tells him, arching an eyebrow.

"Well, that's not very nice."

"As we've just established, I'm not a very nice person."

"That's not a very desirable trait, you know," James says.

Regulus hums. "And yet, you'd sponsor me."

"Yes, well, I'm biased," James murmurs, lazily reaching down to pluck up another tart, holding it out to Regulus. "Here. It's sour and bitter, just like you."

Regulus takes the tart, then—without looking—flicks his wrist and lobs it directly at Sirius' head. By the yelp that follows, his aim is still true. James proceeds to bust out laughing so hard that he's wheezing, and even Pandora releases a giggle as Sirius starts complaining about the tart getting in his hair.

For one moment, the inevitability of what's ahead doesn't feel so crushing, and Regulus would like to exist here forever. It's a childish notion, wanting to wrap himself up in one moment and hide away from the world, but he can't shake the urge.

It shakes him, though, because James' laughter fades as he looks out the window with a quiet, "Shit, look at that."

Following his gaze, Regulus can see the Hallow coming into view over the hill as they rise on the tracks, so much closer than he was prepared for it to be. It's a fortress, frankly. A city, yes, but an impenetrable one nonetheless. At the center, the largest building is a castle, rising high above every other building with slanted rooftops and towers that come to a point. James slowly stands up and approaches the window to stare in wonder, but Regulus refuses to be moved.

"Beautiful, isn't it?" Pandora murmurs.

It is, but Regulus would rather bite his tongue off than admit that. He's never felt it so starkly before, the utter misfortune of not being born in the Hallow, but it strikes him now just how genuinely unfortunate it is. Anyone born inside the Hallow is protected, forever safe, never living in fear of being always so close to impending doom or under the Hallow's control, at least not so obviously. His eyes crawl to Sirius.

Sirius is looking at the Hallow with a bitter twist to his lips, a haunted echo of the past flashing in his eyes. The most beautiful place anyone has ever seen, and Sirius looks at it as if it's made from evil. Regulus is and has always been influenced by his brother, no matter how much he's fought that instinct, but it's no use, especially not here and now. Just from that, from the look in Sirius' eyes, Regulus doesn't trust it. He comforts himself with the fact that he wouldn't have either way, but Sirius' reaction does cement the feeling.

"Oh!" James blurts out, surprised, and Regulus swivels his head to see that the train has slowed down quite a bit and there are people outside it, running along it, screaming and cheering like new celebrities are being brought in.

They're all Hallows, there's no denying that. The sheer disconnect from the underlying horror of all this is the real finalizing factor on that, but it's the odd mixture of styles that mostly gives it away. People in cloaks, robes, strange hats, gaudy colors—it's all enough to make Regulus' stomach churn. The smiles and muffled shouts of praise only makes that sensation worse, and Regulus resists the urge to snap at James to come sit down, especially when he starts waving at them.

"Don't look so agitated," Sirius murmurs, his expression smoothed out as Regulus meets his eyes. He inclines his head towards James. "The games are on, remember? And it looks like he knows how to play."

"I don't want to play this part," Regulus grits out.

"Then die," Sirius replies.

Regulus grinds his teeth, but Sirius doesn't waver, not one bit. Finally, with a harsh exhale through his nose, Regulus shoves his chair back and moves over to approach the window next to James with his arms crossed. No matter how he tries, he can't get his expression to fix into something even vaguely open and warm, only just managing to make his face blank.

"How can you stand yourself, doing that?" Regulus asks quietly, flicking his gaze to James.

"They don't know," James replies, his smile never faltering as he waves like he's eager to make new friends. "Just as we've been conditioned, so have they, Regulus. It's not really their fault, if you think about it. They didn't make the games."

"They watch them. They love them."

"Yes, just as they were taught to. Just as we watch them. Just as we were taught to dread them."

Regulus shakes his head. "How can you care about them? Even them? They'll love us, then weep when we die, then forget we ever existed when the next comes along."

"Well, if the goal is to not die, then there's not much of a problem, is there?" James asks lightly, briefly glancing at him.

"Is that your goal, then?"

"Isn't that everyone's?"

"Do you expect to live to the end?" Regulus murmurs.

James just keeps waving as he says, "I intend to."

"I have unfortunate news for you," Regulus informs him, keeping his voice low as he turns his gaze back to the crowds they go past. "You're not going to make it to the end, even if it's by my hand, James. No matter how important to Sirius you are, I'll do what needs to be done."

"Oh, will you?" James says, his hand pressing up against the glass as he gives up all pretense and turns his head to look directly at Regulus. There's a sparkle in his eyes, and his grin doesn't fade even in an inch. If anything, Regulus can see it becoming more genuine. "So will I, you know. That's exactly my plan—to do what needs to be done."

"I won't hesitate," Regulus warns him.

"Not even for a second?" James challenges, his smile softening until it's more sad than anything else, and Regulus…

Regulus hesitates for a second, one too long, and James' smile grows again as he turns to start waving once more.

Heart sinking, Regulus goes back to sit down.

~•~

"You'll be fine," Sirius assures James. "They're just going to get you cleaned up and pretty to parade you around as an introduction. I think—well, Pandora says we've got a good team this year, so I'll take her word for it. I need to go do some snooping, but I'll see you and Reggie later, yeah?"

James, who feels very out of his depth, and like things are going too fast for him to keep up with, only manages to blurt out, "Er, yeah," before Sirius is darting off.

James feels rather like his safety vest has been taken from him.

He hardly gets to fret for long before he and Regulus are being led away in separate directions. James looks back over his shoulder and is surprised to find Regulus also glancing back at him. Of course, as soon as he catches James catching him, he turns away and doesn't look back again.

"Ah, marvelous," a cheerful voice chirps as James is led into a room. There's a man there with bright red hair styled into a mullet-mohawk fusion that looks quite good, actually. "The name's Fabian. You're my doll, and the other tribute is my brother's, Gideon. Come, come, get naked."

"What?" James blurts out, eyes bulging.

"Oh, no need for modesty," Fabian assures him. "You're clearly giving me plenty to work with." He pauses, then reaches up and smacks his forehead. "Goodness, sorry, I'm rushing the whole process. You're hardly comfortable with me yet, are you? Sorry, sorry, it's just that I don't get a lot of time with you, sadly. Here, I promise I won't be looking. Well, no, that's a lie; it's literally my job to look, but I assure you, it's nothing untoward. I'm just going to help you look nicer than you already do. Trust me, you'll enjoy the process."

"Um," James mumbles, "can I keep my pants on?"

"Well, at least until you get in the bath, sure," Fabian allows, waving his hand and turning away.

Fabian is a liar. James does not, in fact, enjoy the process. It's very strange having someone present when you bathe, even if they're not watching you (and Fabian doesn't, thankfully). He allows James to put a towel around his waist when he gets out, but that's where the whole process becomes a bit like torture.

There's an unfortunate amount of waxing, hair-plucking, poking, and prodding. At one point, Fabian is chattering away casually as he holds up James' arm and forcefully yanks the hair at his armpit out right from the root. He clicks his tongue every time James yelps, patting his shoulder and speaking in a soothing tone before doing it all over again.

Fabian does do things that James finds himself enjoying, like an entire face massage, which is honestly brilliant. Sadly, there is more to it than that. There's exfoliating, and moisturizing, and more hair-plucking, now at his eyebrows, which makes his eyes water—but curiously, the opposite eye of whichever eyebrow is actually being plucked. James is also uncomfortable because Fabian takes his glasses and makes him put in contacts, then listens calmly as James rants for nearly ten minutes straight about why he should be able to wear his glasses, only to then make James put in the contacts anyway. He ends up having to help, because James doesn't know how, and James gets poked in the eye (thrice) because he keeps flinching, unable to hold still.

But, honestly and truly, James draws the line at his hair. Fabian washes it and does a lovely little scalp massage that nearly puts James to sleep, but when he sees scissors out of the corner of his eye, he's fully awake. James has never come out of a chair so fast in his life.

"No," James states firmly, pointing at Fabian, who looks baffled. "Absolutely not. If you come anywhere near me with those scissors, I'm going to start practicing for the arena, and the next person getting violently poked in the eye will be you."

Fabian's mouth hangs open. "But—but your hair is—"

"I'm perfectly aware of what my hair is, but you're right to say that it's mine, Fabian."

"James, please, it's a wreck."

"No," James insists firmly.

"Can't I just—"

"No."

"But what if I—"

"No."

"I—" Fabian stares at him, stricken, then heaves a sigh and lowers his hand. He looks really sad, actually, which would make James feel bad if it wasn't his hair. Fabian slowly puts the scissors aside and nods. "Yes, well, fine. I had so many plans for it, you know. Can I at least style it a bit?"

James purses his lips, but the hope in Fabian's eyes is what gets him, really. He relaxes a little. "As long as you don't cut it, or make it lay flat, you can do what you like."

"I...can work with that," Fabian says decisively, squinting as he tilts his head at James and waves him back over to the chair.

Hesitantly, James moves over.

Fabian stays true to his word, and following the styling of James' hair (victoriously not cut, thank you very much), there's being forced into a surprisingly tight suit. It's an odd suit like James has never seen before, very Hallow-esque; a red so dark that it's borderline black with various gold accents. He doesn't know how he feels about it when Fabian plants him in front of the full-length mirror and asks for a review.

Realistically, James knows that he looks good. He can see that he looks good. He's always been good-looking, and he's not shy about acknowledging that, but this is… Well, it's really enhanced now, that's all. He doesn't look very different, but at the same time, he almost doesn't recognize himself. The suit doesn't look too loud, or overbearing, but it's more stylish and eye-catching than anything he's ever worn. His hair is slightly different, more...full, somehow, and effortless? Alright, James may have to ask Fabian how he did that. But, mostly, it's very strange to see himself without his glasses. It feels like his face is naked, oddly enough. His eyes seem bigger.

"It's...ah…" James clears his throat and glances at Fabian, who is waiting with a bated breath for his response. Helplessly, James gives him a crooked smile. "It's lovely. You did lovely."

Fabian's face absolutely lights up. "Thank you! I'm glad you love it. Come, Gideon should be finished now."

James spares one second to think about what this poor Gideon bloke had to put up with if he was working with Regulus, trying to do all the things that Fabian just did with him, and he has to stifle a laugh as he follows Fabian out. That laughter promptly does in James' throat when he sees Regulus.

Regulus does a visible double-take when he sees him, blinking harshly, but James doesn't have the capacity to wonder about what that means, because he's too busy staring at Regulus. It's just—well, Regulus is always in black, generally, and he's… So, yes, he's undeniably beautiful. There is no denying that, and James has never bothered to try. He knows it, Regulus surely knows it, their entire fucking district knows it.

But this is… Well, Regulus has been cleaned up, too. There's a pampered flush to his cheeks, a shine to his hair (which has been cut), and a suit on him that matches James' perfectly, except it's a green so dark it's almost black with silver accents. His haircut isn't a drastic change, but whatever Gideon did to it gave him an absolute mass of waves and curls that fall around his face and ears to make him look impossibly sweeter than he always does. Ironic, really, because Regulus hasn't really been sweet since before Sirius went into the games.

"Where the fuck are your glasses?" Regulus blurts out, sounding downright appalled, borderline horrified.

James immediately feels vindicated by this. He jerks his hands out and yells, "Thank you! I have to wear contacts, Reg. I really don't want to wear them. Do I look very strange?"

"You look—" Regulus falls silent, then clears his throat and narrows his eyes at Fabian. "Give him his glasses back."

"I won't," Fabian says firmly. "I've already compromised on not cutting his hair."

Regulus' eyes bulge. "You were going to cut his hair?"

"Thank you!" James bursts out yet again, feeling so supported right now. He gestures frantically at Regulus as he stares at Fabian. "Do you see? He gets it!"

"A stubborn pair, aren't they?" Gideon says wryly, looking at Fabian with his eyebrows raised. It takes James a second to realize that he and Fabian are twins, because for all that their faces are the same with very minor, nearly invisible differences to the eye, their hair styles and clothes are vastly different.

"You let them cut your hair," James mumbles, turning his gaze back to Regulus, who scowls.

"I couldn't get out of it. How did you get out of it?"

"Threatened to kill him with the scissors."

"You would...literally never."

"Well, he didn't know that, did he?"

"Now, why didn't I think of that?" Regulus grumbles with a grimace. "Gideon had to strap me to the chair."

"You tried to bite me," Gideon sputters.

"I'll still bite you," Regulus warns, glaring at him, and Gideon looks at Fabian as if he's exhausted.

"Fab, I'm beginning to rethink our current career path."

"Gid, I was just thinking the same thing."

James jolts when an alarm goes off, and Fabian immediately claps his hands together. "Right, yes, time to get you two to the carriages. Now, they're pulled by thestrals, so you won't be able to see them unless you've witnessed death in person—not just through a screen, of course. We hear they're very gentle creatures, though, so don't stress about them."

"You'll be meeting with Dorcas sometime very soon. She's the head of the team and the creator of all themes and designs for your outfits," Gideon explains, ushering them along.

"All you have to do is ride the carriage through," Fabian explains. "You may be a bit overwhelmed by the crowds, but it'll be over before you know it. Sirius will be waiting for you by the end, once it's over. Go on, go, stand tall, there you go…"

Again, things feel so fast that James can hardly keep up with them. He and Regulus are led into a tunnel with a lone carriage that seems to be holding itself up. They're both wary to climb into the back and stand, but they don't really have much of a choice. They've barely gotten into place before the carriage jolts, making them both snap their hands out to hold onto the edge of it, trying to remain steady.

The gap of light at the end of the tunnel grows, and with it, the distant sound of muffled screams of delight get louder. James' heart races for reasons he can't explain, and he's tense all over, anticipation—and not the good kind—rising in him until he almost can't breathe. The light starts pouring over them as they're pulled out into the middle of an arena with stands of people screaming and cheering, throwing flowers as fireworks pop and sizzle loudly over their heads.

James immediately feels oversensitized, unsure where to look, having nothing to focus on. His eyes dart around almost frantically, and he doesn't even have the comfort of his own glasses. His head swivels like it's on a stick, the world a rush of colors and faces jumping out at him until he feels a little sick. He has to squeeze his eyes shut, then just gives up and looks over at Regulus, the only thing that makes sense in all of this.

The thing is, Regulus is nice to look at. As previously mentioned, he's always been beautiful, so this is not really a new thing. The slight changes to his appearance haven't changed much, only highlighting what was already obvious. That's not the only thing James gets out of looking at him, though. It's also just comforting. In all this, when he feels like he's lost and shrinking, locking his gaze on Regulus is what comforts him. It genuinely helps him breathe.

"Why are you looking at me?" Regulus asks without even turning his head towards him. His voice is raised slightly, and still, it's hard to hear him over the crowd.

"I'm just—I mean, you look different," James blurts out, because he doesn't think Regulus would appreciate knowing that James draws comfort just from the sight of him. Regulus hates him. James knows that.

"Different," Regulus repeats.

"Good different," James rushes to clarify.

"Did I not look good before the Hallows got ahold of me?"

"What? No, you—that's not what I was saying. I just meant—"

Regulus does look at him, then. "You look different, too."

"Good different?" James asks, blinking at him.

"No," Regulus says, looking away again. His voice is quieter when he speaks next, so much so that James almost misses what he says altogether, which is a soft, "I miss your glasses."

James starts to reply, but he stops when Regulus tilts his face up as their carriage comes to a halt. He follows his gaze up to the tower that holds people of clear importance. Up there is none other than Riddle, Master of the Hallow. He's the one really behind the games, and if James were to place any blame on anyone for the state of the world, it would be him.

He's an older man, though he wears his age well. His hair is grey with only a light smattering of dark brown threaded through, just the same as his cleanly shaped beard. He's pale, but not in a sickly way. Actually, he's quite handsome—clearly distinguished. He's wearing what can only be expensive robes, the sort that are cut to be tailored to his body, a silver pocket watch chain hanging visibly over his vest from where his robes hang open. Even from here, James can tell he's the type of man that eyes turn to when he enters a room, refined and poise and intimidating. His dark brown eyes sweep over them, critical and sharp, not a scrap of warmth in them.

For a second, he's looking right at Regulus, so intent in studying him that James feels a chill go down his spine. Then, just as easily, Riddle flicks his gaze away, as if he's bored, as if they're meaningless to him, like they're already dead. More so than the Hallows themselves, the people of the Hallow, James despises their Master. That's who James takes issue with.

The carriage jolts as they continue on, and James drags his gaze away to go back to looking at Regulus again.

~•~

"Alright, home sweet home," Pandora declares brightly as she pushes open the door and leads them all in.

Sirius remembers his own response to stepping into the accommodations the Hallow provides for the first time. The pure disbelief and helpless wonder, overly aware of how truly ridiculous everything is. It's so starkly obvious that no district should be living in poverty or starving with all the blatant frivolities that exist within the Hallow. Sirius, after ten years of being exposed to it, has blown past bitter and settled firmly into exhaustion. Reality is a bitch.

"Now, we each have our own rooms," Pandora continues, turning to walk backwards to keep addressing them. She nearly trips on the steps, so Sirius snaps his hand out to steady her, helplessly fond of her. Sirius isn't fond of many Hallows, but he's been working with her for two years, and she's a good person, despite being a Hallow. It's a hard pill to swallow, but some of them genuinely are. "Dinner is within the hour, so you have time to explore your rooms, and your closet, change out of your lovely suits into something more comfortable. Go on, off with you all. We meet back here in forty-five minutes sharp, and do not make me drag you out by your ears. I will."

"She will," Sirius confirms.

James and Regulus share a brief look, and then they split off, no doubt needing time to themselves. They've both been quiet since being paraded out in front of the Hallows. Sirius gets it. He remembers what that was like, too.

Sirius also needs some time to acclimate. It's never easy for him, being back within the Hallow, especially as a mentor. It's just a different version of the games; he's less likely to die, admittedly, but that doesn't make it much better.

Inside his own room, Sirius sits down on the edge of his bed and releases a deep breath as his eyes sink shut. It feels like he's shedding a mask he's been wearing as soon as he entered the city, the arena he's been forced into over and over since his victory. Already, he's been running around to meet up with various mentors and known sponsors, trying to get a layout of what's to be expected and what James and Regulus will find themselves at the mercy of, both in competition and support.

Sirius has made a name for himself in the Hallow, he knows that. He's charismatic when he wants to be, and every year, he tries everything he can to see at least one tribute home, which means he's made himself likeable. Despite this, he knows he's too out-spoken at times, too rebellious, doing things that he shouldn't, that could get him into a lot of trouble. Moody, a fellow mentor for a different district, had told him to be more careful. Despite being a paranoid bastard, Sirius took his advice enough to walk a fine line.

He makes himself just loved enough that he can get away with things that most do not, but he's careful not to push too far, not when lives that aren't his are on the line. He presents himself as the dashing young man everyone wants to be, or be with, charming everyone with his grin and grand words, and then he comes to the seclusion of his room and hates himself for it. But what can he do? If he doesn't, then he's not trying everything in his power to save at least one of his tributes, and that guilt would kill him.

When they inevitably die, the guilt nearly kills him anyway.

This year, things are already looking bleak. Regulus really doesn't realize the impact of how he presents himself. It's already noticeable, the people that are turning sour just at the mere mention of his name, because of his demeanor. He doesn't look happy to be here at all, one sponsor had said, and it took everything in Sirius not to fucking claw his eyes out for it. Of course he's not happy to be here, you fucking idiot, Sirius had wanted to scream, and yet, miraculously, he didn't. He'd kept his smile fixed on his face and painted Regulus as the strong, silent type when he's literally anything but. He's genuinely just a brooding, little shit who doesn't like many people, which Sirius has always found secretly endearing.

But here? That's going to get him killed.

It doesn't help that people are already invigorated by pitting Regulus and James against each other. Picking sides. Making them out to be enemies at direct war with each other. People are thriving on it, bloodthirsty from the drama of Sirius' best friend and little brother being on opposite sides, and it's clear who has their favor already.

James. Of course it's James. He stood up and waved. He smiled. He's physically bigger than Regulus—which honestly doesn't mean much, frankly. After all, Sirius killed people three times his size in the arena. Size doesn't fucking matter, and people are underestimating Regulus because of it, and because they don't know anything about his skills.

Sirius, of course, has been doing his best to dispel this notion, because it's ideal to get sponsors for both tributes, and if they're seen as competing, that will be nigh impossible. It's just not working. No matter what he says, people are so focused on who he thinks will kill the other, on who he wants to win, who he's actually rooting for, as if it never even crosses their mind to think that this isn't fun for him, that he's not fucking sickened by the mere thought, as if he's just like them.

Fuck, Sirius doesn't know how he's going to do this.

Sighing, he drags himself up and shuffles to the closet, barely even glancing at what's been provided for him. It's usually the same, and he knows exactly where to look for a soft shirt and loose joggers, something to relax in while he eats dinner. But first, he needs a shower to scrub away how filthy this day has made him feel, so he goes to do exactly that.

By the time he gets out, it's nearly time for dinner, and Pandora really will drag him out by his ear if he's late (she has before), so he half-dries his hair, leaving it mostly damp and curling over his shoulder, wetting the collar, and then he leaves. He's not surprised to see that James and Regulus have also gotten showers, despite Fabian and Gideon working on them today. He knows how being paraded in front of the Hallows like pieces of meat feels, and that's filthy, too.

The table is already set, a spread of lavish food in front of them. Regulus and James stare at it like they're not even sure they can touch it, or want to, but Pandora promptly starts filling her plate while humming under her breath. Sirius gives James and Regulus a tiny nod, filling his own plate, and that prompts them to do the same.

Seconds later, someone sweeps out with a trolley of wine bottles to choose from. Sirius looks up as it stops next to him, and oh no, he doesn't do this. He never stands for it, and Pandora is used to this defiance by now.

"Excuse me, sorry, just—" Sirius raises up out of his seat and reaches out to the man at the trolley, pushing his hand to the back of his head to find the clasp for the mask on his face. His head snaps up in alarm, light brown eyes widening, and Sirius' fingers fumble on the clasp as their eyes meet.

For a beat, Sirius is frozen in place, despite the fact that this is generally a quick affair for him, removing these masks. In this moment, he becomes so starkly aware of how he holds this man's life in his hands. The man must feel the same, because he's equally frozen, so stiff that he looks like stone.

The mask is fitted to his face up to the tip of his nose, made of black, unforgiving metal with three slits above his mouth, just barely showing small peeks of his lips. The way the mask fits to the jaw is purposeful to make sure whoever has them won't let them open their mouth to speak. His eyes are visible, as is the light smattering of freckles just below them, but that's it. A criminal to the Hallow—this is their fate, being muzzled or experimented on, or both, all in the name of the games, finding new things to introduce each year, and then sentenced to a life of servitude in the Hallow.

Sirius—when he learned about it—had hated it. He'd never been sickened by the Hallow so strongly before that moment when he learned that those in the districts that defied the Hallow in some way, or even simply tried to run away, were caught and captured and put through this. The first servant he met with a mask had been when he was sixteen, and he'd begged her to remove it, only for Effie to inform him that if she was caught removing it, or anyone found out she did, then she would be killed. So, he'd taken to removing it for them.

The thing is, it's still a risk. They have to put them back on when they leave to return to their cells at night, but Sirius has always made it clear that they can go without it when they're in here. Pandora had been startlingly calm when he informed her of this, and she'd promised to never breathe a word of it, even after he threatened to kill her if she did, promising her that it would be his word against hers, and he had made himself important enough that they'd believe him first. She hadn't even batted an eye and just simply agreed.

The way this goes, Sirius has to take the masks off, because they won't do it themselves. If he was very lucky, some of them would get so comfortable that they would come to him first thing so he could remove it for them, but that was as close as he could get to them doing it themselves. He gets why. They'll literally die if they take it off, and this is only really a loophole that no one has dared to test out in the open. None of them, him included, have ever felt the need to take the risk of seeing what would happen if anyone found out that their masks were removed, but they didn't remove them.

Usually, Sirius just pulls the mask off before they can do anything. He's learned the hard way that some will panic and fling themselves back, even possibly injure themselves, and he never wants that to happen. He just takes the mask off quickly and explains they don't have to wear it, not in here, that they're safe here, with him.

"It's alright," Sirius murmurs. "You're alright."

That shouldn't work. The man should be leaning away and going back to his job, but he isn't. He just—stays right where he is, staring at Sirius with those wide eyes of his.

"I was going to remove it," Sirius explains, and that gaze sharpens on his face, studying him more intently. "You don't have to wear that here. I don't—we don't require it. When you're here, you're safe. No one will ever know, I promise. I'm not trying to get you killed; I'm just letting you breathe."

Slowly, the man leans away, and for the first time since Sirius was a tribute, he fails to take the mask off the servant assigned to their suite. His hand falls to his side slowly, and he's left disappointed, a lump forming in his throat because it's just—it's wrong. It's not fair. No one deserves this, and it's genuinely sickening that they're so conditioned to fear for their lives that they feel they have to live this way.

The wine bottle that the man was holding plonks back on the trolley, and his eyes are still on Sirius when he lifts his hand to the back of his head removes the mask on his own.

Sirius' breath quite literally catches in his throat as the mask slips away from the man's face, revealing the rest. His freckles don't span down the rest of his face, and his mouth is pink and full, but ridiculously chapped. Sirius watches those lips part, and the man releases a soft exhale, his eyelashes fluttering.

"Oh," Sirius breathes out, staring at him, and he can't figure out what to say next. His mind is completely blank.

Pandora, thankfully, knows his routine enough by now to pick it for him by asking, "What's your name?"

Now, in most cases, the servants won't speak even without the mask. Only two out of the eight years Sirius has been here did, and one of them only spoke when spoken to—Ryanair, his name was—and the other did speak, quite a bit. She practically never shut up, actually, as soon as she realized that she was free to talk—Myrtle was her name, and as many times as Sirius wanted to tell her to shut up, he never once did. But, in general, it takes time for them to actually work up to it. No one has ever given their name the first time they were asked.

This man does. "Remus Lupin."

"Are you—are you hungry?" Sirius asks, still just staring at him. He gestures distractedly to the table, never taking his eyes off Remus. "You could just sit the wine on the table and we can pour it for ourselves. Join us. We have plenty."

In all the years Sirius has done this, not one servant would do that, no matter how comfortable they got with him and his tributes. He asked at every meal, and they never agreed.

Remus turns his gaze to the table, then flicks it back to Sirius again. His lips curl up as he says, "I could eat."

Sirius' heart is racing, and he doesn't know why.

Casually, Remus sits the mask down on the table, pulls out a chair, and settles in it. Sirius just keeps standing there, staring at him, oddly dazed, and Regulus has to kick him sharply under the table to get him moving again.

When Sirius pours his wine, he pours a lot.

Chapter End Notes

i saw some of you asking about remus. here he is. not what anyone was expecting, ill bet, but trust the process. there's a reason for all of this, i promise. we do get to see more of him.

also, pandora, fabian, gideon!!! and a dorcas mention! oh and tom riddle, he's here, too. if you're booing him, you're absolutely right to.

thoughts, theories, comments, or concerns?

Training Day One

Chapter Notes

hello, all! 👋

warnings for this chapter:

-references to children dying in the arena (nothing explicit, just mentioned)
-references to past substance abuse, and recovery from it
-a brief, blink-and-you-miss-it reference to suicide through substance abuse (about Alpard)
-vague reference to torture (not explicit with zero details and likely subtle enough that you won't pick up on it, but still, just in case)
-mentions of murder (forced murder, due to the arena)
-references to blatant mistreatment to servants
-brief reference to someone being objectified, even as a minor (kind of like a watered down version of finnick without the forced prostitution (if you've read the books), because i simply do not have it in my heart to do that, but the sentiment behind it is still terrible and not unlike the sexualization that many young actors have had to face, i.e. millie bobby brown, finn wolfhard, etc etc, as examples. i don't dive into it much, it's just mentioned in passing, because it makes me uncomfortable and i hate it) and im pretty sure that's it. the warnings make it seem really bad, but this is actually a fairly cute chapter. enjoy that while it lasts. we've got some fun tension, as well as adorable, awkward bumbling, and a suprise!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

"Now, remember," Sirius says as he leads them towards the training center, "the next three days are really important. Not only are you going to be showing the others what you're capable of, you're also going to be seeing what they're capable of. If you listen to nothing else I tell you, listen to this." He turns and comes to a halt, swiveling to face them, eyes oddly intense. "Regulus, stay away from the daggers."

"What?" Regulus sputters, mouth falling open. He feels betrayed instantly, because frankly, this is unfair. He'd even say it's targeted. "But that's—"

"Listen to me, you utter twat," Sirius cuts in harshly. "You don't understand, there will be eyes on you, and I expect your eyes to be on the others as well. The problem is, you're my little brother, and you're from a family of Victors. That makes you a threat, and you can't let them know that you actually are, do you understand? They'll want to get you out of the way early if they think you'll be a problem."

"Wait, you're good with daggers?" James mumbles, glancing over at him with his eyebrows raised.

Regulus purses his lips and pointedly looks away, which makes Sirius snort. Yes, so Regulus is good with daggers. Sirius made sure he was good with daggers, and even after Sirius stopped having him practice with them, Regulus continued on his own.

It was partially just a game as children, at first. Shamefully, they used to leave school and sneak out of the district to go play-fight with sticks, like they were in the arena before they ever were, back before they could fully grasp why it was something to be genuinely afraid of, back before their names were ever in the reaping and it became a possibility—and now, a reality. As they got older, though, the tone changed to the point that it became unspoken preparation just in case, which is coming in handy now, at least.

Sirius used to make daggers for Regulus out of stone. He would work for months to chip them and shape them, then give them handles. Sometimes, he would find broken glass or discarded metal and find ways to turn them into daggers, too. Sirius stopped making them when he came out of the arena, so Regulus had to learn how. He did, but never as good as Sirius.

But yes, Regulus is good with them. Very good with them, actually, above all else. The fact that Sirius is asking him to make himself look weak is—annoying. It goes against every single one of Regulus' instincts, but he'll do it. He will, because Sirius is asking him to.

"You, James," Sirius says, focusing on him, "you're not going to do any showing off either."

"And what are you good at?" Regulus asks, turning to arch an eyebrow at him.

James chuckles. "That's a long list."

"I'm listening," Regulus says dryly.

"Well, I'm good with my hands," James starts, a smile twitching at the corners of his lips. "Really good, in fact."

Sirius snorts again. "James is strong, but he has precisely zero skills with a weapon of any kind, which is a huge oversight on mine and Effie's part, I'm now realizing. So, James, you're to do some light practicing with any weapon you come across. Long range is preferable, or anything interchangeable, but you'd be surprised how much of the arena is hand-to-hand. Brute strength can get you far, but it doesn't mean you can't be killed. So, try things, get a feel for what works, but do not make a spectacle of yourself. If you turn out to be a god with a sword, then you make sure you drop it a few times so you look like a fucking idiot, do you understand?"

"Shouldn't be too hard for him," Regulus mutters.

James ducks his head forward, shoulders shaking with laughter. Sirius looks exasperated, and Regulus resists the urge to heave a sigh. Insulting James has never worked. He always thinks it's so fucking funny.

"Right," James chokes out. "Got it, Sirius. Understood."

"Focus mainly on swords, axes, and maces. Sadly, you're not going to be able to learn to use a bow or crossbow in just three days," Sirius tells him, then flicks his finger between them both. "You two need to train hand-to-hand together. Do not train with anyone else. Don't let them know the weight of your body, or any of your tells, if you have any. They'll unfortunately be able to watch, but you'll also be able to watch them. Pay attention. I mean that."

"Wait, why does James get to know the weight of my body?" Regulus protests. "He's also the competition."

Sirius glances at James, who holds his gaze for a second before looking down at his hands. Sirius' face twitches, lips pressing into a thin line, and then he looks at Regulus. "He's less of a problem than everyone else, trust me. This is—I know you don't like it, but you'll need allies in the arena, Reggie."

"You're asking me to trust people who are going to be trying to kill me at some point?"

"I'm asking you to trust James. Everyone else? No. Just find the ones you'll trust enough not to hunt you down and try to play nice, yes? You don't want to make enemies; you want to make reluctant allies, in that they'll look the other way if you happen to run past them, rather than chase you."

"I—" Regulus exhales sharply, then grumbles, "Fine."

For a moment, Sirius looks at him more fondly than he has in years, and then that expression fades into worry.

"So, I do get to know the weight of your body?" James speaks up, a tiny quirk to the corner of his mouth that makes Regulus want to hit him.

"I'm literally going to kill you," Regulus informs him flatly.

James' smile grows wider. "Well, you know, if you're on top, that might not be the worst way to go."

"Are you—flirting with my brother?" Sirius asks, baffled, and then he reaches out and swats James over the head. "Stop that. Don't do that."

"Sorry," James mumbles, reaching up to rub the back of his head, coughing. "Just—nerves, you know."

Sirius' face softens, and he looks at Regulus, completely missing the way James raises his head and waggles his eyebrows at Regulus with a wink. Regulus doesn't want to laugh. He refuses to laugh. He fights so hard not to laugh, only just succeeding, but losing the battle against the smile that tugs at his lips. Seeing it, James looks away with a grin.

Utterly oblivious, Sirius continues. "Today, I don't want either of you doing too much of anything. Regulus, you focus on all things environmental. You're good at remembering things, so learn the plants that will kill you, and the ones that won't. Learn what to do if you're too cold, or too hot. Learn how to tie a knot and start a fire and find water. Learn as much as you can as if your life depends on it, because it does."

"Is there any way of knowing what conditions we'll be in when we get to the arena before we get there?"

"No. The gamemakers will be building the arena around all the tributes, what skills you have and also those that you don't. They want a good show, not something too hard that you all die too quickly, but still a challenge. Now, when the evaluation comes up at the end of these three training days, that's when you'll show off your dagger skills, so they know to put them in there for you. Still, you need to be prepared for anything."

"Er, what will I be doing?" James asks, waving a hand.

"Try out a few weapons, but learn the same things Regulus is learning as well," Sirius tells him. "Both of you need to be observant. Watch the others. Pay attention to the allies that form, and find the death eaters."

James blinks. "The what?"

"Death eaters," Sirius repeats. "Every year, the strongest, most skilled tributes will gravitate towards each other and form something of an alliance. They're known as death eaters because —well, the name implies why. They're usually the ones doing the hunting of the others, and I've seen it happen enough times to know that they will pick everyone else off until the end, then turn on each other. You do not want to be their target, because they're ruthless, and they will stop at nothing to find you and kill you."

"Charming," Regulus says under his breath.

"And when we find them...what?" James asks.

"Stay off their radar," Sirius replies simply, "but take note of what they're capable of. That goes for everyone, really. Learning their strengths and weaknesses is ideal, but do your best not to reveal your own. Don't provoke the death eaters, avoid them at all costs, and—and be smart. Look stupid, but be smart. Alright? Say alright."

"Alright," James says immediately, and then he joins Sirius in staring at Regulus expectantly.

Regulus rolls his eyes. "Alright."

So, with that, James and Regulus are set loose in the training room, which is, quite frankly, more intimidating than Regulus was expecting it to be. There are countless mats all over the floor; racks of weapons all throughout the room; different ranges for various bows, axe-throwing, and dagger-throwing; a section for rope climbing; and different places to go to learn about survival skills, bugs, plants, and possible environments they may be subjected to. But that's not the most intimidating part, if Regulus is honest.

It's strange stepping into a room and becoming very intensely aware that these people are going to try to kill him, or he's going to kill some of them. He can feel the shock of it settle into his body as he sees heads swivel towards him and James.

Including him and James, there are twenty-four tributes altogether. That's twenty-two to two —or, more accurately, twenty-three to one. Regulus takes them all in slowly with James right next to him, uncomfortably aware that they're being studied in return. Regulus doesn't even know any of their names. At least six of them are young teenagers, between the ages of thirteen and sixteen.

It puts a knot of discomfort in Regulus' stomach to see them, to think that any of them—any at all—might end up dead by his hand. He doesn't… Unlike some, he's not going into the arena with the desire to kill. Some tributes actually do; they look forward to it. Regulus doesn't, and he has no plans to kill anyone unless he has no other choice.

When Sirius was in the arena, he never killed anyone who wasn't trying to kill him. He even once helped a girl escape a trap. Regulus remembers watching him cry when her name and picture played in a banner in the sky, signaling that she'd died. No, Sirius never killed just to kill; he killed when the only other option was to be killed. You'd think that would be mean he didn't kill very much, and yet, he killed twelve people.

Regulus knows, because he counted as he watched.

Twelve people. Literally half of his competition. It makes Regulus wonder how he handled his three days of training, and how he knows that coming from a family of Victors makes things harder for them. Thinking back, Regulus recalls that Sirius was a target. Regulus thinks he knows why now.

With a brief look exchanged between him and James, they split off and go their separate ways. For the first time, Regulus really understands what Sirius meant about the games already being started. He understands all too well.

It doesn't take long for Regulus to locate the death eaters. They're not even shy about it, clustering together and using weapons like toys. It's all loud laughter and dirty looks with them. There's two older men and one woman, clearly around Regulus' age, and one boy who's much younger, looking to be around fourteen or fifteen. Regulus does his best not to look at them, even though he can feel them looking at him.

In between what he's doing, he scans the room, mentally filing away anything of importance. There are two other people who are essentially doing the same thing as him, learning all they can about survival, so he can't really pick up anything from them. There's one teenager absolutely demolishing a training dummy by repeatedly beating it with a club; there's no finesse to it, so Regulus assumes she's just an angry girl.

At one point, Regulus sees James talking to someone while tossing a hatchet from one hand to the other. The guy has kind eyes and round cheeks, and he's laughing at something James is saying to him. Regulus looks away.

After a bit, Regulus has got it down. He's memorized faces, if nothing else, and he has a mental list of who can do what just based on what he's seen so far.

It's at the fire-starter station that James finds him again.

"You look focused," James whispers as he crouches down next to him and watches as Regulus spins a stick back and forth.

"Yes, well, this does take focus."

"It doesn't look like it's working."

"It also takes time and patience, James."

"You sound frustrated."

Regulus grits his teeth. "What do you want? Are you over here to learn to start a fire, or just to pester me?"

"Can't I do both?" James asks lightly, shuffling to settle next to him with the tools the station provides, which isn't very much. Just things you'd find out in the wild. There's an instructional video and a book with clear steps, as well as pictures, which he pays attention to enough to actually shut up for a while. He does eventually speak again, though. "So, take a guess as to who the death eaters are."

"I saw them."

"They have a child with them. I can't work out why, and I don't like it."

"Sirius will likely know," Regulus murmurs, his own lips tipping down. He also doesn't like it.

James hums. "They talked to me, you know. The death eaters."

"Really?"

"Yes. Tried to recruit me, since they're under the impression that I want you dead. They want you dead, because they're assuming you're a threat, so Sirius was right."

"Lovely," Regulus says flatly. "And?"

"And what?"

"What did you tell them?"

"Oh, I told them all to fuck off. Well, not the child; he's very quiet, as far as I can tell," James muses.

Regulus' hands halt on the stick as his head snaps up. "You what? James, Sirius said—oh, he's going to kill you. We're not supposed to be provoking them, you idiot."

"Well, I was polite. Mostly," James grumbles. "What was I supposed to do, Regulus? Join them? I'm not—I won't do that. I won't even pretend to do that."

"You've just put a target on your own back, you do realize?"

"Shouldn't you be relieved by such a thing? Better chances of survival for you, isn't it?"

"James," Regulus hisses, glaring at him.

Heaving a sigh, James lifts his head to stare at him, his own hands going still on his stick. "Staying off their radar is hard to do when we're already on it to begin with, yeah? They wanted to know where I stood, and they weren't going to let me avoid it, so I just… Well, I made it clear. There's no world in which I would sink low enough to align myself with people like them. They're already talking about all the killing they're going to do, Regulus, and I—I don't—I can't—"

"Alright," Regulus cuts in. "Alright, James." It's the most that Regulus has seen James lose his composure during all of this, and that's not something Regulus can stand. He looks back down at his stick and starts over. "Did you at least find a weapon that you were comfortable enough with?"

"Well, you know, I used to chop wood for the fireplace in our house, something I did so Mum and Dad didn't have to," James explains, sounding steadier again. "It turns out, doing that a lot over the years gets you comfortable with hatchets. I never really thought of them as weapons, but…I don't feel like I have no idea what I'm doing with them, so there's that."

"They're not very clean," Regulus murmurs. "I mean, killing someone with that will be brutal, James."

"Killing someone with anything is brutal, Regulus. With these, they're also long range, if you throw them."

"There's an art to throwing weapons. You can't just toss them about as you like. Well, you can, but without practice, the chances of it actually landing are very low."

"And you would know?" James asks.

Regulus huffs a weak laugh. "I'd know better than you."

"That's true, I'll give you that," James admits. "I've spoken to a few people. Have you?"

"No," Regulus says.

James sighs. "Well, it's only day one."

"So it is," Regulus agrees. "Find anyone you like enough to trust yet?"

"You," James says.

Regulus nearly falters again, but he's in no mood to start over. That one word and the tone in which James said it makes him start to rub the stick faster, and world of wonders, smoke begins to rise up. He draws the stick away and leans over, carefully blowing on the spark to get it to catch, pulling away as the fire starts to build.

"Shit, how did you do that?" James blurts out, and Regulus looks over to see him gaping at his fire.

"Well, for one thing, you're holding it all wrong," Regulus mutters, reaching out to cover James' hands and situate them properly. "You want to rotate in a downward motion, so you're creating friction that will catch. Try it now." James does not try, his hands still. "James? Just roll downward and—"

Regulus looks up and stops talking, because James isn't even paying attention. He's just looking at him, scanning his face where they're leaning close together. Regulus' fingers twitch against James' hands, and he means to pull away, but he finds it impossible to move when James is staring at him so intently.

"I do trust you, you know," James whispers.

"You shouldn't," Regulus whispers back. "I said I wouldn't hesitate, and I meant it."

"I'll believe that when you prove it."

"Are you asking me to kill you?"

"Daring you," James corrects, holding his gaze, looking at him like he knows Regulus won't, and that's what makes him so dangerous, because Regulus is afraid he's right.

Regulus jerks his hands back like he's been burned, and he shoves to his feet to march away, drawing too much attention. But it's James' gaze on him he feels when he goes.

~•~

Sirius watches Marlene raise her hand for another drink, slumped over the bar. She's looking rough, but much better than last year, and the one before it.

Four years ago, she won her games, and she's been a mentor ever since, so she's on year three now. Sirius has sort of taken her under his wing, giving her as much help as he can. He remembers her games; he remembers that she killed one of his tributes; he remembers thinking that she would be one of the first to die, then being surprised when she was the last one standing.

This year, both of Marlene's tributes are under sixteen. One is fourteen, and the other is fifteen, younger than both Sirius and Marlene when they entered their own games.

"They're going to die," Marlene murmurs, staring down into the glass that's pushed her way. "They're so—Sirius, they're so young, and they're terrified, and I don't—"

"Marlene," Sirius says gently, and she falls silent.

There's an odd understanding between mentors. Or, most of them. There are exceptions, usually the ones that are mentors of the death eaters; they generally thrive on the games as much as their tributes, and the Hallows. Among those are Lucius Malfoy, Antonin Dolohov, and Corban Yaxley.

Despite the fact that their tributes will all be competing, most mentors spend enough time together to become friends. They're all in the same boat, really, and there's nothing like a bond formed between those that understand the same thing, especially when no one else truly can. They know that their tributes will all be slaughtering one another very soon, but that's not something they can escape, or avoid, so they have to coexist with that reality. Most of them do. Among those are Sirius himself, Marlene McKinnon, Frank Longbottom, and Emmeline Vance.

Early on, getting attached to tributes is commonplace. You grow to care for them, get to know them, and try so fucking hard to save them—and most of the time, you don't manage to. At most, you can only save one, and the chance of that is literally eight percent. Sirius has done the math. He knows.

So, watching your tributes die is never easy, especially when you've come to care for them. You have so much hope for that eight percent, but the reality is, you likely won't get it. Sirius has never gotten it. Neither has Marlene, in the two years prior that she's been a mentor. There are twelve mentors, and only one of them can bring home one Victor; the chances of that being you is also eight percent. That's what they don't tell you. The odds are never in your favor.

Sirius has learned the hard way to not get attached, to do everything he can for his tributes, but face the brutal truth that they'll likely die. It doesn't make it sting less when they do, but it's the only way he can cope with it. Marlene is still struggling to learn to cope with it. Sirius knows how hard it is.

"And the worst part is that everyone knows it," Marlene says, finally, unable to let it go. "They all know that they're not going to make it, so I have sponsors already brushing me off, and it doesn't help that my design team is complete shit. I have nothing—absolutely nothing — to work with, Sirius."

Wincing, Sirius reaches out and pushes her glass up from the bottom, encouraging her to drink. It's probably not the best thing for coping, especially with how easily it becomes a crutch, but sometimes—well, sometimes, there's no other way to cope other than dulling the senses. Sirius was very bad about it when he first returned from his games, before James repeatedly dried him out, before he learned moderation. Not that James really gave him much of a choice.

He was never harsh about it. That was the worst part. He never complained, or got upset, or begged him to do better and try harder. He just took care of him without question, every single time. He didn't blame Sirius when he turned right around and did it again and again; he just picked him up, cleaned him up, and helped. It was James who kept him from choking on his own vomit; it was James who swept through his room and removed every drink and drug he had; it was James who bathed him when he couldn't bathe himself, dressed him when he was shaking too hard to do so, and believed in him every time he got better, even when Sirius had gotten worse all over again so many times before. It was James who kept him from killing himself just like his uncle Alphard.

So, through James' quiet, steady determination to take care of him, Sirius picked himself back up and did better, because he loves James enough that he wouldn't keep putting all of that on him. He knew—they both knew—that James would take care of him like that for the rest of their lives and still smile at him each day, and Sirius couldn't do that to him. He refused.

"Marlene, you're doing everything you can," Sirius tells her quietly, his lips tipping down.

"Am I?" Merlene croaks, squeezing her eyes shut as she presses her glass to her forehead.

Sirius sighs. "You are. Listen to me, you are. I know you, and that act you put on with the sponsors; that's not you. Who are you doing that for, if not them?"

"It's not working," Marlene whispers.

"You're doing your best."

"That's not enough."

"It has to be." Sirius reaches out and plucks the glass from her hand, waiting for her to meet his eyes. "It has to be, because that's all you can do. That's all you can do, Marlene."

Marlene shudders out a deep breath, looking away. "If I could go in and die for them, I would."

"I know," Sirius says softly, because he does know. He knows that even more intimately now, considering who his tributes are this year. Every cell in his body craves to take either of their places and die so that they don't have to.

"What about you?" Marlene mutters, glancing over at him again. "You have it rough this year. Your brother, your best friend, and a new design team. How's that going, then?"

Sirius hesitates. Marlene is a friend, and he trusts her more than any other mentor, but it's still not wise to reveal too much information. He won't take that risk, not with Regulus and James on the line. So, he opts for discussing the safest option, the one that Marlene has granted him. "So far, the new design team seems really quite good. Much better than the years before. The lead is Dorcas. I haven't spoken much to her, but she's gotten James and Regulus' measurements from Gideon and Fabian already, and she's working on something, so that's promising. She'll be meeting them tomorrow."

"Dorcas… Dorcas… Dorcas Meadowes?" Marlene asks, her eyebrows shooting up.

"Yes, I think so. Why? Do you know her?"

"Not personally, but… Well, she's made a name for herself as a stylist. She makes statements with her work, enough that some of the more pretentious people have sworn her off."

"Oh, I like her already," Sirius says, then pauses. "Probably."

"For a Hallow, she's…" Marlene clears her throat. "Well, you know, most of them look ridiculous. She...doesn't."

"Is that so, McKinnon?" Sirius asks, arching an eyebrow at her, and she purses her lips and averts her eyes.

Sirius would be the last person to judge her for having something with a Hallow, despite the fact that he's never done it, though no one actually knows that. Rumors drift through the Hallow, and the ones surrounding him have a lot to do with all the apparent sexual relations he's having with everyone. It's been like this since he won his games, even at sixteen years old, because he flirts and charms and teases, and he never outright denies or confirms any insinuation that people make. That's what they like—the mystery, and the little hope they have in the back of their heads that, someday, they'll get their turn with him if they do or say the right thing. He's had many propositions and bribes, but he's a master at sidestepping them and still maintaining his reputation.

Everyone thinks he's had many lovers, especially those that are Hallows, but the last thing Sirius did was kiss Mary when he was sixteen, just a few days before the reaping that ended with him volunteering for his brother. They weren't even dating. They didn't even go any farther than that, and that was as far as he'd ever gone. Becoming a sex symbol for the Hallows had left a bitter taste in his mouth, because he knows people only want him just to say that they had him, not for him.

"Oh, look at the time," Marlene mumbles, shooting up out of her chair. She darts her gaze to the clock on the wall. "I think training should be over now. I need to go meet with my tributes, and you should do the same."

"Mhm," Sirius hums, lips twitching, but he dutifully gets up nonetheless, because she's not wrong.

When Sirius makes it back to the suite, James and Regulus are indeed back, and they're both being lectured by Pandora. Sirius doesn't really know for what, but they seem sullen, and they both perk up and look relieved when he comes in.

"Whatever they did, they didn't," Sirius announces, putting a soothing hand on Pandora's shoulder, and she shoots him a cross look before plopping down in her chair with a huff. Sirius settles down across from Regulus and James, elbows on his knees as he leans forward. "So, what did we learn?"

"James is fucking stupid," Regulus blurts out immediately, and James tosses his hands up. "He told the death eaters to go fuck themselves, Sirius."

"You—" Sirius darts his gaze to James, who shrinks down a little bit and drops his eyes. Sirius reaches up and pinches the bridge of his nose, eyes shut tight, a headache already forming as he whispers, "Of course you did. The very thing I told you not to do, of course you did it."

"I'm sorry," James whines, distressed. "They tried to recruit me, Sirius! What was I supposed to do? I—I said it...nicely?"

Sirius drops his hand and sighs. "You told them nicely to go fuck themselves?"

"I was very polite," James mumbles.

"That doesn't—" Sirius inhales deeply, then slowly exhales, forcing himself to relax. "Alright, let's just… So, they tried to recruit you? Why? Did you do anything?"

James shakes his head quickly. "No, I swear I didn't. I barely even picked up a few weapons before they came over to me. Er, the main leader seems to be Mulciber, but it's also Avery, Bernice, and a younger boy named Hodge. He's—he's really young, Sirius. Tiny, really."

"Yes, that's normal for the death eaters. They take on one or two people who aren't actually all that strong. Disposable people. The weakest links that they kill first if they all reach the end. I'm assuming they wanted you to be the second?"

"I—well, I don't know. I don't think so. They—they wanted me because they thought I would want to help them kill Regulus."

"Ah," Sirius says softly, working to keep his expression neutral as his heart plummets. He'd hoped—oh how he'd hoped that Regulus wouldn't be a target just for his name. He'd hoped that there would be some chance that Regulus would escape that unscathed, because Sirius hadn't managed to.

"I didn't really have a choice other than to accept or refuse. I was put on the spot, Sirius. What should I have done? Joined them?" James asks, his eyes wide.

Sirius sighs. "I should have anticipated that. You and Regulus are being pitted against each other, which is less than ideal. It's like—sides. Team James versus Team Regulus. No, I would never say join the death eaters, because they're fucking awful, but this is...not good. Very not good. Not only is Regulus a target, but so are you now, James."

"So much for staying off their radar," Regulus mutters.

"Do not provoke them any further, either of you," Sirius insists, glancing between them almost desperately.

"It's too late, isn't it?" James murmurs.

"Yes," Sirius confirms, dread in his veins. "They'll be coming for both of you now, so the plan has changed. Regulus, when you go in tomorrow, you go right for the daggers. James, did you find anything you were comfortable with?"

"Ah, hatchets?" James says awkwardly.

"Practice with them," Sirius tells him. "And you two—you stay together. Remain within a few steps of one another at all times. Put up a united front and make sure they know that you're not going to be easy targets. Some people are more soft around the middle than they seem, and if you can intimidate them, you can make them think twice about targeting you first. Don't train hand-to-hand tomorrow; you'll do that on your last day. Tomorrow is about showing everyone that you are a threat."

"Confidence is key," Pandora says. "I've watched even the strongest and most self-assured tributes falter because another one was more certain they'd win than them. The games are more than just physical; they're mind games, too."

Regulus raises his eyebrows. "So, you do want us to provoke them?"

"No," Sirius counters. "I want you to intimidate them from afar. We want them wary, not angry. Continue to avoid them, and never approach them directly. You, James, I'm assuming you at least talked to other tributes, if Regulus didn't."

"Yeah, a few," James admits. "There was one man I really liked. Peter Pettigrew. He's gentle. Harmless, really. Squeamish, too, he said. He's pretty sure he's going to die very quickly, and he's terrified."

"And what can he do?" Sirius asks.

James blinks, opening his mouth, then closing it. "Er, well, I don't know. I saw him with a knife a few times, but he didn't look like he knew what to do with it."

"Anyone else?" Sirius tries, his voice strained.

"There's Vanity," James says weakly. "She's brilliant with bugs. Knew them all just by picture. She's, er, fifteen."

Sirius' eyes flutter shut. "Who else?"

"I got on well with Irene, Dylan, and Mathias."

"And what could they do?"

"Mathias is good with the crossbow. I watched them. They hit the target nine times."

"How many times did they shoot?"

"...Twenty-seven."

"Twenty-seven."

James heaves a sigh as Sirius' eyes open. "What do you want me to say, Sirius? They're the ones I got on with, alright?"

The ones who are going to die, Sirius thinks, but he won't say it. It sits like a lump in his throat anyway, and he flicks his gaze away to land on Regulus. "And you? Anyone at all?"

"There was one," Regulus says, and James looks startled by this. Sirius is also surprised. "I didn't actually speak to him, but I watched him. He mostly stayed alone, not even spending time with the other person from his district. Just—he's smart, and he can climb. He spent a lot of time at the hanging-ropes, and he ties knots quicker than I've ever seen."

"Oh, I know who you're talking about," James blurts out, his eyes wide. "Evan Rosier. I talked to him for about a minute or two. He showed me how to tie a knot out of vines. He was quiet, though, and he mostly seemed to want to be left alone."

"He goes unnoticed," Regulus adds.

"There's potential there," Sirius mutters. "See if anything comes of it, I suppose, but don't force it. You don't want to agitate him enough that he builds you a noose."

"Thank you for that lovely mental imagery, Sirius," Regulus says with a grimace, reaching up to lightly touch his throat.

"You look tired," James comments, eyebrows furrowed, because trust James to worry about him, even now.

"I'm fine," Sirius lies, smiling tightly. "I just need a shower."

Pandora reaches out to nudge his knee. "Go on, go have a shower. I'll tend to them for a bit. Dinner won't be for a few hours yet, so we have time to rest."

"Yeah, alright," Sirius mumbles, because the Hallow always makes him feel dirty, and he can never feel clean.

"Do you need towels?" Pandora asks.

"I do, yeah, thanks," Sirius says as he shuffles away, trusting her to handle it. She's one of the few Hallows he actually trusts at all. No one knows how much work she puts in, honestly.

In his room, Sirius putters around, grabbing the clothes he'll change into, still in the ones he wore to charm sponsors today. It's like putting on a uniform, and Sirius always misses his clothes back home when he's here. Everything here is just cashmere and silk and satin, things that objectively feel and look good, but it's not his patchy, beat-up leather jacket that he's worn for years. Perhaps it was ridiculous, but when he'd made it home after his games, he'd curled around that jacket and cried into it like a child. He was so scared it wouldn't fit him anymore, like he was a different person in an entirely different body, and yet it did. To this day, it still fits.

There's a knock on his door, and when he answers it, Remus is standing on the other side with a stack of white, fluffy towels. Sirius sucks in a sharp breath, blinking rapidly.

Stupidly, the first thing he blurts out is, "You're not wearing the mask."

"I was under the impression I didn't have to here," Remus replies. "Oh, and hello. I've brought your requested towels."

"You don't. I mean, hello. Hi. No, ah, you don't have to wear it, of course not," Sirius says in a rush. "I just—well, most people don't take them off. I usually have to take them off for them."

"Doesn't make much of a difference who removes it, does it? Either way, if I'm caught or found out, I'll be killed, or worse," Remus murmurs, lifting a shoulder in a half-shrug.

"We won't tell anyone, and no one will catch you here," Sirius assures him. He pauses. "Worse… Worse than dying."

"There are worse things," Remus tells him. "I know. I've experienced them."

"Me too," Sirius admits quietly, startled into honesty.

Remus looks at him for a long moment, then he nods. "Right, well, I have your towels."

"Oh! Oh, yeah, um…" Sirius clears throat and steps back. "You can come in. I'm just—I'm getting ready for a shower."

"Would you like me to hang them outside the shower for you?"

"Oh, no, no you don't have to do that. You can just sit them on the bed. Thank you."

"You're welcome," Remus says as he moves into the room to sit the towels down on the bed.

Sirius goes back into his closet, despite the fact that he's already picked his clothes. He's sort of just hiding. In his closet. Coughing, he raises his voice to ask, "So, would it be too terribly cliche of me to ask what your crime was, Remus?"

"What happens if I don't want to answer?" Remus replies.

"Well...don't?" Sirius frowns at the selection of dresses in front of him. There are so many sequins. "If you don't want to, you don't have to. That goes for anything, really, at least with me."

There's a long beat, then, "I don't want to answer."

"Alright," Sirius agrees promptly.

"Do you need anything else, Mr. Black?"

"Oh, don't—you don't have to call me that. Just Sirius is fine."

"Do you need anything else, Just Sirius?" Remus asks, a vague note of amusement in his voice.

Sirius briefly drops his face into his hands, then repeatedly taps the heel of his hand against his forehead. Taking a deep breath, he lifts his head and turns to step out of the closet, utterly empty-handed. "Sirius. I meant, call me Sirius."

"Sirius," Remus says softly, his lips curled up at the corners. He holds Sirius' gaze as he nods. "Do you need anything else, Sirius? Anything at all?"

"Do you?" Sirius blurts out.

Remus blinks. "Sorry?"

"Just—I mean, is there anything you need?" Sirius asks, feeling dangerously close to fidgeting. "Are you hungry? You can join us for supper again, if you like."

"Well, sure, but first I have to cook it," Remus tells him.

Sirius pauses, then murmurs, "You're using our kitchen to do it, aren't you?"

"Yes."

"Do you need help?"

"I don't."

"Do you...want help?"

Remus stares at him for a long moment once again, and his lips twitch up further. His eyes do this thing where they soften at the corners, and it's making Sirius' stomach flip over like it's tumbling down a hill. "If you'd like."

"Would you like?" Sirius checks.

"I would like your company," Remus clarifies.

Sirius is not at all prepared for the effect those words have on his body. He's pretty sure he's flushing from head-to-toe, and he reaches up to swipe his hand over his mouth to hide his growing grin as he looks away. "Yeah, alright. When do you plan to start, then?"

"In an hour. You have enough time for a shower."

"Brilliant. I'll—be there."

"Alright, Sirius," Remus says with a huff of laughter. "Am I excused?"

"What?" Sirius blinks, then jolts. "Oh! Oh, yeah, of course. You don't have to ask. You can just come and go as you like and leave whenever you're ready. Or not leave. I mean, if you—just if you're not...ready. Um."

"Alright," Remus repeats, then gives him a lingering look before turning around and walking away without another word, a quiet chuckle escaping him as he goes.

Sirius' face burns, and he grabs the towels to muffle a groan into them as he heads to the shower. On the way, he bumps directly into a wall, because of course he does.

~•~

The thing about being a servant of the Hallows is that you get very used to going unseen, so much so that you're hyper aware of being noticed, to the point that you can feel eyes on you.

Remus can feel eyes on him now, in the kitchen, as he chops vegetables in the machine provided. He's slightly turned away from the door, so he can't see who's watching him, but he doesn't need three guesses to work out who it is.

Remus has never been seen before in the Hallow, until Sirius.

For a while, Remus doesn't lift his head, wondering how long Sirius is going to keep looking at him without announcing himself. No one's ever done that before; just observed him, like there's something worth looking at. Not here, in the Hallow. Here, he's just a shadow passing through a room, completely ignored, less impactful than the fucking furniture.

Sirius had, in so many words, changed his life in a split second. For that moment when he was reaching up to remove the mask on Remus' face, Remus quite literally saw his life flash before his eyes—and it wasn't exactly a life he was proud of, at least not since he was brought to the Hallow. And what did he have to look forward to? More of the same? So, in that split second, Remus had almost welcomed it.

But that's not what it turned out to be at all. Instead, it was and is something much more peculiar than Remus could have ever prepared himself for.

People, as a rule, do not care about the servants. They just—don't. It doesn't matter if they're Hallows, or tributes, or mentors; there's no point in caring about the servants, because there's nothing to be done for them. Their fate is sealed, until death, and there's no way to help them. So, people don't try, and they don't care.

Remus can't blame them, really. That's easier, isn't it? They're all servants to the Hallow, in a way; he's just more obvious about it. Not that he has much of a choice, but alas.

Sirius cares. He cares enough to notice them, enough to give them the space and freedom to fucking breathe properly, to speak to them and treat them like they're actual human beings. He cares enough to repeatedly undermine the clear position he has over them, willing to let Remus address him by his name, offering choices and free will. He cares enough that he's made it the standard in his presence, to the point that everyone around him follows it, and accepts it.

And, look, Remus has heard about Sirius Black. Of course he has. The servants know everything about everything, because they may be silent, but they still listen. Remus has heard it all; he's just not the type of person to believe a damn thing about someone before he meets them. The only impression he trusts is his own, and Sirius—well, he's made quite the impression.

Remus pulls out the tray of chopped vegetables, gently sliding them into the pan. Everything in the kitchen is geared towards safety, so Remus has no access to anything sharp or hot, a failsafe in case he gets any ideas. Even the pans on the stove lock in place and self-stir, meaning he can't actually pick anything up. It does provide a mostly hands-free cooking experience, at least, so there's that.

Sirius is still there, and Remus can't take it anymore, so he glances over to find that Sirius is watching him like every move he makes is fascinating. He's lost in doing that for a beat, and then he jolts when he seems to realize that he's caught. He straightens up and coughs.

"Hi, sorry, I was just—" Sirius makes a vague gesture with his hand in Remus' direction. "I've never seen that used, so…"

"It's fairly simple. Do you want to try?" Remus asks, motioning towards it with an onion not yet chopped.

"Oh. Sure," Sirius says, shuffling further into the kitchen. He hesitates when he gets closer to Remus, like he isn't sure he's allowed in his space. He even gestures to make sure, and Remus fights a smile as he nods.

This. This is the man that attempted to remove the mask from his face without even asking. He's so...unexpected.

His hair is curling over his shoulder in damp ringlets again, just like the first night that Remus saw him, glossy in the overhead lights. Remus can smell his shampoo, something like rosemary and mint. Sirius stares at the machine, hands limp on the counter, and then he looks at Remus, visibly lost.

Remus struggles not to laugh. He doesn't think he's struggled this much in a long time. "You were watching, weren't you?"

"Yeah, you," Sirius replies, then immediately starts falling over his words. "I mean, not—I wasn't—I just meant, I was watching how you were—"

"Sirius," Remus interrupts, and he gets a thrill from doing so. He wouldn't be able to do that with anyone else, but Sirius lets him. He even snaps his mouth shut, his cheeks red. "I'll just show you again. I promise it's not complicated."

Sirius nods, his blush spreading, and Remus marvels for a second that this is the Sirius Black famous for being a smooth, charming man that can beguile anyone he meets. So far, Remus has learned that Sirius is a stuttering mess, mostly. A beautiful stuttering mess, but still. It's not exactly what Remus was expecting from the man rumored to have a string of satisfied lovers all throughout the Hallow. Remus likes the beautiful stuttering mess more, if he's honest.

Remus grabs the onion and knocks it down to the counter, then grips it and cracks it open right down the middle, putting one half aside for Sirius to use and showing him how to use the machine with the other. Sirius briefly goes into a coughing fit, but he bangs on his chest and blinks rapidly, muttering that he's fine as he watches intently.

When it's Sirius' turn, something goes wrong.

"I think I broke it," Sirius whispers, eyes wide.

"You didn't break it."

"Remus, I'm pretty sure I broke it. The tray won't come out."

"Hold on, let me see," Remus says, yet again struggling not to laugh at the wariness in Sirius' tone. He offers him a small smile and tugs the machine closer, lifting it to peer at it from the bottom. After a beat, he hums and drops it. "Well, you broke it. Lovely. They're going to take my fingers for this."

Sirius makes an odd choking noise. "What? No, that's not—"

"I'm joking," Remus cuts in with a snort, reaching out to press the maintenance button. It starts to whir. "You just held the chopper too long, so the onion got caught in the mechanism. Give it a moment, and it'll spit it out."

"Oh, don't do that. You nearly gave me a heart attack," Sirius blurts out, staring at him incredulously.

"Yes, sir," Remus says, inclining his head.

"No. No, I didn't mean—that wasn't an order, or—I mean, I don't give orders. Don't do what I say."

"Ever?"

"Well, not if you don't want to. Just—do whatever you want."

"Yes, sir."

"You don't—Remus, you don't have to call me that," Sirius tells him, a strain in his voice.

Remus can't keep a straight face anymore. Helplessly, a smile breaks out onto his face. "Yeah, still joking, Sirius."

"Oh." Sirius blinks at him. He has unfairly thick and long eyelashes. "You're fucking with me."

"Quite a bit, yes," Remus admits. Sirius huffs a startled laugh, shaking his head in awe. "Sorry, you'll have to forgive me. I don't get to fuck with anyone anymore. I miss it."

Sirius clears his throat and leans up against the counter, chewing on his lip. "How long has it been since you've gotten to? You don't have to answer, of course."

"Five years," Remus answers anyway. Knowing he doesn't have to makes him feel comfortable doing so. "I've been a servant for five years."

"Not here," Sirius declares, sounding certain. "I've never seen you here before."

"Maybe you just didn't notice me," Remus murmurs, flicking his gaze towards him, curious.

"No, I definitely would have noticed you," Sirius says, looking down at his hands where he plays restlessly with his fingers. He's still biting his lower lip. Remus hopes he never stops.

"You're right. Sort of," Remus tells him, and Sirius' head snaps up, eyebrows furrowed. "For the first three years, no, I wasn't here. The last two, yes, but I wasn't allowed to work at any gathering events, and I'd never been assigned to work with you, so that's why you never saw me."

"You weren't allowed to work events?"

"Too many penalties."

"Penalties," Sirius echoes, baffled.

Remus chuckles. "Servants gain penalties for not doing their duties properly, or any unacceptable behavior. They come from complaints. You're looking at a repeat offender of daring to roll my eyes. Oh, and once, I accidentally spilled wine on a government official's very nice shirt."

"Accidentally?" Sirius asks, lips curling up.

"He made a bet on someone dying in the games, and he was laughing and boasting because he won the bet, rather than reacting like anyone sane and being upset that someone had just died," Remus explains. "So, no, not accidentally."

Sirius looks at him with blatant respect. Remus can see it, that gleam in his eyes, something heavy and warm. "Yeah? Well, good. It's the least he deserved. What do the penalties mean?"

"Punishment. Further conditioning. Particular assignments that keep them from having the opportunity to mess up anywhere else," Remus says. "Too many penalties is death, but no one knows how many. I had four before I got my shit together enough to end up here."

"We won't complain, if that helps. You could quite literally pour an entire bottle of wine on my head, and we still wouldn't complain," Sirius tells him, and Remus laughs. It makes Sirius grin at him. "Is there a reward system, or something? What if I give you a glowing review? What do you get?"

"Nothing," Remus replies, and Sirius' grin fades. Remus doesn't like that, so he tugs on the tray, watching it pop out with the chopped onion on it. "There you are. One chopped onion. See? You didn't break it."

"Which is fortunate. You know how some people like to tinker? Like, you put things in their hands, and they'll fix them or build something out of them?"

"I suppose."

"Yeah, well, I'm the opposite," Sirius informs him sheepishly, holding up his hands. "I'm really fucking destructive, usually not even meaning to be. I just—I pick things apart. Ruin them. So, you know, if you ever need something broken, I'm your man." He sighs and puts his hands down. "Sorry, I don't think I'm going to be much help. I might actually break something."

Remus can see this is a sore point for him, and it makes his heart clench in his chest in a way he thought nothing in the Hallow ever could. "Well, it's good that I don't need your help, isn't it? You're here because I want your company, remember? You can't really get that wrong."

Like before, Sirius' entire face goes so red that Remus almost pities him. The flush dips all the way down his neck, too. Has no one ever wanted him for his company before, just to have him around? That's incredibly sad, Remus can't help but think. He's not a servant, not as Remus is, so why does no one see him? Remus sees him. He's looking right at him, and he has no desire to look away. That's not proper, and he really shouldn't, but he's not good at being proper or doing what he should.

"I really could," Sirius mumbles as he looks away. "Get it wrong, I mean. Trust me, Remus, I really could."

"I don't think so." Remus ducks his head to catch his gaze, smiling at him. "Prove me wrong. I dare you."

"Well, if you insist," Sirius breathes out, then proceeds to lift himself on the counter, swinging his legs like a child and grinning like he can't help it, like he's so pleased to be here.

Remus goes back to cooking, and Sirius starts talking, and by the time the meal is ready, the only thing Sirius has succeeded in doing is proving Remus right.

Chapter End Notes

new POV unlocked!!!!

remus, my beloved <3 i can't believe people were worried that i would kill remus off. REMUS??? the light and love of my life???? pfft, i would never recover. he may have hard times, but don't worry, remus is safe.

also marlene, my love. and we got a lot of mentions of other people we will eventually see more of.

also², im sure you recognized some names of other tributes, and on that, i have no comment.

thanks for reading <3

Final Training Days

Chapter Notes

hey-o! happy saturday, everyone! i think you're going to like this chapter :)

warnings:

-brief and vague references to sirius' struggles after he got out of the arena, but nothing too heavy
-references to murder (in self-defense) in the name of explaining weapons
-the common theme of death (because of the whole fighting to the death in the arena thing)
-some light (non-violent) sparring
-flirting. ridiculous amounts of flirting.

and yeah, im pretty sure that's it. this is surprisingly a light chapter. it's even sort of fun, actually.

enjoy <3

(EDIT: changed the chapter title because im a neurotic mess, and i hate that all my chapters EXCEPT THIS ONE, had 3 words or less for chapter titles, so i fixed it to match. anyway, carry on)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Regulus is already tired of this, and it's only day two. He's been in the Hallow for three days altogether, and he just wants to go home, at this point. Instead, for the second time, he's walking into the training room with James and strict instructions to never stray too far from him.

Yeah, Regulus is the unluckiest sod in the world.

James, meanwhile, beams at another tribute and waves happily at her. The young girl perks up a little and waves back. Rather cheerfully, James says, "That's Vanity Clyde. She has three siblings, all younger, and a mild obsession with bugs."

"Right," Regulus mutters, struggling not to grimace. Oh, he wishes James didn't know that. He wishes James wouldn't get so invested in people; it's going to break his fucking heart when they die. "I'm going to get daggers."

"I'll come with you."

"Of course you will."

"Sirius literally told me to," James reminds him.

Regulus rolls his eyes as they move through the room. There are a lot of gazes on them at the moment, watching their every move. "You just do everything Sirius says, do you?"

"Well, don't you?" James challenges.

"No," Regulus snaps, as if he's not doing exactly that. He can't help it. Sirius has been through this before, and if there is anyone in this world who Regulus trusts wholeheartedly, no matter what, it's Sirius. When it comes down to life and death—and this certainly is—Sirius is who he looks to.

It's ironic, really, because with everything else… Well, in day-to-day life back home, Regulus didn't look to Sirius for anything, and Sirius didn't really give him anything to look at. When he returned a Victor, he'd come home lost, as if he did lose, as if parts of him died in that arena. Whatever those parts were, they were the parts that Regulus had claim to, and then they were gone. Never seen again.

James was the only one who had Sirius after that. It was James that Sirius needed, not Regulus. Sirius couldn't even look at him sometimes. It was equally hard for Regulus to look at Sirius, knowing that everything that happened to him was his fault. All those parts of him that died when he won, Regulus is the one who killed them, and he didn't even choose to. Sirius made that choice for him when he volunteered.

Sirius never said it. He has never said it, and Regulus thinks he will die before he ever admits it, but Regulus is sure that Sirius regrets taking his place.

But it's Regulus' turn now, and all of those issues can't exist here, as Sirius said. It's about surviving, and of course Regulus instinctively looks to Sirius for that. If not for Sirius, Regulus wouldn't have survived to make it here at all.

"So, how do you know which ones you'll like?" James whispers directly in his ear when they stop in front of an entire display of various daggers.

Regulus jerks away, the proximity of him and the warmth of his breath over Regulus' neck making his skin prickle. He huffs. "Can I just—have a little space? Sirius didn't say you need to stand on top of me, James. Fucking hell."

"Well, he didn't say I couldn't," James replies, grinning when Regulus cuts him a sharp look, but he's dutifully stepping away, giving him the space he's asked for. "But really, how do you know which ones you'll like? There are...a lot."

There are, in fact, a lot of different daggers. There are traditional daggers, made of different metals; small, yet deadly push-daggers; karambits, with the curved, claw-like blade; stilettos with the thin, needle-like blade; and there's even a selection of balisongs, or butterfly knives, as they're known. Regulus feels like a child stepping into a sweet shop, except it's just him and a variety of pointy weapons. He would like one of each, please.

"These aren't the most efficient option, depending on the situation, even if they're fun," Regulus murmurs as he picks up a balisong. "You have to be quick and practiced to open them if they're closed, and if you're not fast enough, it could cost you your life."

"Are you fast?" James asks.

"Yes," Regulus says, then shows him. Sirius made him one of these once, quite literally building the mechanism for it. For months and months, Regulus practiced with it, walking around with small band-aids on his fingers, cuts all over his hands from where he repeatedly used it. He has a few scars on his knuckles from it even now, faint and tiny.

This one isn't really like his other one, so it takes him a few swings and rolls of his wrist to really get used to it, but once he has it, he has it. There's a pattern to it, influenced by weight distribution and the knowledge of what motion you've taken, where the blade is going and where it's been. In seconds, he has it open, then shut right back again.

"That's—that's really—" James stares at him, darting his gaze between Regulus' hand and face.

"These are especially good for hand-to-hand, particularly very close range," Regulus says as he sits the balisong down to pick up one of the push-daggers. The handle sits in his palm, fingers curled down beneath the small blade. He lifts it up in front of James' nose, watching his eyes cross. "They're not hard to use, very good for self-defense. If you find one, keep it on you. It's easy to stab someone in the throat if they're pinning you to the ground, or anywhere you can reach, really."

"Noted," James mumbles.

Regulus drops it and hovers his hand over the karambits, picking up one with a hum. "A karambit. You don't hold them with the blade held up. Your pointer finger goes through the open hole here, and the blade curves outwards like this." He grips it and turns his arm to the side so James can see. "It's good to keep a defensive stance, and then you can swing your arm out, almost like you're punching them, but aim to slit their throat instead. One in each hand is ideal, honestly, for the most effective range of motion."

"Regulus," James says quietly, "how...do you know this?"

"How does anyone know anything?" Regulus replies, swinging the blade around on his finger. James' eyes track the motion, up and over. "I have books. I've paid attention. I've even owned some like these—or as close as you can get when you're making them at home. Sirius—well, he used to make them for me before he came out of the arena. He stopped after that."

"Sirius…" James pauses, staying quiet as Regulus puts the karambit away, hovering his hand over the others with a pensive expression. "It wasn't—that had nothing to do with you, Reg. You know that, don't you? He wasn't trying to give up on you, if that's what you think. He just—he came out feeling...wrong. Really, really wrong. He doesn't build things anymore, did you know that? Hasn't in ten years. He used to make things, fix things, and now—" James swallows harshly and looks away. "Now he just feels like he breaks things. It wasn't that he didn't want to build for you, Regulus. It was that he forgot how."

"It affected me, but I never needed that from him," Regulus whispers, hand gently sitting down on one of the more traditional daggers, one made for throwing and hand-to-hand. "I just needed him to be...him."

"He forgot that, too," James says sadly.

"He remembered eventually."

"And where were you?"

"I said he remembered himself," Regulus declares, an edge to his tone sharp enough to rival the blades in front of him. He lifts his gaze to James'. "I didn't say he remembered me."

"Believe it or not," James tells him, "you were never one of the things that he forgot."

Regulus shakes his head and plucks up three daggers in quick succession. "Leave it, James. I'm not talking about it anymore. I'm going to throw these. If you follow, shut up."

With that, Regulus swivels on his heel and marches off towards the stalls where he can throw his daggers. Between the conversation he and James just had and the weight of all the gazes on him that he can't escape, he feels tense and coiled tight, his hair standing on end, braced for an impact that won't come for a few more days yet. The suspense of it is making his bones ache. He wishes he could turn back time.

James does dutifully follow along, but of course, he does not shut up as requested. He does thankfully drop the subject of Sirius, though. "What about these daggers?"

"More traditional. Good for close range, but also throwing. Multipurpose enough that you can hold them however you wish to utilize them—stabbing, slicing, things such as that. You have options, and plenty," Regulus explains.

"Pretty little things, aren't they?" James muses, head cocking with a lopsided grin as Regulus swivels one of the daggers in his palm and gets into position.

"Oh, yes. Pretty," Regulus says flatly, then lifts his hand and exhales as he snaps his hand out, letting the dagger fly through the air towards the target. It lands with a loud thud, buried to the hilt right in the middle of the figure's forehead.

"Could have been luck," James hedges, eyes bright when Regulus snaps his head towards him in disbelief. James bites his lip, like he's trying not to grin. "Do it again, but aim for the left arm, just above the elbow."

"Your left or the figure's left?"

"My left."

Regulus narrows his eyes slightly, then turns back around, lazily swiveling the dagger in his palm again. After a beat, he raises his arm and sends it flying, watching in satisfaction as it lands exactly where James challenged him to put it. He turns back with his eyebrows raised, tossing the last dagger up and catching it over and over.

"Luck?" Regulus asks, lips twitching.

"If I put an apple on my head, could you—"

"Yes."

"What if I was running?"

"Yes."

"Trick question. The apple would fall."

"Oh, sorry, I thought the question was if I could still put a dagger in the side of your fucking skull."

James chokes out a laugh, his head thrown back in delight, and when he calms a moment later, he steps forward and holds out his hand. "Alright, well, maybe it's easy. Let me give it a go, yeah?"

"If you're interested in embarrassing yourself, sure, carry on," Regulus replies, tossing the dagger up to catch it by the blade to hold it out hilt-first.

"You're so mean," James whispers, like it's a secret, but the sort that you're excited to keep. He steps up when Regulus steps back, and immediately no.

"No," Regulus says, stepping forward again, reaching out to grab James by his shoulder, moving to lightly nudge at his ankles with his shoes. He grabs James by his hip and twists him a little, then steps back. "Alright, continue."

James raises his arm.

"No," Regulus interrupts again, swiveling around to stand by his arm, tapping underneath his elbow, twisting his wrist. James nearly drops the dagger because his grip is so slack, and Regulus clicks his tongue as he slides his hand up to cover James' fingers with his own, pushing them down. "You want to keep your grip light, but not too light when you're throwing. Stabbing requires a firm grip. The last thing you want is for it to go flying if— James, are you even listening to me?"

"What? Yes. Throw light. Firm stab. Got it, carry on. Please carry on," James tells him, watching him intently.

"James, this is quite literally life or death. Now is not the time to discover you have a knife kink," Regulus hisses.

"No time like the present," James corrects, grinning.

"Stop," Regulus chastises, swatting him on the shoulder, and James' grin softens into something sweeter. Regulus averts his eyes from it, because looking at it is hard, and it doesn't really feel like he deserves to see it. "I'm trying to help you. This applies to your hatchet as well, you know."

James sighs, growing more serious. "Alright, alright."

"Throw as you extend, not before and not after. Don't lean too hard in any direction, because that can guide the blade. You have to consider the force and direction of wind, as well as distance, and also judge the force in which you need to throw it so the blade lands instead of the hilt."

"That's—a lot."

"Seems that way, yes, but it does become instinct after enough practice. Think of it as an extension of you. That helps."

"Right, got it. Can I try now?"

"Sure," Regulus says, stepping back again, and to his credit, James does seem to try to follow his advice. Still, Regulus can see where he's gotten it wrong as soon as he lets go, so he's saying, "No," before the hilt even hits the wall next to the target and lands on the floor with a dull clatter.

"You know, this is your fault," James announces.

Regulus rears back. "My fault? I tried to help you."

"Well, with all that unnecessary touching, I got distracted."

"Unnecessary touch—there was no unnecessary touching!"

James hums, planting his hands on his hips. "There was an excess amount of touching, Regulus. You knew what you were doing, and the joke's on you, because while it may have worked, I'm not the least bit embarrassed by it."

"James," Regulus grits out, raising his hand to point towards the targets, "go get my daggers."

"Bossy," James mutters, flashing him a grin before he winks and dutifully jogs to do as he's told.

Regulus heaves a sigh. It's going to be a long day.

He's not wrong, either. It's a long day. As much as he would like to just stand around, throwing daggers all day, that's not all he's supposed to do. James also drags him around to talk to people, as if they're not possible threats.

James and Regulus now come with more knowledge on the other tributes, things that Sirius has learned already, like who some of their mentors are—which apparently matters—but there's still more to learn. Threat levels to assess. Allies to cement.

There's Peter, who is very funny and comforting, but those aren't skills to help in the arena. He spends most of his second day on survival skills, seeming to have given up on weapons altogether. Peter talks quickly and calmly interchangeably, easy to drown out when he's speaking rapidly, but impossible to ignore when he's drawing you in with his soothing tone. Again, not a skill to save his life. He's no threat, and Regulus tries not to learn anything about him the way James does, because he's quite sure Peter's fear of being one of the first to die is going to come true. James already gets on with him so well that it actually tugs at Regulus' heartstrings.

What's interesting is that Peter's mentor is Dolohov, which Sirius had informed them with derision in his tone. It's the same mentor that Bernice has, and that would make Regulus suspicious if not for the fact that Sirius basically stated outright that Dolohov has no use for Peter. He's apparently already made it clear that Bernice is his favorite, the one he wants to win and who he plans to get sponsors for. So, not only is Peter not at all prepared for the arena, but he's essentially been abandoned by his mentor already, which is just...fucked, honestly.

There's Vanity, the young girl who really likes bugs. She spends literally all of her time at the bug station, endlessly fascinated by them. James keeps trying to encourage her to at least go to other survival stations, but she just shrugs him off. Sirius, strangely enough, didn't mention who her mentor was.

There's Dylan, who quite blatantly has a crush on James. He gets flustered every time James smiles at him, or reaches out to touch his shoulder. He's younger, but not by much at twenty-one, and he also doesn't have that many skills when it comes to weapons, but he's very good at starting fires. He does it faster than Regulus has seen anyone manage to yet. Threat level: low. Regulus still doesn't like him.

There's Irene, twenty-three years old, and yet another who also has a strong reaction to James. She drops countless hints about them sneaking out of the training room together, all of which go right over James' head entirely. She laughs at literally everything he says, even when he's not really making jokes, and of course James likes that. It pleases him, the reaction of unspoken praise; he likes to make people laugh, always has. Regulus rolls his eyes so much that it's a miracle they don't roll right out of his head. Irene's skills are not nonexistent, though, which she proves on the second day. She wields a sword like she's been trained for it, clearly practiced, and clearly a threat. Her mentor is a friend of Sirius' named Frank Longbottom. Regulus also doesn't like her.

There's Mathias, who is eighteen, and they're very friendly. They remind Regulus of James, actually, if not a bit quieter. They've improved with the crossbow, and they do take the time to go learn about surviving skills, so they're getting a variety. Threat level: medium. Regulus likes them for the most part, but he still tries not to learn too much about them. Like Irene, their mentor is also Frank.

Finally, there's Evan. On the second day, he's at the rope station yet again, repeatedly tying knots or pulling himself up, as well as swinging between them. No one really bothers him, or seems to notice him at all. His fellow tribute is a teenage girl named Juniper, the one who spent the entire day pummeling a training dummy with a club; she does it again the second day as well, like she has a lot of frustration to work through. People keep a wide berth from her, which may be the point, honestly. Regulus sympathizes with her. Their mentor is yet another friend of Sirius' named Emmeline Vance, and he warned not to underestimate her tributes.

As for Evan, he doesn't seem to really mind that James and Regulus approach him. He teaches them a few knots when they ask, and he listens when they explain some of the things they've learned at the survival station, but it's clear he's not here to make friends. There is a quiet mutual respect between them, though, for the exchange of information; a sort of 'you scratch my back, I scratch yours' situation. Regulus doesn't think Evan would immediately attack him if they ran into each other, but he doesn't know that, not for sure. Threat level: ?

The death eaters have expanded from just Mulciber, Avery, Bernice, and Hodge to now include three more people. There's Willa, Axus, and Quinn. Willa is a young girl around Hodge's age, but she's lethal with a bow and arrows, which seems to be her ticket in. Axus has crafted a fucking hook on the end of a rope that they can toss with frightening precision, repeatedly dragging various objects and training dummies across the room. Quinn is like Hodge, Regulus is sure, in that she's another disposable weak link for them to turn on first.

Mulciber and Avery share a mentor, who is—much to Regulus' discomfort—Lucius Malfoy. Technically, Regulus' cousin-in-law, which he's doing his level best not to think about. Bernice has Dolohov, like Peter, and again, Sirius warned not to underestimate her. Axus and Willa have the same mentor as well, a man named Yaxley, who generally has death eaters every year, like Lucius and Dolohov. Sirius didn't mention Hodge and Quinn's mentors at all.

The remaining ten either stick to themselves, or their fellow tributes, and that's it. They go out of their way to avoid others, to the point that they'll walk away if anyone approaches them.

By the end of the day, Regulus is tired, both physically and mentally. James has improved with his hatchet, at least a little. Enough that his chances of survival in a fight aren't so low that they make Regulus' stomach drop out from beneath him just thinking about it.

Despite his exhaustion, the time for rest is still far away, because he and James have to meet with their stylist.

Dorcas is…

Well, Regulus has never seen a Hallow look so much like a Hallow and also like no other Hallow he's ever seen, but all at once. She's striking, quite frankly. Her braids are styled on top of her head with silver clasps and ornaments weaved through, and her dark skin has a faint shimmer of silver dusting as well, but her dress looks like dripping obsidian, the sturdiness of stone while looking as if it's made of velvet. There's a necklace around her neck with three words written in small cursive letters, Hallow is Hollow, which is quite the statement. Her fingers are covered in rings that connect with her bracelet, and she has one of those finger armor-covers that come to a point, which she taps to the arm of the chair as she flicks her gaze between Regulus and James critically.

James, being James, eventually can't stand the silence anymore, and the first thing he blurts out is, "So, um, your necklace… Did you, er, make that, or...?"

"This?" Dorcas' hand flutters up to it. "Yes, I designed it. Do you like it?"

"It's—bold," James admits, blinking at her.

Dorcas hums. "Well, I'm a very bold person, James. Would you say the same?"

"I mean, I suppose," James replies, eyebrows furrowed.

"Yes," Regulus answers for him. "Don't let him fool you. He's one of the most audacious people you'll ever meet." James glances over at him, looking started, but visibly pleased. "That wasn't a compliment, James."

"Yes, it was," Dorcas corrects bluntly. She threads her fingers together on her crossed legs, her rings clinking together. "I design in bold. It's a compliment." She pauses, flicking her gaze between them. "I won't lie, this is my first year styling for tributes. I'd like to represent you in a way that is both meaningful and a political statement."

"By which you mean…?"

"Let's call it...thought-provoking. Everyone in the Hallow is asleep. I want to wake them up."

Regulus shares a brief look with James, then focuses back on Dorcas. "With fashion?"

"With expression," Dorcas tells him. "That speaks to them, and I want to make something they can't look away from. They'll all be looking at you, so let's make sure they see something important, shall we?"

Sirius and Pandora, who have been quietly murmuring to each other off to the side, stop and look up, clearly paying attention. Again, James and Regulus share another look, a bit longer this time. When they look away, they both lean forward.

"What did you have in mind?" James asks.

Dorcas smiles.

~•~

James isn't really sure what to expect from day three of training, but he and Regulus have their objective. Get in, practice more, learn more, and do some hand-to-hand; sounds simple enough, really.

Again, a lot of eyes are on him and Regulus as soon as they enter the room. That's getting old, at this point. It's like half of them expect them to start trouble, while the other half expect them to start fighting each other. The tension gets under his skin and makes it harder to keep focused.

"Oh, hi," James says, brightening up when Peter comes over to greet him. "How do you beat us here every time?"

"Brilliant time management, courtesy of my mentor," Peter tells him with a chuckle.

"Sirius wouldn't know time management if it jumped up and bit him," Regulus mutters, rolling his eyes.

James snorts. "This is true. The poor thing looks miserable when he has to wake up early. He's always been a bit of a night owl, if I'm honest. He used to say it was a star thing."

"A star thing," Regulus repeats, eyes narrowed.

"Being named after a star, I suppose. It only made sense, he said, because stars are awake and active in the night sky, so why shouldn't he be?" James says fondly.

Regulus scoffs. "I'm named after a star, too, you know."

"I know," James murmurs, lips curling up. "That doesn't really go against what he says, though. You also like to be up and about at night. I've never seen someone look as grumpy as you do when you've been woken up early, except for Sirius."

"Yes, well…" Regulus trails off, clearly unable to refute Sirius' claim. He doesn't so much as admit defeat as he refuses to accept it by pursing his lips and looking away.

So stubborn, James thinks, fighting a smile.

"I saw you yesterday, you know," Peter says, drawing James' attention again. "With the hatchets, I mean. You're actually quite good. I've heard whispers…" Peter glances around and steps closer, lowering his voice. "The others—Mulciber and that whole group—they've been talking about it."

James nods. "I'm sure they have."

"What have they been saying?" Regulus asks, and Peter blinks at him. "You heard them talking, so what did they say?"

Peter shrugs awkwardly. "Nothing too much, really. Just that James is more of a threat than they thought. Seemed too soft to worry about at first, they said." He pauses, reaching up to scratch his nose. "They also—well, I heard them say that you're shaping up to be exactly the threat they anticipated. You're fucking deadly with those daggers, honestly."

"I know," is all Regulus says.

"Right." Peter visibly gulps. "Right, well, I'm going to go...do something. Yeah. Bye, then."

"Lovely," James mumbles with a sigh as he watches Peter quickly shuffle away. "You're scaring our allies."

"Your allies. I don't have allies," Regulus replies, unrepentant.

"What's mine is yours," James tells him.

Regulus arches an eyebrow at him. "Do they know that?"

"They know that," James admits, because they do. He's made that very clear from day one; they're very aware that Regulus is a priority to him, and he's not to be harmed. Not that anyone James gets on with actually wants to hurt anyone at all, but that's besides the point. The point is, they know. "Come on, let's do another circuit of the survival skills portion, then practice with weapons, and we can close the day out by getting on the mat and giving everyone a show."

"Oh, is that the plan?"

"That's the plan. And also, mingling."

"Mingling," Regulus grumbles under his breath, like he detests the idea, but he doesn't complain further. Again, James has to fight a smile as he leads him away.

So, that's how they spend the day.

In between the survival skills portion, James checks in with the people he's gotten comfortable with by now. Vanity is, of course, at the bug station. She brightens as soon as she sees him, and even Regulus is a bit softer with her, likely because of her youth. James talks to her about her siblings by name (Divan, Curio, and Hoosier), listens to her chatter about bugs, and tells her a bit about his parents. Vanity gives him and Regulus a lesson on bugs to watch out for, either because they're dangerous, or because they're good for protein, which James honestly doesn't want to think about. The last thing he wants to do is eat bugs, but...well, you never know, right?

Following Vanity is Irene at the plant station, who gives up on trying to identify the poisonous ones in favor of talking to him, telling him all about her friends back home as he dutifully listens. James likes her, but it's clear that Regulus does not. He rolls his eyes and takes over at the plant station, making snide comments under his breath that Irene outright ignores. James isn't sure why Regulus has such an issue with her, honestly. She's really quite nice.

They meet Dylan at the fire-starting station, and he admits he likes it there because it's the one thing he's really good at. Regulus also doesn't like him, for whatever reason that James can't see. James likes Dylan; he's sweet, and a bit nervous, and he talks about his best friend back home with the same kind of ferocious devotion and love that James feels for Sirius.

James crosses paths with Peter again, pausing to smooth over Regulus frightening him before. Like with most things, James has learned, Peter bounces back easily. He and James chat for quite a bit until they're both in stitches, wheezing with laughter as they hold onto each other's shoulders so they won't fall over. Regulus stands off to the side and looks bored.

Mathias is found practicing with the crossbow, which James and Regulus learn on their way to start with weapons. As soon as they approach, Mathias looks up with a grin. They instantly launch into an excited recount of how much they've improved with the crossbow (twenty out of twenty-six shots so far), and James beams at them, genuinely proud of their progress. They talk to Regulus and James for a few minutes, but they're clearly focused—or in the zone, as they call it—so James and Regulus leave them to it, heading to start practicing as well.

James doesn't really like utilizing the hatchets as weapons, if he's honest, but he knows he needs to be prepared. He wants to make it through without hurting anyone, but he doubts that will be possible if his goal is to get Regulus home, which it still is. Practicing with a weapon is really just getting your body prepped with the motion memory, because there's no true preparation for the real thing—that's what Sirius said, and James believes him. He can't imagine actually harming another human being, can't even picture it, and yet that's the reality that's sprinting right for him at full velocity.

Meanwhile, Regulus uses his daggers like… Well, there's no hesitation whatsoever. He's confident with them, as well as precise. Dangerous. Deadly, even. People are smart to be wary of Regulus and his daggers; as previously established, though, James is stupid, so of course he's fascinated by it. His eyes are drawn to Regulus over and over, watching how he moves, watching the calm coil of his body as he wields his weapons. Pretty little things, indeed.

After they finish with that, towards the end of the day, James and Regulus stop by to see Evan at the rope station again. He's like Vanity in that he's clearly found his thing, and he's doing nothing else. All anyone knows about him is that he's good at tying knots and climbing ropes, which isn't a lot, really. James can't tell if he's friendly or not, but he doesn't ever seem upset when they speak to him. He doesn't divulge personal information or seem to care about theirs, but he seems open to them sharing things they've learned, and every time they do, he makes sure to teach them something as well.

Regulus manages to draw a brief, quiet chuckle out of Evan, just once, and that oddly makes James feel better. It makes him worry less that Evan would take the opportunity to kill them the moment he found it, if not hunt them down. Now, at least, James thinks that Evan would maybe, possibly back away if they did, instead of immediately trying to fight, so there's that.

As the day starts to draw to an end, before the evaluations being held in the evening, James follows Regulus to one of the mats off to the side. It's not directly in the center of the room, but everyone will be able to see them. They both kick off their shoes, then step up.

"No damage to the face," James reminds Regulus, because Sirius had been very clear on that, and so had Pandora. They want no visible bruises before the upcoming interviews.

"I know," Regulus says, rolling his eyes. "I'm not going to punch you in the face, James."

"Well, you've already done it once," James teases, grinning when Regulus' face turns red.

"That was an accident," Regulus mumbles, "and I thought we agreed to never talk about it."

"No, you just demanded that I never mention it."

"Which you're ignoring."

"You gave me a nosebleed."

"I was thirteen."

James chuckles and bounces on the balls of his feet. "A very feisty thirteen year old, going around assaulting people."

"You broke into my house through my window!" Regulus sputters. "It was the middle of the night. I thought you were an intruder. What was I supposed to do in that situation?"

"Well, I didn't expect you to scream, roll out of bed, and punch me in the face," James admits, laughing helplessly as Regulus' face glows brighter. "I thought it was Sirius' room, you know that. All I wanted to do was sneak into my best friend's room, and instead, his little brother nearly broke my nose."

"And now I'm tempted to again," Regulus grumbles.

James shakes his head and bounces some more, his chest warm at the memory. He had really been trying to sneak into Sirius' room, so he wasn't at all prepared for the fist that collided with his face as soon as he slipped through the window. As soon as Regulus realized it was him, he'd started stuttering apologies as James groaned and bent over, clutching his face because it had fucking hurt. He remembers that it had left him stunned, though, dazed as he'd stared at a rambling Regulus in pure disbelief, so startled because he never even saw him coming. That's a common theme with him, really.

Regulus had been so embarrassed, and he'd rushed to get a towel for James' nose, his cheeks red. He'd nearly been in tears. James remembers sitting on his bed as Regulus apologized over and over, then laughing helplessly, only to groan at the pain that caused. Regulus had held the towel to his face until James smiled at him, and then he'd turned red again and left quickly to go get Sirius. Of course, when Sirius heard what happened, he'd laughed so hard that he actually had to lay on the floor, and poor Regulus looked like he wanted to crawl under his bed and never come out again.

Those were simpler times. Back before Sirius went into the arena. Back before Regulus hated James. Back before James knew what it was to feel like a failure. They were so young.

"Are you going to stand there all day, or…?" Regulus raises his eyebrows and shifts on his feet ever so slightly.

"Best not to leave it to a tap out," James muses, lips curling up at the corners. "You're so stubborn that you'd never."

"Well, at least you know," Regulus replies, a flash of amusement passing through his eyes.

James nods, and then he moves in. He hasn't really done anything like this with anyone other than Sirius, but he has done it enough with Sirius that he knows what to do. In a way, it's like a dance, one where your partner is actually your opponent and you have to anticipate their steps while doing your best not to give your own away. You have to pay attention and focus, relying on defense and offense interchangeably, knowing which one is most efficient.

Regulus has likely never done this with anyone other than Sirius either, so this means he knows all the same things that James knows. Like James, he doesn't tense up, and he remains watchful of every move James makes.

Distantly, James knows that people are watching them, that they've gathered something of a crowd, but he doesn't care. His world narrows down to Regulus, and that's it.

There's the first few tentative shifts of their bodies circling each other like a dance, or a stand-off, and then Regulus skips backwards when James makes the first swipe for him, light on his feet. It happens again, then again, and then James picks up on how to anticipate it, catching his arm. Regulus immediately grabs James' hand and whirls around, twisting it around his back. He uses the momentum to shove James in the back, sending him stumbling forward a few steps.

When James turns back around, Regulus is still in the same place, loose and relaxed. Huffing a laugh under his breath, James shakes his head and moves in again.

"You and your evasive maneuvers," James mutters as Regulus once again dances out of range.

Regulus sends him a quick smile, there-and-gone in a flash. Oh, he's enjoying this. "Surely you didn't think I would make it easy, did you, James?"

"You? Never," James says. "Less fun that way anyway."

"This isn't about fun. This is about survival."

"Who says it can't be both?"

"Only you would think that way," Regulus tells him.

James grins and shifts forward, catching Regulus' elbow when he starts to lift it and hooking his foot around the back of his calf to sweep his legs right out from underneath him. Regulus goes down, hitting the mat with a thud and a soft wheeze, the breath knocked from his lungs. James peers down at him smugly. "See? That was fun."

Regulus narrows his eyes, and then James yelps when cold fingers wrap around his ankle and yank. Again, he doesn't see it coming, so he trips backwards, and Regulus lifts his leg and pushes so that James goes down. James lands pretty hard, groaning once he's there, blinking rapidly. It takes him a second to catch his breath, and then he's rolling over in just enough time to catch Regulus' wrist.

There's a brief struggle, Regulus' knee hitting James in the stomach and James twisting Regulus' arm back. They roll, then roll again, and then Regulus rolls right on top of him, gripping James by the wrists and slamming him down to the mat.

"Still having fun?" Regulus asks, somehow managing to arch an eyebrow even as his chest heaves from exertion.

"So much," James wheezes, then rolls his wrists and bucks his hips as he flings himself to the side. He weaves an arm over and under Regulus', shoving him face down as he drops his knee into the middle of Regulus' back. He could wrench Regulus' arm up, but there would be no point, seeing as he'd let James break it before he'd ever tap.

Regulus curses under his breath, letting his forehead press to the mat as he breathes hard. His body is tense, and James sees the sweat that slides over the back of his neck, disappearing into his collarbone. After a beat, Regulus relaxes all at once, then reaches back with his free hand to hook his fingers in the crook of James' bent knee. He snatches on it at the same time that he rocks his body to the side, making James sway and nearly fall over. Regulus manages to turn over underneath him, freeing his arm, but now James is just straddling his hips and frantically trying to grapple for his wrists.

It doesn't work very well, honestly. Regulus just knocks his hands away, grabs onto James' hips, and fully tosses him to the side, using the momentum of his own roll to counteract James' weight. Yet again, James hits the mat, flat on his back, with a grunt and muffled curse. Regulus just follows him right over.

"Fucking stay down, would you?" James groans.

"You first," Regulus gasps out. He has James' hands caught between each knee and James' own body, holding them in place while one hand presses on the middle of James' chest. The other is holding James' shoulder, keeping him pinned.

James blows out a deep breath, his mind racing. He tries to wriggle his fingers, but Regulus' knees squeeze his sides tighter, keeping James' hands trapped. Honestly, James can't move much, or he doesn't think so. It takes him a minute to remember that he can bend his knees, and then he does just that, throwing his leg up into Regulus' back hard enough to displace him just the bit he needs to get his hands free.

As Regulus balances again, James locks his hands around each of Regulus' wrists in just enough time to yank his arms back as he lifts himself up. This shifts them a bit until Regulus is just sitting on James' thighs as James sits up and pins his arms behind his back. It puts them at an impasse, because Regulus can't get his hands free, and James can't get Regulus off of him, so they're pressed chest-to-chest, panting as they stare at each other and try to come up with what to do next.

"Well," James says, finally, "what now?"

"I'm thinking," Regulus admits.

James snorts weakly. "Oh, are you? Do take your time."

"I can't headbutt you, that would damage your face," Regulus complains. He pauses, then clears his throat. "And mine."

"Nice to know which one is the priority for you."

"You know, actually, I'm rethinking that decision. At this point, it would be worth it."

"Don't be a sore loser," James teases.

Regulus scoffs. "Are you joking? If I had my dagger, you'd be dead ten times over already."

"Mm, but you don't." James grins at him, then bites his lip when Regulus lets his head roll back as he groans. "Oh, don't do that. You're giving me all sorts of filthy ideas."

"Am I?" Regulus lifts his head and narrows his eyes at him, tugging on his hands, but James keeps his wrists firmly locked behind his back. Regulus huffs. "Well, realistically, I can't do anything else, and you can't do anything else, so that's that."

"There are a lot of things we could do in this position," James corrects, then grins when Regulus glares at him. "Oh, you meant the—right, sorry, I was thinking of other things."

"Sirius told you not to flirt with me."

"Yes, he did. You didn't. Funny, that."

"You won't be able to flirt with me when you're dead," Regulus informs him, the flush on his face not fading in the least.

James just hums. "Suppose I'll have to live long enough to keep doing it some more."

"If you get close enough to try, you won't get the chance."

"What are you going to do? Crawl in my lap and let me hold your hands behind your back? Oh no, I'm terrified."

"You have two seconds to let me go, or I'll just headbutt you and let Sirius yell at us," Regulus snaps. "One—"

"Alright, alright," James concedes, dropping his hands, because that's his I'm not fucking around voice. James has heard it enough over the years to know it well.

"Idiot," Regulus says as he immediately, without hesitation, slams James back down to the mat by his shoulders.

"You know, I'd say you've really come a long way," James murmurs breathlessly, hands settling on Regulus' hips—and he could attempt to throw him off, but he won't.

Regulus raises his eyebrows at him, hands going slack against James' shoulders, sliding further apart like he's feeling them beneath his palms. "Have I? How so?"

"Well, we've come from you punching me in the face when you were only thirteen, and now here you are at twenty-five, using me as a seat and manhandling me as you like," James tells him, huffing out a laugh as Regulus stops leaning down over him, slowly sitting up. As he does so, his hands slip over James' shoulders and slide down his chest. James sees Regulus catch his bottom lip between his teeth, eyes tracking the movement of his own hands. Struggling not to laugh, James squeezes his waist gently. "Enjoying yourself?"

"Sadly, yes, at least a little," Regulus confesses, which leaves James feeling rather triumphant, actually. Regulus shakes his head and gently taps James just between his lowest ribs, the hollow of his stomach. "You are unholy, James, do you know that? It's not fair. You should not be this—this—"

"Fit? Attractive? Sexy? Irresistible?" James lists off.

"Athletically inclined," Regulus fills in with a scowl. A very cute scowl, but a scowl nonetheless.

James grins up at him. "You hate it, don't you?"

"With a burning passion."

"So you feel passion for me."

Regulus rolls his eyes and pushes his fist into James' stomach hard enough to make him grunt and curl up a little bit. With a thin smile, Regulus reaches out and pats James' cheek as he groans quietly. "Something like that."

"Brilliant. Love that for me," James wheezes as Regulus launches himself up off him. James presses both hands to his stomach, breathing hard, and then a hand is held out above him. Regulus waits, eyebrows raised, and James—after he catches his breath again—reaches up to take it.

"Again?" Regulus asks as he helps haul James to his feet.

James chuckles. "You're like a snake measuring my body to know precisely how you need to kill me." Regulus' lips twitch, but he doesn't deny it. James shakes his head and shifts on his feet. "Yeah, alright. Let's go again."

They go again, and again, and a few more times for good measure, until they're both just sprawled out on the mat, panting as they stare up at the ceiling. They've been in every position possible at this point, and each of them has won at least once. James now knows what it's like to have Regulus' thighs around his head, and when he'd made the comment that he could now die a happy man, Regulus had squeezed as if he was trying to pop his head like a melon. James didn't even try to get out of that one, if he's honest.

People stopped watching the show about halfway in when it became apparent that they weren't actually going to try to kill each other. Some of them even seemed surprised or amused to hear James flirting with Regulus at literally every available opportunity. Irene had asked if she could train with James, and Regulus thankfully shut her down with a simple, sharp no, find anyone else, which saved James from finding a way to refuse.

The training room is emptying out now, people leaving and getting ready for personal evaluations. James knows he and Regulus need to get up and leave, but neither of them do for a long moment. They remain on the mat, chests heaving as they lay side-by-side, completely worn out.

Surprisingly, it's Regulus who breaks the silence first. His voice is quiet. "Sometimes, I try to picture putting these skills to use, and it's not—it isn't clear. It won't be like this, James. Not in the arena. We'll be fighting for our lives."

I'll be fighting for yours, James doesn't say. He can't bring himself to say it, and he doesn't know why. Maybe he should. Maybe he should just tell Regulus that he plans to help him get home, but he just—he can't. It won't make Regulus hate him less. James knows it'll make Regulus hate him more.

"I know," is the response James settles for.

"You can't hesitate," Regulus whispers, sounding grave. He pushes himself on his elbow and peers down at James, his throat bobbing. "Not even for a second, not for anyone."

James gazes up at him. "Not even for you?"

"Not even for me," Regulus says softly, and then he gives James a smile. It's small and sad. "But I'm faster."

"Yes, you are," James admits, because he is. "So, as long as you don't hesitate, I won't even get the chance to."

The thing is, James doesn't believe Regulus will kill him, given the chance. It's hard for him to even conceptualize it. He's known Regulus since he was ten years old, just a young boy being carried around on his big brother's back because he wasn't feeling well, asleep on his shoulder. James thought he was younger when he first saw him, because he looked so innocent and small when he was sleeping, a wet spot of drool on Sirius' shoulder under his slack mouth. It had surprised James to learn he was a year younger—nearly two younger than Sirius. He's just a baby, James had thought.

James grew out of thinking that about Regulus, eventually, and Regulus stopped being sweet soon enough. That doesn't mean James doesn't remember. That doesn't mean James doesn't know he's capable of it. Regulus, with his scowls and harsh words, used to smile and stutter and default to kindness as his first instinct. He used to be shy. All of those things still exist within him; they just manifest differently now.

James doesn't always have Regulus figured out, not the way he used to, but he knows one thing for sure. Regulus isn't a killer. He is a survivor, and he'll do what it takes to survive, but he won't go out of his way to hurt anyone. Especially not James. He can say what he likes, but after all these years, Regulus' eyes are the same, if nothing else, and James needs only look in them to see who he really is.

"Then you won't get the chance to, because I'm not going to hesitate," Regulus tells him quietly, not for the first time, and James just doesn't believe that at all.

Maybe that's a risk, but James looks into Regulus' eyes, and he feels completely, entirely safe.

As if he can sense the source of his weakness, Regulus drops his gaze and pushes himself up all the way, standing to his feet. He could walk away and leave James behind, but he doesn't.

He offers his hand, holding it out to him.

James reaches up and takes it.

Chapter End Notes

quick recap:

Bernice and Peter's mentor: Antonin Dolohov
Axus and Willa's mentor: Corban Yaxley
Avery and Mulciber's mentor: Lucius Malfoy
Irene and Mathias' mentor: Frank Longbottom
Evan and Juniper's mentor: Emmeline Vance Dylan's mentor: unknown
Quinn's mentor: unknown
Vanity's mentor: unknown
Hodge's mentor: unknown
Regulus and James' mentor: looks into the camera like im on the office
All other tributes and their mentors: unknown just putting that information ^ there for your theories, because as of now, that's all you know.

regulus when he was small: im just a baby james, upon meeting him: he's just a baby!

regulus now: i will cut you james now: he's just a baby!

we love james being consistent. 😭😭😭 not james and regulus flirting in the middle of preparing to fight to the death. hello????

now is NOT the time, guys. get it together. lmao james really said: YOLO 🤪 also we will be seeing more of sirius and remus next chapter. i miss them :(

Evaluation Aftermath

Chapter Notes

hi, again!!!

warnings for this chapter:

-themes and references to death
-very vague references to torture (implied, really)
-an argument
-angst

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Regulus knows he shouldn't. He knows it's a bad idea, and Sirius would be furious if he found out, because he made it very clear from the beginning not to antagonize the gamemakers.

The thing is, when Regulus goes into his evaluation in the afternoon of the last training day, he walks in with a plan. It's a simple plan already approved by Sirius. Go in, show off with various daggers, then leave. Very simple.

He means to do this, and he does for the most part, but…

Well, it's just that Regulus detests this entire experience, even more so when glancing up to see the various people up there watching him intently, laughing and looking excited when he shows them what he's capable of. Just a pawn for them. A character in their show. They don't understand the gravity of his situation; they don't know what's at stake; they don't know what it's like to be afraid, even for a moment.

Regulus wants them to be afraid, to come face-to-face with their own frail existence. Horace Slughorn is the head gamemaker, and he's the one Regulus aims for. It's a quick snap of his wrist, and the dagger flies through the air, burying itself in the cushion right next to Slughorn's head. Regulus aims close enough to slice off one strand of hair that drifts down to his shoulder, but not close enough to actually injure him.

They all fall silent, and Slughorn slowly turns his head to stare at the handle of the knife with wide eyes. He reaches up and pulls the hair off his shoulder, holding it up in visible disbelief, and they're all shaken. Regulus can see that it scared them, and he relishes in it. When they all look at him, he gives a mock bow and walks out with his head held high.

Yeah, Sirius can never know about this.

~•~

"You threw a dagger at his head?!" Sirius bellows, feeling dangerously close to going fully fucking mental. He raises his arms and waves them wildly. "Have you lost your mind?! What were you thinking?! Do you have any idea—"

"Can you just—not?" Regulus cuts in wearily, rubbing the side of his head with a sigh. "How did you even find out?"

"Slughorn came complaining to me about it, telling me to keep my tributes in line," Sirius snaps, his nostrils flaring. "You can't just do things like that, Reggie! You don't understand how you put not only yourself but James and also me at risk when you act like a selfish, unthinking child!"

Regulus glares at him. "That's rich, coming from you."

"This is the Hallow!" Sirius explodes, smacking the back of one hand into his other open palm. "The rules are different here. You can't just do whatever you want to whoever you want just because you're feeling a little angry. Breaking news, but we're all feeling a little fucking angry! Every move you make, every word you speak, every choice you go with—it reflects on you, and not only you, but on us. And that controls just how much fucking danger we're in, do you understand?"

"Well, clearly you're blowing this out of proportion," Regulus snaps defensively, gesturing to the screen. "You saw my score. It was higher than everyone else's."

Sirius could strangle him. He could actually strangle his stubborn, innocent little brother. He really could. "That's not a good thing, Regulus! That's bad! That's very, very bad, you fucking idiot. What do you think that score tells everyone else, hm? What do you think it tells the enemies you've already made? Go on." Regulus doesn't answer, choosing to look away, his jaw clenched. "It tells them that you're a threat, and not only that, but you're a bigger one than they realized. It makes them bitter and eager to hunt you down and slaughter you."

"They were already planning to do that anyway, and you know it," Regulus grits out.

"Can you just—can you at least fucking try to listen to me?" Sirius hisses, his blood pumping, pent up anger and stress and worry leaving him restless and itchy. "I need you to care. I need you to use your fucking brain. I am responsible for you, do you realize that? Everything you do, it falls on me as well, and that puts me in danger and makes my job to help you survive in that arena just a bit harder, so if you could just—"

"Alright!" Regulus shouts, throwing his hands up as shoves himself up from his seat. "Alright, I get it, just shut up, would you? I think you've made your point, Sirius. I can't do anything right for you, I'm not enough like James, I'm a huge fucking disappointment—right, got it, you've only been making that very blatantly obvious for last decade."

Regulus whirls around and marches off, and after a long beat, there's the loud slam of his door. Sirius stares after him, passing his hand over his mouth as he exhales harshly through his nose, fighting the lump that's forming in his throat. His eyes sink shut for a brief moment, and then he drops his hand and glances over at Pandora and James, who are both very still and very quiet in their chairs.

"Good talk," Sirius mumbles, heaving a sigh as he shakes his head and turns to move into the kitchen, going primarily for the liquor cabinet that's waiting in there.

"Sirius." That's James, of course, following him and speaking gently. When Sirius glances over at him, James' eyes are sad.

"I—I have to be harder on him, you know that, because he's in so much danger, James. He doesn't even realize—" Sirius chokes off, his head ducking as he stands before shelves of wine and various liquor for him to choose from.

"Sirius," James repeats, even softer this time.

Staring at the drink options is pointless when his vision is blurring with tears. Sirius swallows thickly. "That score was a punishment, and they'll punish him in the games. He's going to get himself killed. He's—he's—"

"Stop. Hey, Sirius, stop," James whispers, moving over to grab him by the shoulder, turning him so that they're looking at each other. "I'm not going to let that happen, alright?"

"You can try, we both can try, but sometimes—" Sirius inhales sharply, the tears spilling out when he blinks. "Sometimes it's not that simple, James. And—and then there's you. Because you're not—because you've decided—"

James cuts him off by pulling him into a tight hug, and Sirius' words fail him from there. He doesn't try to say anything else, unwilling to voice how unfair all of this is, how hard it is, how it's chipping at him and wearing him down until he's feeling like he's falling apart all the time. Instead, Sirius buries his face into James' shoulder and tries not to cry too much.

It feels wrong, in a way, to need James to comfort him now, when he's the one going into the arena. Sirius should be the one comforting him, and he knows it. He hasn't really had the time between trying to do everything he can to keep them both alive. How James is handling all of this, Sirius doesn't really know; he doesn't think James would be honest about it either.

James can act like he's settled in his choice all he likes, but Sirius knows it's not as simple as that. People aren't just at peace with their decision to die in a situation such as this. James must be scared, worried, stressed; yet, despite it all, he's the one holding Sirius right now, as steady as a rock.

Sirius pulls away, ashamed, and he shakes his head as he swipes his wrist under his eyes. He turns to compose himself, grabbing the first bottle of amber liquid he comes across and two glasses. The worst part is, Sirius still hasn't faced it, hasn't come to terms with James' choice. He knows James wants him to respect it, but how is Sirius supposed to do that? With his little brother on the other side, it's all so fucking complicated.

Sirius still doesn't know how he's supposed to do this, and yet here he is, doing it. Because that's all he can do.

"Regulus didn't mean that, you know," James murmurs as Sirius pours them both a glass.

"Yes, he did," Sirius rasps, sitting the bottle down. "And he's right, isn't he? When I got back from the arena—"

"When you got back from the arena, you were hurt, Sirius. You don't need to apologize for how you healed. How you're still healing," James says firmly. "You did nothing wrong by leaving that house and coming to mine."

"I asked him to come," Sirius confesses for the very first time, and James looks surprised. Sirius looks away. "Two years later. Two years too late."

"I asked him the day you moved in," James admits.

Sirius stares down at his drink and whispers, "He needed to hear it from me. He needed me to be the one to ask, and I—I didn't. I didn't until I knew he wouldn't come."

"You didn't until you could," James corrects softly. "Sirius, don't feel guilty for what you went through. You were—you did your very best."

"James," Sirius croaks, "I couldn't even look at him."

To that, James has no reply. Sirius works his jaw, then lifts his drink to knock it back all at once, eyes sinking shut at the burn that flares as it goes down.

The truth is, Sirius couldn't look at Regulus. Couldn't be near him. Couldn't talk to him. Couldn't do anything with him, or for him, because Sirius was a fucking mess. He was broken irreparably, and he didn't know how to handle it.

Sirius couldn't figure out how he was supposed to look his little brother in the eye knowing that Regulus watched him murder in his name. Everything Sirius did—all of it—was so Regulus didn't have to, and that's a lot to put on one person, especially a fifteen year old boy who looked up to him. Sirius returned home wrong, and he didn't want Regulus to know, to see it. He's Regulus' older brother, the one who carried him around when he was tired and took care of him when he was sick and volunteered when his name was called.

Sirius didn't want Regulus to see what he'd become, to look at him and remember what he'd done for him. Regulus was the mirror that Sirius was avoiding, too horrified by the reflection of all that he'd done to even come close enough to catch a glimpse.

Regulus couldn't look at him either. Sirius doesn't remember much from that first year when he returned, but he does recall that Regulus was different. Harsher, colder, distant, and defensive. It only got worse as the years went by, and Sirius could only look at him and know he'd done that to him. It was his fault. Sirius went into the arena and fought to get back to his little brother, only to come back and lose him anyway.

Regulus hasn't said it. He has never said it, and Sirius thinks he will die before he ever admits it, but Sirius is sure that Regulus regrets that he ever took his place.

"You're being hard on yourself," James tells him as he swirls his drink in his glass. "You're working yourself spare trying to help Regulus and me. Don't think I haven't noticed."

"It's not half difficult, I'll tell you that," Sirius mutters under his breath, reaching out to swipe James' glass from his hand, drinking it if he won't. "Regulus isn't making it easier."

James snorts. "Well, it's Regulus. You know how he is, and honestly, can you blame him? As if you wouldn't like to make the gamemakers shit themselves out of fear." James shakes his head, ducking his head to hide his grin, though Sirius can see it anyway. "That was fucking brilliant."

"James," Sirius scolds lightly, and James gives him a look. Sirius tries to keep a straight face, but then he can't help it; a chuckle slips out, and then he's laughing, because it really is fucking brilliant. Deep down, Sirius is so proud. He wishes he could have been there to see it, if he's honest.

For a moment, despite everything, they're both just two best friends laughing at the absurdity of Regulus launching a fucking dagger at someone's head. It's so surreal, and they both laugh so hard that they're bent over wheezing, nearly in tears. The acceptable kind of tears this time. James makes everything better; he always has.

"What's worse," Sirius continues, as the laughter fades, "they all think you and Regulus are in some sort of personal battle. They're pitting you against each other, can you believe that?"

"Can't you just tell them we're friends?" James asks.

"Oh, I could, and I've tried, but that's not what they want to hear," Sirius complains. "They want drama. They want a story they can get invested in. All the greatest stories have fighting, so of course that's what they want to see."

"I know you're worried," James says, "but what happens will happen regardless. I know you're trying for both of us, and you're doing all that you can, but you have to take care of yourself, too. You—you have to take care of yourself, Sirius." He swallows, looking more solemn as he holds Sirius' gaze. "You have to, do you understand?"

Sirius' lungs seem to shrivel. "James."

"Even when—" James takes a shaky breath, dropping his gaze as he exhales, eyes squeezing shut. "Even when I'm not here to make sure that you do, you have to take care of yourself."

"James, don't. I can't. I—"

"Promise me."

"Stop it," Sirius chokes out, his eyes stinging again. He can't do this. He can't claw himself out of this state of denial. It's a weak, desperate thing to cling to, but he won't accept anything else. He won't do it.

James reaches out to lay his hand on Sirius' arm, chasing Sirius' gaze until he can't evade him anymore. "Please, Sirius. I need you to promise, and I need you to keep it. You have to, alright? I need you to do that for me. Will you do that, please?"

Sirius will do anything for James, but he doesn't know how he's supposed to do this. He doesn't know how he can. Yet, Sirius rasps, "I promise."

The thing is, it's a lie, because Sirius will do anything for James, but he won't be able to do this.

"Thank you," James whispers, none the wiser.

~•~

Regulus isn't in his room when James knocks and tentatively pokes his head in. It's been over an hour now, so James is hoping he's cooled off, even just a bit. The door to his balcony is cracked, a gentle breeze flowing in. James approaches it, then hesitates, then shakes his head and keeps going.

The balcony is wide enough to hold two chairs and a small table between them, a crystal ashtray sitting in the center. James isn't surprised to see that it's empty and clean; Sirius is the one who smokes occasionally, not Regulus. As for Regulus, he's just sitting in the chair with his legs folded up under him as he peers down at the people walking on the streets, looking like strange, colorful ants from this height.

Regulus doesn't even look up as he sharply says, "What makes you think I want anything to do with you right now?"

"Er," James says, and Regulus sighs. There's a long beat of silence before James carefully settles in the open chair, clearing his throat. "Well, better me than anyone else, I'd assume. I mean, I can go get Sirius if you like—"

"I'd rather not be bothered by anyone," Regulus clarifies.

"I just want to check on you," James murmurs.

"I'm fine," Regulus says.

James studies him and quietly asks, "Are you?"

"I have to be," Regulus tells him. "We all do."

"None of us are, and we can't be, not with all of this," James counters, turning his head to watch the people on the street with a small frown. "I don't think trying to force ourselves helps any of us, and pretending to be fine is...pointless."

Regulus doesn't say anything. He just hugs his leg closer to his chest, leaning his chin on his knee. He's had a shower. His hair is damp and curly, and he's changed into soft clothes, like he's ready for bed. He looks sleepy, actually, or maybe just tired. There's a difference; one is adorable and one is sad, and somehow, Regulus manages to be both.

"Sirius—"

"I don't want to talk about Sirius, James. I really don't."

"Right." James releases a quiet sigh, tucking his lips in and ducking his head to stare at his fingers in his lap. He pinches one of his knuckles, then glances back up, scanning the side of Regulus' face. "Do you remember your fifteenth birthday?"

Regulus lifts his head slightly and turns it just to rest his cheek on his knee, looking at James through half-lidded eyes. There's a ghost of a smile on his face, faint and barely there. His voice is so soft when he says, "Yes, I remember."

"It snowed the night before," James recalls, lips tugging up at the corners. "Sirius dragged you all the way to my house in at least five layers and that hat you used to always wear. The lumpy one with the little frayed ball on top."

"Sirius made it for me," Regulus murmurs, his eyes drifting shut. Like this, he looks peaceful. "It used to have a bell in the ball, you know, that way Sirius could hear me coming. He used to say I moved like a ghost, too quiet. That was before you two met. By the time you came into the picture, the bell had stopped ringing. We could never work out why."

"I never knew that," James muses. "That day, your birthday… I remember we spent hours outside in the snow. We built that snowman on my front lawn, and you just put your hat on it. You forgot it there when we went off to make snow angels."

"Never did see it again," Regulus says softly.

"Well, you and Sirius had to leave quickly so you wouldn't get in trouble by your parents, and I—" James clears his throat when Regulus' eyes flutter open. "You just—left it, so I took it inside. I meant to give it back to you, but—"

"But, two days later, life as we knew it fell apart," Regulus fills in, huffing out a bitter laugh.

James looks down at his fingers again. "Yeah."

"Suppose it doesn't matter now," Regulus mutters, letting his eyes drift shut again.

"I still have your hat," James confesses. Regulus' eyebrows furrow, but his eyes don't open. "It's—it's, ah, in the top drawer in the stand by my bed."

"James," Regulus says slowly, "it's been ten years."

"Yeah, I know," James mumbles. "But...just in case you ever wanted it back, or...I don't know. It's—that's where it is."

"Why would you do that?" Regulus whispers, eyes finally opening again. "Why would you keep it?"

"It was important to you," James says.

Regulus stares at him for a long time, not saying a word, and there's something unbearably gentle about his eyes right now. James watches them shift from that tenderness to something much more devastating; simple grief. "Sirius told me the day before the reaping that he would make me a new one and put a bell in it for me. I never saw that one either."

James struggles to speak past the lump in his throat and finds that he can't, because it goes so much deeper than just a hat, and he knows that. For Regulus, for Sirius, it's about all that changed for them both. They were so young to have gone through so much. Neither of them deserved it. None of them deserve what they're going through now.

"That sounds stupid, doesn't it?" Regulus asks, dropping his gaze to his own fingers that pluck at the seam on his knee. There's no loose thread, but he's searching for one. "What does a hat matter in all of that, really? It doesn't. It never mattered to me more than him. James, it was never about the hat, or the daggers, or all the things he did for me."

"I know," James rasps, and Regulus closes his eyes again, not speaking for a long time. His fingers drift up and down the scrunched seam where his knee is bent; he couldn't seem to find a thread to pluck on. James focuses back on his fingers, his chest feeling tight. "I remember the snow in your hair."

"What?" Regulus mumbles, one eye cracking open lazily, almost like a cat. No, exactly like a cat. A very suspicious cat that wants something but won't tell you what it is.

James coughs and reaches up to scratch at the back of his neck. "Just—on your birthday, I remember the snow that got in your hair. When—just, you know, after you got up from the snow angel you made. You'd already taken your hat off, and there was a bit of snow in your hair, like a faint dusting of it. I don't know why I—well, I mean, I just remember it."

"Okay," Regulus says, both eyes open now, but not very much. He's just squinting at him, still suspicious.

"I don't know," James mutters, dropping his hand to thread his fingers together. He stares down at them, but his mind seems to rewind, casting back to that day. "You looked—really happy. I think that's the last time I saw you look that happy. I remember right after, I was laughing with Sirius, and a fucking snowball just hit me in the back of my head out of nowhere."

Regulus' face twitches, and there it is—that tiny smile that opens up his eyes a bit more, showing how warm they can be when they're filled with amusement and secret delight. "I wanted your attention."

"You got it," James replies dryly, and Regulus turns his head to press his smile against his knee. James wishes he wouldn't. He wants to see it. "Yeah, you definitely got it."

It's true. James remembers that moment in perfect clarity, because it was an impactful one. Sirius had been chattering about the snow fort they just had to build, speaking grandly about how magnificent it would be, and James could only laugh about each ridiculous additional idea he kept coming up with, as well as the silly names he suggested for it.

The thing is, James did hear Regulus call his name the first, second, and third time. He just didn't care enough to turn around, much more interested in what Sirius was saying to pay attention to his little brother. Regulus stopped calling his name, and James promptly forgot all about him—for about five seconds. Regulus, who was becoming less and less shy as he got older, launched a snowball at the back of his head so hard that Sirius had shut up mid-sentence and James had just gaped at him in pure disbelief for about two seconds.

Sirius, of course, proceeded to roar with laughter, literally folding in half and slapping his knee, a stream of praise for his little shit of a brother falling out of his mouth. Meanwhile, James slowly reached up to brush the clumps of snow out of his hair and pivoted on the spot, fully prepared to threaten Regulus and immediately retaliate by pelting him with snowballs, except he never quite made it that far.

Regulus was standing there with a faint dusting of snow in his dark hair, face flushed with delight, eyes bright with pure satisfaction. He was grinning and wiping his gloves together to get the snow off. It was the first time James had ever looked at him and thought of him as anything other than Sirius' little brother. His breath had caught, because that was the moment he realized Regulus was utterly, undeniably beautiful.

Regulus had fixed his face into something neutral, despite the bright gleam in his eyes, and he'd arched an eyebrow right at James as he said, "I was talking to you. Don't ignore me."

From there, James never ignored Regulus again.

But, really, nothing was the same after that. Two days later, Sirius was volunteering to go to the arena so Regulus didn't have to, and Regulus… Well, Regulus started ignoring James. He never quite stopped, and it only got worse when Sirius made it back home. Regulus' distance had shifted into hatred at some point, and James just had to live with that.

Sometimes, James wonders what would have happened if Regulus' name had never been called, if Sirius didn't volunteer for him, if the games didn't exist at all. Sometimes, James wonders what would have happened if he and Regulus had bothered to pay attention to each other at the same time. There's no point in wondering, really. He'll never know.

"That was a good day," Regulus murmurs, his face soft with fondness. "The last good day, I think. Before—everything."

"You never did tell me what you wanted," James says, which makes Regulus blink over at him. "I mean, you hit me in the back of the head with a snowball, but you never did say why."

"I just wanted you to look at me," Regulus tells him, then jolts and squeezes his eyes shut. "Wait. Wait, no, I didn't—"

"Oh, is that so?" James teases, leaning forward with a grin as Regulus groans and begins repeatedly tapping his forehead to his knee. His cheeks are turning red. "You wanted me to look at you? That was all? So you hit me in the back of—"

"I was fifteen," Regulus hisses, head snapping up as he glares at James. "Only just!"

"A very violent fifteen year old. You wanted my attention enough to give me brain damage."

"Oh, please. I did not hit you that hard."

"It hurt, Regulus."

"It did not hurt, stop exaggerating."

"Did too."

"Well, maybe you shouldn't have ignored me, then."

James hums and braces his elbows on the table, flicking his gaze over Regulus' face—the fading red in his cheeks, the secret smile at the corners of his mouth, the flash of humor in his eyes. "That was the last time I made that mistake."

"That was the last time I cared if you did or not," Regulus informs him bluntly, fucking ruthless about it without even having to try that hard. In a split second, all the delight and humor has drained away, and that secret smile has flickered out of existence like a candle being blown out.

"I know," James says softly, sinking back into his seat and tucking his hands under the table again, twisting them in his lap. He watches Regulus' lips press into a thin line before he looks away to stare at his knee, and James drops his gaze to his restless fingers right after.

The silence stretches between them, heavy and stilted. James doesn't know how to break it, and Regulus clearly doesn't care to, so it remains unbroken. Even here, in the silence, James is overly aware of Regulus. It's been ten years, and James still can't find it within himself to ignore him ever again.

Maybe somewhere deep down, where that happy fifteen year old is still alive, despite everything that's tried to smother it, including the twenty-five year old that he is now—maybe there, Regulus still cares, because he eventually does break the silence to say, "Thank you for keeping my hat."

"You're welcome," James replies quietly, and he doesn't say that Regulus will see it again, but he will. He knows where it is now, and James is going to make sure he gets it back. He'll wear it again when this is all over.

James is so fucking sad that he'll never get to see it.

~•~

Remus stares at the door in front of him, the inside of his bottom lip caught as he worries it between his teeth. It's such a simple thing—just lift his hand and knock. He does it all the time, but never in the last five years has he done it of his own free will, just to show up and seek someone out.

It infuriates him that there's fear mixed up within him for doing one simple thing. He's been trained—conditioned—to not do this, and he hates that he's struggling with it now. A self-imposed restraint that he would have snarled at and shook off only five years ago. Now, he can't even knock on a door.

Remus takes a deep breath and slowly releases it, waiting for the anxiety-induced racing of his heart to slow. In and out, he breathes, looking down at his feet. There's trust in this, too, and it's Sirius. It's Sirius, who has been nothing but kind to him, who has given more reason to trust him than anyone else ever has in the last five years. Sirius even told him he could do this, could come and go as he pleases, so there's no need to restrain himself. The worst that happens is that Sirius turns out to be a liar, and Remus ends up dead. Or worse.

Well, that didn't help at all. Remus squeezes his eyes shut, frustrated beyond measure, and he starts to turn away before he forces himself to stop. In all of this, Remus never wanted to lose himself; he never wanted to let them win. This? This would be letting them win. The fear means they already have.

Clenching his jaw, Remus lifts his hand and holds his breath as he knocks. He only does it twice before he's snatching his hand back, his heart racing, nerves pulled tight enough to snap. He shouldn't be here. He shouldn't—

"Remus," Sirius blurts out as soon as the door swings open, his tired eyes immediately growing wider and filling with a startled spark. His hand fumbles on the doorknob, nearly making him stumble, and he violently clears his throat as he straightens up, a weak smile working onto his face.

And, just like that, Remus isn't scared anymore. It's strange what a sense of identity can do for someone, and Remus feels more real each time Sirius says his name. "Sirius. Hi."

"Hi. Hello. Hi," Sirius says, then huffs out a breathy laugh and scrunches his nose. "I—ah, I said hi twice."

"You did," Remus confirms, lips twitching.

"Right. Sorry. Hi," Sirius tells him, then squeezes his eyes shut, cheeks stained red. "Sorry. That's—um, that's probably the last one. Maybe." He coughs and lifts his head again, a sheepish, mortified half-smile on his face. "Is—did Pandora send you? I didn't request more towels."

"No, she didn't, and no, you didn't," Remus agrees, and Sirius blinks at him. Remus wavers, suddenly unsure how to even explain what he's doing. It's been too long since he's had any social interaction, honestly. He thinks, five years ago, he would have been more discreet, maybe less blunt, but now… Well, now he's a lot more direct. "I came here on my own."

Sirius blinks again, and then his whole face lights up. "Oh. You did? That's—that's great! I mean—" He rocks back on his heels, grinning broadly. "Sure, of course. Not that you can't, you can do whatever you want, but...why? Just—do you need something specific? Can I help you with anything?"

"No," Remus says, then chuckles. "I mean, unless you feel like helping me with laundry, which I doubt, so—"

"No! I mean, yes! I mean, I'd love to. Help. With that," Sirius bursts out, then inhales sharply and stares at him.

Remus struggles so hard not to smile, and then he wonders why he's fighting it. He lets it bloom on his face slowly, feeling it, the freedom of it. "You want to help me with laundry?"

"Well, if you're offering…" Sirius reaches up and scratches at the side of his neck, shrugging. "I've the time."

"Alright," Remus says slowly, cocking his head. Not exactly his plan, if he's honest, but there's something nice about that, about not knowing where he might end up, going with the flow and seeing the freedom in surprise. "Alright, come with me, then."

The laundry room is located in the back of the suite, never used by anyone but the servants. Sirius clearly never even knew it was back here, if the baffled expression on his face is anything to go by. Remus wonders what he thought happened when his clothes disappeared and reappeared in his closet, when his towels were taken and replaced. Not much thought often goes into the process when you're not the one doing it, but Remus is the one doing it, so it's always agitated him a bit that no one ever even stopped to think about it. Sirius isn't above his own privileges, and that should bother Remus—it does, a bit—but mostly, it just makes him seem more real, too.

What Remus likes best about Sirius is that he isn't afraid to acknowledge these things. The first thing he says is, "I never even thought about laundry, not once. You do it for all of us, don't you? Here?"

"Yes," Remus admits. "I like Regulus the best, if I'm honest. He keeps his dirty clothes in a neat stack for me to find. I don't have to go searching for them, and he doesn't leave them lying all over his floor." At this, Remus shoots Sirius a pointed look, mildly amused when Sirius looks horrified instantly. "James doesn't leave his wet towels on the floor, which is nice. And Pandora… Well, she never has laundry at all. I think she throws her clothes away, or burns them, or...I don't even know."

"She donates them, or recycles the fabric," Sirius explains, huffing a weak laugh. "Pandora is...a gentle soul, really. She was dealt a good hand, being born in the Hallow, and she doesn't waste that, if she can help it. She tries to help the less fortunate as much as possible."

"Not much like a Hallow at all."

"Not really, no. It's what I like best about her."

Remus hums. "She's kind to me. You all are. Well, Regulus is… Actually, I don't think he's ever spoken to me outside of a quiet hello here or there. Meanwhile, James talked to me for almost an hour yesterday about something he'd learned while training. Did you know that some moths and butterflies will drink blood and tears from people? It's called mud-puddling. I didn't know that until James felt the need to tell me."

"Oh, James," Sirius says with palpable fondness, chuckling under his breath as he shakes his head. "Sounds like him."

"I saw you two earlier in the kitchen, you know," Remus confesses as he turns around to face the clothes in a pile on the table. His voice comes out measured with tentative curiosity, unable to help it. "I didn't mean to. I was just walking by. I didn't linger, I promise."

Sirius walks around the other side of the table, watching Remus sort the clothes into separate, smaller piles with a furrow in his brow. "Sorry if we were in your way. You could have come in if you needed to. Um, what are you doing?"

"Sorting the clothes," Remus explains. "Some have to be washed at different temperatures, some can't be dried, and some can't be washed together."

"Oh," Sirius says weakly. He looks very out of his depth as he lifts his gaze to Remus'. "I didn't know that." Again, Remus likes that he just—admits it. "Can I...help?"

"You can separate the white clothes from the rest," Remus says, lips curling up. Sirius looks relieved and immediately starts doing what he's told. Remus likes that, too. "I didn't want to interrupt. You and James, I mean. It looked like an intimate moment. You two seem...close."

"Yeah, we are," Sirius murmurs, smiling softly, and then he blinks before his gaze snaps up. "Oh, you mean—do you think—no, no, no, I swear we're not—we're just best friends. It was intimate, but not intimate. Not like—we're not together."

"Okay," Remus replies casually, nodding easily as he keeps sorting through clothes.

"We've never been together," Sirius apparently feels the need to add. "Just best friends. I mean, I've known him since I was eleven years old. He's…" Sirius' face softens into something much sadder. "He's the best friend I've ever had."

Remus feels his heart clench, because he knows that Sirius is in a difficult position right now, between his little brother and best friend going into the arena. Only one can come out, and the chances of that are depressingly low. "I, ah, have one of those. A very special best friend. I get what you mean."

"You do?" Sirius asks, startled and curious, sucked right out of his sadness in a snap. "Here?"

"No. Back home," Remus murmurs, dropping his gaze to the silk slipping over his fingers. He swallows thickly. "Lily. I haven't seen her in five years, but when you're best friends like we are—like you and James are—time and distance doesn't really matter, does it? It goes beyond that."

"Yeah. Yeah, I know what you mean," Sirius croaks, offering a tight, trembling smile. There's a long beat of silence, and then he clears his throat. "Five years. I can't even imagine being without James for that long. You must miss her."

"Very much. Every day with every breath," Remus admits.

Sirius smiles at him, gently. "You can—I mean, if you want to, you can tell me about her."

And Remus does want to, he realizes, because he misses Lily like a permanent ache in his bones, and it's been so long since he's seen her; he's starved, in a way, desperate to take the chance to talk about her. It's like he can keep her closer if he makes her real to someone other than him.

So, Remus tells Sirius about Lily. In between sorting clothes, he tells Sirius how he and Lily met in school, how they became fast friends, how they ate lunch together every day and went to the train tracks after school just to walk up and down them while talking about nothing and everything as the sun sank down below the tree line. He tells Sirius about the red of Lily's hair, the snort in her hardest laughter, the light that entered her green eyes every time she saw Remus coming.

In between starting the first load of clothes—and giving Sirius a brief lesson on how to use the fancy Hallow machine—he talks about how he and Lily went everywhere together and did everything together, so much so that everyone mostly assumed they were dating. He talks about how they thought, because of those assumptions, that they had to date, only to realize after a kiss that sent them both into uproarious laughter that their desires leaned away from the opposite sex. He talks about how he was there for Lily when her first girlfriend got taken in the reaping and never made it back home. He talks about how Lily punched his first boyfriend in the face because he was caught kissing another boy from their class.

As they go back to sorting the clothes, Remus talks about how close their families were. Lily was always coming over to the Lupin home, and Remus was always at the Evans house. He talks about the long summers, the heat that brought a flush to Lily's round cheeks, the nights they sat out at the train tracks to watch the lightning bugs flicker. He talks about their tradition to get high the night before every reaping, smoking and giggling like they had no worries at all.

Remus doesn't talk about when it went wrong. When it all fell apart. When he and Lily were crossing the train tracks for the very first time, running for their lives and going farther than they ever dared to, blood on their hands and Aurors on their heels. He doesn't talk about how only one of them could get away, and how he made sure it was her.

He doesn't even breathe a word about the fact that he doesn't know if she managed to or not, if she's dead or alive, and if she did escape, where she is now.

Because he doesn't mention these things, Sirius essentially shatters his heart by tentatively saying, "I—well, you know I have to be there on the tour back through the districts, so if you wanted to write her a letter, or just send a message, I don't think it would be impossible for me to get it to her."

"Thank you," Remus says softly, swallowing down the lump in his throat, "but it would be impossible. I—I appreciate the offer, though, really. You're very kind, Sirius."

"Alright," Sirius murmurs, eyebrows furrowed. "If you change your mind, the offer is always open."

Remus gives him a tight smile and turns away to put the first load onto dry, then turns back and clears his throat. "The rest of this is really tedious, and there's nothing more that you could do to really help me, so you don't have to stay. Thank you for all your help, but I have it from here."

"I didn't really do anything," Sirius says.

"You listened," Remus tells him. "That's more than anyone else in the Hallow has ever done. I just…"

Sirius scans his face, then he takes a deep breath before slowly releasing it. "Remus, you don't need an excuse to tell me to go away. If—if you want to be alone, you can just tell me you don't want my company. It's alright. I'm not going to… I said you can do whatever you want, and that can include telling me to piss off. You don't have to hold back with me, alright?"

Having it put to him so bluntly makes him realize that this is a fear, too. A faint, flickering fear in the back of his mind that this newfound freedom Sirius has granted him could be taken away if Remus upset him in some way. It's such a small concern that he didn't even notice it, because he doesn't really believe it; doesn't really think Sirius would make something like this conditional. He's so earnest, and Remus can feel his trust in Sirius growing stronger with every interaction.

That doesn't mean it's easy. That doesn't mean Remus isn't unconsciously being careful, having doubts, clinging to restraint he's had rewired into his brain after five years. It's like a leap of faith, pushing boundaries even when Sirius tells him that he can. This is bigger than a knock on a door, and yet, with Sirius right there, he's not as afraid as he should be.

"I—I'd like for you to leave," Remus says, and immediately, his heart jolts and takes off in his chest, his stomach dropping right out from under him.

"Alright," is Sirius' quiet response, a tiny smile flickering across his face, and then he pulls back and starts to leave.

"Sirius!" Remus blurts out, a little breathless, and Sirius pauses to glance back, blinking and waiting. It's strange. Remus wants to shrug back into freedom like a familiar, beloved coat, but less so when it involves freedom from Sirius. It's not that Remus forgot that he wanted things; it's that he forgot he was allowed to. He's relearning to navigate that, and he wants to do it with Sirius. "I just—I only want a bit of time. I'm—I still have to make dinner when I finish with the laundry, so if you wanted, you could—I mean, you could help with that, too."

"You don't have to do that, Remus," Sirius says.

"No, I know," Remus breathes out. "I know, Sirius."

Sirius bites his lip. "You know I'm not going to be much help in the kitchen."

"Well, that's the thing," Remus tells him, huffing out a soft laugh, "it's your company I really want."

"If you're sure," Sirius says, holding his gaze, his lips twitching at the corners like he's struggling not to grin.

"I'm very sure," Remus replies.

"Well, alright," Sirius muses, tucking his lips in, eyes bright. He nods and clears his throat. "I'll just…go make sure I don't have any clothes strewn all over my floor."

Remus looks down with a smile. "Much appreciated. I'll see you in the kitchen in an hour, then?"

"Yeah. Yes. I will—yeah," Sirius answers, stumbling over his words as he backs up. He turns and knocks directly into the door. "Shit." He glances back at Remus, and then he drags his hand down his face as he hangs his head, cheeks red. He opens the door with a cough. "Right. Bye. I mean, see you soon. In the—okay. Bye."

Remus moves over as Sirius ducks out and starts up the hallway, berating himself under his breath as he goes. Remus slowly shuts the door and presses his forehead against it, a small smile curving his mouth. Sirius—more so than anything else he's ever encountered—is Remus' favorite mess. Nothing or no one could ever compare.

Despite that, Remus is glad that he left. Glad that he would leave, all because Remus gathered the courage to ask, all because Remus needed him to. Because, right now, Remus really needs to be alone.

He turns and puts his back to the door, slowly sliding down the length of it until he lands on the floor, his knees bent in front of him. His smile is long gone as he stares at the machine that whirs quietly with the clothes of people who don't even bother to think about who washes them. He can't really see it through the blur of tears in his eyes, because at this moment, the only person he wants to be with is Lily, and he will never get to see her again. He doesn't even know if she's alive.

For the first time in five years, Remus is granted the freedom to sit down and cry about that.

Chapter End Notes

i have been encouraged to ramble at will in my end notes, so ill do it when the mood strikes.

first of all, regulus being a defiant little shit will never not be funny to me, but also, the butterfly effect is real, and regulus just caused a wing flutter.

also, sirius is going THROUGH it. this poor guy is just being pushed to rip all his hair out, like james and regulus are trying to give him a heart attack, at this point. and the complicated relationship between regulus and sirius makes me so sad. it's so, so complex, and honestly, despite the angst of it, it's actually really interesting to navigate and explore. there is no pain like the pain between them, in my opinion. like, that always hurts me the worst.

and sirius being in denial about james deciding to die. he really said: this sign can't stop me, because i REFUSE to read it. 😜 same, sirius. i also do not accept any version of james potter's death. that's valid, king!

but then!!! james and regulus talking!!! the hat!!! the snowball to the back of james' head!!! they're so cute, and at the same time, they're so fucking tragic. james being sad that he'll never see regulus wear the hat again :(

and THEN!!! remus and sirius. i find it absolutely hilarious that they're essentially falling in love in the middle of being very domestic. like, they're cooking and doing laundry together. yes, that's a recurring theme for them. i didn't plan that, honestly. it just kept happening. but it makes me giggle because like, oh there's this big horrible event (the hunger games) about to take place and it's freaking everyone out. cut to sirius and remus flirting while doing laundry 😭 and finally, LILY!!! LILY LILY LILY!!! oh, you all have NO IDEA how excited i was for that mention of her. but also, remus crying because his best friend is possibly dead. oh, that's so sad. their backstory is... well, it's a doozy, lemme just say that.

anyway, hope you all enjoyed!

Interview Preparation

Chapter Notes

warnings for this chapter:

-an overall background theme of death (because of the whole "possibly dying in an arena" thing)
-references to murder (not explicit, just mentioned)
-references to child abuse (vague, but obvious, yes it's Walburga and Orion's A+ parenting again)
-more references and descriptions of Sirius being objectified by the Hallows
-violent thoughts
-angst

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Sirius wakes up to a knock on his door, and he can tell it's early because he has to fight the desire to groan and shove his head underneath his pillow to hide away from whoever is trying to drag him to the land of the living before it's time. His sweet oblivion; he misses it already. He can almost feel himself sinking right back into it, eyes drifting shut again as—

Knock, knock, knock.

Muffling a growl under his breath, Sirius tumbles out of bed with one eye squinting as he snarls, "What the fuck do you want? It's too fucking early to be—"

Sirius promptly swallows the rest of his words when he opens his door to find Remus standing on the other side, a mild expression on his face. Sirius tries to fix his face into something that's not just squinting at him with one eye like a deranged lunatic.

"Remus, hi," Sirius greets weakly, regretting the last five seconds more than he's regretted anything in his life, and he's actually murdered people.

"Good morning, Sirius," Remus says calmly. "Pandora asked that I would wake you up, as you apparently requested an early start to the day."

Sirius grimaces. "Yeah, well, Sirius of the past is a prick, and I don't like him." This makes Remus' lips twitch, but his expression remains fairly neutral otherwise. "Sorry about—you didn't have to do that. You're not an alarm clock. You could have told her no."

"I didn't mind," Remus murmurs. "It got me out of making breakfast. Pandora said everyone knew how to use the toaster, and the day would be so busy that a big breakfast would just hold up the schedule."

"It's—yeah, it's going to be a busy day," Sirius admits wearily, heaving a sigh as he runs his hand through his hair. It's likely sticking up in all different directions, but he tries not to focus on the fact that Remus can see it. "We have to get James and Regulus ready for their interviews tomorrow. It's—well, if I'm completely honest with you, it's going to be difficult."

"Regulus?" Remus asks, because he's spent four days around him by now, and that's all it really takes to know that Regulus isn't the best conversationalist.

"Regulus," Sirius confirms with a sigh.

Remus hums. "I don't suspect James will be much of a problem."

"No, I think his interview will cause the least drama, honestly," Sirius admits. "Regulus… Well, my hopes aren't high, if I'm honest, and we had a fight yesterday, so… And then they have to go be fitted for their outfits with their stylist team while I have to go to a fucking party and smooze at sponsors."

"I have to work that party," Remus tells him.

Sirius blinks. "Oh. So, you'll be there?"

"Yes," Remus says. He pauses, slowly lifting his eyebrows at him. "You—you can't talk to me, Sirius. Or remove my mask. Or have anything to do with me there, really. I mean, I'm sure you know that, but...just a reminder."

"Right, no, I know," Sirius replies quickly, despite the fact that his brain was already coming up with increasingly ridiculous scenarios involving literally all of those things. But that's not how it works in the Hallow. He does that, and Remus would be killed. "But, well, I can look at you."

"You...can," Remus agrees, lips curling up. "I suppose that's not a crime."

"That'll be enough to improve my night," Sirius admits, because it's true, and he's so pleased he said it when Remus' smile grows.

Remus hums and looks away, his side profile still giving away the smile on his face. He can't hide it at all. "Right, well, I suppose I should leave you to...starting your day."

"Do you want to come in?" Sirius blurts out.

"Aren't you going to shower and get dressed?" Remus asks, looking at him again with his eyebrows flying up.

Sirius thinks it's unfair that the floor won't open up and swallow him on the spot like he's desperately internally begging it to. "Ah, yeah, but—I mean, you could help me pick out what to wear tonight. So you'll recognize me."

"Sirius, I think you could be in a plastic bag, and I would still recognize you," Remus tells him, amused.

"I'd wear a plastic bag if you told me to," Sirius replies, and he would. He absolutely fucking would.

Remus starts laughing; full, genuine laughter that shakes his body and makes his eyes sparkle and brings a flush of life to his cheeks. He lifts his hand like he's about to cover his mouth to hide it, or smother it, and Sirius' hand snaps out to catch his arm. He pushes it down gently, and Remus' laughter fades slowly, leaving behind a smile and something that shifts in his eyes. Sirius pulls his hand back, his stomach all topsy-turvy and his heart thumping hard in his chest.

Maybe Sirius shouldn't have done that. He's never—he hasn't touched Remus since trying to remove his mask, careful not to do it without permission. In a way, stopping Remus from covering his mouth was—wrong, and presumptuous. He should have let Remus do it, if that's what he wanted to do; he just wasn't thinking, because he liked it, to see his smile and hear his laugh, and Sirius didn't think Remus should feel like he had to cover that at all.

"Sorry," Sirius murmurs. "I wasn't—I shouldn't have—"

"You don't have to hold back with me either, you know," Remus replies quietly, his face softening. "Really, you're fine. Come on, let's pick something for you to wear."

"Not a plastic bag?" Sirius jokes as he turns to let Remus inside, his heart jumping as Remus slips past and very gently, very briefly slides the tips of his fingers over Sirius' arm as he goes by. Sirius swears it makes his whole body tingle; even his scalp is prickling in the aftermath of the barely-there touch.

Remus glances back with a tiny smile. "No promises."

~•~

James is not at all gratified by the tension that exists between Sirius and Regulus right now. It's putting him on edge, if he's honest, because they need to sort their shit out before the games—which starts in three fucking days, including this one.

The thing is, James has accepted that he's going to die. Is he happy about it? Well, obviously not. He isn't happy that he'll never see his parents again, that he'll never get to go home again, that he won't get to stay with Sirius, who will need him, who will get older while he can't. No, of course James isn't fucking pleased that he's in this situation, but he's accepted it nonetheless, because this is his choice. The alternative—he can't do that. He won't do that.

So, in a way, it feels like a slap to the face that Sirius and Regulus are essentially wasting this time they could spend getting on better terms by remaining stilted and distant. James knows that it's complicated, that they can't just overcome a decade of issues in a handful of days, especially under the very stressful constraints they all exist within now; that being said, he still wishes that they would just—be okay again.

James is annoyed with Regulus, because Sirius is going to need him; James is annoyed with Sirius, because Regulus already does. They love each other so much, even more than the other realizes, and if they could just accept that, and show that, then things would be better for them. They're both so stubborn, so resistant, and it's driving James mad.

But, because James is always willing to find the bright side to any situation, he can admit that, while all of this is fucking awful, it does nonetheless force Regulus and Sirius to actually interact with each other. Hey, it's something. He'll take it.

Sirius is pacing back and forth, clearly weighing his words very carefully, so at least he's making an effort. The same can't be said for Regulus, who is slumped down in his chair, arms crossed with a scowl etched onto his face. James doesn't think it's fair for someone to look good when they're making such a sour expression, but that's Regulus for you.

"Rita Skeeter," Sirius starts, and Pandora makes a low sound of disdain, which causes Regulus' lips to twitch. James' does as well, frankly, because it hasn't taken very long to grow fond of her. Even Regulus is giving into it, at this point. "She's been doing interviews and commentary for four years now. She's settled in and made a name for herself, beloved by many Hallows, and she knows what she's doing."

"Not all Hallows," Pandora grumbles, and James has to stifle a chuckle at the derision in her tone.

Sirius coughs around a laugh. "Ah, originally, Pandora tried to go for the same job, but Rita…"

"Is a vapid, morally corrupt snake who will do anything and anyone to get what she wants," Pandora snaps, and Regulus' eyebrows fly up, visibly impressed by the poison in her words. He glances over at James, and as soon as their eyes meet, they both quickly look away so they won't bust out laughing. Meanwhile, Pandora huffs. "Some of us have standards. I wasn't about to lower those standards or stoop to the level required to get that job. It's an ugly, horrid position, you know. I wanted to go in with sympathy, with genuine sincerity to the tributes we meet and lose, but no, it's all about the drama. Tch."

"Right, yes, you have our sympathy, Pandora," Sirius tells her, seeming to honestly mean it. That softens Pandora quite a bit, and James is once again startled to find that Sirius actually has people he cares about in the Hallow; fellow mentors, a Hallow here and there, and most definitely Pandora. "You certainly would have been the better choice, no doubt, but I'm selfishly grateful to have you to myself anyway. We all are, aren't we?"

"Oh, yeah, certainly," James confirms supportively.

"It doesn't make much of a difference to m—ow!" Regulus' scowl deepens as Sirius walks by and whacks him on the back of his head. Sirius gives him a rather stern look, and Regulus rolls his eyes. "Yes, Pandora, we're very grateful for all that you do for us. You're appreciated."

Pandora looks much happier now. "Thank you. If I'm honest, I'm much happier where I am anyway. Carry on, Sirius."

"So, as Pandora so helpfully described, Rita is not a good person," Sirius announces as he continues to pace. "She doesn't give a toss about you. What she cares about is drama. She thrives on a story, a scandal, any secret she can find. I've watched her ruin men twice her size during interviews and take them from having countless sponsors to having none."

"She can really do that?" James asks warily.

"She can, and she will," Sirius warns. "If she detects even a hint of weakness, she will absolutely pounce. If there's anything for her to uncover, then she will dig it out by the root."

James swallows. "By anything, you mean…?"

"Secrets. Lies. Drama. Anything the Hallows will go mental over," Sirius explains. "In your case, James, you're fine. You don't have anything to hide, and there won't be very much drama surrounding you."

"Are—are you sure about that?" James says, high-pitched.

Sirius waves him off lazily. "Quite sure. At most, she'll try to follow the thread on thinking you hate Regulus, but you won't be lying when you tell her that you don't. She'll no doubt ask if you two are squabbling, and she'll drag me into it, but you're not the complicated part of that equation."

"That would be me, I'm assuming," Regulus says flatly. He heaves a sigh. "Why does it always come back to me?"

"Because you're a Black, and our family is cursed," Sirius replies, and Regulus snorts weakly, tossing his hands up in some form of agreement. "But yes, it's going to come down to you. Regulus, listen to me, if she catches even a hint of a whiff that you have complex feelings for me, she will pick them apart. Do you understand what I'm telling you? If you let slip that we're not—that things are more complicated than it seems, she will chip away until there's nothing left, then lay it out for everyone to see. And I do mean everyone."

Regulus stares at him, suitably uncomfortable. In a rare show of vulnerability, he whispers, "Sirius, I don't—I don't know how to do this. I don't know how to talk to people. I'm not like you. I can't—I don't know how to be—"

"Regulus," Pandora cuts in gently, "that's why we're here. We're going to help you, alright? You'll be prepared for anything that vile twit could think to throw at you."

"Look at me," Sirius says quietly, crouching down beside Regulus' chair to hold Regulus' gaze. "You can't—you can't shut down, Reggie. When you're up there, you can't retreat into yourself and hide. I know you'll want to, but you need to present yourself in a way that makes them love you. I know you hate that, and I get it—I really do—but your survival depends on it. You just have to make it through, alright?"

"I don't know how to make people love me," Regulus replies softly, and that might be the singularly most heartbreaking thing James has ever heard in his fucking life. Oh, that pierces right through the heart, that does.

Sirius' throat bobs, and he squeezes his eyes shut, exhaling slowly. When he opens his eyes, he murmurs, "You don't have to make people love you."

"You just said—"

"I—I know what I just said, but I'm not talking about that anymore. I'm not talking about the Hallows. I'm—I mean, in life, Regulus. You don't have to make people love you; they just do. The ones who do—they do, just because you're you."

"No one—" Regulus halts, his mouth snapping shut, and just like that, his expression shutters. He visibly shuts down, then looks away. James feels his heart sink, because he knows where that ends; they all do; it was fucking obvious where that was going. No one loves me.

Sirius looks stricken, and then—because he's a Black, too, and just as complicated as Regulus, if not more—his face goes blank as well. He pushes himself up, pacing away again as he shoves his hands through his hair, gaze distant and cloudy. James feels like his insides are wilting, because that's the perfect opening for Sirius to tell him, except Sirius can't, or won't, because he's too locked in his own head.

James could say it. You're loved, he could say. Sirius loves you, he could say. There's a lot he could say, but the worst thing about knowing what needs to be said is knowing that he's not the one who needs to say it. Regulus doesn't want to hear it from him, not any version James could throw at him, and he won't believe him. Frankly, James doesn't think Regulus wants to hear it from Sirius either. In a way, that just makes things so much harder for them both.

"Do you remember when we used to play the redirect game?" Sirius asks abruptly, whirling around to face Regulus.

Regulus slowly turns to frown at him. "Yes?"

"The redirect game?" Pandora asks curiously.

Sirius chuckles, and even Regulus quirks a small, sardonic smile, like they're sharing an inside joke that's both funny and not funny at all. "It's this game we used to play when we were children, sort of to prepare ourselves to try to avoid any punishments from our parents. It was like—practice, I suppose. It didn't always work, but sometimes it did."

"It was for when we'd done something wrong. When we broke something, or came home late, or said something we shouldn't have," Regulus explains. "Sirius' method was to be as erratic as possible. He broke a vase once, and when Mother started to punish him, he rambled for—I'm not joking—an hour about various gossip he heard around the district, in hopes that something else would infuriate her more. It actually worked that time. He just got sent to his room."

"One of my luckier moments," Sirius says wryly. "Now, Regulus' method was to be their innocent little angel who never did anything wrong. Oh, that broken window? No, Mother, of course your precious baby boy didn't launch a ball through it. Your baby boy was bringing the ball inside when he tripped and fell, and the ball went flying, and he wanted to pick up the glass, but what if he got hurt? Mother, your baby is so sorry, he'll go pick up the glass now. What's that? You don't want your darling little angel to cut his fingers? Just be more careful next time? Of course, Mother. Of course."

Regulus' lips curl up into a smirk. "I still can't believe she bought that one, actually."

"He won the redirect game more than I did," Sirius declares, shaking his head.

"Someone's bitter," Regulus comments. "I can't help it that I was good at it."

"It's all in the eyes with you," Sirius mutters. He points at Regulus and raises his eyebrows at James and Pandora. "He can cry on command, you know. Just bring tears to his eyes in seconds, and it's all fake. I've seen it. Fucking mental, he is."

"Wait, can you actually?" Pandora gasps, leaning forward.

"Yes," Regulus admits with a shrug.

Sirius makes a face. "That is not normal, Reggie."

"Do it," Pandora insists, looking enthralled.

"What, right now?" Regulus asks, eyebrows furrowing.

"I vote no," James cuts in. "Let's keep the tears to a minimum, yeah? Fake or not."

Regulus huffs a laugh. "That stopped working on Sirius by the time I was eight anyway."

"You know when it's real," is all Sirius says. He shrugs when James stares at him incredulously. "Trust me, the real thing isn't that calm. He gets all shaky and struggles to breathe when he's properly crying."

"Yes, well, you're ugly when you cry, so," Regulus grumbles, and he scoffs when Sirius flips him off.

"That sounds brilliant," Pandora announces brightly. "Do it."

"No," James says sharply. "Can we just—is there a point to all of this? Are you telling me that you want him to fake cry during his interview, Sirius?"

"No, I don't think taking it that far would do much good, especially not in the arena." Sirius crosses his arms and goes back to pacing, eyes narrowed in thought as he traces his lips with his finger. "The problem is, this is really just a balancing act, and a very important one. Think of it like spinning plates, and you do not want to drop even one of them, because that will surely bring the rest down as well."

Regulus arches an eyebrow. "I'm good at balancing things."

"Yes, I know. James is the clumsy one." Sirius purses his lips, then claps his hands together. "Alright, so you've got three plates, yeah? One is threat level, dealing primarily on how your enemies in the arena see you. To start, you balanced that one quite well, but you've likely fumbled it with that act you pulled that got you a high score. They're wary of you, Regulus, which is good. What's not good is that they're eager to get rid of you as soon as possible. So, that's one plate down, but it's not a broken plate. You didn't shatter it. You're good with daggers, you can fight, and you can run. You're smart enough to outwit those brainless idiots."

"Alright," Regulus says slowly, sounding cautious, clearly not expecting Sirius to brush off the source of their last fight.

"The second plate is political damage," Sirius continues, heaving a sigh as he crosses his arms. "This one is about the gamemakers and government officials, particularly their opinion of you. If you're a favorite, or if you're boring to them, or if you've caused trouble and peeved them off—which you have, by giving Slughorn an impromptu haircut."

"I just took a little off the side," Regulus protests. "Sirius, honestly, you can't even tell! And I could have killed him, you know, but I didn't. That's something!"

Sirius covers his whole face with his hand, and then, miraculously, he laughs. He's still laughing when he manages to choke out, "Do you—do you realize that you sound like me?"

"I do not," Regulus argues instantly, rearing back in offense, like he can't think of anything more insulting.

"Reggie, that's absolutely something I would have done, and you're defending yourself by pointing out how much worse you could have been, which is exactly what I do," Sirius informs him, dropping his hand.

"No," Regulus denies, shaking his head. "No, absolutely not." He looks at James, who scrunches his face and tips his head from side-to-side. Regulus looks appalled. "No. I refuse to—no, James. That—that wasn't a Sirius move."

"It was a Sirius move, yeah," James confirms.

"Well, if—if that's true, which it isn't," Regulus stresses, and it looks like his eye actually twitches, "then why were you so fucking angry, Sirius?"

"Because it's not my life on the line," Sirius tells him, raising his eyebrows. "It's yours. It's James'. You did something incredibly reckless, and if it wasn't for the fact that it increases your chances of being killed, I wouldn't have been angry. But it does, and I can't believe I have to say this to you of all people, but you have to be more careful."

"I thought it was brave," Pandora comments.

Regulus looks stricken. "Oh, it was a Sirius move. Why did I do that? Why would I ever—"

"Well, for you, I imagine it comes from a place of pettiness, because you're a raging bitch," Sirius says casually.

"And what's your excuse?" Regulus shoots back.

Sirius grins at him. "The same, really, but I'm just louder about it. You couldn't have picked a worse moment to increase your volume. Tone it down, would you?"

"Oh, fuck off," Regulus mutters, but something about his tone or body language must read as compliant, because Sirius looks satisfied as he nods. "So, political damage plate down, too?"

"Well, it's certainly falling, which is not good," Sirius tells him with a wince. "These people control your experience in the arena, particularly Horace Slughorn. They're the ones who can blink a stream out of existence just as you're dying of dehydration, or send a fucking fireball at your head when you're sleeping. Some things in the arena are set in stone, like the layout and original design, but they can control other things as well. They can't outright kill you, as that wouldn't make for a good show, really, which is the most important part to them—but they can, however, influence how easy or how hard things are for you. If you've peeved them off, well, you can assume that it's not going to be easy."

"Lovely," Regulus says, eyes sinking shut. "One plate down, and another heading for the floor. Just lovely."

James fidgets restlessly with his hands in his lap. He doesn't like this at all. It's sounding more and more like it's going to be very fucking hard to keep Regulus alive and get him home. Whether it's simple, or the most grueling thing James will ever go through, he's still going to do it regardless, but he's not ashamed to admit that he wishes it wasn't that difficult.

"And the last plate?" James prompts warily, because at this point, he isn't expecting good news.

"Public image," Sirius announces. Regulus scoffs as his eyes snap open, and Sirius points at him. "No, don't do that. Don't make that face and be so quick to dismiss it. Public image is more important that you realize; I don't know how many times I have to tell you. Believe it or not, it's the most important."

"It is," Pandora confirms. She leans forward with a heavy sigh, threading her hands together. "Who do you think this is all for, really? I mean, really think about it."

Sirius nods. "The people—the Hallows, primarily—have more power than you'd think. The tributes they care about, the ones they want to see, those are the tributes that make it far. Not just because sponsors empty their pockets; it's also about public opinion. If they have a high opinion of you, they want to see you live, and fight, and even win. The games...they're never really just left up to chance, or fate. There's an unfair advantage for those that come in with skills, and there's an unfair advantage for those that endear themselves to the public. You want those advantages, and it can't matter that they're not fair, because it might just be the thing that stands between you and death. Very, very rarely does anyone go into the games with no skills and no support and come out alive. It can happen, but it almost never does, and do not make the mistake of thinking that it will for you. Chances are, it won't."

"But it has happened?" Regulus asks, sounding genuinely curious. "I mean, you say it can, but has it?"

"Only once that I've ever seen," Sirius murmurs. "My friend, Marlene. She had virtually no sponsors, and she hadn't ever practiced with a weapon before the training center."

"She won," James says softly. "How?"

"She fought when she needed to. She hid well. She surprised everyone, because no one expected her to live past the first day, let alone be the last standing. Not even me," Sirius admits.

Regulus is quiet for a long moment, taking that in, and then he heaves a sigh. "So, I'm guessing my public image plate is absolutely shattered on the floor, then?"

"Actually, no," Sirius corrects. "It's still up and spinning, but it's a bit wobbly. Fortunately, you haven't had to appear in public much just yet. This interview is going to decide whether or not that plate falls, and Regulus? You need to not let it fall, do you understand? If you keep it up, the other two can be picked up, too. But if it falls, all plates are down, and your odds in the arena… Well, it's not good. Not good at all."

"The problem is, I don't know how to keep it from falling, Sirius," Regulus grits out.

"I know that, which is why I brought up the redirect game. You're going to play it," Sirius tells him firmly. "You're going to be the Hallows' angel trying to avoid trouble. That's all it is. You can do that; you've done it all your life."

"So, I'm supposed to—lie," Regulus says.

Pandora busts out laughing, smacking her thigh. They stare at her until she calms, and she shakes her head, amused. "Oh, you're absolutely going to lie, Regulus. Everyone is going to be lying when they talk to Rita. She is not the type of person you want to trust with the truth."

James feels a jolt of nerves shoot through him, because he's not a good liar, especially when he's anxious. He starts to bring this to everyone's attention, but Sirius and Pandora lean forward and launch into coaching Regulus on how to survive his interview. James falls silent, but he can't help but think that he might need some coaching, too.

Well, maybe it'll be fine.

~•~

Regulus doesn't want to admit it, but he's come to reluctantly like Gideon as a person, despite the fact that he's a Hallow. It's much the same as with Pandora and Dorcas. Being forced to spend time with them has shown him that they're more than he ever expected them to be. Not many Hallows are.

"No, not like that," Gideon says with a sigh, reaching out to smack Regulus' hands away from the clasp at his throat. He looks unbothered by the glare Regulus pins on him. He even rolls his eyes. "Oh, stop it, I'm trying to help you. What are you going to do? Attempt to bite me again?"

"Don't tempt me," Regulus mutters.

"Believe it or not, this is a collaborative effort," Gideon tells him, looking amused. "We're all here to make you look your best, so you can survive your best."

"The day we met, you told me I was the nicest doll you'd ever had," Regulus says flatly.

Gideon chuckles. "Yes, well, don't fault me for appreciating potential when I see it. You, my friend, have what one would call timeless, natural beauty." He leans in and lowers his voice to a whisper. "That's a weapon too, if you use it right."

"Well, the goal is to get the Hallows to love me, so...I suppose being pretty can't hurt," Regulus replies with a grimace, a deep sigh escaping him. He can't help the nerves that jumble up under his skin just thinking about the interview.

"Hey," Gideon murmurs, his voice softening as he braces his hands on Regulus' shoulders. "You're going to do fine. And this, what we've given you? It's a tool, Regulus, and you can use it. We're going to be in the crowd, you know. So, if you need a familiar face, look for me, Fabian, and Dorcas."

Really, if Regulus wants anyone to be there, just for reassurance, it's Sirius. He won't be, because he'll be in the back before and after each interview. Still, it's actually sort of nice that Gideon offers. "Thank you."

"Not too tight?" Gideon asks as he gently tugs on the cloak resting over Regulus' shoulders.

"No, it's—it's fine."

"You're comfortable? Don't feel like you're being strangled?"

"No."

Gideon nods and pulls his hands back. "Excellent. Might I say, Regulus, you look downright fetching."

"Yay," Regulus mumbles, and Gideon snorts. "I know that this is basically your livelihood, but it's just not...my thing."

"Yeah, I figured that out on my own," Gideon muses, lips twitching. "You know, Fabian and I… Fashion was one of the things that always really gave us independence. We've expressed ourselves differently since we were children, and this actually gave us a sense of independence that—well, I'd say it really empowered us both. We needed it. Something that kept us separate, but it also brought us together as well. When you're brothers, something like that is sacred."

Something that kept us separate, but it also brought us together as well. When you're brothers, something like that is sacred. Regulus thinks of him and Sirius, and then, rather ridiculously, what passes through Regulus' mind is one word. A name. James.

He swallows thickly and drops his gaze, running his fingers over the cloak that slips down past his fingers. It's dark and soft, only just sweeping along the floor.

"Come on," Gideon says, stepping back, "let's get you to Dorcas so she can explain everything."

Regulus follows him out and isn't surprised to find James and Fabian chatting easily. James is cracking up, laughing at something Fabian is saying, and he looks unfairly good in the outfit designed for him. It's not much different from Regulus' own, except there's no choker around his throat shaped like a crown. Instead his crown has been broken in half and placed on each shoulder, holding his cloak up. It's similar to Regulus', except it's white, and it looks more like a cape for a set of armor than an actual cloak. It drapes mostly from his back, making him look like some form of royalty.

"Oh, well don't you look nice?" James comments when he sees Regulus, a smile spreading across his face immediately. He's been shaved recently, a close and clean shave that makes his face look smooth. Regulus has admittedly appreciated his stubble before, so this is...new.

"Are they ever going to give you your glasses back?" is all Regulus can bring himself to say in response.

"I asked the same thing," James admits, clearly vindicated. He shoots Fabian a look that quite blatantly says see? Fabian just rolls his eyes, and James looks at Regulus again. "Did they, er, fluff your curls? They look—fluffy."

"Yeah, that'd be called volume, darling," Fabian says, amused, and James huffs. "But yes, Gideon has obviously tousled them for him. The goal here is to make him look angelic, and I'd say he looks as near to a cherub as one can get. Nicely done, Gid."

"Thank you, thank you," Gideon replies grandly, dipping down into a bow with a pleased grin.

Regulus scoffs. "Oh, come off it. I do not look—"

"No, you do," James cuts in, then coughs when Regulus stares at him, startled. "I just—I mean, you look...sweet. Because of Gideon. What he did, I mean. You look—yeah."

Fabian snorts, then disguises it as loudly clearing his throat, suddenly finding the ceiling utterly fascinating. Meanwhile, Gideon starts to smile, only to tuck his lips in and look down at his shoes like he's never seen them before. James, on the other hand, looks like a spooked deer.

"Sweet?" Regulus asks skeptically.

"Yeah, like...young," James says slowly, then starts rambling instantly. "Not—no, I don't mean that you look really young, because obviously you're not. Just—well, I'm not saying you're old. We're the same age, is all. And it's—I don't see you as, you know, younger or innocent or—or anything like that, just because you're Sirius' baby brother. Well, not baby. Little. Younger. I mean—"

"Pretty," Dorcas fills in as she comes sweeping into the room, her lips curled up. "He thinks you're pretty."

"Oh, I'm so glad you've arrived," Gideon breathes out.

"Yeah, that was painful," Fabian says, and James elbows him sharply in his side, which just makes him stifle a laugh.

"Yes, well, James is right. You're very pretty. Both of you are. Come here, let me look at you," Dorcas says, moving over to reach out and grab Regulus' shoulders, turning him slowly. She hums in a pleased fashion when he faces her again. "Yes, very pretty, but not only just. You're a star, Regulus."

"Ha ha," Regulus says flatly.

Dorcas chuckles, pivoting to face James. "Now, let me see you. Oh, this is good. Very good. You're shining, James."

"Very funny, Dorcas," James teases as he comes to a stop in front of her.

"Laughter is the music of the soul, my loves," Dorcas says sagely. "Right, let's start with you, Regulus. You're the one Sirius is most worried about. Now, your outfit is a very good talking piece should you feel uncomfortable, or not know what to say, or don't know how to answer. There will be cameras at all angles, so when you stand up and spread your cloak, give a slow spin so everyone will be able to see it."

"Alright," Regulus murmurs, nervous all over again.

"Your cloak is the main event. The Leo constellation with the brightest star: Regulus. Do you know the myth behind it?"

"About Hercules, yes."

"Don't be afraid to tell it, and don't hesitate to draw the comparison between you and Hercules. He defeated the lion, making him a champion. Play into that, if you need to."

"Right, but Regulus is the heart of the lion. The comparison between me and Hercules doesn't make sense. I'm not the champion; I'm the slain."

"I know," Dorcas tells him, her voice softening. "That's the hidden message, Regulus. That's the truth. People will see it. Not all of them, but some of them, and it will mean something. It can mean something to you, too, because you're the one that is being sent to your death. Be a champion anyway."

Regulus finds that he can't respond to that past the lump that blocks his throat. He dreads every second that brings him closer to the arena. There's the rest of today, the interviews tomorrow, and then the next day they go. He's not ready. He doesn't think he'll ever be ready.

"This is something personal," Dorcas murmurs, reaching out to gently run her finger over the crown-shaped choker resting around his throat. "You come from a family of Victors. Royalty, if you will. There's a saying—heavy is the head that wears the crown. The thing is, this is no crown that sits upon your head and grants you power. It is a collar, and no one should dare think any different. We'll make them look at it, because ignorance is bliss, and they don't deserve bliss when you're suffering at their hands."

"Thank you," Regulus whispers, and in that moment, he understands what she means about expression, about how moving it can be. She really does design in bold.

"Don't thank me. Believe in yourself, because I already do," Dorcas tells him quietly, holding his gaze for a long moment, and then she smiles and turns to face James. "Now, you."

"Me," James says, blinking at her.

"Your cloak works much the same as Regulus'. Sirius has informed me that your interview will be after his, so I don't doubt that Rita will want you to show off first to get it out of the way," Dorcas explains. "Yours, of course, is different in that it's not multiple stars; it's only one."

James huffs a weak laugh. "The sun."

"A very important star to us all, but there's meaning in it as well," Dorcas declares firmly. "What you can lean into is that getting too close to the sun ensures that you'll burn up. You're the sun in this scenario, James, and that's the warning. The hidden meaning, though? We need the sun to survive, and yet it still sets. What happens if it doesn't rise again?"

"I don't know," James admits.

Dorcas smiles. "Exactly. No one does, but I can promise you, no one wants to find out." She steps forward and runs her hands gently over the broken crown pieces at each of his shoulders. "We talked about this. One for your mum, and one for Sirius. Your exposure to what being a Victor really is. There's a saying—the weight of the world on one's shoulders. You've felt it before, and you carry it still. Carry it a little longer, James, and never stop rising."

"Right," James whispers, staring at her with wide eyes, and Regulus understands. The force of Dorcas Meadowes looking at you like that is heavy and life-altering. She sees the world in a way no one else does, and she looks at those around her just the same. It's both frightening and invigorating.

"Gid, Fab, get them undressed and let them go rest," Dorcas says. "They're going to do lovely, I just know it, and I've a party I need to attend. Good luck, my loves, we'll be right there in the crowd tomorrow, just for the two of you."

And, with that same commanding, larger-than-life presence that she used with her entrance, she makes her exit. Regulus looks over at James to find him already looking back, and then Gideon and Fabian are ushering them both off. When Regulus glances back, James is already doing the same.

This time, Regulus doesn't look away until he has no choice.

~•~

Remus, shockingly, likes working at events. Well, he likes it as much as anyone in his position can like anything, meaning he hates it with a burning passion, but he does get something out of it from time-to-time.

What he gets out of it, generally, is information. Gossip. Secrets. There is a lot to be gleaned from a party full of high profile Hallows when the drinks are flowing and the people are speaking with loose lips. Sometimes, Remus thinks he knows more about the inner-workings of the Hallow than even Riddle. The things that he hears… The things that he knows… Well, he could do a lot of damage with it all, honestly.

But, really, he can't. He has a mask, one he can't remove, not here. Not with these people. He hates it, and what he hates more is that he's fucking used to it. He's worn it every day for five years, and the only time he takes it off is when he's eating, or when he's in the suite he's assigned to now. He doesn't know when the discomfort of having the mask on shifted into a sense of strangeness when he has it off. He hates that, too.

Remus' duties at the event are fairly simple. He's not the only servant here, and there's an unspoken agreement between all servants (unspoken for obvious reasons) to divide and conquer for wider coverage. It's a solid rotation, like cogs working in a machine, all of them circling the room from one station to the next. There's pouring drinks for people, or offering trays of food, or working at the bar, or cleaning in the back, or preparing more food and drinks in the kitchen; and, of course, there's the overall station that remains a priority at all times, in which the servants are at the beck and call of everyone around them for anything they need or want.

Currently, Remus is in the middle of pouring Joffrey Macnair more wine while simultaneously listening to gossip about one Sirius Black. He's a little too interested, honestly; he shouldn't be, he knows that, but he can't help it. There's some secret, glowing satisfaction that he knows they're wrong.

"Francilla is insisting that he's taken her to bed," Joffrey says in a low voice, talking to Devina. "She said she wouldn't pledge her sponsorship for nothing less, and there are whispers of a sizable donation already promised in his name."

"He sure is getting around this year," Devina murmurs, holding out her wine. Not even in Remus' direction. She just lifts it a little and expects it to be filled, which it will be. "I'm not surprised. It's his brother and closest friend this time, so naturally he cares more for them. It's a pity, isn't it?"

Joffrey hums, sipping his wine. "Yes, I know. I asked him who he thinks would kill the other, but he didn't quite give me an answer, the tease. Just winked, laughed, and told me to watch the show to see. My money is on James."

"Oh, is it?" Devina asks, leaning in with a soft gasp. "You naughty thing. Did you promise a donation as well?"

"Well, a gentleman never kisses and tells, Devina," Joffrey replies with a smooth laugh.

Remus steps back, his breath held. He wants, rather violently, to smash the bottle over both of their heads. Sirius has done no such thing, of course. He hasn't brought anyone to his bed, and he's quite busy with doing everything he can to help his little brother and best friend. It's beyond fucked up that they can't see how horrible of a situation this is for Sirius, and they're just fucking sitting here, discussing him like he's nothing more than a piece of meat.

"Joffrey, Devina, I thought that was you," comes the bright voice of none other than Sirius Black himself, which causes Remus to freeze as Joffrey and Devina pull away from each other to turn in their chairs.

"Sirius," Joffrey greets warmly, launching himself up from his chair to lean over and kiss each of Sirius' cheeks, which Sirius allows with a charming grin.

"My, you look so handsome tonight, Sirius," Devina comments as she holds out her hand.

Sirius bends over it instantly, gripping it and pressing a lingering kiss to it as he winks at her. As he stands up, his gaze flicks to Remus, and his smile softens a little. "Thank you. Someone very dear to me helped me pick my outfit."

"Dear, you say?" Devina asks curiously as Sirius takes a seat next to her. Remus turns away to pour another glass of wine, a smile trying to form under his mask, even though that's literally never happened before, and it's quite impossible with how tight to his face it is. "By dear, you mean…?"

"Wouldn't you like to know?" Sirius teases.

"Do my ears deceive me, or has someone managed to capture and ensnare the ever elusive Sirius Black?" Joffrey muses, clearly fishing for information.

"Perhaps I'm only elusive to those who don't have anything to offer me," Sirius replies easily.

Remus leans down next to him and offers him a glass of wine. Sirius glances at him only briefly before he takes it, but he makes sure their fingers brush as he looks away. For a moment, as Remus straightens up, he fantasizes about a life where Sirius was born in his district, where they could have known each other outside of a setting like this, where Remus could have done things he doesn't dare to do here.

He doesn't have anything to offer Sirius. Genuinely not one thing. He's chained to his forced servitude to the Hallow, nothing to his name, and no possessions to claim. And yet, Sirius is the least elusive person Remus has ever known. Is that a choice? Or does he just know the real Sirius?

"Well, I wouldn't know anything about that," Joffrey announces, crossing his legs and leaning back with a grin. It's shark-like. "I have much to offer. You need only ask."

"If I were to ask, it would be a request, not an offer," Sirius points out, and he reaches over to gently lay his hand on Devina's knee like an afterthought. It makes her hide a smile behind her wine glass, and it causes Joffrey's eyes to zero in on it, his nostrils flaring. "And you, Devina? Do I elude you?"

"You are quite the enigma, indeed," Devina admits with a rich laugh, reaching out to place her hand on his chest, like she has a right to it. Sirius lets her. "I think there are some who would offer the world to see the inside of your mind. What must go on up there, I wonder."

"Oh, you can't imagine the things I have hidden up there. I'm afraid the cost of sharing it is an amount so few have been capable of meeting," Sirius tells her, smiling as she walks two fingers up his chest slowly, gazing into his eyes. Without ever breaking her gaze, he lifts his wine and takes a slow sip, the temptation of his curled lips peeking over the rim.

"Name your price," Joffrey states firmly, sitting forward.

Sirius focuses on him again and takes his hand off Devina's knee. "Make an offer. Let's see if you meet it."

And, just like that, Joffrey does.

What follows is a very convoluted dance in which Sirius plays Joffrey and Devina for fools, using them against each other to get the promise of their support when the games start. Sirius hardly has to do very much at all, other than sit there and let Devina run her hands all over him, pointedly not letting Joffrey do the same; in turn, Sirius only ever touches Devina's knee, removing the contact as a sign of approval when Joffrey has done something he likes.

It's—fascinating, almost. Terrible, yes, but the way he plays them to his will, twisting them around his fingers with one short conversation and a few gestures—it's like magic. There's something dangerous about it as well, how simply Sirius does it, how alluring he is that he can do it. He's magnetic, and people want him, but never for the right reasons. That's where it's sad. Remus' heart sort of breaks for him, actually, that he can do this, that he has to do this, because he does. Because there's no doubt in Remus' mind why Sirius is doing it; all of it is for James and Regulus, that much is clear.

Remus tops up their drinks one more time before he rotates out with the next servant, ending up at the bar. From this vantage point, he can see the whole room, and he can see as Sirius proceeds to work it. The night carries on with Sirius making his way from person to person, laughing brightly and turning people to puddles for him to play in.

Sirius does seem to give himself breaks in between, chatting with other mentors, from what Remus can tell. Remus knows that getting all these sponsors to do what he wants is a precaution, because no one knows what's going to happen yet. And from what Remus has learned over the years, it can take multiple donations from multiple sponsors to afford a couple of small loaves of bread, let alone more necessary things such as medicine for injuries. So, it doesn't surprise him that Sirius takes small breaks only, consistently working as much as he can.

There is one point where Sirius comes to the bar with a blonde woman Remus quickly learns the name of—Marlene. They chat as they order drinks, and under the dim lights, Sirius gives him a very special smile. Remus never quite realized until tonight, but Sirius smiles at him differently than he does all those other people. This is a warmer smile, a more bashful one, and it's so much sweeter than Remus can really wrap his head around.

"Oh, oh, Sirius," Marlene hisses as Remus slides her a drink. She starts swatting at Sirius' arm. "That's Dorcas. That's—"

"Pipe down, McKinnon, she's not a celebrity. You seem a little starstruck," Sirius teases.

Marlene swats his arm harder. "Shut up. Fuck, just look at her. I mean, she's legitimately mouth-watering. How are you around her without constantly fainting?"

"She's not really my type," Sirius says, lips twitching.

"A sexy Hallow isn't your type?" Marlene asks incredulously.

Sirius chuckles. "A sexy Hallow that my friend quite clearly fancies, so no, not my type. I have a little integrity, believe it or not. See? Watch this. Oi, Dorcas!"

"Sirius," Marlene chokes out, whirling around frantically and nearly spilling her drink. Remus quickly picks it up before she does, then gently slides it into her hand. Distracted and looking dangerously close to fainting, Marlene shakily raises her glass at Remus and wheezes, "Cheers," before knocking all of it back in one desperate gulp.

"Ah, Sirius, lovely to see you here," Dorcas greets as she moves over, leaning in for a hug as soon as Sirius does.

"And it's lovely to see you, as always. You're a vision, as always," Sirius replies as they break apart. "Tell me, did Regulus and James behave?"

"As much as they ever do," Dorcas tells him, amused. Her face softens as she nods at him. "They looked lovely, Sirius, and I know they're going to be just fine."

Tension visibly seeps out of Sirius' shoulders. "Thank you, Dorcas." He turns slightly, gesturing to Marlene. "Have you met Marlene? She's rather infatuated with you."

Marlene proceeds to choke into her glass, which Remus had dutifully refilled for her because she was looking a little desperate, honestly. She goes into a coughing fit, wiping the back of her mouth as she turns, looking mortified.

"Because of your work," Sirius clarifies with a grin. "She's rather infatuated with you because of your work."

"I—yes, hi," Marlene says weakly, holding her hand out.

"Marlene McKinnon. Yes, I know of you. The Victor that shocked the Hallow," Dorcas murmurs as she takes Marlene's hand and promptly brings it up to her mouth, kissing it. This isn't really unheard of for Hallows as a form of greeting, but it's usually only done for people you hold in high regard, or people you want to think that you hold them in high regard. Marlene looks at her with her lips parted. "I think I'm the one who should feel honored to meet you, honestly. I rather like anyone who can defiantly shock the Hallows, including myself. No one saw you coming, Marlene McKinnon, not even me, and that rather infatuates me about you."

"Well, isn't that lovely? Lots of infatuation going on here today," Sirius says pleasantly, winking at Marlene behind Dorcas. "I'll just leave you both to it, shall I?"

"Never can stay in one place for long, can you?" Dorcas teases, but she's still looking right at Marlene, even as their hands break apart all at once.

"Yes, well, people to do and things to see, or however that saying goes," Sirius says lightly. He turns and looks at Remus. "I'll take another drink before I go, though."

Because Dorcas and Marlene seem to be genuinely swept up in some intense eye-contact, Remus allows himself to pour Sirius' drink slowly. Perhaps for the same reason, Sirius looks right at him, not looking away for the duration of the drink being made. His bottom lip catches between his teeth, a smile trying to form on his face, and Remus only has to look at him with a quirk of an eyebrow, just one twitch upwards, for his cheeks to flood with color. He looks flushed and flustered and utterly delighted, more so than anyone has been capable of making him so far tonight, and it's—fuck, it's exhilarating.

It's genuinely so thrilling that he can do that to Sirius when he's not even showing his whole face. Remus, a servant with nothing, not even the ability to speak, can do to Sirius what rich Hallows with more words than they know what to do with can't. They all want to, they all try, and none of them ever manage it—but Remus? He does it with ease.

When Remus pushes the glass over to him, their fingers brush again, a warm caress of contact that makes Remus' skin break out in goosebumps. Sirius' hand visibly shakes, his breath punching out of him, and he nearly drops the glass entirely. Remus snaps his hand out to catch it at the bottom, grateful he didn't pour too much so none spills over the sides, and he's quick to draw his hand away. Sirius is blushing harder.

He curls his glass to his chest, and Remus can tell he wants to apologize, so dangerously close to rambling and stuttering and turning into that lovely mess Remus has come to appreciate so very much. That would be very bad for both of them, so Remus steps back and ducks his head.

When he looks back up, Sirius is gone.

For a bit longer, Remus is subjected to seeing Dorcas and Marlene blatantly flirt with each other. They aren't ordering any more drinks, but they remain at the bar, and if he's honest, it's sort of amusing. Dorcas is very bold, and Marlene is a bit guarded, so this makes for great entertainment. Nonetheless, there's no denying that they get on very well, and Sirius is sweet to see to it that his friends have the opportunity to enjoy each other's...company. How thoughtful of him.

They're still chatting, but now Dorcas' hand is on Marlene's arm on the bar, and Marlene keeps getting blatantly distracted by the rings on her fingers, so much so that she repeatedly loses the thread of the conversation. Dorcas is patient with her, even seeming to find it endearing, and Marlene appears to grow just a bit meaner the more flustered she gets. They've gone from light conversation to mild bickering, and Dorcas looks like she's having the time of her life. Marlene looks like she wants to rip Dorcas' dress off, the poor thing.

In the end, Remus has to rotate from the station before he ever sees which one of them will inevitably make a proper move past getting to know each other and teasing one another. It's a bit disappointing, honestly, because that was the least troubling interaction he's seen between anyone at this horrible fucking party. Everyone else here is complete shit, while Marlene and Dorcas seem to be the only genuine ones, other than some of the other mentors. Well, except for Sirius, but he's working at the moment, and his job isn't exactly as glamorous as some would think. He's an actor, essentially, and a performer, and a manipulator, and a mystery, and so many things that Remus can't even fathom how he manages to balance it all with such effortlessness.

Remus sees Sirius a few more times as he works, but they don't get near each other again. Instead, Remus has to watch across the room as people touch, talk, and flirt with Sirius, while Sirius touches, talks, and flirts back. Which is fine. That's fine. Remus is fine. It makes sense, actually, because Sirius is doing what needs to be done to help ensure that Regulus and James will be safer and have more support. Remus knows this.

Does that mean Remus doesn't want to break every finger on every hand that dares to touch Sirius? No, of course he does. He wants to snap them all one-by-one, which is a violent thought that he should shy away from, but he almost relishes in it. It's been ages since he's gotten this worked up about anything, so it's sort of—nice, in a way, to know that he still has it in him. The fact that it has to do with Sirius… Well.

Remus tells himself it's just being protective, because really, these people treat Sirius like he's a fucking object that they can play with, or buy, or pick up and put down at will. He's so much more than that, so Remus being angry on his behalf would make perfect sense. They're...friends. Sort of. Right?

But, deep down, Remus knows what it is. He knows it's an unearned sense of possessiveness, tangled with jealousy and envy that leaves a bitter taste in the back of his mouth. He knows that's senseless, because he has no right to Sirius, but the feelings exist anyway. That steady pulse of he's not yours to touch, which makes no sense, because he's not Remus' either; and then there's the sharp twist in his chest at every word that they get to say to Sirius, free to speak and gain his attention, only to fucking waste it; but perhaps the most pressing feeling is the way he wants the same things they all do, but without wanting them for the wrong reasons. He wants all of Sirius' focus, too. His touch. His laughter. Anything and everything Sirius Black, he wants it—most importantly, he wants it where no one can see, and he wants to never breathe a word of it, and he wants it to be something only they know about, no one else.

Of course, the acknowledgement of his wants only frustrates him, because he knows that's literally the worst thing he could do. That's the most dangerous thing he could do. There would be no penalty for this; they would just torture him until he fucking died, if they ever found out.

It's not proper. Remus shouldn't. He keeps telling himself that over and over, and then he sees a man lean in close to whisper into Sirius' ear and he's viscerally reminded that he's not very good at being proper or doing what he should.

The only thing that stops Remus from doing something very, very stupid is the fact that none of them—no one Sirius talks to, or flirts with—make him blush. They don't get his soft smiles. They don't make his hands tremble.

No, that's Remus. Just Remus.

At one point, Remus is in the back, washing various glasses and trays. It's a fairly secluded area, only one way in and one way out. The dishes come in on a conveyor belt that he controls, and the servant before him didn't let it get backed up, which was nice. There's a separate, smaller room with racks for the dishes to be dried, and the door squeaks every time he goes through it. Otherwise, it's rather quiet. He likes it better back here than out at the event, except for the fact that he can't actually see Sirius from here.

Remus is in the middle of washing a glass when the door peels open, and he looks over in surprise because it's far too soon for a rotation already, but then his eyes bulge when Sirius pokes his head in. He immediately starts to open his mouth to speak, and Remus dives forward quickly to clamp a hand over his mouth, which makes him inhale sharply.

Sirius stares at him with wide eyes, frozen in place. Remus shakes his head and draws his hand away, lifting his finger in front of his mask to indicate that he should be quiet. Very carefully, Remus sits the glass down and reaches out to run the machine before it's even fully loaded, the loud whirring filling the space. Even still, Remus jerks his head and moves over to the room with the drying racks, holding it open as Sirius slips into it. Remus follows and shuts the door, then reaches up to unclip his mask.

"You shouldn't be back here," Remus whispers, his voice barely even a breath. "Sirius, people will notice—"

"No one's going to notice, Remus," Sirius murmurs, stepping closer to compensate for how quietly he's speaking. "I told everyone I was leaving. The party is slowing down now, so I could slip off. I just—I wanted to say hi. Um. Hi."

"Hi," Remus replies with a breathless laugh. "You look nice. I hear someone very dear to you helped you pick your outfit?"

Even in the low lighting, Sirius' blush is glaringly obvious. He shifts a little restlessly. "Yes, well… Yeah."

What Remus really likes about Sirius is the fact that he'll just say things that are true. Sometimes with a lot of stuttering and very blatantly embarrassed about it, but he will. He's a perfect blend of shy and shameless.

"Well, they have excellent taste," Remus teases softly.

"It's been helpful," Sirius whispers. "The outfit, I mean. I know you've seen me tonight with —with them. It's not—I'm not exactly proud of it, but there's nothing I wouldn't do for Regulus and James. I know what it looks like, but I'm not—"

"Sirius," Remus cuts in, "you don't have to explain yourself to me. I get it. I already know."

Sirius bites his lip, and the motion draws Remus' eyes to his mouth. "I'm sure you hear things, though. No one ever thinks to censor themselves around the servants, so I can't imagine what nonsense you've heard about me."

"None that I believe," Remus assures him.

"Good, please don't," Sirius says with a weak laugh, like he's trying to make it seem like a joke, but he actually, desperately means it. "I just wanted to say hi before I go, and tell you thank you. Seeing you really did improve my night, Remus."

"Glad to help."

"Will you—are you coming back to the suite tonight?"

"No. I have to return to my cell after I finish here," Remus admits with a sigh.

"Oh." Sirius nods slowly, doing nothing to hide the way that disappoints him. "Will I see you again in the morning?"

Remus' lips twitch. "Yes, and I'll be there following the interviews as well."

"Brilliant," Sirius breathes out, perking up immediately. He breaks out into a grin and gestures to the door as he attempts to slide his hand in his pocket. He keeps missing it. "Right, I should go. Don't want to be too risky. I shouldn't have—I'm sorry, Remus. I'll just—I'll see you in the morning."

"Sirius," Remus says, and Sirius pauses with his hand on the door handle. For a moment they're just staring at each other, and it's so quiet that Remus can hear neither of them breathing, holding their breath at the same time. Remus just wants Sirius here a little longer.

Slowly, Remus exhales and steps forward to reach out and capture a lone strand of Sirius' hair that fell forward from behind his ear. He carefully tucks it back into place, listening to the shaky, thin exhale and immediate following hitch in Sirius' breath. Remus' knuckles only just brush Sirius' jaw as he pulls his hand away, and Sirius sways forward like he's following it, like he's being reeled in.

"Goodnight," Remus murmurs, and Sirius sways right back with a violent blink of his glazed eyes and a harsh flush painted on his cheeks.

Sirius takes a moment, just breathing, and then he gives Remus that very special smile before saying, "Goodnight."

With that, Sirius swivels on his heel and quickly slips out of the tiny room, the door squeaking as he goes. It shuts after him, and Remus takes a moment to breathe as well, then puts his mask back on and returns to work.

Chapter End Notes

sirius really would wear a plastic bag if remus told him to, and i stand by that. they're so cute, i want to bite them.

lmao, i love that literally everyone looks at regulus and they're like: that is the most grumpy, awkward man on the planet, he knows NOTHING about how to be charming, so he's absolutely going to bomb his interview 😭😭😭 HELP that's so mean, but it's true. regulus is NOT interview material.

then you've got james, who is like: hey, so um, i know im really charming and all, but im a REALLY bad liar when im scared and this may be a problem. hello? is anyone listening to me? no. okay. great. just great.

well, it's like james said, maybe it'll be fine 🤔 fabian, my beloved <3 gideon, my beloved <3 dorcas, my beloved <3 marlene, my beloved <3 also the little hints of dorlene 👀 trust me, we see more of them in the future.

sirius just having everyone eating out of the palm of his hand, but he can't be normal and calm around remus for two seconds is EVERYTHING to me.

sirius, to everyone else: pathetic sirius, to remus: talented, brilliant, incredible, amazing, show stopping, spectacular, never the same, totally unique, completely not ever been done before—

The Interviews

Chapter Notes

hello all! 👋 im like, stupidly excited for this chapter. as the chapter title suggests, it's the interviews!!!

warnings for this chapter:

-references to death
-references to torture
-description of characters being anxious/nervous
-brief display of violence (quickly stopped, and no one is seriously injured)
-a bit of angst

enjoy the drama ;)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Remus can tell that everyone is nervous. He'd offered to go and wake them all up, which Pandora had seemed grateful for. He starts with James, who he knows is generally up early as it is, so there won't be any issues there.

"Morning, Remus," James greets when he opens his door. He sounds less cheerful than he usually does when greeting him.

"Good morning, James," Remus murmurs. "I just wanted to be sure that you're up and ready for the day."

"Up? Yes. Ready for the day? Well…" James grimaces slightly and runs his hand through his hair.

Remus is silent for a beat, then he says, "If it helps at all, I find you to be very likeable. You're kind and funny, James. I doubt you'll have any issues for your interview."

"Yeah?" James brightens up a little at that. "Thank you, Remus. I'm just—well, I'm nervous. Not just for me, but for Regulus, too. And—and it's also our last day before…"

"I know," Remus says softly, his heart squeezing in his chest. He's never really grown attached to anyone as a servant before; no one cares about him, so he returns the favor. And yet, when it comes to this group of people—Sirius, James, Regulus, and even Pandora—Remus finds that he's come to care about them so much in such a short amount of time.

James huffs out a weak laugh. "It's a shame I'll be gone soon. I think you and I could have been friends."

There's something so irrevocably sad about that, even more so because Remus can tell that James means it, and believes it. To him, it doesn't matter that Remus is a servant. So, Remus keeps his voice light as he teases, "I thought we already were."

"No, yeah, we are," James agrees, grinning. He looks so relieved to have something to be cheerful about.

"I have to go wake the rest," Remus tells him. "Breakfast is already finished, and you should eat."

"Alright," James says. "Hey, you'll eat with us, yeah? Sirius likes it when you do that. Well, we all do, but today… Er, you always cheer him up, that's all. He likes you, Remus. A lot."

"I know," Remus repeats once again, this time with a tiny smile, and James' eyes sparkle with delight. "He's not very subtle about it."

James laughs. "Bless him, he's really not."

"He doesn't—do anything," Remus ventures cautiously, not entirely sure how to put into words what he means.

"Yeah, he won't," James replies simply, and Remus can't stop himself from frowning. Seeing it, James sighs. "It's—I mean, in fairness, the power imbalance is… Well, I know none of us really talk about it, but we're painfully aware."

"It's not his fault, or anyone's," Remus points out. "It's not as if you all did this to me, and you've made my assignment here as comfortable and close to freedom as I'll ever have."

"I get that, but Sirius won't cross a boundary," James tells him, sounding solemn. "We see you as Remus, our friend, but we also know that we have superiority over you that none of us asked for. We could—we wouldn't, not ever, but we could have you killed, or we could make you do...fucking anything, honestly, and it's awful. It's not right. None of us would ever, ever cross boundaries with you, because you deserve them, and you deserve for us to respect them."

Remus feels like there's a band tightening around his chest, just from that blunt declaration of consideration. It's basic human rights that Remus doesn't have as a servant, and yet they all grant it to him without question. That's more important to him than he could ever express to any of them. There's just one tiny problem, though.

"But what if I want Sirius to...do things?" Remus asks weakly, feeling oddly embarrassed, his face heating up.

"I thought you might," James teases, beaming at him. He looks fucking ecstatic. "I suppose the question is, if you want something done, why don't you do it yourself?"

Remus stares at him.

James chuckles. "Who said it has to be Sirius? You can. That'd tip the scales on the power imbalance, don't you think?"

The mere thought sends Remus' brain into an uproar of fear and desire all tangled up together. He could. He could, but could he, really? That's fucking dangerous. If it were Sirius to do something, then Remus would be able to just—go along with it. Less control that way, which is his normal, what he's used to. Five years ago, Remus would never have stopped to have this internal debate. Actually, five years ago, Remus would have fucked Sirius by now, probably.

Remus swats that thought firmly out of his head, because it's making his heart race, leaving him jittery. He's too enticed by it. Tempted. "Right, I'm going to wake the others now. Nice chatting with you, James."

"Same to you, Remus, anytime," James replies with a note of satisfaction to his tone. It makes Remus fond, how pleased he is to be his best friend's wingman. They're sweet, James and Sirius, and their love for each other is palpable.

The next person to wake up is Regulus. Like Sirius, he does not appreciate being up early, and he looks really tired. There are purplish-grey impressions under his eyes, which are bloodshot and watery, and his exhaustion practically falls off of him in waves. He's quiet and reserved, but he's never disrespectful to Remus. He greets him in a quiet mumble, thanks him, then waits for Remus to greet him in return before shutting the door. Remus hopes he doesn't go back to sleep, because he is not knocking again. Pandora can handle it.

Speaking of, she's the next person Remus wakes up. Pandora greets him through a yawn, rubbing her eyes like a child, and she smiles at him sweetly as she thanks him for waking her. She offers to make breakfast, then gently berates him when he admits he's already done it, then lightly bullies him into agreeing to share breakfast with them.

Remus did admittedly save Sirius for last, because he's biased and not above a little favoritism. So, alright, maybe he's letting Sirius get as much sleep as he can. What of it?

Sirius doesn't come to the door while cursing, which had admittedly amused Remus the last time. Instead, he opens the door and blinks sleepily at him. A tiny, lopsided smile curves his mouth, despite how tired he also looks, a world-weary exhaustion more so than lack of sleep. He looks unbearably soft like this, just waking up, his hair ruffled and lines creasing his cheek that he probably doesn't know about.

"Good morning, Remus," Sirius greets warmly, his fingers fiddling mindlessly with the doorknob.

"Good morning, Sirius," Remus replies, and he gets such a vivid impulse to reach out and touch him that he almost thinks he's done it without realizing. He tucks his hands behind his back to be on the safe side, then wonders why he's doing that, why he's holding himself back, only to then be reminded why he is and why he should. It's not proper. It's dangerous.

"Hi," Sirius says, then snorts. "Oh, no, I'm not doing that again. Once was embarrassing enough. Sorry, hi, I just—oh, lovely, did it again anyway. I'm going to shut up now."

Fuck propriety, actually. What's life without a little danger anyway? Dead boring, that's what. Remus can't help it; there's just something about Sirius that tugs at him until he genuinely can't resist, and at the moment, he doesn't want to. He's still careful, despite everything, only stepping forward to reach out and tug Sirius' shirt up where it's slipping down over his shoulder, wrinkled and warm cotton that's just a bit too big.

Remus' knuckles brush his collarbone, and Sirius holds himself very still as Remus says, "I'd really rather you didn't."

"Well, that's a first," Sirius breathes out, gazing at him with such focus that Remus feels his stomach turn over. "Most people like it when I shut up, unless I'm telling them the things they want to hear. For some reason, I get the feeling hearing me tell you hi over and over isn't exactly the height of sophisticated conversation for you."

"I don't know, I like it," Remus mumbles, spending far too long holding onto Sirius' collar. He can feel the warmth of Sirius' skin beneath the backs of his fingers. There's a war going on inside him at the moment, one side battling in favor of him tugging Sirius in until they're kissing while the other rages on in favor of him letting go.

Sirius doesn't help either side of this battle, remaining firmly locked in place. He just smiles and asks, "Yeah?"

"You're my favorite hello," Remus admits, swallowing down a sigh as he pulls his hand back. It's not a complete loss. At his admission, Sirius does that very deep, intense blush that sneaks down all the way to where his chest peeks out a bit.

"Oh," Sirius says softly. "Well, hello."

Remus chuckles. "Hi."

"You know, maybe you're onto something. I like it, too," Sirius tells him with a broad grin.

"Mm, I can tell," Remus muses, shaking his head. "Go on, get dressed. Breakfast is ready."

"Right. Today," Sirius mutters, his smile falling. He says today like it's the root of all evil. He looks like he's dreading it, and then his eyes lock onto Remus hopefully, as if Remus is the one source of good in today. "Will you—"

"Yes, I'll have breakfast with you," Remus cuts in, still secretly pleased that he can interrupt. "With everyone, I mean, but you know what I mean."

Sirius is smiling again, which was the goal. "Brilliant. I'll get ready, then meet you there. Well, meet everyone, but—"

"Goodbye, Sirius," Remus says, exasperated because Sirius is teasing him, his eyes sparkling with humor.

"Bye, Remus," Sirius replies with a delighted little laugh before he shuts the door, and Remus stands there for a long moment, that laughter ringing in his ears.

His favorite hello, indeed, and his hardest goodbye.

~•~

Regulus has always been very good at hiding things, at least from the moment he had things to hide. When he's scared, when he's hurt, when he's nervous, when he's feeling anything he deems a weakness—he knows exactly how to hide it, to cover it up so he looks calm, neutral, completely uncaring.

Before his interview, Regulus does just that, sitting in a tiny room with Pandora (who is watching the other interviews), Sirius (who is pacing with his arms crossed), and James (who is doing nothing to hide his own anxiety). What James could possibly have to be anxious about, Regulus doesn't know. He's not the one everyone is worried about; he's not the one who will have to fight to make people love him; he's not the one with complex relationships and secrets to hide.

No, that's just Regulus.

Sirius keeps glancing at him, then looking away quickly, a wrinkle of worry between his brows. It's sort of nice. Regulus wasn't expecting to see so much concern from Sirius, to be able to pick up on how much he cares, but it's there. Regulus can't deny it. He hasn't seen anything like it in years, and he never thought he'd want to see it again, but it's comforting.

Irene is being interviewed before Regulus, and Rita has plucked a few secrets from her with ruthless precision, including the one about having a crush on James. This is sort of ironic, because James is so lost in his own head that he isn't even paying attention, so he completely misses it. The Hallows love it, though. Irene is clearly a favorite, and she's working the crowd with lovely smiles and gentle laughter.

Regulus doesn't like her, but he can admit that she's a survivor who knows what she's doing, and she's going to be a tough act to follow. His stomach is tangled up into knots and only getting worse as her interview draws to a close. Someone steps out to tell Regulus he has about two minutes, waiting to escort him to the stage, and his heart fucking drops.

"Hey," Pandora says quietly, moving over to crouch down in front of him, her eyes clear as she holds his gaze. She reaches out and cups his hands in both of hers, smiling gently. "I want you to do something for me."

It takes Regulus a second to respond past his rising nerves. He can see Sirius and James fluttering at the edges around him, likely trying to be comforting, or helpful, but Pandora takes all of his focus. "What?"

"I want you to find a very happy memory. The first one that you think of," Pandora murmurs. Regulus isn't sure why it pops into his head, but he thinks of the time he and Sirius snuck out of school to go pick pecans that they could sell at the market, just so they could buy sweets. It was Sirius' idea, of course, and they'd ended up cracking pecans open by the shell and eating them together while burning daylight. They'd laughed so much that day, and when they went to sell the pecans they gathered, they didn't even get enough money to buy more than one chocolate muffin, but they didn't mind. They just shared it. Regulus was nine. "Do you have it?"

"Yes," Regulus whispers.

Pandora smiles. "That's lovely. Now, as you go out there, I want you to think about the memory, yeah? Think about it and nothing else, and I want you to smile, because it's a happy memory that you can smile about. Don't think about Rita, or the crowd, or anything else—just think about that memory as you go sit in the chair. Will you do that for me?"

"I'll try," Regulus says.

"You're going to be fine, Regulus," James tells him, drawing his gaze. He gives him a smile. "Remember, you're an angel who's never done anything wrong in his life, not ever."

"Just for today," Sirius agrees with a shaky laugh, nodding when Regulus glances at him.

"I'm going to fuck this up," Regulus announces.

"No, you're not," Pandora counters firmly. She squeezes his hands, shaking her head at him. "Confidence is key, Regulus. You will not fuck this up. You will go out there and get through it, and you'll steal more hearts than you think."

They don't really get to say anything else to him, because his time is up, and he has to go. Pandora draws back, and Regulus pushes to his feet, his heart thumping loud in his ears as he lets himself be led out of the room. He glances back one more time to see Pandora smiling encouragingly, Sirius looking blatantly worried, and James just—looking at him, something unbearably soft about his gaze. Regulus turns, and he goes.

The distant sound of Rita talking to the crowd reaches him as he draws closer, saying, "Now, I don't know about the rest of you, but I am excited to speak to our next tribute. Regulus Black, little brother to our beloved Sirius Black, thrown into a tense battle against James Potter to make it back home to his brother and make his family proud, no doubt. Let's give him a warm welcome, shall we?!"

In response, there's a cacophony of cheers and chants of his name that makes him want to turn and run in the opposite direction. His stomach lurches, but he continues to walk, squeezing his eyes shut as he tries to do what Pandora said. He thinks of that day, giggling with Sirius as he showed him how to crack two pecans together, peeling the shell with quiet laughter between them. It's hard to focus on the memory, but he does his best, and it manages to draw a tiny smile to his face despite everything else.

That smile lasts for all of five seconds as he walks onto the stage before ultimately falling as he takes in the waves of faces staring at him, cheering for him like he's not just a walking corpse. He wonders bitterly if they'd continue to cheer if he died right in front of them now, if they'd be horrified if it existed outside of their screens, or if they'd just laugh over his dead body because that's all he ever was to them anyway.

But there, to the left in the front row, Gideon sits with Dorcas and Fabian, and Regulus isn't prepared for how much of a relief it is to see them. To see Gideon, especially, who lifts his hand in a little wave and gives him a tiny smile. Somehow, that manages to keep Regulus going, to push him to continue to the chair right across from one Rita Skeeter.

Rita is a blonde woman in a silk dress, lips painted red and making her smile look even more dangerous. She looks right at Regulus like she's eager to crack him open and peel his shell, no different than the pecans. It takes two to do it, and Regulus has a feeling that Sirius will be the other. Suddenly, that happy memory doesn't seem so happy.

"Goodness, Regulus," Rita greets as the noise dies down, and she's addressing him like they're old friends, "you're almost as beautiful as your brother."

Regulus knows a backhanded compliment when he hears one, but he's not entirely sure what he was expecting. Of course Rita would do that, compare them, as if Regulus gives a toss about being as beautiful or more beautiful than Sirius when he's about to be fighting for his life literally tomorrow.

"Yes, well, we're related, so it makes sense for us to look alike. That's generally how genetics work," Regulus replies. He realizes belatedly that this may have been a rude thing to say and internally curses. "But, you know, I've seen siblings look different as well. It's a shame you never got to interview Sirius, Rita. He's very funny."

Rita hums. "Oh, yes, I've heard many things about the charm of Sirius Black, and I think it moved everyone when he volunteered for his darling baby brother. It certainly moved me emotionally. How did it feel for you?"

"It felt…" Regulus trails off, and the whole room seems to wait with a bated breath. Innocent angel, Regulus reminds himself, and he looks at Rita with wide eyes, blinking slowly. "It felt like he saved me. I was worried for him, worried that he wouldn't come back, but he did."

"You must have been so proud of him when he returned a Victor," Rita breathes out, hand to her chest, and the crowd seems to make soft, heartbroken noises like they sympathize. As if they ever could.

Regulus lies, of course. "He's a hero. My hero."

"Oh, that's just so…" Rita makes a small noise and reaches out to take his hand, squeezing it. Her fingers are cold, and her nails are shaped like coffins. There's some sort of symbolism to that, Regulus thinks. Someone out in the crowd is crying, which is so fucking stupid that Regulus struggles not to roll his eyes. "And do you plan to return home to your brother just as he did for you, Regulus?"

"Yes," Regulus says simply.

Rita drops his hand and leans back. "An honorable goal to strive for, but surely a complicated one. You are, after all, going into the arena with his best friend."

"I am," Regulus confirms.

"Are you and James competing to see who will make it back to Sirius' side?" Rita asks, clearly expecting him to feed into it, to boast about himself and how sure he is of his own victory.

An innocent angel would never do that, though, and Regulus honestly doesn't want to perpetuate the belief that they're fighting. It makes things harder. "No, not at all."

"No?" Rita says, sending a curious look towards the crowd before leaning in like her and Regulus are just trading secrets between them. "Does it not bother you that James may make it back to your brother, if you can't?"

"If it can't be me, then I would hope James makes it back to him," Regulus admits, and it's not even a lie, not really. "But it will be me. Nothing or no one is going to stop me."

Rita cocks her head. "Not even James?"

At this, Regulus hesitates, and Rita unfortunately picks up on his hesitation. He can feel his nerves rising again, though they had barely settled. It takes effort for him not to shift restlessly in his chair, and it's like he can feel every camera, every light, every eye focused right on him all at once.

"Are you and James close?" Rita asks, eyebrows raised.

Regulus can't clear his throat, because everyone will hear it, but he desperately wants to. "Well, I grew up with him, really. He is Sirius' best friend, so obviously he's not a stranger."

Rude, Regulus' brain points out, but is it? He genuinely can't tell. He doesn't know when he's being harsh half the time, because most of the time, that's just him being honest or pointing out the obvious. It's not like he's trying to be a prick; it genuinely just seems to come naturally to him.

"So, you never felt like you had to fight for your place in your brother's life?" Rita challenges, gaze sharp on him, probing, trying to find his weakness so she can slip the blade in and start peeling back his layers. "There's no part of you that's eager to triumph against James at all?"

Regulus knows what they all want to hear. Bloodthirsty and panting for drama. They want chaos, something to talk about, something to capture their interest. He refuses to give it to them, though he knows that he could. He could say that he hates James, and Sirius, for the same fucking reasons; he could never say that he can't hate them, not really, for entirely different reasons altogether. He's full of complexities that these people would thrive on, and he won't show any of it.

"Sirius has never given me a reason to feel that way," Regulus lies without missing a beat, and he can see a small tick of frustration in Rita's jaw. The crowd lets out soft sighs and soft murmurs, a quiet aw drifting through the room, like they're all so touched. Fucking idiots.

"There must be some pressure on you nonetheless, coming from a family of Victors," Rita continues. "You would hate to be the first to fail, surely."

Regulus smiles at her, all teeth, bright and charming just like he's seen Sirius do a million times. "Well, if history is anything to go by, I don't have anything to worry about. Coming from a family of Victors—it's not a pattern I intend to break."

"Oh, that confidence—we love to see it, don't we?" Rita addresses the crowd, earning laughter and cheers, and Regulus can feel his smile becoming fixed. No one seems to notice, at least. Rita turns back to him, chuckling. "Now, I suspect you're also eager to get back to your parents, as well as Sirius."

Regulus doesn't expect it, but a laugh falls out of his mouth before he can stop it. He can hear the edge to it, so he tries to soften it, and it ends up being a little breathy. The absurdity of her statement makes his head spin a bit. "Oh, well, my parents are expecting me to come home, that's true."

"You have no desire to let them down, do you?" Rita says.

"I never have before, and I'm not going to start now," Regulus lies, glancing at the crowd with the sweetest smile he can muster, like his mother might be out there watching. It's the redirect game, just like Sirius said. He knows his mother and father must be watching at home, and for a moment, he wonders if they're worried about him.

He knows the answer to that.

As if she can sense his thoughts, Rita muses, "Surely they're at home watching you now. Do you think you're making them proud, Regulus?"

"I hope so," Regulus lies, glancing back at Rita. Again, the crowd titters and seems so touched by what he's said.

"Is there anyone else back home you're trying to get back to? A lover, perhaps?" Rita asks, and everyone seems interested in this, which agitates Regulus to no end.

"No," Regulus murmurs. "No one at home."

"I see. A family man," Rita teases, and the crowd laughs again, almost mockingly. He can tell they're displeased, but he knows why. Sirius has a reputation here, and they would all thrive on the idea that Regulus, like his brother, is a romantic. They don't know Sirius, though, not really. Regulus has no intentions of playing that role. Ever. "I suppose if you're a Victor, you'll have many options. Although, I have to be honest, I can't imagine how you don't have options already, with how handsome you are, especially right now."

"Well, I never said I didn't have options. I just said there's no one at home I want," Regulus points out, then realizes that he's being argumentative when he should have just agreed. His heart rate spikes, and he wants to get far away from this topic right now; he has an opening, thankfully. "I can't take all the credit for how I look right now. Some of it has to go to the design team." He inclines his head towards where Dorcas, Gideon, and Fabian are sitting. People start clapping politely, and they all wave and smile. "Honorable mention to Gideon, who works with me personally. James got Fabian, but I got lucky." At this, Gideon can be heard laughing loudly, and the crowd follows suit, laughing along with him as if Regulus has just told a very funny joke. "But, really, my outfit is lovely. There's more to it. I can show you, if you like."

"Oh?" Rita glances at the crowd, and they all break out into eager cheers, urging him on. Rita laughs grandly and sweeps out her hand. "Please do."

With a secret sigh of relief, Regulus stands up.

~•~

Sirius watches the screen as Regulus spreads his dark cloak and gives a slow spin. As soon as the cloth pulls tight, a white glow of the Leo constellation forms on the cloak, the outline of the lion glittering out to everyone. The heart of it, the Regulus star, shines the brightest.

Everyone loves it, of course. The crowd quite literally goes wild, and Sirius turns his head as he paces the length of the room, agitated. He can feel eyes on him, and he knows it's James before he even looks.

"What?" James asks quietly. "He's doing well, isn't he?"

"Yes, he is," Sirius snaps, his jaw clenched.

James frowns. "Then what's wrong? He's doing everything you told him to."

"I know that, James," Sirius bites out.

"Sirius," James says softly.

Shaking his head, Sirius glances back at the screen to see Regulus sitting back down, explaining the constellation, his star being the heart of the lion, and the myth involving Hercules. Sirius looks away again. "He's lying. I can always tell when he's lying. Practically every word he's said was a lie."

"That was the point, Sirius," Pandora reminds him.

"Yes, well, you'll forgive me for not being ecstatic about hearing my brother call me his hero, all while knowing it's a fucking lie," Sirius snarls, whipping around to go stomping in the opposite direction.

James sighs. "You were sixteen. You shouldn't have had to be a hero. What you went through, that wasn't heroics. That was a tragedy, and it was unfair to you. He sees it that way as well."

"You don't know that," Sirius mutters, grimacing.

"I believe that," James tells him firmly. "Look, this isn't easy for me either. Do you think I didn't notice how hard he was avoiding telling everyone he hates me? He couldn't even bring himself to say we were friends."

Sirius scoffs. "He's a little prick, that's what he is."

"He's doing what you told him to do."

"I know, alright?! It's just—it's—"

James' face softens. "It's upsetting. I know. I get it."

"When he said that I never made him feel like he had to fight for a place in my life…" Sirius swallows thickly. "James, he was lying. That was a lie."

"Sirius," James whispers, his eyes sad. "Look at me, you know it's more complicated than that. You know it's not that simple."

"But he felt that way. I made him feel that way," Sirius insists, his heart feeling as if it's shriveling in his chest. "I didn't mean to, but I couldn't—I wasn't—"

"Stop it," James murmurs, but Sirius can't.

Sirius shakes his head. "He still feels that way, James. He's my little brother, and he's going to —he's going in the arena, and I can't—I can't take his place, I can't save him, I can't—"

"Sirius, hey, Sirius," James cuts in quickly, launching to his feet to come over and put his hands on Sirius' shoulders, shaking him a little. "Breathe. Just breathe."

"There's not enough time," Sirius chokes out. "I don't have enough time to make it right."

James takes a deep breath and slowly releases it, waiting for Sirius to copy him. His voice has softened. "You both have been through unimaginable things, and you've suffered so much, but you're his brother, Sirius. He knows, alright? Deep down, he knows you care about him, no matter what you've been through."

"How did we let it get so bad?" Sirius whispers, his eyes stinging. The question weighs heavy in his mind. He knows the source was him; he was where it all went wrong, even if he can't remember. But he got better, as much as anyone can in his situation, so why didn't their relationship get better? Why didn't they try? Ten years. It's been ten years, and neither of them could bring themselves to try. Now, it's too late.

"It was a joint effort, I think. Between all of us," James says softly, his eyebrows pinched. "We—we did the best with what we had, Sirius. None of us are to blame."

Sirius knows what James is saying. Regulus was the one who pulled away, James was too busy taking care of Sirius, and Sirius was caught up in falling apart. They all had their own problems, and the repercussions of how they handled those problems lingered even after the problems weren't as pressing as they were at the start. By the end, none of them knew how to fix what they'd already brushed under the rug. The shattered remains crackled underfoot until they grew calluses and learned to keep walking, despite the cuts.

James squeezes his shoulders, holding his gaze. "You'll have time with him, plenty of it. I'll make sure of that."

"James," Sirius croaks.

"Let him help you," James whispers. "When I'm not here to do it, let it be him. He needs you as much as you need him."

Sirius swallows thickly. "I need you, too."

"You always have me, Sirius. I'm always with you, even when I'm gone. The ones who love us never really leave us." James smiles, a slightly trembling twist of his lips, and his throat bobs up and down. He pats Sirius' chest, nodding at him. "I will be right here. That's where I'll go, and that's where I'll stay. With you. You'll carry me with you forever, yeah?"

Sirius shakes his head, dangerously close to bursting into tears. He can't accept it. He can't face it. Doesn't know how. Doesn't think he'll survive it. If James—if he's gone, Sirius will go with him. There is no forever without James.

Exhaling deeply, James tugs on him, pulling him into a tight hug. Sirius all but clings to him, shaking all over. He wants to take James and Regulus, and run. Just run as fast as they can, as far as they can go, and never look back. He wants to split himself in half and take their places, die in their stead, suffer so they don't have to. He wants to save them, and keep them, and he can't. It's going to kill him.

Someone steps out to give the two minute warning, making them break apart slowly. Pandora is still dutifully watching Regulus' interview. He's used up a lot of time talking about stars, which is working in his favor; less of a chance for Rita to yank any secrets out of him that way. Rita is winding down now, though, clearly about to end with Regulus and get started on James, who looks strangely anxious.

"You'll be fine, James," Sirius assures him, reaching out to squeeze his arm. "You weren't the one we worried about, in any case. The hard part is over."

"Er, Sirius," James says weakly, his eyes wide.

Sirius waves him off. "Calm down, yeah? You just go out there and put on that James Potter charm. You'll have them eating out of your palm in no time."

"Right. Right, but Rita—"

"Rita cares about secrets, and you don't have any. Well, none that I don't know already, and I assure you, the fact that you cried the first time you got high isn't exactly a secret that Rita will be after, so you're fine."

"Well, um," James starts, but he never gets to finish before Regulus comes into the room.

"That," Regulus declares, "was the single most torturous thing I have ever gone through. I feel filthy. And ill."

"You did marvelous," Pandora praises, bustling over to him to usher him into a chair. He sinks down into it with a deep exhale, like he's just defeated a terrible foe.

"Did I?" Regulus asks, sounding unsure, and he lifts his head to look right at Sirius for his approval. In that moment, he could be five years old, looking up to Sirius after he managed to jump over a rain puddle, seeking his pride.

Sirius feels his heart clench, and his voice is a hoarse rasp when he says, "Yeah, Regulus, you did."

"Well, brilliant," Regulus mutters wryly, leaning his head back against the wall as his eyes drift shut. "I never want to do that again. Fucking hell."

Sirius doesn't have the heart to tell him that he will, in fact, have to do that again if he wins. Victors are interviewed at the end, and it's just another brutal process of rehashing all that happened in the arena. Sirius doesn't remember his Victor interview, not really. If it wasn't for Effie, he probably would have been catatonic on the stage.

James jumps when he's called, and he looks worried despite everyone's many reassurances. Sirius reaches out and squeezes his shoulder before he walks away, and Pandora gives him a gentle smile. Regulus doesn't even open his eyes to see him go.

Sirius moves over to sit down next to Regulus, gently bumping their knees together. Still, Regulus doesn't open his eyes, but a tiny smile briefly curves his mouth.

For now, that just has to be enough.

~•~

Rita wastes no time in getting James to show off his outfit, no doubt trying to get it out of the way. The crowd loves it when he holds his cloak out and spins, showing the golden sun that blazes to life on the white fabric. People ooh and ahh, gasping and cheering in hushed delight.

"Absolutely lovely," Rita comments when he sits down, and she smiles right at him, but James can't help but note that there's no warmth to her gaze. "Regulus the star, and you're the sun, the star that outshines him. Is there meaning to that?"

"What? No," James says, rearing back a little bit. "I don't outshine him. It's—that's not the meaning. Just, you know, the sun is warm, so warm it'll burn you up if you get too close."

"Like Icarus," Rita muses, and James nods tentatively. "And who would you say is your Icarus, James? Regulus?"

"No," James mumbles.

Rita laughs. "Well, aren't you a humble one?"

James takes in a small, short breath. He forces himself to relax. Okay, he can do this; he's brilliant at this. He knows how to smile, to put people at ease, to keep them happy. As he exhales, he smiles broadly and chuckles. "You know, my mum always did tell me to stay humble, and she's never wrong."

"Your mum. Euphemia Potter, a Victor herself, and at the tender age of thirteen, too," Rita says. "She was Sirius' mentor when he was a tribute, wasn't she?"

"She was."

"Do you think she's relieved to know Sirius is your mentor, or perhaps concerned, since his little brother is also a tribute?"

"My mum loves Sirius as if he's her own," James says, which makes the crowd let out soft noises, almost coos. "She holds no ill will for him or Regulus in her heart. She's—well, I know she's watching right now. Hi, Mum. Hi, Dad."

The room breaks out into laughter as he raises his hand and waves at the camera off the side of the stage. He imagines his parents watching, pressing their hands to their smiles as they see him beaming at them, being their goofy son with a smile that never wanes. It makes him inexplicably sad, but he isn't going to let it show. He chuckles along with the others, dropping his hand as he winks at a few people in the front row before turning to focus on Rita again.

"A man who loves his parents wholeheartedly; we adore that. You must miss them very much," Rita points out.

"I do, yes," James admits, because he does.

Rita clicks her tongue in sympathy, but James doesn't think it's real. "I'm sure you're eager to get back home to them."

"I'd love to see them again," James says carefully, perhaps too carefully, but he really is a shit liar when he's anxious. This is the truth, though. "They know my intentions to do what needs to be done, and I know they're proud of me."

"How lovely," Rita replies with a hum. "Let's talk about your reaping, how you must have felt when your name was called, only to hear Regulus' name afterwards. I can only assume you were relieved at first, knowing that your best friend would be beside you, but surely that relief soured when you heard your best friend's little brother would be your competition."

"He's not—we're not competing," James announces, shaking his head. "It's not like that."

"No?" Rita challenges. "You're not worried that Sirius will do more for his little brother than you?"

James clenches his jaw. "We're under no illusion of how difficult this is for all of us to navigate. What's important is that we're all doing our best, and we are. Sirius, especially."

"That's sweet, James, but I must ask… What will you do in the arena when it's just you and Regulus?" Rita presses, leaning forward with a frown, like she pities him. "You said you'll do what must be done. Do you think Sirius will forgive you for it when that includes his baby brother?"

"Well…" James swallows, feeling lost at sea. He wishes more than anything that Pandora or Sirius had coached him for something like this, because he has absolutely no idea what to say. He doesn't want Regulus—who is watching—to know his decision, and he doesn't think people would like it so much if they knew he was going into the arena with all plans to die. They like people who will fight, who aren't planning to give up. Think, what would Sirius do? James asks himself. Instantly, he laughs and plasters on an easy smile, leaning forward like he's telling a secret. "I suppose you'll have to watch and see."

Rita hums as the crowd responds pleasantly, clearly liking the suspense and implications. She laughs along with them and nods. "I suppose we will. I, for one, cannot wait to see what tricks you surely have up your sleeve."

"Oh, trust me, you have no idea what tricks I'm capable of," James teases, leaning back in his chair lazily.

"Well, well, you sure know how to bring a sense of anticipation, James," Rita praises. "Can I ask? Does Regulus know what tricks you have up your sleeve?"

"Honestly? He knows most of them," James admits, his lips curling up, "but not all. Never all."

"Do you think you'll surprise him, then?"

"I know I will."

Rita gives a theatrical shudder. "Oh, you sound so sure that you've gone and given me goosebumps. We're all on the edge of our seats; I daresay you have us hooked."

"Well, I have you right where I want you, then," James says with a grin, sweeping his gaze over the crowd. This time, he catches sight of Fabian with Dorcas and Gideon. Fabian is hiding a smile behind his fist, and James winks at him. Some of the people behind him think it's towards them, and they look like they're about to swoon.

"I can't help but notice that you speak of Regulus fondly," Rita tells him. "He mentioned that you two grew up together, but he didn't say much else. I think he was shy."

James' smile softens helplessly. "Believe it or not, he actually was shy when he was younger. He was very, very sweet. The first time I saw him, he was riding around on Sirius' back, asleep on his shoulder." Again, the crowd seems to find this unbearably adorable, and James can't really blame them. It was very cute, even then. "We met properly a few days later when I came to their house. Sirius dragged him out to introduce us, and he was certainly more bashful then. Very polite, though."

"Isn't that just adorable?" Rita asks the crowd, and they make loud noises of agreement. She laughs and turns back to James, her gaze sharp. "It's almost as if you see him as a little brother, too. That would make sense, if you grew up together."

"Er, no, not—definitely not," James says weakly, clearing his throat. Rita raises her eyebrows at him. "I just—I only mean that Regulus isn't… He's not just Sirius' little brother. He's his own person. I—I, um, worked that out as I got a bit older."

"Oh?" Rita murmurs, her tone light. "So, you would say that you two are close? Friends of your own, perhaps?"

James can feel the eagerness in the room, the pressure building as everyone wants an answer one way or the other, metaphorical claws digging into his skin in persistent demand. He flounders for a moment, his heart racing, feeling frozen to the spot and overheated with every eye on him. How the fuck does he answer this? Does he—can he lie? Should he lie? He can't very well tell the truth, because that would be very bad for everyone involved. Well, you see, Regulus hates me and has hated me for the last ten years or so, but the feeling isn't mutual, so it's all very complicated; can we talk about anything else?

Yeah, no, James can't say that.

"Ah, we—well, we have a lot of memories together," James stutters out, struggling not to wince at how shaky his tone is. Rita looks fucking delighted, like she can tell that he's hiding something. Shit. Shit, shit, shit. Not good. "A lot of good memories, in fact. With Sirius, too."

"But also without Sirius?" Rita cocks her head at him, her gaze piercing. "Did you and Regulus spend a lot of time alone?"

"I—well, no, not very much. I mean, sometimes we spoke when Sirius was getting ready to come down from his room, but um, mostly we just...all spent time together." James shifts restlessly in his seat. "But also, there was the time that Sirius was in the arena. I was there for him as much as I could be."

Rita makes a soft sound and reaches out to pat his knee, which feels very patronizing and only makes James' nerves even more tense. "Of course you were, but surely you had other friends."

"Er, yeah," James admits slowly. "I had a lot of friends back home. Still have, actually."

"That's lovely," Rita says. "You seem to have made a lot of friends here as well. Many other tributes spoke highly of you."

James breaks out into a smile. "Oh, yeah, I've met many lovely people here."

"I'd say you're a clear favorite, and with your gorgeous smile and undeniable charm, it doesn't surprise me at all. In fact, I think you've caught Irene's interest the most," Rita tells him, and the crowd breaks out in titters and dreamy sighs. James is so confused right now, honestly. Is she implying…? "Could you see something blossoming between the two of you?"

"Er, in the arena?" James asks skeptically, a little incredulous. So, she obviously is implying what James thinks she is, but she can't be serious, can she?

Rita laughs. "Oh, sure. Love is like a flower that blooms even in the harshest conditions. Do you look for that to happen?"

"Between me and Irene? No. Goodness, no, we're just friends," James declares quickly, shaking his head. This is clearly not the right thing to say, because the crowd makes it very clear that they don't like this. James holds his hand up in surrender, internally panicking. "Not—not because of her. She's lovely, but I'm—I just, um, well—"

"I see what this is," Rita says softly, reaching out to grab his hand and pat the back of it. "You had feelings for someone back home, didn't you?"

"Well, yeah, actually," James confesses, relieved that the crowd has gone from being upset to being intrigued.

"You were dating someone?"

"No. It wasn't—I mean, he doesn't know how I feel."

Rita pats his hand yet again, and the crowd joins her in making soft, pitying noises. "You could always tell him now. After all, James, it could be your last chance."

"Ah, no, I really couldn't," James mumbles, huffing out a weak laugh. "It's...complicated."

"Feelings always are, aren't they?" Rita pulls her hand back and studies him. It looks like she has cogs turning in her mind, and the needling force of her gaze is just making his anxiety so much worse. "Well, if you win and return a Victor, you'll have to confess your feelings for him."

James snorts and says, "Well, if I win and return a Victor, I won't have anyone to confess to."

There's a long pause, and the entire room falls silent. James realizes a beat too late that this is possibly the stupidest thing he could have said. He goes very still, his eyes widening, and he can see a slow smile steadily splitting Rita's face. Oh, fuck. Shit, shit, shit, James thinks, his heart falling to the pit of his stomach. He did not just—why did he say that?

"Do you mean...Regulus?" Rita asks, gazing at him with this bright spark in her eyes, utterly triumphant. "A boy you had feelings for back home, a complicated situation, and if you win, that means he won't be there. Am I right?"

James waits for someone to come save him. He waits for the ability to turn back time and fix this mistake made in the shaky foundation of his anxiety, only growing worse from each second that passed from the start. He feels like shrinking down and hiding away from the world, but all eyes are on him, and he has nowhere to go. Helplessly, he glances around the room, finding nothing more but eager eyes and waves of delight for the drama unfolding before them.

"James?" Rita prompts, drawing his gaze. Her eyes are still sparkling, despite the tender frown on her face. She reaches out to put her hand on his knee again. "Is this true? Do you have feelings for your best friend's brother?"

"Um," James rasps, flexing his fingers on the arms of his chair, and he can feel how hard his heart is thumping against his ribs, threatening to break them in an attempt to break free. He opens and closes his mouth, then feels himself sink into the freefall, because he doesn't know what else to do. With a shaky laugh, he nods. "Yes, well, can you blame me?"

Rita's lips curve up at the side, just for a moment, and she squeezes his knee before leaning back. "No, I don't think anyone can blame you for that. He's beautiful, and I think I can speak for everyone when I say how unfortunate it is that you two are in these circumstances. It's a tragedy, isn't it, that you'll never know what life you two could have lived together? But remember, harsh conditions or not, love is like a flower that can bloom anywhere. I hope it blooms for you. Don't we all hope it blooms for James and Regulus?"

The room nearly trembles with the ear-splitting shrieks and cheers of support. People are crying, people are shouting advice, and some are telling him to love while he still has the chance. Rita doesn't interrupt it, and James swivels his head to look out at everyone, feeling faint and out of his depth.

It makes sense, in a way, because love is a universal truth. It is, despite everything, what most—if not all—people can agree on, in that people feel the call of it. People find hope in it. People believe in love, almost instinctively, because love exists all around them. In families, in friends, in lovers. There's so much love in life, and it's what makes living worth it.

For James, in more ways than one, it's what will make dying worth it, too. For Sirius, yes, but also Regulus.

The interview doesn't last for much longer. Rita gives out a closing statement as James fixes a smile on his face, ears ringing, and then he's being escorted off the stage. He's almost as nervous to go back to the room as he was to leave it. What is he going to say to Regulus? Fuck, what is he going to say to Sirius? His brain is in an uproar, too much going on for him to make sense of anything at all.

James steps back into the room and shuts the door, turning around with a deep breath. He doesn't even get to exhale before his back is hitting the door with a loud thud, Regulus shoving him against it and pinning his forearm against James' throat, holding him in place. James wheezes, eyes bulging as he takes in the pure fury on Regulus' face, his lip curled into a snarl and his eyes blazing. Frankly, he's fucking gorgeous. These are less than ideal circumstances, admittedly, but James can't help but notice.

A steady stream of an angry tirade is spilling from Regulus' mouth, even as James gazes at him and thinks, helplessly, you are so beautiful. He'd probably say it like an idiot, because he's in it now, so why not? But Regulus isn't really giving him the chance between his arm at James' throat and his ranting.

"Are you fucking mental?!" Regulus is shouting. "Do you think this is funny, some sort of joke? Were you trying to tease me? Make me look weak? You stupid fucking—"

"Reggie! Regulus, stop!" Sirius scolds, then curses sharply under his breath and fully reaches around Regulus' front to grab him and haul him clear off his feet as he pulls him back. Regulus, being Regulus, tries to tip forward and get to James again, but Sirius ignores his dramatic flailing and carries on pulling him back.

"Put me down!" Regulus bellows.

Sirius swats him on the side of his head, snapping, "I will when you stop trying to attack him."

"He—"

"I know. I heard. I was there."

Regulus cranes his head to stare at Sirius in disbelief, his face flushed with anger. "Sirius! Let me go. He just told the entire fucking world that he—he—"

"Yes, as we've established, I know," Sirius grits out, dropping him harshly enough that he stumbles a little bit. Sirius latches onto Regulus' arm so he can't get away. "You should be thanking him. Do you have any idea what he just did? He made you desirable, Regulus."

"He—you—" Regulus rears back, eyes wide. "Did you fucking put him up to this, Sirius?!"

"No, actually, that was all him," Sirius mutters, his gaze darting to James. His eyes narrow slightly, but he glances back at Regulus. "Stop being an idiot. Pandora, take him to go cool off, would you?"

Pandora moves over, winding her arm through Regulus' and gently tugging him towards the other door. "Come on, Reg. I know, I know, you want to kill him. Save it for the arena."

Somehow, Pandora coaxes Regulus out of the room, and James prods at his throat with a grimace. It doesn't hurt, really, but the pain behind the gesture tugs at his chest. What was he expecting, though? He knows Regulus hates him, so it would only make sense for Regulus to respond that way.

That doesn't make it hurt less.

Hesitantly, James drops his hand and drags his gaze up to find Sirius staring at him. His lips are pressed into a thin line, and his arms are crossed. Slowly, one eyebrow ticks up.

"So, er, I take it I failed my interview," James says weakly.

"James, what the fuck was that?" Sirius hisses.

"I just—I don't know what you want me to say, Sirius. She was dead awful, and I—I tried to —" James makes some sort of helpless gesture with his hands, and Sirius still looks tight with agitation, and all the stress comes crashing down on James at once as his mounting frustration bubbles up in him until it spills over. "Well, it's not like I knew what to do! I told you I was worried, and you just kept brushing me off. What did you expect to happen when you and Pandora didn't coach me at all? I did my best on my own, because you certainly didn't fucking help me, did you?"

Sirius doesn't react for a moment outside of the tiniest flinch, something like horror flashing in his eyes, and then his eyebrows tug together as he drops his arms. He almost instantly reaches up to drag his hand over his mouth, then shoves it through his hair. "No, you're right. I—I'm sorry. I just thought—I don't know why I assumed you would handle it with ease. Even I didn't. No one does, really, and I shouldn't have expected you to. It's—I just admire you, so I…"

"I know I make it seem easy to get on with people, and for me, it generally is," James croaks. "Just...not so much when I'm being interrogated and I'm so scared that I can barely think."

"Fuck." Sirius' eyes sink shut, his face twisting. He hangs his head forward and scrubs his hand over his hair roughly once, twice, and then a third time before dropping his hand and looking up with remorse in his eyes. "Fuck, James, I'm really sorry. That was a lot to put on you. I should have—well, you're right, I should have helped you. If—if it makes you feel better, you did brilliantly on your own. You—you didn't fail."

James blows out a deep breath, his shoulders slumping as he looks at Sirius with wide eyes. "I didn't?"

"No, you…did really quite well, actually," Sirius says, and James instantly feels better. "You answered questions beautifully with only a few minor hiccups here and there, but they were smoothed over quickly. And I wasn't lying when I said that Regulus should be thanking you."

"You weren't?" James asks in surprise.

Sirius shakes his head. "You just solved the issue of everyone pitting you two against each other, and not only that, but you've given them reasons to root for both of you. What's more enthralling than war? A love story, that's what."

"Oh," James breathes out, feeling a hysterical laugh bubble up in the back of his throat. He didn't even mean to do that, but if it'll help Regulus survive… Well, brilliant.

"The thing is," Sirius says slowly, "you didn't do that on purpose. I know you didn't, James. Rita dug that out of you. But that would mean it's true…"

James stares at him, holding his gaze, and then he lets his head thump back against the door. He huffs a weak laugh and lifts his hands before letting them drop back down limply. "What are you going to do, Sirius? Kill me?"

"Oh, for fuck's sake," Sirius mutters, looking downright exhausted. James sort of pities him. "My brother, James?"

"Sorry?"

"Are you?"

"I mean…" James trails off, biting his lip. In his defense, he's never done anything to be sorry for. It's not as if he and Regulus have been running around behind Sirius' back. James just has hopeless feelings for him that he failed to mention to Sirius, very much on purpose.

"But, like, why?" Sirius' face screws up. "And don't say it's because you think he's pretty. You think I'm pretty—or you better think I'm pretty—"

"Yes, of course you're pretty, Sirius."

"Thank you. Moving on. I need an explanation."

James scratches at the side of his head, pursing his lips. "I mean, I—I do think he's pretty, to be fair. But you're right. He's just… Well, it started—er, do you remember his fifteenth birthday, when he hit me in the head with a snowball?"

"Yes. Is that—" Sirius stares at him incredulously. "Do not tell me my little brother abused you into forming a crush."

"Listen—"

"Fucking hell, James."

"Shut up, alright?" James mumbles sheepishly, his face getting hot. He averts his eyes. "Obviously it's more than that. He's more than that. His eyes, the way he talks, the little smile he tries so hard to hide. Even his anger, his pain, his—everything. I can't help it. I can't ignore it. I can't ignore him. And I know it's stupid, I know he hates me, but I just—I—"

"Yeah, alright, I—I got it," Sirius cuts in wearily, heaving a sigh as he reaches up to rub his finger furiously along his eyebrow. James can see him chewing on the inside of his cheek, processing. "So, all the flirting lately…"

"I...may have been indulging a little," James admits with some chagrin. He shrugs when Sirius drops his hand to stare at him blankly. "Well, you know, I'm going to die soon, so I may as well…"

Sirius flinches again, looking distraught in an instant, and James is so fucking scared of dying for a lot of reasons, but the main one is Sirius. He doesn't want to leave Sirius alone. He doesn't want to leave Sirius at all.

Something flickers over Sirius' face, and then his eyes widen as he whispers, "Oh. Oh, that's why, isn't it? Your choice—you said it was more than just for me. It's for you, too."

"Yeah," James says softly. "Yeah, it is."

For a long time, they can only stand there in stifling silence, utterly smothered by the tragedy that is.

And oh, what a tragedy it is.

Chapter End Notes

starting from the top:

remus really went to sirius' best friend and was like, hey why isnt sirius doing inappropriate things to me??? help??? lmaoooo the fact that james immediately sold sirius out. "he really likes you. a lot" JAMES DIDNT EVEN HESITATE 😭😭😭 but also, he's a real one for being like, maybe YOU should do inappropriate things, ever thought of that, remus, huh? james "best wingman" potter is trying to get his best friend laid, and we love him for that.

not sirius being remus' favorite hello and hardest goodbye ☹☹☹ brb gonna cry. everyone sort of calls this a "jegulus fic" and there are times when jegulus gets the main focus (particularly in the games), but this is as much a wolfstar fic as it is a jegulus fic. this is very, VERY wolfstar heavy, and we also get a lot of dorlene, too. others as well, but i can't speak on the other relationships because we haven't gotten to them yet. we get there when we get there.

anyway, as for the interviews. regulus really did his best, you've gotta give him that. he held it together and lied his ass off. go ahead, king, you be a little innocent angel. james potter number one regulus stan: he's never done anything wrong in his life, ever. all regulus stans: i just think he's neat 🥰 side note: the pecan story will be used for further angst later on, just a warning but also, sirius being sad because regulus was lying, so now he knows regulus doesn't see him as his hero 😭😭😭 that's so fucking upsetting. listen, regulus and sirius have A LOT they need to unpack and literally no time in which to unpack it. they make my heart ache.

then you've got james, who was SO anxious for his interview and NO ONE HELPED HIM 😭😭😭 like, everyone really looked at james and thought: now THAT'S a man who can do anything and charm anyone with no problem. and yeah, it comes from a place of admiration—even sirius is not immune. in a way, it's cute, because he's like: james is great, he can do anything, he's so cool and doesn't need help at all. yeah, real sweet, except for the fact that james is not perfect because no one is and no one can be, so it leads to moments like james accidentally confessing his feelings for regulus in front of the entire world.

i would like it on the record that sirius was not maliciously withholding his help from james—neither was pandora, for that matter—but he literally just admires james and believes in him THAT much. like, it came from a place of love. he didnt MEAN to put james in that position, and he was quite convinced that regulus was the one who needed help (and to be fair, regulus absolutely would have bombed that interview without all that help). still, james getting to be upset about being brushed off and put on a pedestal and having to do it on his own with no help was very cathartic.

lmao regulus was about to claw james' eyes out 💀 we get more on why he was so upset later, i promise. james really got mildly attacked by regulus and STILL was sitting there thinking he was beautiful. help this fool. and sirius smacking regulus upside the head will never not be funny to me, because it reminds me of that video where that cat is trying to fight, and the dog just comes over and grabs the cat by the scruff to pull it back 😭😭😭 not pandora being like: save it for the arena. she's FOUL for that one, but she's so funny to me, pls sirius being confused about why james would even like regulus is HILARIOUS to me. he really was like, okay you're gonna have to make diagrams and pie charts to explain to me how this even happened. this poor man. he is So Tired. like, james and regulus are stressing him out so much at this point. if it's not one thing with them, it's another, and now he has to deal with romantic feelings on top of everything else??? let him REST.

meanwhile, james is over here twirling his hair because regulus is pretty and mean to him and nearly gave him brain damage when he was fifteen. leave him alone, that snowball was his wakeup call and he's been wide awake ever since 😭😭😭

anyway, i really liked this chapter, if you couldnt tell. let me know your thoughts!!! i love all your comments so much and try my best to reply when i have the energy/time. thank you all so, so much <3

The Last Night

Chapter Notes

warnings for this chapter:

-references to death (in the past and also assumed to be in the future)
-brief description of violence
-brief description of murder (nothing too detailed, but explicitly stated what happened)
-references to torture (not explicit and only really hinted at, you might not even pick up on it)
-depictions of dissociation and dissociative amnesia
-reference to a pet passing away to old age (peacefully and only briefly mentioned)
-brief reference to a nightmare
-angst

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Dinner is a quiet affair.

Regulus isn't sure if it's tense because of the earlier interviews, or simply because it's the last day for him and James, or both. Pandora is the only one who speaks, really, but she quickly gives up on that when no one has much to say in response.

Sirius and Remus are making eyes at each other, which Regulus mostly ignores. Usually, it's sort of fun to see his brother turn into a complete idiot the moment Remus so much as breathes in his direction, but Regulus understandably detests any and all hints of romance right now. The source of this issue—one James Potter, of course, who barely lifts his gaze from his plate the entire meal and doesn't say one word.

Actually, James is the first one to leave, and he does so in a manner that's not like him at all. Without a goodbye, he just shoves himself out of his seat and leaves without looking back. It takes Sirius all of five seconds before he's up and following him, looking worried and a little sick.

Regulus doesn't want to be bitter, but he is, a bit. Of course Sirius would go to James, regardless of the fact that Regulus is literally in the same situation as him. Of course James would want Sirius' company over anyone else's, regardless of the fact that Regulus is surely feeling just like he is at the moment. That's how they work; it's always James and Sirius, and Sirius and James. Never one without the other.

It feels like a bad omen, in a way. Vaguely, Regulus realizes the world wouldn't make much sense if Sirius and James didn't have each other. Going into the arena with James where only one can come out...this acknowledgement isn't a comfort. It's never been a comfort for Regulus, though, so he's used to it.

He remembers when he used to be so, so happy that Sirius and James were best friends. Funny how things change. But, really, not funny at all. Regulus hasn't laughed about it in years.

Pandora tries to get up and help Remus clean, but he firmly sends her off to bed, which is probably for the best. She's tired, and honestly, she might be the only one who actually gets some proper rest tonight, so Regulus figures someone should.

Regulus doesn't want to admit it, but he doesn't want to be alone right now. He doesn't want to go sit in his room and think about what's waiting for him tomorrow. He doesn't want to drown in his own thoughts. Mostly, he wants to avoid thinking for a while; he wants to avoid everything. So, he gets up and starts scraping plates without a word.

"You don't have to do that," Remus murmurs.

"I know," is all Regulus replies, because he's very aware that it's technically something Remus is only required to do. He doesn't care. He's doing it anyway.

Remus is silent for a long beat, then he says, "Really, Regulus, you can go rest. I can do this on my own."

Regulus lifts his gaze and just looks at him, the fork scraping slowly against the plate as he continues what he's doing. For a moment, Remus just stares at him, then he seems to realize that Regulus isn't budging on this, and he gives a tiny, singular nod—mostly to himself—and turns away without a word.

In silence, they work in tandem to grab the plates off the table, throwing food away. Regulus hates it, really, because this is food that could go to people who are very, very hungry in various districts. He never wastes a meal, and neither does James or Sirius, but...well, this is their last day. It doesn't leave much room for an appetite, so Regulus lets it go.

Regulus also helps Remus gather the glasses off the table, then just gives in and goes to help him wash dishes. If Remus is surprised by this, he doesn't show it. In fact, Remus doesn't say anything at all at first, letting them fall into a silent rhythm where Regulus washes and Remus rinses, dries, and puts away.

"I saw your interview, you know," Remus says, eventually. "I'm not technically supposed to watch, but I was already here, so I just… Well, anyway, you did very well."

"You saw James' too, I'm guessing," Regulus mutters.

Remus hums. "Yes, but I was assuming you didn't want to talk about that."

"Nothing gets past you, Remus," Regulus says dryly, and Remus snorts quietly.

"You don't have to talk about it. It's obviously complicated."

"Yeah, that's the word he used, too, but it's not really that complicated at all."

"No?" Remus asks.

"No," Regulus confirms. "I hate him. I hate him even more now, for involving me in a stupid lie that I wanted nothing to do with. He had no right to do that."

"Right," Remus says slowly. There's a long pause. Remus puts away a glass and comes back, his lips pursed when Regulus glances over at him. "I hope I'm not overstepping here, but if I may… I'm not so sure that it is a lie, and people can't—they can't help how they feel, Regulus."

"Don't compare what you and Sirius have going on to James and I. It's not the same," Regulus replies shortly.

"I...wasn't," Remus mumbles, and Regulus appreciates that he doesn't try to deny anything about him and Sirius. It would just piss Regulus off if he did. "It's just, well, when you're a servant with nothing to do but watch, you learn to notice things, and James looks at you. Really looks at you. A lot."

Regulus scoffs and scrubs harder at a plate, his face dropping into a scowl. "That doesn't have to mean anything."

"No, but I'm observant, and I've observed that it does." Remus reaches over to take the plate without warning, and Regulus huffs quietly under his breath. Remus seems to find this amusing, if the way his lips twitch are anything to go by.

"Honestly, this is the least of my worries right now," Regulus says shortly, shaking his head.

"I know." Remus blows out a deep breath. "I just don't think it has to be a worry for you, really. Rita practically tore James apart to get to what he was protecting, and that turned out to be you. He was sincere, Regulus, and it wasn't malicious."

Regulus turns that over in his head, because admittedly, he hasn't really—considered it. He doesn't know why, and he also does. But he was there. He watched the interview. He saw the way James looked, the pure fucking panic in his eyes as soon as he realized what he said, as soon as he realized what he revealed. James—of course he would never do something like that to be malicious; he literally announced to everyone that he had no feelings for Irene only moments before. He's sincere like that, about the things that matter, and feelings—people's feelings matter to him. Rita just cracked him like a fucking pecan, and Regulus wasn't prepared for him to be the other one that she used to do it. He didn't see it coming.

But, really, in the grand scheme of things, it doesn't matter. It can't matter, so Regulus isn't letting himself think about it. He doesn't want to think about it, not when tomorrow is still going to come no matter what passes through his mind.

"I have more important things to focus on than what James may or may not feel," Regulus announces firmly, passing the last plate over. He reaches in to drain the water, staring at the suds that cling to his forearm. "It's not going to change anything in the arena anyway, so…"

Remus rinses the last plate, but he takes his time drying it. Regulus can feel him looking at him, so he slowly glances back. Remus murmurs, "Are you scared?"

Regulus stares at him, then arches an eyebrow.

"Right, stupid question," Remus admits wearily, shaking his head. "I just—I suppose I wanted to give you the option of talking about it, if that would help."

"It won't," Regulus says bluntly. "Talking about the fear isn't going to magically make it go away. It's still there, no matter what's said about it."

"Yeah," Remus replies quietly. "Yeah, I know."

Regulus watches him, lips pressing into a thin line. "This is going to be hard for Sirius. Watching James be in danger when he can't do anything about it… He'll be a mess, Remus."

"And you."

"What?"

"Watching James and you be in danger, he'll be a mess. You're his brother, Regulus." Remus frowns when Regulus doesn't respond to this, and then he sighs. "I know this isn't going to be easy on him."

"You'll make it easier," Regulus murmurs, holding his gaze, and Remus swallows harshly. "You're important to him. I'm sure you've worked that out by now, but I'm telling you in case you haven't. Just—I can't make you, I can only ask, so I'm asking. Do you know what I'm asking?"

Remus nods carefully. "Yes."

"Will you, then?"

"I'll try."

Regulus nods, then turns and leaves without another word, feeling like he's smothering in the request he couldn't bring himself to voice out loud. Take care of him. It's always so hard to say, because it's never him that Sirius needs, but that doesn't stop him from wanting Sirius to be alright.

He's grateful that Remus heard him nonetheless.

~•~

Sirius remembers when James lost his first and only pet. A stray cat that had wandered through the Victor's Village for years, one that James had been feeding and bringing inside since he was a child. She was an older cat, and she had been around for years, but by the time James was eighteen, she was gone. The day he found her, peacefully gone in her sleep in a patch of sun, James had been a fucking wreck.

It had been alarming seeing James cry. Since they were eleven, Sirius had never seen James cry like that. He'd seen him cry from laughter, and he'd seen him cry while reading soppy books, and he was sure that James cried when he returned home after his time in the arena—even if he couldn't remember it. None of that was how he cried that day, raw sobs and horrible grief, so heavy that Sirius had been scared.

James hasn't cried like that since, until tonight.

It's as scary as it was then. Tonight, he curls himself up on his bed next to Sirius and cries with so much grief, so much loss, that it's a fight for Sirius not to cry right along with him. The one James is mourning this time? Himself.

That feels like some sort of cruel joke that the universe is playing on him. People don't get to attend their own funeral, and yet James has already made himself at home in his grave.

Sirius sprawls out on the bed next to James, listening to him weep with a shrill sound ringing in his ears that sounds like his own screams he keeps trapped behind his teeth. He says things, soft things, comforting things; he wraps an arm around James and holds him; he tries and tries to help, and he doesn't really do anything at all. There's nothing to do, and yet his hands ache to dig James up from his grave until his nail beds are so torn that they're bleeding.

Sirius breathes and thinks I'll breathe life back into you, because James isn't dead. He's not dead, and Sirius can't accept that he might be one day very soon. He doesn't accept it. To him, the grave is just a door, and Sirius refuses to close it.

James cries himself to sleep, and Sirius stays a long time after anyway, just watching him breathe. He can't drag himself away until James turns over in his sleep, and then Sirius buries his face into the pillow to muffle the choked sound that falls out of his mouth. He shoves it down, the rising grief and pain that threatens to consume him, because he has no reason to feel it. He doesn't accept the reasons it would be there.

Sirius tugs the blanket over James, his lungs feeling like they're on fire, and then he leaves.

It's not late. Still afternoon, technically. James just exhausted himself with all the crying, and Sirius hopes he sleeps all the way through until morning, just for one last night of the last dredges of peace he'll get to have before the arena wrings it out of him for good. Because it will. Sirius can attest to that.

He's not surprised when he ends up at Regulus' door. For a long time, he just stands outside of it, not even sure if he can bring himself to go inside. He rests his hand on the doorknob, feeling oddly hollow. His mind buzzes dully, but nothing really sticks when it drifts through; it's like his thoughts are just pieces of paper fluttering along the wind, brushing past his fingertips when he tries to grab them, always out of reach.

Slowly, he turns the doorknob, his eyes shut as he eases the door open. He waits for Regulus to say something, but he doesn't, and Sirius understands why when he peels his eyes open. Regulus isn't in his room. The door to the balcony is cracked, and Sirius can just make out the shadow of his brother pouring in from outside the gap.

Sirius' memory of the past is really bad, but he still has issues with it in the present. His mind isn't—sometimes he can't get it to work right. It's not brain damage from the arena; he was medically checked over and cleared when it was over. He has physical scars from his injuries, but the mental ones never fully healed, and he doubts they ever will. It fucks with his memory a lot, sometimes even in real time.

Like now. Sirius blinks and finds himself at the door to the balcony with absolutely no recollection of how he got there. It's just—blank. He doesn't know if he walked in a straight line, if he stopped halfway there, if he skipped or ran or twirled in circles from one point to the next. And he'll never know. That time—that moment—is just lost to him now, and he knows he'll never get it back.

It's one of the most common aftereffects of the arena that has lingered in his life, even ten years later. It's gotten better, admittedly. He used to lose entire days, or hours, and not just moments. It used to happen frequently and without reason, no matter what he was doing or who he was with. James told him once that he acts no differently than usual, that he just carries on what he's doing, and no one can even tell that he's gone. It's like he's sleepwalking, but it's sleep-living, and it scares him each time he wakes up. It's different from the nightmares or hallucinations, because he's still present for them, but this? It's like he doesn't even exist when it happens.

Sirius exhales quietly, reaching out with a shaking hand to ease the balcony door open and slip outside. Regulus is curled up in a chair, his arms wrapped around his bent legs. His head swivels to watch Sirius move over to sit in the lone chair across from him, but he doesn't protest, or speak at all.

For a long time, Sirius doesn't speak either. He can't. He isn't sure what to say. The silence feels heavy between them, thick like quicksand, something they sink into the more they struggle. They've been struggling for so long now that Sirius doesn't think they know how to do anything else. You don't drown in quicksand; it suffocates you. There's a difference, and Sirius doesn't know which is worse.

Sirius feels like he's dangerously close to breaking down, but he can't let Regulus see that. Maybe it's messed up, because Regulus has lost it on him more than a few times when they were younger, but Sirius is supposed to see that, supposed to step in and be there to mop his face and hold him up when he can't do it on his own. That's not Regulus' job to do it for Sirius, because he's the little brother, the one who looks at Sirius and knows he's strong, steady, not someone who loses it.

It is, Sirius knows, really messed up. They're brothers, and the age gap isn't very big at all, and they're adults now. Older, wiser, capable of understanding what they just didn't as children. Regulus sees them as equals, and Sirius knows just how badly Regulus used to want to take care of him, just like Sirius took care of Regulus for so long, until he couldn't anymore. But Sirius just can't. He can't bust down that wall and shatter that illusion, because he's weak—he knows he is—but for Regulus, he gets to be strong. He can't lose that.

Sirius sucks in a rattling breath, his hands shaking, losing it. He's losing it, and what happens then? He never has, not with Regulus. What happens when he has no choice? I can't help it, he thinks, vision blurring. It hurts. Fuck, it hurts so much.

"I—I'm—" Sirius curls his hands into fists, his voice scraped raw, thin and reedy like it might snap in half. Regulus turns to look at him, just staring, and Sirius is too close to tears to see what his expression looks like right now. "If I could, I'd go so you didn't have to, Regulus. If I could—"

"But you can't," Regulus murmurs with quiet finality, like the final nail in a coffin.

"I'm sorry," Sirius rasps.

Regulus is silent for a long moment, and then he whispers, "I'm not. I think once was bad enough."

And Sirius just—he laughs, because yeah. Yeah, it was. It's the worst thing that ever happened to him, and he would do it again a hundred more times for Regulus. It fucked him up beyond repair, and he wouldn't go back to choose differently, even if it meant he got to be whole again.

"I wish—I really wish I could remember everything before better than I do," Sirius confesses as his laughter fades out. There wasn't any real humor in it anyway.

"You...don't?" Regulus ventures cautiously, clearly confused. Of course he would be. Sirius has never told him how bad he was, and he never let him see it.

Sirius clears his throat. "No, not really. I can remember some things, but not very much. Not as much as I should. And what I can remember, some of it isn't clear, or comes in this strange jumble, so I don't always know what was real or not."

"I remember," Regulus murmurs. "I can tell you if it was real."

It tugs at Sirius heartstrings that, despite everything—all that they've been through, and all the time that's passed—Regulus still wants to do the one thing that Sirius could never let him do. He knows logically that he's not all to blame; he was going through a lot, and Regulus was as well, and neither of them knew how to handle it. They should have never had to handle it, no different than they should have never had to handle what they did from their parents. Regulus grew bitter and cold and resentful; he pulled away and stayed away, giving up on Sirius just as Sirius was trying to learn to stop giving up on himself. Sirius didn't let Regulus in; he let the distance grow and never knew how to cross once it was there, because it was never supposed to be there. They put it there together, and only they can get rid of it by meeting in the middle, but they're different, and they've changed, and neither of them really know how.

Maybe this is a start. Maybe it's too late to start at all, and maybe they won't get farther than this one step, but Sirius thinks this one step might mean the world to both of them regardless. Maybe it's enough, or maybe it'll have to be, because maybe this is all they get to have, and maybe that's more important than having nothing at all.

"Did we ever…?" Sirius' face scrunches. "I have this sort of disjointed memory of—of glass shattering? But I wasn't scared, and it wasn't Mother or Father. I think—I think we were throwing bottles? Glass bottles. Is that—did we—"

"No," Regulus says softly. "No, that never happened, not with me. With Uncle Alphard. You used to go over to his house, and you'd both throw glass at the wall. He was raging and sloshed, but you—well, it frightened me. Made me uncomfortable. Mother always told us to stay away, but you never did, of course. You would bring shards of glass back sometimes to use in something. You built me a dagger out of one once."

Sirius blinks rapidly. He doesn't—even with Regulus telling him, he doesn't quite remember, really, but it doesn't feel as distressing not to. The memory is still broken up, and Sirius doesn't remember Alphard there at all, but something in him eases to know what it is. All he'd known was that he wasn't scared, and he'd assumed that meant he was with Regulus.

"Oh," Sirius mumbles. "Alright, what about…? There's one where I know you're there, but I don't—I can't remember what we're doing exactly. You were young, but I can't recall how old you were, or even my own age. We were...chasing something, I think. Yeah, yeah, that's what we were doing, but we were laughing, not—desperate or anything. There was this—this house? A mud house. Like, a tiny one. I don't...I can't really remember much else, but was that—do you know what I'm talking about, or am I making that up?"

"I was nine, and you were ten. We were chasing a lizard, and I actually caught it, so you decided it needed a house to live in. It had rained, so the ground was muddy enough for you to build a tiny little house out of it. There were a few windows, I think, and you tried to build a door, but it kept falling over. We put the lizard in, no bigger than my palm, and it stayed for about...fifteen seconds, maybe? Yeah, just about, and then it darted out one of the windows and ran off," Regulus tells him. "You named it Lewis."

Sirius closes his eyes. With the details, the memory is easier to sort out and click into place, less fuzzy and distorted as it comes into focus. He doesn't know if it's because he actually remembers it, or because he can just picture it perfectly, but either way, it feels nice to have something solid.

"I have—I know it's impossible, but I have this memory of us jumping off the roof of our first house, and we flew. We were trying to touch the stars. Our stars. I don't even know if they were visible that time of the year, but I—I distinctly recall us doing it. Obviously we didn't fly, but...did we…?"

"No. We never even climbed to the roof, but we used to talk about flying to the stars. Me, you, Andromeda, Narcissa, Bellatrix—all of us. We all used to plan grand adventures along the stars and constellations we were named after, and Narcissa would pretend to feel left out because she didn't have one, but it wasn't real. They were older, so that was just something they used to do to entertain us, especially when they babysat us. It was like a little story they would tell us before bed, all the adventures we'd have in the cosmos."

A lump forms in Sirius' throat that he has to swallow down, because that memory—one that isn't even real—is so vivid. He's known for a long time that it's not real, because it's not possible. He and Regulus couldn't have leapt off of a roof and flew up to the sky with bright bursts of laughter, but it rings through so clearly that he can feel the air on his cheeks and hear Regulus shrieking in delight as he soars through the sky.

Maybe it was a dream and he can't separate them from reality as properly as everyone else can. Maybe he took a story that his older cousins told them and turned it into a memory that feels more real to him than things he actually experienced. He doesn't know why it's there, and it's frustrating. The way his own mind betrays him makes him want to curl up in a tight ball and never move again. His past is so flimsy, so spotty in some places, and it's like he lost so much of himself that he can never really get back. He aches with the loss.

"Thank you," Sirius croaks. "For being honest, I mean."

"Do you remember the day we gathered pecans?" Regulus asks him, and Sirius frowns.

"No," Sirius admits. "Should I? Did we do that?"

Regulus sighs quietly. "Yeah, we did."

"You can—I mean, you can tell me about it, if you want," Sirius suggests. He won't remember, he knows that, but he'd like to hear about it.

"It's fine," Regulus says, looking away. "It's not a very happy memory anyway."

"We had them, though, didn't we?" Sirius asks, his voice soft as he drops his gaze. "Happy memories, I mean. Back when we were—the people we used to be."

"I don't know anymore," Regulus replies, equally quiet. "I don't really remember the people we used to be."

Sirius smiles sadly. "Yeah, Reggie, neither do I."

~•~

Remus knocks on Sirius' door, receives no answer, and decides to leave. It's sure to be a hard night for him, as well as James and Regulus, so maybe Remus shouldn't intrude. He doesn't think he would have dared to, if not for the conversation he had with Regulus only a few hours ago.

You're important to him, Regulus had said. The thing is, Remus knows that. Sirius has made that clear. Somehow, in just a handful of days, he's become important to Sirius. He hasn't been important to anyone in five years.

Sighing, Remus turns away as if to go, only to come to a halt when he sees Sirius heading towards him. His eyes are tired and red-rimmed, and yet he still manages a small smile when he looks at Remus. It's faint and flickering like a flame threatening to go out, but it is there nonetheless.

"Almost missed you," Remus comments as Sirius draws closer.

"Wouldn't want that. I have divine timing, then," Sirius jokes weakly, coming to a stop beside him, in front of his door.

"Are you alright?" Remus asks softly, then feels just as stupid as he did when he asked Regulus if he was scared.

Unlike Regulus, Sirius doesn't make it obvious how stupid of a question that is. He just says, "No, honestly, I'm not."

"I know, I'm sorry," Remus murmurs. "Can I do anything?"

"You're doing plenty already, right now."

"I'm not doing anything at all."

"You're here," is all Sirius says.

"I can't stay all night, but I would if I could. I only have a few more hours before I have to go back to my cell," Remus tells him with an apologetic grimace.

Sirius nods. "Alright. How do you want to spend them?"

"With you," Remus admits, feeling his stomach drop out from under him like he's just fallen from a great height. These wants he's learning to allow himself to have, they scare him and excite him in equal measure.

"Well, that works out quite nicely, because I want the same thing," Sirius replies, and despite everything, there's a blush on his cheeks and a tiny smile curving his mouth. "Do you want to come in?"

"Yeah, alright," Remus says.

Sirius holds his gaze for a moment, then opens his door and steps inside. He holds it open, waiting for Remus to come in before he shuts it. For a moment, Remus is overcome with the awareness that he trusts Sirius, even behind closed doors.

Utterly oblivious to the magnitude of such a thing, Sirius moves past him while blowing out a deep breath, muttering about changing. Remus watches him step into his closet, sliding the door shut. Slowly, Remus glances around the room, just standing awkwardly in place.

Remus has seen Sirius' room many times before, of course, but he doesn't really know what else to do with himself at the moment. A fond curl wriggles in his chest when he thinks about the fact that Sirius never leaves his clothes on the floor anymore. He folds them as meticulously as Regulus does now.

Right on cue, Sirius steps back out of the closet with his clothes he was previously wearing in a neat stack that he puts on the chair in the corner. He's changed into joggers and a shirt that appears soft, and there's no sleeves, the hem ending on his shoulders and revealing his upper arms. Remus isn't at all prepared for how toned they look, or the scar that spills out from his right shoulder, jagged like someone tried to slice him in a harsh arc but never got to finish.

"That's not even the worst one," Sirius says, and Remus' gaze snaps up to see that Sirius has caught him staring. He reaches up and pokes the scar with a snort. "The ever so lovely Jericho tried to slit my throat, but I dodged and got this instead."

"I remember that," Remus replies, because he does, if only vaguely. "You bashed his skull in with a rock."

Seems like a lifetime ago, before he ever ended up in the Hallow. He did watch Sirius in his games. Everyone watches, and Remus was no exception before he became a servant. Back then, Sirius was just a boy on the screens doing things that churned Remus' stomach, even when he was so desensitized to it that he barely let it weigh on his mind. What would be the point? It happened the year before, and it would happen the year after. Remus knew even he could one day have to do it, if his name was called, but that's not how things went for him. Some would think he was lucky. They would be wrong.

"I did, yes. I remember that all too well." Sirius huffs a sardonic laugh. "Of all the things to remember… You know, I can't forget one detail of my time in the arena, and yet—" He shakes his head, lips twisting, then he looks at Remus with a tight smile. "If I'm honest, I was sort of hoping you might not have seen my games. I know you weren't a servant then, but…"

"No, I saw them," Remus confirms, and Sirius nods, looking away as he clenches his jaw. "It's—Sirius, it's alright. You did what you had to do to survive."

"I killed twelve people. I'm literally a murderer, Remus."

"Against your will. You didn't have a choice."

"I could have died instead," Sirius says, gaze foggy and distant, and there's a wistful quality to his voice like he almost wishes he had. It makes Remus' stomach cramp with panic.

"Well, I'm glad that you didn't," Remus tells him firmly.

Sirius glances at him. "You saw all that I did, what I'm capable of, and yet you still say that. I don't know how you can stand to be in the same room as me, honestly."

"You had no choice," Remus says, and it's sharp like a whip cracking against wet concrete, and he would know. Sirius gives a harsh blink, his lips parting in surprise. Remus shakes his head. "What happened to you—it wasn't fair. You didn't want to go through all of that. It's not right that you were forced to kill to survive, and that's not on you."

"It's just…" Sirius swallows. "I don't know. I just hoped that maybe you hadn't seen me at my worst."

Remus softens helplessly, and he takes a deep breath, then slowly lets it out. "Sirius."

"Yeah?" Sirius rasps.

"You see me at my worst every time you look at me," Remus whispers. "I wish more than anything that you could have seen me at my best, but this is what you get, and somehow it's still enough for you. Why would I feel any differently about you suffering at the hands of the Hallow?"

Sirius shudders out a deep breath, shuffling forward a few steps. He reaches out slowly, coming short of touching him, then he pulls his hand back and flexes his fingers. "I don't see what you think I see when I look at you, Remus."

"What do you see?"

"Something glorious."

Remus' breath catches. He steps forward, running his gaze over Sirius' face. "Why did you pull away? You were going to touch me, but then you stopped."

"Can I?" Sirius asks, and it sounds like a plea, like he's desperate for it. His eyes are wide, and his fingers twitch at his sides as he gazes up at Remus with hope etched into his face.

This idiot, Remus thinks fondly. This lovely mess of a human being. He shakes his head with a quiet huff of laughter, still remembering his conversation with James. Sirius won't cross boundaries, so Remus is just going to have to show him that the boundaries have moved. He lifts his hand and cups Sirius' left wrist with his right hand, briefly sliding it up just to watch the way Sirius' chest stutters on a sharp inhale, then sliding it back down to gently tangle their fingers together.

It feels momentous, this breach they've been so careful not to rush into, and yet it's also quite possibly the easiest thing Remus has ever done. He tugs on Sirius' hand very gently and tells him, "Yes, you can. I want you to."

Sirius exhales all at once, loud like he can breathe easier suddenly, and then he proceeds to shuffle forward to close the last bit of space between them and drops his head directly on Remus' shoulder. He leans into him with a deep sigh, his body relaxing into him; it's so simple for Remus to slide his hands up Sirius' arms and around his back, just to hold him.

"You're so warm," Sirius whispers.

"Mm," Remus agrees distractedly, too busy working up the courage to brush his fingertips over Sirius' hair where it spills over his shoulders. It's so fucking soft that Remus' brain briefly cuts out entirely, and his hands itch to delve deeper into the strands. "I like your hair, you know."

Sirius releases a quiet laugh against his shoulder, dangerously close to a damn giggle. Remus' lips twitch, and he tugs gently on one strand that he catches between the tips of two fingers. Slowly, carefully, Sirius' arms slide around Remus, looping loosely around his back—and, just like that, it's an embrace.

For a long time, neither of them speak. They just breathe and hold onto each other. Sirius' breathing is even and calm, and he's so relaxed that he's actually a little limp, like he could just drift off and fall asleep right here. His only movement is when he occasionally rubs his cheek against Remus' shoulder, as if settling in. Meanwhile, Remus indulges a bit too much, unable to stop himself. He sweeps one hand up and down Sirius' back, and the other is on a mission to get into his hair if it's the last thing he does. He manages it, eventually, finally working up from just playing with the ends or the random strand here or there that he curls around his knuckles. Instead, he gives in and cards his fingers through from root to tip, entranced immediately by the slip of silk-soft hair between them.

In response, Sirius gives a full-body shiver and turns to press his face more firmly against Remus' shoulder. Remus can still hear him breathing, noting the falter in it before it picks back up in a slightly uneven rhythm.

"Alright?" Remus asks.

"Mhm," Sirius responds, high-pitched.

"Do you want me to do that again?"

"I am doing everything in my power not to beg you to do that always."

"I unfortunately have other things I'm required to do with my time," Remus teases lightly.

Sirius grunts. "Cruelty. Torment. Utter misfortune."

"Isn't it just?" Remus' lips curl up in amusement as he once again pushes his hand through Sirius' hair. At this, Sirius' displeasure dissipates, and he gives a low hum of approval.

"That could put me to sleep," Sirius mumbles.

Remus thinks about that for a second, then says, "Well, you do need your rest tonight. I can—I mean, I can help with that."

"In bed?" Sirius' head pops up, nearly displacing Remus' hand, and he looks very fixated on this idea immediately. "You'll get in my bed? With me? I mean—I just—I'm not—if you, um—"

"Yes, to help you sleep," Remus says, amused.

"Well, you know, there's a lot of ways to—" Sirius stops all at once, coughing as he does that blush all over that Remus likes so much. He looks a little mortified. "Sorry, that was—"

"Are you ordering me to exhaust you in other ways?" Remus asks, arching an eyebrow at him.

It's almost comical how quickly Sirius pales, the blush completely draining from his face. "No! Fucking hell, no, I would never."

"So, you don't want me to tire you out?"

"No. Yes. I mean—I—"

Remus frowns at him, but he's barely hanging on at this point. In a moment, he's going to break. "Is there a problem with how I complete my tasks? Do you think I'll fail to handle this one to your satisfaction?"

"My—my satis—what? Remus?" Sirius looks a little lost, and dazed. "No? I mean, I'm not asking—it's not that I—" He cuts himself off as soon as Remus' lips twitch at the corners, which means he's studying Remus mouth a little too closely, but Remus isn't complaining. Sirius' mild panic drains away until he's stunned. "Oh, you were fucking with me again."

"I was, yes," Remus confirms, breaking out into a smile as he rubs both hands down Sirius' arms as he starts to pull away.

Sirius muffles a quiet noise and reaches up to cup his forehead, exhaling shakily. "That's—you know, for something that scares the piss out of me, I find it very attractive. I'm not aroused by my fear, just to be clear. I think it's the mischief that does it for me, if I'm honest. Maybe...a little bit of the fear, but today is not the day for me to explore that."

"Thank you for taking me with you on that short journey of self-discovery," Remus says cordially.

"You make me feel things," Sirius informs him, gazing at him sort of helplessly, like he's lost.

Remus' lips twitch. "I noticed."

"Okay. I just—I wanted to make sure you knew."

"I know."

"Right. Are you still getting into bed with me?" Sirius asks.

"Yes," Remus says.

Sirius' lips tug up into a grin. "After all of that, I have to make you feel things too, if you're still willing to get in my bed."

"Come on," Remus tells him with a gentle laugh, reaching out to push him towards the bed, getting an inner thrill from putting his hand on him again and knowing that he can. He slides his thumb along the scar on his arm, and Sirius barely walks straight because he's too busy gazing at Remus.

Getting into bed with Sirius is surprisingly easy, but maybe it shouldn't be a surprise. So many things with Sirius are easy, so why shouldn't this be as well? It's not proper, he shouldn't do it, yada yada yada—the same spiel as usual, and Remus just really, really doesn't care at the moment. Being with Sirius is always a risk, and it's one he's willing to take.

The bed is so much softer than Remus' cot in his cell, and he actually has pillows, as well as satin sheets and lovely duvets that feel so good Remus could weep. He doesn't really know how to relax into it, despite this, because he hasn't had anything even close to it in five years. Luckily for him, the goal isn't to get comfortable; the goal is to indulge in more of Sirius and his hair that Remus is admittedly fascinated by.

Remus ends up propped up on his side and one elbow, his other hand raised to run through the hair that Sirius has helpfully fanned out along the pillow like spilled ink. It's almost artistic, the waves of black against the stark white pillowcases, something sharp and ethereal all at once.

"Remus," Sirius murmurs, gazing up at him through half-lidded eyes.

"Hm?"

"Will you wait for me to fall asleep before you go?"

"If you fall asleep before I have to," Remus says softly.

Sirius hums and closes his eyes. "I want to fall asleep with you here. Is that strange?"

"No, I don't think so," Remus replies, because he'd desperately like to do the same. He can't. He'll never be able to.

"Thank you," Sirius whispers, his eyes still shut. "For being here for me, I mean. Tonight, especially. It's—it would have been so much worse without you, Remus."

Remus gazes down at him and keeps dragging his hand through his hair. Tenderly, he whispers back, "Of course."

Sirius releases a soft sigh, and it's not long before he genuinely drifts off to sleep, his mouth falling slack and his body sinking into the mattress. Remus continues to stroke his hair, marveling at the level of trust Sirius has in him, the same trust that Remus feels reverberating in him for Sirius. He stays right where he is until he has to go, wishing with every cell in his body that he could stay. The one reprieve is that Sirius got to fall asleep with him there, at least.

If Remus will never get to do the same, he makes sure to take a little something for himself before he goes. A tiny indulgence. He leans in and presses a kiss to Sirius' forehead, soft and lingering, letting it form into a smile as he pulls away.

When he leaves, even under his mask, his lips still tingle.

~•~

James jerks awake with his heart pounding and Sirius' name falling from his mouth in a rasp of pure panic. He sits up frantically, disoriented, searching for him—but he's not there.

It takes James a moment to realize that this is okay. That the lack of Sirius' presence doesn't mean something bad has happened. That Sirius is likely in his own bed, hopefully getting whatever rest he can. James exhales and hunches forward to rub his palms into his closed, gritty eyes. Sobbing oneself to sleep, especially whilst still wearing contacts, does not make for very happy, healthy eyes. Who knew?

Dropping his hands, James swallows past the lump in his throat. He hates that he did that. He isn't—he doesn't regret his choice, alright? The plan is still the same, and he won't change his mind, but...that doesn't make it easy. That doesn't mean he's not scared. That doesn't stop him from feeling like he's gagging on his own grief for the life he won't get to live.

James drags himself up to check the time—it's the middle of the night—and then goes to take a shower. He's sweaty from his nightmare, and he tries not to take the chance to be clean for granted.

Once he's finished and changed, James eases out of his room. Carefully, he moves up the hall to Regulus' room, intending to just check on him, maybe see if he's up. They haven't spoken since the interviews, and James feels the need to apologize. More than that, he doesn't want to enter the arena with the weight of Regulus being angry at him on his shoulders.

He eases the door open cautiously, and the light is still on, but Regulus isn't in bed. The door to the balcony is cracked, just like last time. There's a brief moment of hesitation, and then James slips in, shuts the door, and heads to the balcony.

Regulus is sitting in the same chair as he was last time, a creature of habit. He's always liked his routines, his little made up rules of tidiness for how things should be, what goes where and how things have to function. When he unconsciously picks a chair, that chair is his. When he wears brown shoes, he needs black socks. When the streetlights come on, he has to pass through each golden glow of the circle on the ground on his route home. Regulus has always been comfortable with order in his life, while Sirius and James prefer spontaneity.

"Hi," James greets cautiously as he sinks into the open chair. Regulus doesn't acknowledge him, but James can see his jaw clench. "Er, have you slept at all?"

"No," Regulus answers stiffly. "Have you?"

"A little, but not very well," James admits.

Regulus exhales sharply and turns his head to look at James. In the wash of light that barges out here from the cracked door, his eyes are blazing. "What do you want, James?"

"I know you're angry with me," James mumbles.

"Yes, I am," Regulus snaps.

James swallows. "I'm sorry, Reg."

"I don't want your fucking apologies. I want you to not have done it," Regulus says harshly. "Of all the fucking things to do, to say, and you—and you know that was cruel—" His voice cracks, and he sounds brittle. He turns his head away, hand balled in a fist on top of the table. When he speaks next, his voice sounds small, and it breaks James' heart. "It was cruel. You had no right to mock me like that."

"I wasn't mocking you," James tells him. "I know why you would think that, but—"

"Do you?" Regulus hisses, his shoulders wrenched tight, and he sounds furious because of what he already knows.

James already knows, too. He's known since he was eleven and was introduced to Regulus for the first time, and Regulus had looked at James with wide eyes, like he was the most amazing thing Regulus had ever seen. He's known in all the moments after; when Regulus could barely string a sentence together around him; when Regulus blushed every time James smiled at him; when Regulus would race to beat Sirius to the door every time James came over, just to have a precious few minutes alone with him before Sirius stole James' attention entirely.

Of course James knew that Regulus had a crush on him all the way from eleven to fifteen. James knew, and he thought it was funny. He thought it was hilarious, in fact, and he sometimes even played into it with winks and playful comments, just because it amused him. Not because he cared. James didn't care, unfortunately. To James, Regulus was just Sirius' baby brother with a hopeless crush.

And then, well, Regulus abused him into forming a crush right back, quite literally hitting him over the head and telling him to fucking pay attention, which reoriented James so hard and so swiftly that he'd gone from not even thinking twice about Sirius' baby brother to daydreaming about what it would be like to kiss him. This abrupt one-eighty happened in just enough time for Regulus to do an abrupt one-eighty of his own, going from crushing on James hard to hating him just as fiercely. Isn't that terribly ironic?

"I know you had a crush on me once," James admits quietly, and he can't help but appreciate the blush that floods Regulus' cheeks, even when he's still pissed off.

"Yes, well, I was young and stupid," Regulus mutters with a scowl. "Not that it mattered to you anyway, and we both know it. For you, it was just a source of entertainment."

"You have no idea how long I've been kicking myself for being young and stupid in the exact opposite way. I had so many opportunities that I let pass me by, and as soon as I realized how fucking stupid I was for that, it was too late." James heaves a sigh. "No more opportunities."

Regulus is silent for a beat, and then he looks over at James with narrowed eyes. "You meant it, then."

"I didn't mean to tell literally everyone my deepest, darkest secret," James says dryly, "but having feelings for you was, in fact, my deepest, darkest secret."

"Deepest and darkest," Regulus echoes flatly, an eyebrow arching. "High praise. Very romantic. Should I swoon?"

James groans and reaches up to scrub his hand through his hair. "Just—fucking hell, Regulus, you know what I meant. Obviously I didn't want anyone to know, or anyone to find out like that. For one thing, Sirius didn't know. For another, I didn't want you to learn about it."

"Why?" Regulus challenges. "You knew about me."

"Yeah, I did, but—" James grimaces. "Well, it's shit, isn't it? As soon as I started having feelings for you, your feelings for me went away. What was I supposed to do with that, especially with everything that was happening with Sirius? There was so much, too much, and even when we learned to live with it all, there was no point. You fucking hate me."

"Yeah," Regulus murmurs, frowning. "Yeah, I do."

"See?" James tosses up a weary hand. "No point."

"There's even less of a point now, and yet you're still here."

"Well, the thing about feelings is, whether or not it's pointless to have them, they still sometimes persist anyway."

Regulus looks at him for a long time, no longer seeming angry, but his face is inscrutable. James shifts a little, feeling weirdly studied, like he's under a microscope. Regulus' gaze feels like a test, and James wants so badly to pass it, but he knows he can't when Regulus is the one grading him.

Slowly, Regulus pushes his chair back with an awful scrape, standing up. James instantly goes still as Regulus circles the table at a leisurely pace, moving closer to him. His heart races, because he—fuck, he doesn't know what's about to happen, but Regulus is coming closer, and he's doing so with the knowledge that James wants him closer than he's ever been.

"One of us is going to die in that arena, or maybe it'll be both of us, but neither of us have very good odds," Regulus says softly, pausing to lean against the table, one hand gently drifting back and forth along the edge.

James nods slowly. "I know. This is—it's our last night."

"It is," Regulus agrees. "Things are complicated with Sirius, I have murder and possible death in my very near future, and I've had no choice but to do a lot of thinking about who I used to be, who we all used to be. You're right, feelings persist, and my hatred for you isn't going anywhere. Ever. If I die, I'll do it hating you. If I live, I'll do that hating you, too."

"Even when—if I'm dead?" James asks, admittedly hurt by this, though he shouldn't be. He knew this already.

"Yes." Regulus holds his gaze. "I'll hate you for that, too."

"For being dead?" James murmurs, startled.

Regulus looks at him, and his eyes—those eyes, James knows them when he knows nothing else, and there's something about them now. Heavy and intense. "Yes, for being dead. Perhaps for that more than anything else."

James should not find that overwhelmingly romantic, as well as tragic, but his breath hitches in his throat anyway. It's so strange how Regulus' hate can feel like a benediction when he wields it this way. James never wanted it before, and now he's suddenly grateful for it. Hatred isn't apathy, or indifference, and James doesn't think he could survive those from Regulus. Hatred isn't love either, but it's dangerously close, and James thinks he could die for both. He's going to.

"We could be dead tomorrow," Regulus whispers, "and I don't want to spend my last night alone, even if that means I have to spend it with someone I hate." He lifts his hand off the table and holds it out, fingers spread and gently curling, an offering and a beckoning. "You're lucky, James. You get to spend it with someone you don't."

"What about the fourteen year old Regulus in you?" James whispers back. "Does he feel lucky, at least?"

"He doesn't feel anything at all. He's been dead since I was fifteen," Regulus replies with a brief smile that's sad around the edges. He wiggles his fingers a little. "Go on, I want to be young and stupid just one last time, so you should take your last opportunity before I change my mind."

James exhales shakily, the significance of it all not lost on him. He knows it's because they're going into the arena tomorrow, and everything will change, then. Regulus would never do it otherwise. But when you're trying so hard to outrun tomorrow, the only direction you can go is backwards. Regulus wants to go as far back as he can get, and in the distance behind him is a boy who once wanted someone who never took his hand when he offered it, but will now. Funny, how things change. Tragic, how some changes don't get to mean something.

James slips his hand into Regulus', his heart doing this weak, pathetic fluttery thing as their fingers slide past each other. Regulus holds his hand delicately, cupping it from the bottom as his thumb swipes tenderly over James' knuckles, like James is royalty and he's going to bow over his fingers. He doesn't, though. No, he just gives a gentle tug, encouraging James to stand up, and as soon as James has, he turns his hand to slot their fingers together before leading James in his room.

Ridiculously, James feels a little wobbly in the knees, just from the way their fingers tangle together, fitting in the crevices of each other like they were always made to be that way. James had thought that the first time they held hands, that fateful day in the courtyard while Sirius was attacked on the screen, and Regulus had threaded their hands together like he needed the contact to help him stop trembling. It didn't really work, but neither of them let go, even long after Sirius had walked away from the fight with a dead body in his wake.

Regulus turns off the light first, and immediately, the modifications he's made to his room with the Hallow tech and advancements offered to them become obvious. The ceiling is just the night sky full of pinprick stars that offer a faint, blue glow to the room from the midnight canopy above them. It's gorgeous, honestly, and James is admittedly distracted by it so much that he doesn't look away until Regulus pulls on his hand again, silently demanding him to get in bed.

It's almost like Regulus is that young boy with a crush again, calling out to James for his attention. Here and now, it's very different, because they're adults who are about to be in bed together when they never have before. James' mouth is dry as he follows Regulus under the sheets.

"Don't get any ideas," Regulus mumbles, like he can read James' mind, which did in fact have many ideas.

"Too late," James admits. This earns him a soft huff of laughter, despite everything, and he grins as he sinks down onto the pillow under his head. He's on his side, and Regulus is right across from him, looking at his face in the dark. They're both just looking at each other, but James is a brave soul, so he works up the courage to make a request for what he really, really wants, most of all. "Can I hold you?"

Can I have you? James thinks, desperately. Just for tonight. Please.

Regulus doesn't answer him. Not with words, at least. He turns over, and James' heart starts to sink at the rejection, but then Regulus scoots back until he's pressing into the curve of James' chest and open arms. He shifts to share James' pillow with him, tugging his own up to his chest, then curls up slightly and rocks back more firmly into James like he's snuggling in. James holds his breath, not quite believing that this is actually happening.

He hesitates, but then he slips his arm over Regulus and relaxes forward with a soft sigh, eyes drifting shut at the sensation of actually getting to hold him. He's close, and warm, and apparently the little spoon—and James feels dangerously addicted to this already. He doesn't want to let go; he wants to stay right here forever, where he gets to hold Regulus and know what it's like to have him, even for a moment in time that can't last, because tomorrow is on its way, and it will catch up to them eventually.

But, for now, James curls up to Regulus and thinks that he was right, because here, like this, despite everything he has waiting for him when tomorrow comes, James knows he's lucky to get to spend his last night just like this.

Chapter End Notes

regulus and remus WILL be friends in this fic, don't you worry, but we gotta get there first. it's a slowburn friendship lmaooooo. i love them so much. remus is just like: so, like, are you scared about the whole "possibly going to die tomorrow" thing? and regulus is just like: 😐🤨 and remus is like: you know what? that's fair. carry on, mate. HELP THEY'RE SO FUNNY TO ME THEY'RE GONNA BE SO SASSY WHEN THEY REALLY SETTLE INTO THEIR FRIENDSHIP I CANT WAIT 😭 meanwhile, sirius and james are being sad girlies 😔 nah bc sirius really said: james isn't gonna die, i simply Do Not Accept It. and he's so valid for that. the denial is strong with this one. me too, babe, me too.

and then the regulus and sirius angst had me like that meme where that reality star is like screaming and crying at the cat, you all know the one. me after writing every line: STOP, YOU'RE DONE, PUT THE PHONE AWAY. me @ me: leave them alone and let them rest 😭😭😭 also me: writes more sad shit

but the pecan story being one of regulus' happiest memories in the last chapter, only to find out that sirius doesn't even remember it at all, and THEN to learn that it's not a happy memory for regulus anymore because the Hallow essentially destroyed that for him??? im chewing on glass. ☹☹☹ on a high note!!! remus and sirius hugged 😭😭😭 no, sorry, they "embraced" bc sirius would feel like that's an important distinction. yes, he was practically levitating in that moment. FINALLY SOMEONE IS HOLDING THIS MAN HES BEEN SO STRESSED PLS. but they were unbearably cute with a little angst mixed in, as well as humor, because remus never misses a chance to fuck with people if he can. "you don't think i would complete this task to your satisfaction?" OH??? 🤨 WHAT'S THAT MEAN, REMUS??? he's so sexy i love him 😌 anyway, cut to james and regulus, and it comes out that regulus used to have a crush on james, and james KNEW about it, but didn't care until it was too late. talk about tragic, right? on the bright side, regulus stowed away his Personal Issues for one night and was like: you know what, im could die tomorrow, so i will allow myself one (1) human indulgence of not spending my last night alone. go ahead, king, you be that little spoon! and james is just happy to be involved 🥰

Lift Off

Chapter Notes

hello, all!

this is the point in the story where i remind all of you that this fic will get dark and people will die. it's heavy, heavy stuff, so PLEASE check the warnings, and don't hesitate to check the more in-depth descriptions i put in the end notes to spoil yourself if you need it, and also DO NOT READ if it's best for you not to. always, always prioritize yourself first. <3

warnings for this chapter:

-some sexy spice!!! (only semi-explicit, nothing too detailed, but you definitely know what's going on)
-angst (very, very heavy angst)
-references to torture (not explicitly described but most definitely stated where you won't miss it)
-references to death
-references/hints to possible future plans of suicide (basically stated, but nothing explicit, and no, it's not going to happen. it's not from a place of wishing to commit suicide, but rather from a place of grief)
-dissociation and a dissociative amnesia moment explicitly described (i will go in more depth about this in the end notes for more spoiler-y warnings)
-assault and murder (yes, there's death in this chapter, and i will go in more depth about this in the end notes for more spoiler-y warnings as well)

i will be putting very in-depth warnings in the end notes, but i will also be telling you how you can skip or just simply skim-read those parts, like to warn you in enough time so you can just quickly scroll by if that's something you'd rather do, which is valid as well!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Sirius is only half-awake when he turns over and presses into something warm and solid, and usually, this would be strange enough that he would be in danger of responding defensively, but he remembers falling asleep next to something warm and solid, so it's perfectly fine.

In his sleepy state, warm and solid means something good, just like it did when he fell asleep, and so Sirius snuggles into it as he smacks his lips and tries to go back to sleep.

A beat later, Sirius' brain connects warm and solid to Remus, and his eyes snap open as he jerks up in alarm. It is, in fact, Remus. He's wide awake and looking at Sirius fondly, but Sirius' heart promptly drops as dread and panic sinks in.

"Did you fall asleep here?" Sirius rasps, his blood pumping as his heart races. "Remus, are you—"

"Sadly, no," Remus interrupts calmly. "I did leave last night, but I came back. I thought, since you wanted to fall asleep with me here, you'd like to wake up the same way."

"Oh," Sirius breathes out, relaxing all at once as his eyes drift shut and he settles back down. A moment later, it feels like his heart seizes in his chest when he realizes that Remus—he did this on his own. He chose to do this. He came into Sirius' room without asking and crawled right into bed with him, and if it was anyone else, Sirius wouldn't be giddy and delirious with joy about that. "Oh. I—yes, I do like it. Thank you. Hi."

"Hi," Remus responds, lips twitching. "You don't mind, then?"

"No, no, of course not," Sirius rushes to say. "You can do whatever you want, Remus, you know that. I mean, um, you did want to, right? You don't have to be here if you—"

"I wanted to. I want…" Remus' gaze flicks down to Sirius' mouth, lingering, then flits back up. "I want a lot of things."

Stupidly, the only thought that Sirius is capable of forming is wait, no, I haven't brushed my teeth. Fortunately, he doesn't say that, but only because the sole sound he's capable of making is a little high and garbled.

Remus' eyes soften from sharp to playful. "My compromise on my many wants was this, though. Watching you drool in your sleep. Very entertaining start to my morning, I'll admit."

"I do not drool in my sleep," Sirius sputters, reflexively lifting his hand to rub it quickly over his mouth.

"You do," Remus counters. "It's cute."

"Oh, well, in that case, I do drool in my sleep, actually," Sirius says, breaking out into a grin when Remus turns his head and stifles his laugh into a pillow. Sirius thinks he's so lovely, just gazing at him, and before he knows it, his hand is reaching up to gently push back where his hair flopped over his forehead. Remus turns his head slightly, peering at Sirius through his eyelashes. "Is this alright?"

"It's alright," Remus murmurs.

Sirius bites his lip, moving very carefully as he sweeps his fingertips across various strands of hair. His fingers shake from the importance of this moment, from brushing up against the glorious. He doesn't go too fast or too far, refraining from doing too much, no matter how desperately he wants more. Sirius breaks things, but he is determined not to break this with Remus—whatever this is.

He used to build things. Create things. And now he's lucky if he doesn't destroy what's already formed. This, with Remus, feels like building something, and it scares him. He never means to break things, especially what's important, and Remus is undoubtedly one of the most important things to come within reach of the ruin he carries in his palms.

Overcome by his own wariness, Sirius draws his hand away, swallowing thickly. A mixture of shame and guilt swirls in the gaping maw of his chest, making the back of his throat burn. Instantly, he feels the compulsive need to apologize, because he doesn't—he can never tell when he's genuinely done something wrong, or when he just feels that he has.

"Sorry," Sirius blurts out. "I'm sorry. I didn't even ask, and I shouldn't have just—"

"Sirius," Remus cuts in firmly, and Sirius shuts up, gaze caught as Remus stares at him. He shakes his head slightly, then sighs deeply. "I won't break, you know."

"Just wait, I've barely gotten my hands on you yet," Sirius says.

"You can't break what's already broken." Remus quirks a tiny smile. "Besides, if breaking is the result of being touched by you, I won't be satisfied until I'm in shambles."

"Did—did you mean for that to sound as sexual as it did?"

"Yes, absolutely."

"Oh, that's not fair. That's dangerous. You're dangerous," Sirius announces breathlessly. "You'll be the death of me. All that's tried to bring me to my end, and it'll be Remus Lupin and his poetic innuendos."

Remus chuckles, then proceeds to rock forward and roll right on top of Sirius, pushing him on his back on the bed with the weight of his body. Which—oh, okay. That's a lot for Sirius' brain to handle, honestly, and he briefly short-circuits. No, really, Remus might actually be the death of him.

Remus is. He's just. There's a lot of him, somehow, and he's literally just lying on top of Sirius, chest-to-chest. Sirius is under the thick duvet from the waist down, which thankfully keeps their hips from meeting, hopefully deterring his body from responding the second he actually gathers his wits about him. At the moment, he's frozen, staring up at Remus with wide eyes and staying very still.

"Touch me," Remus says.

"What?" Sirius chokes out.

"Touch me," Remus repeats, and ah, yes, Sirius did hear him correctly the first time. How he's still alive right now, Sirius has no idea, but he isn't surprised that he's struggling to breathe properly. He'll be dead soon, probably. Which is fine. What a way to go, really. "You need to get over this, Sirius. Or maybe I just need you to. I don't want you to hold back with me, so just—just touch me. That's all."

Sirius is so, so tempted beyond measure, like a bee drawn home to honey. Despite the destructive nature of his hands, he wants so badly, so selfishly, to put them on Remus anyway. Not only that, but Remus is asking him to, and there's genuinely nothing Sirius wouldn't give him if he wants it.

Slowly, Sirius lifts his hands and slides them up the sides of Remus' arms, flexing his fingers into the gray cloth that covers them, even though he should be gentle. He isn't sure if his hands know how to do that anymore, but Remus doesn't seem to mind, at least. He's just watching Sirius with half-lidded eyes, heavy and drooping like he's relaxed.

Easing up, Sirius gets to the shoulders next, feeling the broad line of them and up into the curve of his neck before pushing down to his upper back, pressing fingers into his shoulder blades, internally freaking the fuck out at the firm muscles under his hands. He drags back up and over, breath stuttering as he slides his palms down Remus' collarbones, then his chest until it meets with Sirius' own. Again, he slips right back up to go back to each curve of Remus' neck, clamping down on his bottom lip as his fingers find their way up into Remus' hair.

Remus is watching him, still, and the lazy gaze is somehow obscene. It's like Sirius is indulging in some secret, hedonistic pleasure while Remus observes with mild, suppressed interest. There's no reason for it to seem like Remus is a voyeur when Sirius is simply touching him, and yet that's how it feels.

Helplessly, Sirius' fingers tremble as they rake through Remus' hair. He's fascinated by the feeling, and even more so by the way Remus' eyes flutter shut ever so briefly, his lips parting around a soft sigh. Sirius' stomach promptly erupts with butterflies, and his whole face goes hot.

"Why are you blushing?" Remus asks, low and amused.

"I don't know," Sirius mumbles, and he just knows he's blushing even harder now. "Just...you. This. It's intimate."

Remus hums. "Imagine how I feel. No one's touched me without causing me pain in five years."

"I would never hurt you," Sirius says immediately, an automatic response, reflexive and instinctive like breathing. He can inhale and exhale that promise; exist with it, like it's a necessity to life, because it is.

"I believe that," Remus murmurs.

Sirius feels his chest tighten, but in a good way, strangely enough. He ruffles Remus' hair gently. "Does it feel good?"

"It's calming, with you," Remus tells him.

They fall quiet as Sirius slides his hands out of Remus' hair and carefully drags his fingers down the sides of his neck before slipping to the front. He gently presses a thumb into Remus' Adam's apple, to which Remus dutifully hums, low and deep, so Sirius can feel the vibrations of it. Sirius' lips curl up, pleased, and Remus looks so endeared by him.

Next is the jaw and cheeks. Sirius cups the first in both palms, then cradles the second while tenderly brushing his thumbs under Remus' eyes. He keeps doing that, feeling a rush of emotion from the sight of Remus' face held in his hands. He's precious. He's lovely. He's glorious.

"Remus," Sirius whispers.

"Hm?" is Remus' equally quiet response.

"You're achingly beautiful, do you know that?" Sirius asks softly, running his gaze all over Remus' face. This means he gets to see in perfect detail how Remus' eyes flick down, his lips curving up, a bashful response that only becomes more apparent when Sirius feels Remus' cheeks heat up under his hands. A blush glows between his fingers, highlighting freckles that Sirius is eager to trace. "Oh, you liked that, did you? Who's blushing now, Remus, hm? Go on, tell me—"

Remus props himself up to reach around Sirius' arm, covering his mouth to muffle his teasing and breathless laughter. Sirius grins against his palm, using his own hands to gently push at Remus' (still warm) cheeks, making his face pucker a bit.

"Smug bastard," Remus grumbles as he moves his hand, but he doesn't go very far, leaving his palm cupping Sirius' cheek. There's a smile on his face, one he's trying to pretend isn't there, but Sirius has it caught between his hands.

"Let me have this. I'm always the one blushing. It's nice to know I can make you do it, too," Sirius teases.

"Is it?"

"My greatest achievement, honestly."

Remus chuckles and gazes down at him with unbridled affection, doing nothing to hide it at all. It makes Sirius melt a little bit, his insides turning to soup. He can't help it; Remus just makes him feel—well, everything, really. The whole spectrum of emotion, things that Sirius didn't even know it was possible to actually experience, and Remus can gift it to him with something as simple as a look.

"What?" Remus asks when Sirius huffs out a soft laugh.

"Oh, you have me all wrapped around your finger," Sirius informs him shamelessly.

"Is that so?"

"So it is."

Remus arches an eyebrow at him. "Are you only just working this out now?"

"You know, Remus, you could save a man the embarrassment of being so painfully obvious," Sirius mutters with no true heat to his words.

"There's no saving you from that, I'm afraid," Remus says solemnly, and Sirius laughs so much that he snorts inelegantly and shakes the bed as he wheezes. It can't be a pretty sight, frankly, and yet Remus gazes down at him and announces, "You're beautiful too, you know."

Sirius' laughter cuts out, already breathless when Remus steals his breath by saying so. It makes his heart flutter and his stomach swoop, a fuzzy feeling that's not at all unpleasant forming in the tips of his fingers, even where they're still draped over Remus' cheeks. He lifts one hand to carefully connect the distance between Remus' freckles under his eyes.

Remus' eyes are so lovely, brown like a sequoia tree and amber when the light hits it just right. Sirius remembers the first time he saw those eyes, the way it was like missing a step on the stairs, something inside of him lurching. Everything had stopped when those eyes locked with his, and it happens again here and now. Sirius feels that little lurch in him, like the ground just gave way beneath him, and he can't help but fall.

Not for the first time, Remus' gaze drops to Sirius' mouth, eyes glazing over, and then he's leaning in, and then Sirius is blurting out, "I need to brush my teeth," like the biggest idiot on the planet while his heart attempts to evacuate his chest right up through his fucking throat.

"You—" Remus blinks, some sort of clarity coming back to his eyes, then he starts laughing. He hangs his head forward, pressing it to Sirius' chest, forcing Sirius to sort of just cup his ears, mildly bemused. It takes a second for Remus to regain his composure, and then he lifts his head with a broad smile and sparkling eyes. "Right, of course. I'll let you go do that. I need to start breakfast anyway."

Sirius' face is on fire. "Can I, um, help you with breakfast when I get out of the shower, if you aren't already finished?"

"You can come stand next to me and look pretty, how's that?" Remus teases, still grinning at him.

"Perfect," Sirius says with a snort. "Finally, something I'm good at."

"You're good at a lot more than that, but you are good at that, yes," Remus muses, sounding fond. He leans down with no warning and brushes a kiss against Sirius' cheek, just a faint pressure that's a blink-and-you-miss-it sort of thing.

Regardless, Sirius makes a humiliating sound in response and goes hot from his hairline to his navel, no doubt flushing more than he ever has. Remus has already drawn back, and the only smug bastard here is him. He looks very pleased with himself as he rolls off of Sirius and right out of bed, telling him oh so casually to meet him in the kitchen when he's finished.

As soon as Remus is gone, Sirius turns over and proceeds to bite his pillow, then muffles a scream into it for good measure. He's never felt so much all at once in his life.

He's also never been happier.

~•~

Regulus wakes up to a hand carding through his hair and a warm chest rising and falling under his cheek. Even before he's properly awake, he knows that it's James.

He knows James just by hand alone. By the time he was fourteen, he had memorized the shape of James' hands, just because James' hands felt like a brand every time he deemed to touch Regulus. There was nothing like James' hand on his arm when he was fourteen; he could have powered entire cities from the way he just lit the fuck up, the energy it gave him, how utterly giddy he was. James could touch him once, just casually, and Regulus would think about it for three days, revisiting how it felt, how it made him feel, over and over until the next time James did something else.

Regulus, to put it simply, was a pathetic teenager with a crush so painfully obvious that it could be seen from space. James knew. Regulus knew that he knew, even if it wasn't confirmed out loud until last night. They never said anything, but James would hint at it a few times when Sirius wasn't around, and Regulus would get helplessly flustered and shy, because back then, the scariest thing he could think of was James laughing at how pathetic he was. Then, well, Sirius went into the arena, and nothing was scarier than that.

Ten years later, and James' hands are different, much bigger now, but Regulus still knows them. He knows the way James' pinky curves, and the blunt, square shape of his nails, and the warmth carried in the crevices of his palms. The way they make him feel—well, that's different, too. Regulus isn't a pathetic teenager anymore, so he won't be powering any cities or running laps around the world, but he's a pathetic adult who pretends to be asleep for longer than he actually is just so he can keep basking in how unfortunately good it still feels.

There's also just—it's just, when he does drag himself up, the reality of the day is going to sink in, and Regulus isn't ready for it yet. Like this, with James, he gets to escape. It's safe here, with James' steady heartbeat under his ear.

"I know you're awake," James says, because he's terrible, and oh, right, Regulus hates him.

"No, I'm not," Regulus mumbles.

James chuckles, the vibrations of it against Regulus' cheek. It shakes him a bit where he's laying all over James' chest with little care to how he ended up there. "Oh, sure."

Regulus doesn't respond, keeping his eyes closed as he breathes in and out, trying to stay in this state of calm he knows better than to take for granted. He's helplessly grateful for the fact that James' hand still pushes through his hair in a repetitive motion, in the same exact pattern that matches the rise and fall of his chest. Honestly, Regulus could drift off to sleep again just like this, if he weren't so determined to feel every inch of how relaxed he is at the moment.

It's a bit pathetic that Regulus hasn't slept so well in—years, honestly, but especially not since his name was called. He hates that he slept like a fucking baby just because James was with him last night, all wrapped around him, holding on like he might never let go. He's still holding onto him now, in fact, his free arm looped over Regulus' back. He will have to let go eventually, but Regulus isn't ready for that either.

"Did you know," James murmurs, "you talk in your sleep?"

"No, I don't."

"You do. That's how I woke up. I was moving around a bit, trying to get comfortable, and you told me to piss off."

"Alright," Regulus says, "so maybe I do."

"Of course, when I did try to piss off, you rolled over and latched onto me like a limpet," James tells him, and Regulus can hear the smile in his voice. "I'd assumed you were kicking me out of your bed, but you were just trying to get me to stop moving. You're very grumpy, you know, even in your sleep."

Regulus grunts, refusing to be embarrassed by literally anything to do with James anymore. "If you don't shut it, I will kick you out of my bed. Literally."

"Adorable," James muses with a soft laugh, because he always has the audacity. "That's what you are. Just adorable—and clingy, too. I didn't really see that one coming."

"No."

"I can respect your determination to deny this, even while you're literally clinging to me."

"I hate you," Regulus announces with a heavy sigh, peeling his eyes open as he starts to shift away, as much as he despises it.

"Wait, wait, no, don't do that. Sorry, I'm sorry, we don't have to talk about it," James blurts out quickly, reaching out to drag him right back in, blowing out a deep breath when Regulus slumps against him once more. "I was just teasing, Reg, I promise. We can pretend it's not happening."

"Better," Regulus praises, settling back down.

"Just—if we were talking about it," James continues, because of course he does, "I would tell you that I really, really don't mind. Actually, I'm quite pleased about it, so—"

"James," Regulus snaps, shifting against him to raise up a bit and glare at him. This doesn't get the response he was expecting, honestly. He was prepared for apologies, or maybe a lazy grin, or further earnest commentary. He doesn't expect James to inhale sharply as he goes still, eyes slightly wide.

"You might want to watch where you're sliding your knee, love," James says weakly, a strain in his voice. He pointedly shifts his hips away as he reaches to push Regulus' leg down.

Regulus looks down, then looks back up, his face blank and his voice flat as he says, "Really, James?"

"I—well, sorry, but I can't help it," James sputters, looking flustered in a heartbeat. "It's just—you know, a natural bodily response, alright? I'm in bed with someone warm, and you smell really nice, and your skin is soft, and so is your hair, and it's—I mean, it's you, quite literally the person I've been daydreaming about since I was fifteen, so you'll have to forgive me for being...happy about it."

"You know," Regulus says thoughtfully, "there's some sort of poetic symmetry to this. I used to get off to fantasies about you all the time."

James' eyes sink shut. "Please don't talk about getting off."

"Hm." Regulus studies him for a long moment, feeling the shape of a mischievous thought take form in his mind. It's an idea, really. An indulgence, and frankly, he basically owes it to his fourteen year old self, who would have a fucking heart attack if he knew this would one day happen to him. Less than ideal circumstances, broadly speaking, but still. "It's just, well, believe it or not, one of my fantasies started just like this."

"Did it?" James asks, his voice low as he opens his eyes to gaze at Regulus, heavy-lidded. He can hear the shift in Regulus' voice, no doubt, the suggestive undertone to it.

"Mhm," Regulus confirms. "Me and you in bed together, only just waking up, our bodies close. Don't know how we ended up there, but to be honest, the details didn't really matter." He taps his fingers to the middle of James' chest, then starts sliding his hand down. James' gaze snaps to the motion, tracking it. "Of course, it was always you touching me in the fantasy, because I was just a bit too shy back then."

"Less shy now," James mumbles, gaze locked onto where Regulus' hand slips further down his stomach.

"Well, you know, with experience comes less reasons to be shy," Regulus muses, fingers flirting with the edges of James' waistband.

"Experience?" James says, gaze flitting up. "With—let me guess, Barty?"

James says Barty's name with heavy derision. Regulus became close with Barty when he was seventeen, when they both tried to buy the same chicken from Mrs. Fibbs. They'd gotten into an argument over the chicken (Regulus was having a hard time, what with his brother moved out and avoiding him, and Barty is just always up for an altercation), and then Barty made a comment during the argument about Regulus having a pretty mouth ("I don't give a toss how pretty your mouth is, Black; nothing is making me give up this chicken," were his exact words), which somehow led to Regulus responding very suggestively ("My mouth could do things that would have you buying, killing, cooking, and feeding me this chicken, Crouch, so tread carefully," was his response), and that inevitably led to them trading blowjobs less than twenty minutes later.

All that is to say, they became fast friends. They'd dated for about two months, but it never seemed to work out, mostly because Regulus was dealing with too much to care about handling a relationship and Barty was too enticed by all the other people he could also be with to really give it his all. They came to a compromise that worked well for both of them, one in which they had sex when they wanted to, didn't when they didn't, and there were no strings attached.

Above all, they were friends. By the time they reached twenty-one, the sex had slowed down a lot, and they certainly don't do it as much anymore, usually just enjoying getting to spend time together as friends, too uninterested or lazy to get off together the way they used to.

James never liked Barty. Whenever he came around and Barty was there, he would get agitated. Knowing that James had (and apparently still has) feelings for him, that makes sense.

"Oh, yeah, we've done all sorts of filthy things together," Regulus admits, smiling sharply. "Jealous?"

"Yes," James says bluntly, holding his gaze.

"You poor thing," Regulus replies softly, clicking his tongue, and then he curls his fingers in James' waistband to snap it against his skin. James jolts a little, inhaling sharply yet again, and Regulus laughs quietly. "Like you never had anyone. You kissed a girl right in front of me when I was thirteen. Just about broke my heart, you did."

"Tracy," James murmurs, because of course he remembers the name of the first person he kissed at fourteen.

Regulus hums. "Yes, that one. And then you dated Renee when you were fifteen. I overheard you talking about what you did with her to Sirius. I handled that better, at the age of fourteen, sort of. Then, well, it was a while before you got with anyone else, I think, but then again, I wasn't paying attention."

"Ravi was next," James informs him. "I was nineteen, and I liked them a lot, just...not enough to get over you. Then there was Holly, then Saxon, then Wellis, then I gave up when I realized no one was going to make me feel the way I did when I caught a glimpse of you."

"Ran off with your heart, did I?"

"And didn't even look back. Return it, would you?"

"Mm, I don't think I will. I think I've earned it after all those years you spent holding onto mine," Regulus says lightly.

James quirks a sad smile. "I suppose that's fair. I should have been more careful with it while I had it. Maybe then I wouldn't be so empty-handed now."

"Poor, poor baby," Regulus whispers, tutting at him, and he once again pops James' waistband. This time, he dips the tips of his fingers inside just a small bit and eases them right back out, watching James take a deep, steadying breath. "Empty hands and unfulfilled fantasies; it's all very tragic, isn't it?"

"Just tragic," James breathes out, catching his bottom lip between his teeth.

"That's us—a great, big tragedy," Regulus tells him. He dips his fingers in again, just a bit, and leaves them there. "Can't change that now, but the empty hands and unfulfilled fantasies —well, we can do something about those."

"What are you doing?" James asks, his voice rough.

Regulus arches an eyebrow. "Do you want me to stop?"

"No," James blurts out, "but I'd like to know why."

"I'll tell you when it's over," Regulus says, holding his gaze. James' pupils are blown. "Are you alright with that?"

James looks at him for a long moment, exhaling shakily, and then he gives a frantic nod. With that, Regulus pushes his fingers up James' chest to slip around the curve of his neck. Gently, he tugs on James, encouraging him to shift closer.

Regulus guides James' face into his shoulder at the same time he slots his thigh between James' legs. He can feel James' breath stutter against the curve of his neck, and one of James' hands reach out to settle on Regulus' hip not pressed into the bed, his fingers flexing and bunching up the soft cotton of Regulus' shirt. Regulus closes his eyes and turns his face into James' hair, sliding his free hand back down James' chest slowly as he carefully, with a practiced motion, grips James by his waistband and starts tugging to encourage his hips to move.

"Shit," James whispers breathlessly, his free hand snapping out to grab the front of Regulus' shirt, gripping it hard. His other hand tightens on Regulus' hip.

Regulus clamps his teeth together and forces himself to exhale slowly, a full-body shiver winding up at the base of his spine. He ignores it, because it's one thing to indulge his inner little idiot who was obsessed with any and all things James Potter, but it's something else entirely when it's affecting him in the present. James stopped affecting him when he was fifteen years old, and Regulus isn't willing to let that change now.

Because that's the thing. Regulus genuinely moved on from James, left all that idiocy over him in the past, and grew to hate him instead. That's real. It's not a lie; everything Regulus ever felt for James twisted and grew thorns, until this is who he is, unrecognizable to who he used to be. Regulus takes comfort in that.

But, well, it is sex. He can't be blamed for responding. James is infuriatingly warm, and the quiet sounds he's starting to make sends a very naughty portion of Regulus' brain into overdrive. He bites down on his bottom lip hard to stay quiet, refusing to deviate from what he's doing. He breathes in and out, forcing himself to calm down.

"Mm, there you go," Regulus murmurs in approval the moment James' hips start shifting, fully just grinding against his thigh, which means Regulus can stop pulling on his waistband, making James work for it on his own. James groans into Regulus' shoulder, moving almost mindlessly, his breathing erratic.

"Fuck," James chokes out, and then he just—whines. Regulus squeezes his eyes shut as his mind turns to static, that whine the one remaining thing reverberating within his skull. That's bullshit. No one should sound that fucking good; that's just not fair. "I—Regulus. Regulus."

James says his name like it's the only word that has meaning. His voice is rough, and Regulus' name is sloppy and desperate in his mouth, like a hail mary or a form of salvation.

Regulus slips his hand under James' shirt, which would have been a dream come true once upon a time. Regrettably, he's still finding it to be fucking amazing, because James really is fit. Helplessly, he runs his fingers over James' skin, mapping out every bump and divot of James' stomach and chest.

James' hips twitch and curl, his fingers flexing on Regulus where they hold on, and then he's abruptly running his hands all over Regulus wherever he can reach. In his hair, over his shoulders, up his sides; he's greedy about it, desperate like he can't get enough. His head tilts up, mouth grazing Regulus' jaw, breath hot and stuttered against Regulus' skin.

"Regulus? Please?" James breathes out, and Regulus couldn't miss what he's asking for if he tried. James is really obvious about it, making his way to Regulus' mouth and waiting with what seems to be immeasurable restraint to kiss him.

Yeah, no, Regulus isn't doing that. He wouldn't kiss James Potter to save his own life, and he doesn't care how inviting James' mouth looks at the moment; it's not happening. The atmosphere is getting to him, obviously. It's the heat, the feeling of James' body against his own and under his hands, the soft moans that spill out of James' mouth. For fuck's sake, he sounds like sin. That should be illegal.

Regulus doesn't flat-out say no, but he doesn't quite say yes either. He comes up with a compromise for them both, one he's quite sure is safer than a kiss. He tilts his head and offers James his neck to attack at his leisure, mistakenly assuming that this won't have much of an impact at all.

That's before James takes the offering like it's a gift, tipping forward eagerly with a groan to get his mouth on Regulus' throat. He's so gentle about it at first, just soft and sweet kisses that Regulus can mostly ignore, but with each roll of his hips, he grows bolder. Regulus doesn't even notice it's happening until it's suddenly happening, and then James is lavishing at his skin like that's all he's ever wanted to do.

Obviously Regulus has had something similar happen to him before—Barty is a good lover, there's no denying that—but he'll be damned if James isn't just better.

Regulus has to catch his bottom lip between his teeth harder than ever to stay quiet, doing his absolute best to concentrate, and it's not fucking working because James' mouth is—his mouth is—it's really, really—

James muffles a groan into his throat, breathing hard as his hips start to stutter, and Regulus forces himself to shake it off and get back on track. He blinks hard and swallows, then slides his free hand up into James' hair, holding him in place as he slips his other hand from under James' shirt, raking his nails gently down James' abdomen as he goes, which earns him a full-body shiver. Humming, Regulus dips his hand into the front of James' trousers and pants, once again snapping his waistband against his skin.

James' hips jerk, pressing harder into his thigh, no finesse. Just eager in the pursuit of his own pleasure. He whimpers, and really, Regulus is going to need him to stop immediately and never do it again. He's never been so desperate to taste a sound before in his life, and he is not about to kiss James for anything in this world. Absolutely not.

"Regulus," James gasps out, pressing one trembling hand into Regulus' hair and dragging the other down to paw at his side, desperately trying to get him closer. "This feels—you feel—it's so good. I'm—I—"

"I know," Regulus murmurs. "Keep going. Don't stop. Fantasy fulfilled, and—well, our hands certainly aren't empty anymore. Come on, James, just one last thing."

"What? Anything. You can have—oh, oh, fuck." James whimpers and curls up, his fingers tightening in Regulus' hair.

"You're already going to give me what I want," Regulus tells him, and James groans like he's been wounded.

"What? What do you—" James cuts himself off, going taut all over, choking out a moan that sounds a lot like Regulus' name.

"You're close enough as it is, and I'm just here to watch," Regulus whispers in his ear. "Show me, James."

"Shit, fuck, Regulus, Regulus—" James shows him, alright. He arches up and shakes all over, and Regulus begins moving his leg to work James through it, listening to James whine and gasp his name like a prayer.

Regulus doesn't stop until James is gasping for air, clinging to him and trembling as he goes boneless against him. For a moment, Regulus closes his eyes and turns his face into James' hair, breathing him in, and then he snaps his eyes open and pulls away, letting James fall back.

James spills out on the bed like a puddle, his eyes closed and his mouth slack as he settles. It takes him only a second to blink open his eyes, looking absolutely amazed.

"Fucking hell, Regulus," James breathes out in a croak, reaching up to shove a shaking hand into his own hair. He blows out a deep breath. "That was—it was—am I dreaming? Did that actually happen?"

"It happened."

"Why did it happen?"

"Because you might die today," Regulus tells him bluntly, shrugging one shoulder as he stands up. "Consider it a parting gift. Now, get out."

Before James can so much as respond, Regulus turns on his heel to go get his clothes and head off to have a shower. He shuts the door behind him and locks it, waiting for the distant sound of the door to his room to be closed, signaling that James has, in fact, got out. Then, and only then, does Regulus turn on and climb into the shower.

Under the hot beat of water, Regulus takes himself into his hand and wrings out an orgasm so intensely good that he braces his arm along the wall and bites down on it to muffle the whimpers that spill out of his mouth. It's not a fantasy of James that gets him there, like it once would have been.

This time, it's a memory.

~•~

"James?"

With a jolt, James blinks and snaps his gaze towards Remus, who is pulling toast out of the toaster, the final touches of breakfast; a grand breakfast with nearly every option in the world available; the last proper breakfast James will have.

Remus is looking at him in what seems to be genuine concern, but there's no surprise. It's as if it makes complete sense for James to be distant and quiet, a little dazed and lost in his own head, as if it's perfectly fair and expected because of what's waiting for him today. The arena, more accurately, and that's definitely something that's going to weigh on James as soon as the reality of it gets closer and starts to sink in—but, really, the cause for his distraction is Regulus.

Perhaps it's stupid to be fixated on what happened, considering everything else he's going to be dealing with today, but honestly? James sort of prefers this. For one, it's certainly a more pleasant alternative—a little death is favored over a bigger, more permanent one. Though, if this little death Regulus has given—has gifted—to him is an omen of what's to come in the arena...well, James is well and truly fucked.

It's just—it felt so fucking good, and it was, to him, wildly confusing, but endlessly worth it, and even if he's still puzzling over it with whatever brain that didn't leak out of his ears, he doesn't need to fully make sense of it to know he's so, so fucking grateful that it happened.

He is puzzling over it, though. In fact, to him, it's a real head-scratcher. He just doesn't think that someone who hates him would do...that. Like, literally any of it, certainly not the way Regulus did it, not even in a kind gesture of some sort due to impending doom. A parting gift, Regulus had said. Well, it was a lovely gift, but someone who hates him wouldn't be giving him a gift at all, not even if he was actually dying right in front of them. Regulus is a conundrum, honestly.

James just can't figure him out. He knows Regulus hates him; he's been dealing with that for years. He knows Regulus used to have a crush on him; he's been dealing with that for years also. But this? This is new.

James isn't entirely sure what to do, or think, about it. Hence all the spacing out, glazed eyes, and uncharacteristic silence. Nice of Remus to show that he cares, though.

"Yeah, I'm fine," James says reflexively, and he realizes belatedly that Remus is going to know that this is a lie, because there's no possible way he's fine today. He settles for something a little more honest. "I mean, not really, but it hasn't...hit me yet, I think."

"It's not going to," Sirius announces as he sweeps into the kitchen, and James immediately drops his gaze for...so many reasons. For one thing, he's scared to look at Sirius, because if Sirius shows even the least bit of upset on his face for what's to come, James will fucking lose it. For another, Sirius' little brother just got him off less than thirty minutes ago, and James isn't planning on telling him, mostly because he's going to die soon enough, so he can get away with taking it to his grave. Oblivious to all of this, Sirius continues to speak as he moves in the room. "It likely won't hit you until you're about to go up, or maybe until you actually get up there. It didn't hit me until the countdown finished and the cannon sounded."

Carefully, James picks his gaze back up, letting it crawl higher until he can see Sirius move past Remus, a hand pressed to the small of his back as he goes by. The touch is visibly light, but not hesitant, and Remus' lips curl up. Did they…?

Well, maybe—despite everything—they've all had a nice morning. James isn't going to think about it too hard. Instead, he's just grateful for what's clearly good developments for his best friend. He doesn't need to know the details, since it won't really matter anyway, and he's not sharing his own very good developments either. Just—good for them. All of them.

On the last day before everything changes for good, James is so fucking thankful to have something positive to cling to.

"What's going to happen?" James asks, bravely looking at Sirius' face, relieved to find that he looks—calm. Sort of. It's a facade, James can tell, but it's one they can both use to ignore what's really underneath. "Right before, I mean."

Sirius exhales as he pours himself some juice. "Is Reggie up yet? I want him to hear this."

"He's in the shower," James says, then snaps his mouth shut so violently that his teeth click together. Sirius' gaze flits to him, latching on to study him, and James tries so hard not to fidget or shift restlessly. He ends up doing both, and Sirius slowly puts the juice aside, tilting his chin up as he arches an eyebrow at him. "Um. It's—I mean."

"Why," Sirius says slowly, with the dramatic pause and everything, "do you sound so sure about that?"

James could lie. He could say he just walked by Regulus' room, paused to poke his head in, and heard the shower going. It would be easy to let the words slip past his lips—except it's Sirius, and James would feel so guilty about it, and Sirius would see right through him anyway. James just stares at him, utterly defenseless in this moment, and the only thing he can think to do is look to Remus for help, almost instinctively.

Remus—oh, Remus is a fucking angel, is what he is. He shifts rather abruptly and slides his hand up Sirius' back in a would-be casual way, if not for the fact that Sirius immediately straightens up with a sharp inhale and focuses right on him, distracted in an instant. Easily, like he doesn't have a care in the world, Remus picks up an apple slice off the plate of fruit on the counter, holding it up to Sirius' mouth.

"I sprinkled a bit of cinnamon on some of these, just to see if it would be good. Try it for me and tell me what you think, would you?" Remus asks lightly.

"I—what?" Sirius rasps.

"I want your opinion," Remus tells him, holding the apple slice closer, a tiny smile on his face.

"Oh, I—from your—you want me to—" Sirius genuinely can't seem to string a sentence together, the poor thing, and Remus just puts him out of his misery by nudging the apple slice forward, gently resting it against his mouth. Almost like a reflex, Sirius bites into it, the crunch making him jolt, and then he blinks as he chews. His eyebrows are furrowed when he swallows. "Oh, wait, actually… Remus, that's good."

"I thought they might be," Remus muses, looking pleased, and he pops the remaining piece of the apple slice in his mouth, chewing it with a twinkle in his eye.

Sirius makes a noise, quiet and muffled. James tucks his lips in and ducks his head, struggling not to laugh. Remus Lupin. If there's one good thing to come out of all this, it's him.

"Oh, lovely, we're all here," Pandora announces in what is obviously forced cheer as she comes into the kitchen, Regulus trailing after her without a word.

James wouldn't be able to stop himself from looking right at Regulus if he tried, but he doesn't bother to try. It's sort of invigorating that Regulus is already looking back, not shying away from his gaze in the least. The exchanged look feels charged, at least to James, like they're both thinking of what happened this morning at the same time, a silent acknowledgement that James can feel like a tangible touch. It's warm in the kitchen, and James still shivers.

Remus clears his throat. Loudly. "Good morning, Pandora, Regulus. Sirius was just about to explain something important, but he was waiting on you, Regulus."

"Sorry," Regulus says, not sounding sorry at all, "I was in the shower." Sirius purses his lips, darting a glance towards James, but he doesn't comment. "What's this about?"

"I asked what would happen. Like, right before the arena," James explains.

Sirius heaves a sigh. "You'll both be with me until you have to go. They'll lead you into a Hallow heli-carrier and fly you off, then you'll be in separate rooms. No one close to you can be with you in there. Someone will come in to inject a tiny device in your arm that tracks everything to do with you. This means your vitals, your position in the arena, things such as that. It will hurt, just a bit, but you'll forget it quickly. They'll leave, and someone will speak over an intercom to tell you to get changed in the clothes provided for the arena. You'll have a few minutes, ten at most, and then you'll be instructed to step into the tube that will close behind you and raise the platform you're on to take you right into the arena. Do not step off that platform before the countdown finishes and the cannon sounds, or you'll be blown up."

"What if I trip and fall off of it?" James asks, eyes wide.

"Don't," Sirius replies, lips pressing into a thin line.

At the uncomfortable silence, Pandora clears her throat. "I'd like to be there with you as well, of course, but I have to go home for a few days, so I—I won't get to see either of you off. But that's—it's alright. I'll have breakfast with all of you before I go. Let's just—let's have a nice breakfast together, yeah?"

James' heart breaks a little at the quake in her voice. She's trying so very hard to sound light and unaffected, but it's clear that she's very emotional at the moment. Pandora does a lot for them, almost as much as Sirius, and James has come to appreciate her—more than that, he's grown fond of her. She's warm and kind and funny, and she gets a little fussy sometimes because she obviously cares about them, and it's blatant just how much she cares about them now. She looks like she's about to cry. The smile on her face trembles.

They do make an attempt to have a good—last—breakfast together, possibly just for Pandora's sake. But, sadly, at the table is an unwelcome guest; the unspoken knowledge of death that hangs over two of them. Pandora chatters nonstop, praising Remus for the food, talking about meaningless things like if she stops, she'll never find her voice again. Sirius barely eats, mostly just having the apple slices. Regulus and James likely wouldn't eat either—hard to have an appetite when time is running out—but Sirius insists that they tuck in.

"You need to eat for your strength, and for running, and for—a lot things," Sirius mumbles. "Trust me, you'll wish you had."

So, James and Regulus eat. Despite the fact that James is overly aware that this is the last meal he'll have outside of the arena, he can't bring himself to enjoy it at all. It tastes like ash that coats his teeth and leaves an acrid burn in the back of his throat. It's hard to swallow each bite and harder still to keep it down. He forces himself, though, closing his eyes and wishing with everything in him that he was back home, eating the warm and hearty soup that his parents would make for him or Sirius when they weren't feeling well. Mum, Dad, I'm not feeling well, James thinks and struggles not to throw up.

By the end of breakfast, silence has fallen, and no one's eating anymore. Pandora is staring down at her half-empty plate with a thick sheen of tears over her eyes. Yet, they do not fall. She takes a steadying breath and pushes to her feet, and everyone follows suit to see her off.

At the door, Pandora turns to James and reaches out without warning to cup his face in her hands. It's a startlingly gentle gesture, and for some reason, it makes James feel smaller. She's shorter than him, almost comically so, but he abruptly feels no bigger than a child standing before her.

"I am—" Pandora's voice catches, and she pauses to release a shaky breath, sliding her hands down to grip his shoulders. "James, I am so grateful to know you, and so sorry that I had to. Every name that I call is a name I wish I never learned. Yours—you—will remain etched into my heart forever."

"I forgive you, you know," James murmurs, watching her eyes shine with more unshed tears. "I know better than to shoot the messenger, Pandora. You've been so kind while delivering it."

Pandora swallows harshly and tugs him into a fierce hug. In his ear, she whispers, "I know what you're going to do, James. For them. For Regulus and Sirius—and yourself. You are so, so brave. I'm sorry. I'm so sorry."

James' eyes sink shut, and he tucks his face down against her hair, inherently comforted by her preemptive grief. It feels like he means something, like his impact on the world and the people in it carries weight he can be proud of. She squeezes him, and he squeezes her back. Her hair smells like lemons.

As she pulls away, James wonders how she knows. Sirius and James haven't breathed a word of it, and he knows neither of them ever would. Pandora holds his gaze as she draws back, and she gives him a tiny, watery smile. James returns it, suddenly sure that it doesn't matter how she knows. Maybe she's known for some time now, working it out herself, and she won't put a name to this, not daring to speak it. She's the reaper. When she speaks of something with a name, death follows, and he's so grateful she's not encouraging this to die.

When Pandora turns to face Regulus, he shakes his head and says, his voice tight, "No. Don't. There's no need."

"I know," Pandora says softly, and Regulus looks so startled by this. She smiles. "I'll see you again soon, Regulus."

Regulus' breath hitches, his eyes widening before they dart to James, like he can't believe she just insinuated what she has. That Regulus will be back, that he'll win, and James will not. No one, not once, has outright said anything of the sort.

Pandora reaches out and grabs Regulus' hand, squeezing it only for one second, and then she drops it to turn and pull Sirius in a hug. She holds him for a long time, even longer than she held James, and no word passes between them, but when she cups his cheek, he nods and she nods back. Lastly, Pandora breaks the somber mood by facing Remus and asking if she could hug him too, so he won't feel left out.

Remus agrees with a quiet huff of laughter, possibly only because it's lightening the mood, making James chuckle and Regulus' lips curl up and Sirius' eyes—previously devoid of any spark—light up in delight. Pandora hugs Remus, but doesn't linger very long, which seems to keep him at ease.

After Pandora leaves, they don't have very long at all. Remus goes to clean up the kitchen, and Sirius just sits with James and Regulus in silence as they wait. None of them can really bring themselves to say anything.

There's far too much to say to even try.

~•~

Sirius wants to rewind time, selfishly, to this morning when he and Remus were in bed together, when Sirius hadn't let himself think about what this day was, when—for the first time in a long time—he let himself be happy, unhindered.

Time continues on anyway, a cruel mistress that won't let up. Here he stands before his best friend and little brother just moments before they will leave him to go face down death, and he doesn't know what to say. He doesn't know where to start.

There's too much with both of them.

James. James. James, James, James. His best friend. The air in his lungs. The one he needed when nothing else would suffice. The one who helped him when living was the hardest thing to do. If not for James, there would be no Sirius now, and it still feels that way. Even on the brink, Sirius can't let himself accept it, what James plans to do. He thinks it doesn't matter, in the long run. No James equals no Sirius. If he stops breathing, all the oxygen will dry up in Sirius' lungs, and he won't ever take a breath again.

Regulus. Reg, Reggie, his baby brother. His heart, and all the fractures in it. The one he would have gladly died for, and proved so. The one he lived for, even when it came at the cost of remembering how to live at all. They have too much between them, and at times, not enough. It all went wrong, and Sirius wishes with everything in him that they could make it right, but he doesn't know if they'll ever manage to. Ten years ago, Sirius returned with a broken heart, and he learned to live with that. If Regulus' heart stops beating, the fractures in Sirius' heart will crack too wide, and it'll never beat again.

"Regulus Black."

It's some sort of horrible irony that Regulus' name is called first to be taken away. Sirius' hand snaps out immediately to latch onto his arm, holding onto him as he holds his breath. Regulus looks away from the Auror waiting on him to look at Sirius instead, pale and wide-eyed. He looks so scared, so small. Sirius' little brother. Always his little brother.

"Sirius," Regulus whispers, his voice a mere breath.

And Sirius can't let him go. He can't. He. It's not working. He knows he has to; he knows how bad things will be for all of them if he doesn't, but he can't peel his fingers away. His grip on Regulus is desperate, bruising, and he can't let go.

The Auror steps forward, hand on their gun on their hip, and James steps forward as well, snapping, "Give them a moment. For fuck's sake, that's his brother."

James could be talking about either of them. As much as Regulus is Sirius' brother, Sirius is Regulus'. An equal exchange. An instinctive, familial possession. It's in their blood; that simple truth. Mine. James puts his body between them like a shield, like he'll protect that truth with sinew and bone. His back is to them, and Sirius has never felt so scared and so safe all at once before.

"Sirius," Regulus says again, more frantic and distressed this time. He's shaking, and Sirius knows how to do this, how to put everything aside, his own fears and needs, just to comfort his little brother. To be steady and strong for him.

"It's okay. You're going to be okay," Sirius rasps, his voice thick, and he tugs on Regulus' arm to pull him into his own. They haven't hugged in ten years, but Regulus folds into him like ten years haven't passed at all, like he's still just a child slumping into the safety of his brother's arms.

Regulus' voice is small when he chokes out, "I don't want to go."

"I know," Sirius croaks, his eyes squeezing shut as he cups the back of Regulus' head. The confession wrenches at his chest, making him feel like he's being ripped in half, because he can't take his brother's place this time. "I know, Reggie."

"I don't want to die," Regulus breathes out, the words muffled into Sirius' shoulder. That doesn't stop them from being soul-shattering. Regulus is clinging to Sirius just like he did when he was fifteen and it was Sirius who was leaving. He'd said the same things then, too, just for Sirius. I don't want you to go, he'd said. I don't want you to die.

I won't, Regulus. I promise I won't, Sirius had vowed, and then he didn't. He refused. Sirius shouldn't make the same promises for Regulus, because he has no way of knowing, and yet.

"You won't," Sirius tells him anyway. "I promise you won't."

"Regulus Black." Again, the Auror makes their demand, and it's clearly the last warning.

A shuddering breath escapes Regulus, and he's abruptly ripping himself right out of Sirius' arms. Sirius tries to grab him again, unable to fathom letting him go, but Regulus jerks away. His face is like stone, and he looks at Sirius for only one moment, just a mere breath. In that breath, Sirius thinks I love you, and he can't make the words leave his mouth on an exhale before Regulus is walking away with the Auror.

There's never enough time.

They had ten years, and still, that wasn't enough.

"Sirius," James says gently, turning back after watching Regulus go. They'd stared at each other until Regulus took the corner, not looking away even once.

"James," Sirius practically whimpers, and in the next second, they're grabbing onto each other to embrace so tightly that it hurts, gripping each other so hard that Sirius can't breathe.

"I'm sorry. I'm so sorry, Sirius," James whispers, and Sirius' breath is snatched right out of his lungs, because he knows exactly what James is apologizing for.

James hasn't, not once. He hasn't apologized for his choice, for leaving Sirius, for deciding to die and never come back to his best friend. But he is now. There's so much remorse in his tone that it sounds like he's choking on it, and he is sorry, he's so blatantly sorry for what he's going to do, and that—

That makes it real.

Sirius has no choice but to accept it, then. It bears down on him all at once, and he breaks immediately, as soon as he lets himself feel it.

It feels like dying.

Sirius has brushed up against death many times, so he's aware of how brutal it can be. He's wielded death like a weapon, and he's been on the verge of death enough to know that it's not peaceful. It's blood and gore and pain. It's terrifying.

Not James, not James, not James, Sirius thinks desperately, and he'd offer himself up instead, if he could. Me. Take me. Please don't take him. Please, not James.

A sob works its way out of his mouth. James is still chanting his apology, saying it over and over and over, but never—not for a second—wavering in his decision. Sirius grasps at him harder, like he's trying to crush him, like he can grind him into dust and cup him in his hands and swallow him down as if he can keep them together that way. James is gripping him just the same, like he's trying too, and Sirius wishes it would work.

And, if Sirius has to accept it, if he has to face it— my best friend is going to die, James is going to die, he's not coming back— then the next logical conclusion is that Sirius will simply join him. No James, no Sirius. That's it.

Somehow, Sirius can live with that, until he's dead. Until they're dead. He can accept it that way, like a universal truth, something unshakable, more embedded in this world than the core of the earth. Regulus—he can live on without them, and has. He will live on. This is Sirius' only compromise.

Still. Even still, Sirius' instinctive defiance fights it, pushing at it with feeble hands. Not James, not Regulus, not me. We'll live. Somehow, somehow, somehow...

The will to survive is a fickle thing, isn't it?

"James Potter."

Sirius chokes on a raw sob, holding onto James as hard as he ever has, and then—

It's all gone.

Sirius blinks, sucking in a sharp breath as he stares around the hall, utterly alone. A broken whine falls out of his mouth, because no, no, that's not fair. His last moments with his best friend—and he can't remember them. They're lost to him.

No.

No.

No, please.

James was just in his arms. Sirius had him. Sirius was holding onto him. Did he try to keep him? Did the Auror have to rip him away? Did James say something? Did Sirius?

He'll never know.

And again, like a snapshot, Sirius stops when he blinks and finds himself walking. Gritty-eyed, face tight with tear tracks, he's moving, and he doesn't remember when he started or where he was trying to go. Sirius stumbles towards the wall, hyperventilating as he squeezes his eyes shut and—

"Sirius."

That's Remus. His lovely voice, so soothing, calling to him. Sirius blinks, and Remus is right there, right in front of him. When did Sirius make it back to the suite?

"I can't remember," Sirius says, his voice cracking. "Remus, Remus, I can't—I can't remember. I can't—"

Remus' hands reach for his face, and then—

Sirius is on the settee, pressed into Remus' side as he weeps into his shoulder. The screen shows Rita, her mouth moving, no doubt performing the usual introductions before the games that take place before they start—things like recapping information about each tribute and getting the excitement up for the arena, as well as what's about to happen inside it. She's muted, though, the tiny speaker with a line through it in the corner of the screen making it obvious.

Remus' arms are around him, holding him, one hand gently carding through his hair while the other sweeps up and down his back. Sirius feels like he's reentering his body, and as always, he's struck by the horrible thought of what occupies it when he's gone. No one ever knows that he's left.

When Sirius lifts his head, Remus' hand in his hair lifts away to cup his cheek, gaze flicking over Sirius' face. Softly, he says, "There you are."

"What?" Sirius croaks, blinking swollen eyes.

"You were gone for a bit, I think," Remus murmurs, as simple as that, and Sirius feels his heart stutter in his chest.

Sirius exhales shakily. "You—you could tell?"

"Yes," Remus says, eyebrows pinching. "It's alright, Sirius. Just breathe. You're here. I'm here; I'm right here."

"I don't know how I got here," Sirius admits, choked up, his eyes stinging again. "I can't—I don't remember. I—"

"Shh, it's okay. Breathe," Remus instructs gently, ducking his head forward to press their foreheads together, thumb swiping along Sirius' cheek so tenderly that he starts crying again.

It's a soft, steady sort of crying, though. From the eyes and not the chest. They just spill out, and he shuts his eyes, feeling his wet, clumped eyelashes against his cheeks. Every time Remus' exhale spills over his mouth, Sirius inhales. In turn, he exhales every time Remus breathes in. It's an exchange, guidance, and he falls into the gentle rhythm until it doesn't hurt as much.

Sirius feels himself become more solid around the edges, no longer a spector to his own life as he lives it, flitting in and out with no comprehension of what he's missing when he's gone. He doesn't get it back.

He'll never get it back.

~•~

James looks up from where he's slipping into the jacket provided for him, Sirius' last words ringing in his ears. The sound of the door takes his focus, and he feels himself start in surprise as Fabian comes sweeping in.

"You're here. How are you—" James sucks in a sharp breath of pure disbelief. "Fabian—"

"Special permission from Riddle himself, apparently," Fabian cuts in with a smile, winking at him as he moves over. "What, you didn't think I was going to let you go into the arena looking anything less than your best, did you?"

James releases a choked laugh. "I—I don't really think it's going to matter how I look."

"I know," Fabian says, softening as he reaches out to brace his hands on James' shoulders, just gazing at him.

"Why…?" James swallows and licks his lips. "Why would Riddle let you in to see me?"

Fabian hums. "Well, honestly, likely as an incentive. A little gift, if you will. You and Regulus really made quite the impression between your outfits and your little love story. You're both fan-favorites now, so the pressure is on to keep you two going for as long as possible, hoping some magic will happen, so to speak. I believe I'm here to boost morale."

"So, they—they're planning to milk us for all we're worth, then?" James mumbles, easily reading between the lines.

"Indeed they are, and indeed they will," Fabian murmurs, not bothering to lie to him. He slips his hands down and shuffles close, dropping his voice to a whisper as he fiddles with the front of James' coat. "But you're worth more than they could ever get out of you. You're the sun, James. Don't forget."

Following Fabian's glance down, James sees a small, bronze pin in the shape of the sun, a circle with triangles wrapped all the way around its outline. James reaches up to rub his thumb over it, then looks up. Fabian winks at him and zips his coat.

"Thank you," James whispers.

"The sun always comes back up, and so will you," Fabian tells him, then drags him into a hug.

James closes his eyes and hugs him back, his chest aching, because Fabian will never get to see him again after this.

"James Potter, step on the platform," comes a voice over the intercom, the same one that instructed him to get dressed.

It makes James jump a little bit, his heart racing as his anxiety spikes, sharp fear sliding down the ridges of his spine. Fabian squeezes him tighter for just a moment, and then he pulls away, giving James a nod of encouragement.

Swallowing thickly, James walks over to the platform, hesitating only a moment before stepping up on it. As soon as he's in, the tube slides shut, locking him inside. As soon as that happens, the door bangs open, and a flood of Aurors come in all at once. James sucks in a sharp breath, then releases a shout that reverberates off the glass and right back onto him as he watches, trapped and useless, as the Aurors beat Fabian to the floor. Fabian crumbles, curling up, and James bangs on the glass, begging them to stop.

They don't stop. They just keep hitting him with their batons, making his body jerk, his face twisted in a grotesque tableau of pain. He gets hit in the face and immediately slumps like all of his strings have been cut.

"Fabian," James breathes out, hand on the glass as he stoops down, trying to reach for him even when he can't. It doesn't look good, but Fabian is still breathing. He's still—

An Auror pulls their gun from their hip, points it directly at Fabian's head, then pulls the trigger. The sharp crack of the gunshot is loud, and James flinches away, freezing as his back hits the glass behind him.

Blood trickles from Fabian's forehead. From the bullet wound. One hand is stretched out, slack on the ground. He was trying to reach out for James, too.

The Aurors drag Fabian's body from the room, and James stays crouching on the platform, trembling so hard he can't breathe.

~•~

Regulus knows he's supposed to sit and wait, but he keeps pacing, turning his gaze to the platform he'll have to step onto soon. His stomach lurches with the thought. He doesn't want to do it. He wants to go back to being in Sirius' arms. He wants to go back further, back to when he had James' steady heartbeat under his ear. He wants to go back even further than that, back to his fifteenth birthday, or any time before then.

The door opens, making him whirl around, and Regulus' breath punches out of his chest when Gideon comes strolling in with a smile, eyes sparkling.

"Gideon?" Regulus whispers, hushed and reverent.

"There's my favorite doll," Gideon says softly, moving closer. "Don't you dare bite me for what I'm about to do."

What Gideon is about to do is, apparently, tug Regulus right into his arms. Regulus doesn't bite him, doesn't even fight it, because he's so scared and he doesn't want to be alone.

"How are you here?" Regulus asks in a rasp. He doesn't hug Gideon back, can't really bring himself to; it doesn't feel right, if Sirius isn't the last person he held onto. He lets himself be held, though, and Gideon doesn't seem to mind.

"Parting gift from Riddle himself," Gideon murmurs, pulling back with a small furrow between his eyebrows. "It's—it isn't really—when the request was made, Fabian and I instantly agreed; we jumped at the chance, if I'm honest. But now I'm thinking...it wasn't exactly a request. I'm here for a reason, Regulus, and I don't know if it's a good one."

Regulus gazes up at him, heart thumping hard as his blood immediately starts rushing faster in his veins. "What? Gideon, what does that mean? What's—"

"I don't know," Gideon admits, "but that's not what you need to worry about right now. You need to be focused, alright? Listen to me, Regulus, you can win. I know you can."

A lump forms in Regulus' throat, and he jolts a little when Gideon unzips his coat just a little. It's lightweight, but there's some sort of thermal material on the inside that suggests it's going to get cold in the arena. Regulus really hopes there won't be any snow. If Gideon is removing his coat—

Oh. Gideon is not removing his coat. Regulus glances down to see a bronze pin under his fingers, shaped like a star. Slowly, Gideon zips his jacket back up, smiling gently when Regulus looks back up to meet his gaze.

"Be a champion anyway," Gideon reminds him quietly.

"Regulus Black, step onto the platform."

The instructions steal Regulus' breath, and Gideon steps back with an encouraging nod. There's something on his face, in his eyes, an undercurrent of unease like something isn't quite right, but it's clear that he's trying to hide it, focusing on Regulus instead. He looks like he has a headache.

Cautiously, Regulus walks over to the platform, repeatedly glancing back to see nothing but support from Gideon. It's that support that manages to get Regulus to step onto the platform, and the tube shuts around him instantly.

A mere breath passes before the door opens again, and Regulus freezes as Aurors come in the room in waves. Gideon doesn't miss a beat, picking up the chair in the corner and slamming it to the first Auror who dares to come too close. He fights, and he fights hard, but he's quickly overtaken. They strike him over and over with their batons until he's a heap on the floor, and Regulus watches in horror, not even breathing.

He doesn't so much as twitch until a gun is drawn, and then he throws himself forward, shouting, "Wait! Wait, no, ple—"

Regulus doesn't even get to finish begging before Gideon is dead. Blood pools onto the floor, a small puddle left behind as the Aurors drag his body away without so much as a stutter.

Regulus is left there, frozen in place as tears gather in his eyes, his throat going tight, and then it can't matter, because the platform starts to move.

Chapter End Notes

for those of you coming to check the end notes for more in-depth warnings and where to skip:

Starting with the suicide implications: FIRST, IF YOU WISH TO SKIP THIS PART, SCROLL PAST WHERE JAMES APOLOGIZES TO SIRIUS AFTER REGULUS IS TAKEN AWAY BY THE AUROR!!!

If you DON'T want to skip, but you still want the spoiler-y warnings (which is valid): Sirius sort of feels it finally hit him that James is planning to die and never come back, and he has the thoughts that he will just die with him, rather than live without him. It's not explicitly stated how or anything like that, but he makes it very clear that he plans to die if James does.

The dissociative amnesia: FIRST, IF YOU WISH TO SKIP THIS PART, SCROLL PAST WHEN JAMES AND SIRIUS START HUGGING AND JAMES' NAME IS CALLED, AND DON'T STOP UNTIL IT SWITCHES BACK TO JAMES' POV!!!

If you DON'T wish to skip, but you want the spoiler-y warning (which is so valid): Sirius essentially gets too overwhelmed/upset and loses moments/blocks them out. His memory goes very spotty, and he comes in and out, like snapshots where he finds himself for a moment, then goes right back out. He is upset and panicking through this (it's mentioned once that he's hyperventilating), and he manages to make it back to the suite where Remus is, but he doesn't really remember how he got there. It's very, VERY upsetting for him. Remus does comfort him, but it's explicitly stated that Sirius will never get those memories back that he lost.

The death: FIRST, IF YOU WISH TO SKIP THIS PART, SCROLL PAST WHEN JAMES IS INSTRUCTED TO GET ON THE PLATFORM TO GO TO THE ARENA, AND THEN WHEN IT'S REGULUS' POV, JUST STOP READING WHEN REGULUS IS INSTRUCTED TO GET ON THE PLATFORM!!!

If you DON'T wish to skip, but you want the spoiler-y warning (which is so valid): Two people die this chapter. Fabian and Gideon. It's explicitly stated that they are beaten down to the ground and then shot by Aurors. It's violent, but mostly brief. Both James and Regulus see this happen and are extremely upset about it.

for those of you who HAVE finished the chapter:

how we feelin'?

whew, talk about a rough one, right? i mean, it STARTED out good. sirius and remus got handsy and flirted with each other, which was fun. also, sirius blurting out that he needs to brush his teeth when remus tries to kiss him is so fucking funny to me. he PANICKED 😭😭😭 poor babe. he was really overwhelmed as it was, leave him alone.

meanwhile, regulus gave james a little treat. 💀 he's foul for that lmaoooo. he really was just indulging that person who used to have feelings for james and giving james a nice little parting gift because hey, he's gonna have to die if regulus making it home, so like. it's the least he could do. see, he can be nice sometimes.

james was like: you know what? im not even gonna question it. im gonna accept this fortunate stroke of luck and cherish it. 😭😭😭 he deserves nice things, really. very happy for you, king. it's what you deserve <3 the rest, though? fucking awful. 😒 gonna find the bitch who wrote this and put them through a meat grinder bc he's a little shit. the fuck was that???

listen, i love angst as much as the next person, but this one genuinely took a lot out of me, and it somehow still gets worse??? like, the story can and will get heavier from here, im not joking. not exactly in the same way, at least not always, but still.

honorable mention to pandora, who just Knows Things. i love her so much, you have no idea. her saying goodbye HURT sirius and regulus clinging to each other before regulus goes into the arena? sirius not being able to let him go? sirius reassuring him the same way he reassured him when it was him going into the arena? sirius not getting to tell regulus he loves him? i would rather shoot myself with a nail gun, thanks.

sirius losing his last moments with james had me regretting all my life choices that led me to this moment. like, that shit was so sad. and the way he blanks things out in moments of high distress? yeah, ive been there. it hits hard, ill just say that. also yes, sirius did say something to james, but no i will not be telling you what it is because it's relevant later for more angst. feel free to make your theories, though!

and finally, fabian and gideon. ow. that was fucking brutal. rest assured, their deaths will not be brushed under the rug. it's actually a Very Important plot point. but still, that shit HURT.

also, side note, because im evil: james was indeed right, fabian WOULD never see him after that.

another side note, because again, im evil: gideon had a headache because fabian died first.

The Arena

Chapter Notes

hello, hello!!!

warnings for this chapter:

-references to death
-references to previous deaths that took place
-actual deaths (we're in the arena now, so this makes sense, but it's not too detailed. only just mentioned, really)
-depictions of characters being afraid/anxious/panicked (but no in-depth descriptions of panic attacks or anything like that)
-very brief physical fight (it doesn't last last long and is quickly cleared up)

that's...it, im pretty sure. like, yes, we're in the arena, but this is actually a fairly mild chapter, despite that. enjoy! :)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The first thing Regulus notices is the sun.

It's warm on his skin, bright in his eyes, making him shudder at the temperature change and squint as he holds up his hand to block his face. The sound of the gunshot still rings in his ears, and the image of Gideon's dead body feels seared into his mind. Why? Why would they do that? Because of—Regulus?

There clearly was a reason for Regulus to see it. They made sure he would see it. To disorient him? To send him to the arena in a state of hysterics? It's working. Regulus is still shaking, his breath coming out choppy, but Gideon…

He'd never want Regulus to let them win.

Regulus thinks he knows. There's something… The outfits, the interviews, the impact he and James had on the Hallows… Of course Riddle didn't like it. This was a warning. But why Gideon? Why...? It doesn't completely make sense. Regulus can't figure it out, but he can still hear Gideon's voice in his head, telling him to focus.

Inhaling sharply, Regulus can taste the salt in the air. Iron. It makes his teeth ache slightly, and he swallows thickly, his heart thumping along with the large countdown that hangs in the sky in the distance. Big, large numbers that glow, a gamemaker's voice counting down at a steady, sedate pace.

26, 25, 24…

A large field is stretching wide and far in front of Regulus' platform. In the middle of said field is a cave—a big one with a large opening, like a mouth threatening to swallow anyone who gets too close. There are poles with bags and supplies hanging off them scattered in front of the cave, but inside the cave are the weapons.

17, 16, 15…

In front of the poles, before anyone would be able to reach them, there's a wide river that cuts through the entire field. It arcs off in a circle, like it's wrapping around the cave. To reach the cave, they'll have to cross it. The water is red, stark red that flows like blood. A crimson river.

9, 8, 7…

Swallowing, Regulus swivels his head, trying to breathe as his gaze darts around. The platforms are spaced apart, but it doesn't take him long to find James at all. He's hunched over, breathing hard and looking like he's about to vomit. Like he can feel the weight of Regulus' gaze, James turns his head and looks at him. Their eyes meet.

3, 2, 1…

The cannon sounds, and Regulus is running before he even realizes it. Everyone else is, too, he's sure—but he can't focus on that. Running to the weapons first thing is exactly what Sirius said not to do, but the poles are scattered far enough that Regulus can snatch a bag and run directly into the woods surrounding the field on all sides.

Regulus is fast. Very fast. Likely faster than most, and yet there are others that still manage to beat him there, which turns out to be a blessing in disguise. There's a loud splash of water, a scream, and then the cannon sounds again.

It's so unexpected, so abrupt, so quick that Regulus stumbles and falls to the ground before he ever reaches the water. Again: BOOM! People are screaming, and Regulus pushes up on his hands, breathing hard as he looks over to see Mulciber catching Avery by the chest to stop him from going into the river. Someone else—one Regulus doesn't know—isn't so lucky, and their momentum propels them into the water.

Immediately, pale hands break forth from the river to claw at them, yanking them down as they cry out. The scream cuts off, and it takes a minute, and then the cannon sounds again.

Three dead already.

Frantically, Regulus whips his head around, searching for James, trying to see, to make sure of the three, it wasn't—but James is there, scooping Vanity up with an arm right around her stomach, snatching her back and whirling her away right before she goes careening into the water. They stumble and fall, and then Vanity launches to her feet and starts sprinting to the right, towards the forest. James follows.

"There's something in there!"

"Don't touch the water! Don't fucking touch the water!"

"How do we reach the weapons, the supplies?!"

In that moment, the widespread panic feels almost—unifying. None of them are above it, and for just a second, the first instinct everyone has—even the death eaters—is to keep everyone from stepping into the water, panicking about how they're all going to survive if they can't reach what they need. It lasts only a moment, and then it's utter mayhem.

Fights break out, and people start to scatter. Regulus is among them. He's a target, and it won't take long before people start hunting him down, weapon or no weapon. He would prefer not to be beaten to death, thank you. So, he turns and runs as hard and as fast as he can into the forest. To the left.

He crashes through the foliage, struggling a bit on the terrain. It's uneven ground, littered with the branches and rocks and dry leaves. Trees blur all around him as he bobs and weaves, his mind utterly silent, heart racing and thighs burning as he pushes himself to run. Keep running. Always running away. Run, run, run. Don't stop, don't stop, don't—Regulus darts around a tree and collides into someone so hard that he legitimately goes flying, as does whoever he hits. He lands on the ground with a thud, his breath knocked out of him, and he hears the grunt opposite of him. The sound spurs him to his feet, scrambling to get up, and he freezes as soon as he has.

Evan stands to full height, breathing hard, his gaze sharp as their eyes lock. For a moment, neither of them move, or speak.

And then, "Regulus."

"Evan," Regulus replies shortly, a level of caution in his tone. There's a rock in between them. Either of them could lunge for it at any time, and yet, neither of them do.

Regulus shouldn't hesitate, but he isn't going to kill someone who isn't trying to kill him. The problem is, he doesn't know if Evan will try or not. They're not—it's not like they ever agreed not to, like proper allies or something. A few conversations and one laugh hard-won isn't exactly a contract signed in blood.

"Some river, eh, lover boy?" Evan asks lightly, holding his gaze. Regulus tries not to grimace at the moniker. Lovely. If he dies being called lover boy, he's going to be pissed.

"You saw it, then," Regulus says slowly.

Evan nods. He takes a step back, carefully. "Oh, I saw it. Puts a bit of a strain on everyone getting what they need, doesn't it?"

"I'd say so."

"If you ask me, it doesn't make sense."

"What?" Regulus mutters, admittedly a little baffled that they're just—standing here, talking, not...doing anything.

"They wouldn't put all those prizes out there for us if there wasn't some way for us to get to them," Evan points out, and Regulus...can't really argue with him there. "I have an idea."

"An idea to...get to the supplies?" Regulus asks.

"Yes." Evan is silent for a beat, and then he takes another careful step back, like he's waiting to see what Regulus will do. Regulus doesn't do anything. "I have a proposition for you."

Regulus narrows his eyes. "Do you?"

"I think I know how to get to the supplies," Evan says, not reacting to his suspicion. "If you help, I'll help you get to them, too."

"And why would you do that?"

"I'm generous."

"For some reason, I find that hard to believe," Regulus retorts, and Evan breaks out into a grin. It's boyish, playful, but not faked. Regulus still doesn't trust it. "Why me?"

Evan waves a hand lazily, like they're old friends just having a lovely little chat. "Oh, because you're the first person I came across, honestly, and you're not actively trying to kill me."

"Yet," Regulus adds.

"Well, I have to work with what I can get," Evan drawls, shrugging a shoulder. "Looks like that's you, lover boy. So, if you're willing to make a truce, I'm willing to get a dagger in your hands. How does that sound?"

Regulus sits on that for a long second, thinking about it, and then he sets his shoulders. "What do I need to do?"

~•~

Vanity stumbles over her feet and hits the ground, weeping quietly, and James backtracks quickly to reach out and grab her hand. He holds onto it as he pulls her back to her feet, and they're both running again, her small hand held in his grip.

James isn't—he isn't thinking, really, just reacting. Vanity is so young. She's only fifteen, and she's scared. She nearly died; the river nearly took her. If not for him, she'd be dead right now.

Fabian's dead body keeps flashing in his mind.

James couldn't help him. He'd wanted to. He'd tried to, and he couldn't. Fabian, James thinks. Fuck, I'm so sorry.

There's a harsh tug on his hand, weight pulling him to a stop, nearly making him trip. He whirls around, and Vanity looks up at him through her tears and says, "James, please, I—I can't. My legs hurt. I can't breathe. I—"

"Okay. Okay, hey, let's just—" James takes a steadying breath, his own body sore from all the running. He's already thirsty. Squeezing Vanity's hand, he looks around warily. "I know you're tired. I know that, and I'm sorry, but we don't—we can't stay out in the open like this. We have to keep moving."

"I'm scared," Vanity whispers.

"I know," James whispers back. "Me too." Maybe that's not reassuring, or maybe it is, but either way, Vanity seems calmer now after the small break. "Listen, we'll find somewhere to go, somewhere to take a break, and then—"

And then? And then what? James' brain seems to stutter over what comes next, what he's meant to be doing, unable to think past the next few seconds unfurling before him. His mind is already too full, a litany of Fabian, Regulus, Vanity, river of blood, Regulus, three dead already, run, hide, Regulus, Regulus, Regulus.

"Water," Vanith says, drawing him out of his own head. She squeezes his hand. "We need to find a source of water, and I don't really think the murder river back there is a good idea. Just saying."

James blinks at her, then huffs out a startled laugh. "Er, right. No, that's—yeah, bad idea, you're right. Okay, we'll find somewhere, and then we'll work on finding water."

"That won't murder us," Vanity adds.

"Right, that," James agrees, lips curling up. "Ready to run?"

Vanity nods. "Yeah, I'm good now."

So, they run. They're not pushing as hard this time, and Vanity isn't stumbling anymore. Pushing deeper into the forest doesn't prove to be fruitful, not at first. To start with, it's just a lot of trees.

Eventually, when they're both breathing hard and have been running for a long time, they do come across something. It's another cave, but a much smaller one than the first that they saw back at the start. The cave is nestled at the bottom of a sharp, overhanging cliff; it's surrounded by animal tracks and various bushes, nearly obscured entirely.

Frankly, it's the safest thing James has seen so far. Vanity, too, if her small gasp of delight is anything to go by. They exchange a look, faces splitting into relieved smiles, and then they start moving right for it. They're quiet and careful, for which James is grateful when he sees shoe prints on the ground, like someone came barreling carelessly through and ran right into the cave. It's silent inside, and James doesn't know if they're going to get another opportunity like this.

Cautiously, James lets Vanity's hand go and raises both palms at her, silently telling her to stay put. Vanity crouches down, her face strained and lips pressed together tightly. James gives her one last reassuring look—he hopes—then eases inside.

He barely makes it a few careful steps inside before there's a garbled shriek and a fist colliding off-center with his jaw. Weight slams into him so he goes stumbling back from the dark of the cave and right back into the light, landing hard enough that the air is knocked from his lungs.

Instinctively, James lashes out, his hand hitting something that earns him a muffled yelp. He jerks his knee up, slamming his hands against the body holding him down, shoving it away. He scrambles to his feet in just enough time to hear Vanity give something of a war-cry as she proceeds to repeatedly hit the person with a stick. Not a very big stick, mind you, and it breaks literally after three hits. James sort of gawks at her in disbelief as she starts kicking the body on the ground, looking absolutely terrified, but doing it nonetheless.

The body on the ground is on its front, curled up, and James feels himself jerk in surprise as he realizes that it's...Peter?

"Peter?!" James blurts out, eyes bulging. "Wait! Wait, Vanity, wait! It's just Peter!"

Vanity freezes, breathing hard as she stares at him with wide eyes. On the ground, Peter groans and sort of just—flops over, face scrunched as he pushes himself to sit up.

"James," Peter breathes out, looking relieved. "For fuck's sake, you scared the piss out of me. I thought—I didn't know who you were. I didn't know it was you."

"I—yeah, I got that," James says with a deep exhale. He raises his hands at Vanity in a soothing gesture. "It's okay. It's Peter. He's a friend, I promise."

"Oh. Sorry," Vanity replies sheepishly, dropping the broken piece of her stick from her hand as she takes a step back.

Slowly, Peter pushes to his feet, taking a moment to brace his hands on his knees and just—breathe. His shoulders sag as he stands up. "I am...so glad to see you, James, you have no idea. Um, sorry for punching you. I just—panicked."

"It's alright," James assures him, reaching up to prod at his cheek. He cracks a weak grin. "Not so bad, Pete. Besides, I got you back, and Vanity…"

James raises his eyebrows at her. She crosses her arms, looking only slightly embarrassed, looking like any stubborn teenager in this predicament would. At the look, Peter chuckles, then winces as he cups his side.

"Yeah, she has a mean kick." Peter shakes his head and eases out a careful breath. "To be honest, as soon as I heard someone approaching, I was pretty sure I was about to die. I'm very glad to not be dead. Fucking awful about the river, yeah?"

"Yeah," James agrees quietly.

"Seems to be a fatal flaw in the design," Peter grumbles. "Why have supplies and weapons if we can't even get to them?"

James shrugs, just as bewildered by it as him. "No idea. Maybe they didn't want us to be able to reach them immediately? Maybe the river will dry up?"

"Murder river," Vanity mumbles, frowning.

"Do you think?" Peter asks James, not hearing her.

"Only way we'll know is if we go back, and I strongly suggest against that," James says, and Peter instantly starts nodding.

"Yeah, I'll take this cave over the other one any day," Peter announces, gesturing to it. "Not much in there, honestly, and it's dark. But there's water run-off from the cliff. Just a small trickle on the walls. If we boil it, it should be safe." He glances between them hopefully. "Anyone thirsty?"

"Parched," James says with a small smile. Trust Peter to immediately offer them refuge. Safety in numbers and all that, and James suspects he doesn't want to be alone.

A cannon sounds, making them all jump as they look around. James' smile falls, and immediately, he thinks Regulus. His heart lurches, a creeping dread making his muscles tense. James needs to get to him, to make sure he's—

"Let's not stand out in the open," Peter mumbles warily, reaching out distractedly to usher Vanity towards the cave with the same mindless instinct to keep her safe that James has.

James takes a deep breath and follows.

~•~

"You want me to what?"

Evan looks exasperated. He plants his hands on his hips and raises his eyebrows at Regulus, canting his head to the side a little bit. "You heard me. Come off it, lover boy. Don't pretend you can't climb; I've seen James, he's taller, and you're not going to tell me you're not climbing him, are you?"

Regulus takes it all back. He rues the day he ever showed an interest in being possible allies with Evan Rosier. Regulus scowls at him, but that only makes him smirk.

"First of all, climbing a person is entirely different from climbing a fucking tree—"

"How so?"

"Trees won't keep me from falling. James has arms."

"Ah, so you have climbed—"

"Rosier, if you want to keep your tongue, you might want to shut up."

"Well, you can't cut my tongue out without a dagger," Evan sing-songs, tossing the ridiculous amount of vines he's collected and rolled up from hand-to-hand. "So, if you want a dagger, I suggest you start climbing."

Regulus glances warily from Evan to look at the tree, more than a little uneasy. Climbing isn't exactly...Regulus' thing. He may have a tiny, small, infinitesimal fear of heights—which is very fucking sensible, honestly. People don't have the ability to fly for a reason; obviously they're meant to stay on the ground.

The tree that Evan has chosen is the one closest to the back of the cave in the field. It's large and unnervingly tall, and there's a few different branches that stretch out over the crimson river that three have already lost their lives to. Evan's plan to essentially climb the tree, swing over the river, and drop safely down to the other side isn't a bad one, all-in-all. Regulus just hates it with every fibre of his being.

"You first," Regulus mutters, shooting a shrewd look at Evan, who looks vaguely amused.

Evan chuckles and winds the vine around his chest, tucking it in and pulling it tight so it stays in place, leaving his hands free as he approaches the tree. He glances back at Regulus and winks at him. "Sure, if you like, but that means if you fall, I can't catch you on your way down. Don't go backing out on me now, lover boy. I need someone to distract everyone else so I can get away if the river suddenly lets people cross."

"Oh, so that's what I am. A high priority target. A distraction. Your personal lookout," Regulus grumbles, watching Evan stretch up to grab a branch on the tree and brace his foot on a knot that juts out, effortlessly hauling himself up. He starts climbing with ease, like he was born to do it.

"We all have things that makes us useful," Evan calls down without so much as a grunt, or any strain in his voice, the fucking prick. "Like me, I'm being very useful to you now. And you—well, there's no denying that between me and you, there are far more people who are out for your blood than mine. But, you know, if all goes well, it won't be a problem."

"Comforting, thanks," Regulus says dryly, approaching the base of the tree as Evan steadily gets higher.

Evan doesn't respond, so Regulus takes a deep breath and tries to do exactly as Evan did. It's not like the tree has perfect footholds or little ledges for him to cling to. Regulus struggles with the whole ordeal, huffing and puffing and shaking like a leaf that would much rather be safely on the forest floor. Briefly, he imagines Sirius laughing at him for getting himself into this mess, then dashes the thought away. Sirius used to tease him about his little fear of heights, but this is…

Well, this is different. Regulus isn't climbing a tree back home and getting stuck, needing his brother to come up and coax him down with quiet teasing and gentle words. Regulus is climbing a tree with someone who essentially needs him because he'll be the first that other people will try to kill if things just so happen to go wrong. Regulus is climbing a tree to get to a weapon, so he can defend himself against the people who will try to kill him at some point, especially when they inevitably find their own ways across the crimson river. Maybe they're planning to build a fucking boat, who knows?

Yeah, Sirius wouldn't be laughing about this.

Evan, who Regulus is starting to hate a little bit, continues to climb higher—uncomfortably high, at this point. Regulus makes the very stupid mistake of pausing to catch his breath, automatically looking down and immediately feeling his stomach drop out from underneath him when he sees just how far the ground is beneath him.

"Oh, shit," Regulus chokes out, squeezing his eyes shut as he presses his forehead to the bark, his limbs shaking from the effort to hold himself up. If he were to fall now, he would be seriously injured; he'd break something, without a doubt, and maybe just fucking die. So, brilliant, that's just brilliant. He groans and tips his head up, heart sinking when he sees that Evan is still climbing, utterly calm about it. "Okay. Okay, just. Okay. Keep going, don't look down; keep going, don't look down; keep going, don't look down."

Sirius told him the same thing that day, when Regulus got stuck in the tree. It wasn't even a particularly large tree; Regulus was just a fucking baby about the whole thing. He couldn't help it. He didn't even know he was afraid until he was already up there, too scared to come down, and he remembers thinking—rather dramatically—that he'd just die up in that tree, until Sirius talked him down from it.

Regulus was seven. The mantra Sirius used shouldn't really work now, after all these years, but somehow it does. He keeps going, and he doesn't look down. If Sirius is watching, if this moment is being televised, does he realize what Regulus is doing? Does he even remember?

Eventually, after too long, Evan swings himself up on a thick branch, yet again with annoying grace that Regulus would very much like to smack him for. He scoots back and swings his legs, looking down at Regulus with a snort.

"Need some help?" Evan asks in amusement, leaning down to offer his hand. Regulus would have to climb a little higher to be able to reach it.

This is a pivotal moment, and Regulus knows that. If he takes Evan's hand, it's a sign of trust—a shaky sign, but a sign nonetheless. If he doesn't, it shows a complete lack of trust that could be detrimental later on. The problem is, if Regulus takes his hand, Evan could easily just—drop him. On purpose.

Regulus doesn't trust anyone. That's for the best, generally, but in this situation… Well.

Taking a deep breath, Regulus climbs higher until he's within reach, then stops to squint at Evan's hand. His whole body is shaking, and he feels like, at any moment, he's going to give out and fall. He genuinely isn't sure he'll be able to pull himself up onto the branch, not on his own. Still, it's a risk. A very big risk. Evan wiggles his fingers and raises his eyebrows.

Regulus gives him a sharp look of warning that essentially says if you try anything, I'll take you down with me. Evan just looks amused again, so Regulus huffs out a harsh breath and flings his hand up, his heart racing. Evan surges down to grab it, clamping down tight and helping haul him up with a grunt. Regulus scrambles against the bark and throws his leg over the branch, his breath punching out of him once he's seated.

Stupidly, Regulus peeks down at the ground and nearly vomits, his head spinning as a weak noise slips out of his mouth. It's a weakness he would be ashamed of if he didn't feel like he was about to faint. Oh, that's high. They're so high up. Fuck.

"Ah," Evan says, strained, "I'd appreciate it if you didn't break all the bones in my hand, thanks."

Mortified, Regulus snatches his hand back from Evan's, choosing instead to place his hands on the branch between his thighs for some sort of stability. Evan flexes his hand with a slight grimace, then snorts quietly and shakes his head.

"How are you so comfortable up here?" Regulus grits out.

"I've been climbing trees my whole life," Evan says simply, still swinging his legs like he's having fun. Oh, he's mental.

"Why?" Regulus asks in disbelief.

Evan shrugs lazily. "No one ever thinks to look up."

Regulus doesn't really have anything to say to that. He sort of gets what Evan means, even if climbing trees was never his method for hiding. He had his own methods—he's a Trojan Horse—but he knows that's what Evan is saying, basically. No one thinks to look up; if Evan's up, no one sees him. Yeah, Regulus gets that.

"Come on, we need to get as far out on the branch as we can, so we can swing across," Evan tells him, then proceeds to brace his hands on the trunk and just haul himself up, as agile as a cat, balancing on his toes as he goes to stand.

"Evan. Evan," Regulus blurts out in distress, snapping his hands out frantically to grasp Evan by the front of his coat and tug him right back down. The branch shakes with the motion, which makes a whimper fall out of Regulus' mouth, but Evan just drops back down with ease, legs spreading and swinging yet again. "No. Just—no. Absolutely not."

"Regulus," Evan says, stifling a laugh.

"No," Regulus hisses.

"Well, how exactly do you expect us to get farther out?"

"Not by walking, you fucking lunatic. Can't we just—scoot?"

"Scoot," Evan echoes, mouth twitching into a grin.

Regulus glares at him. "I will push you out of this tree."

"You'd lose your balance and fall just trying. You're so shaky, poor lamb," Evan coos at him, utterly unperturbed by the threat. He shakes his head. "Alright, lover boy, we'll scoot. It'll be slower, but...sure."

"It's not as if we're in a rush," Regulus grumbles, watching with a frown as Evan starts scooting back along the branch, using his hands to briefly lift himself up and re-seat himself a few inches away. He glances behind himself as he does it, and the branch shakes a little each time.

"No, maybe not, but the sun is already starting to go down. I'd like to make it over there sometime before it's dark. This will be harder to do without some light, at least."

"You're making exceptional progress. Should you be going so fast? What if—I mean, can't the branch break?"

Evan rolls his eyes. "The branch is solid. It's almost as thick as the tree itself. I promise it's fine. Well, all branches eventually break, and it'll get thinner the farther we go, so we'll have to be careful. Just—come on."

"If this is how I die, I'm going to be furious," Regulus mutters in complaint, but he dutifully starts...scooting. He does it with a lot less finesse than Evan, but he does do it.

"There's four already dead," Evan comments. "Three to the river. What do you think happened to the fourth?"

"No idea," Regulus says quietly, releasing a deep breath. He's trying not to think about it, because he doesn't want to think about the possibility that it's James.

"Worried about your boyfriend, lover boy?"

"You're lucky I can't reach you right now."

Evan laughs.

They're quiet as they get farther out, focusing on making their way across the branch. Admittedly, Regulus is a little grateful that Evan is indulging him. He surely didn't expect that he would have to metaphorically hold Regulus' hand through this whole process, and he could be a lot crueler than he has been. Honestly, he hasn't been cruel at all.

Eventually, they get far enough out to see the crimson river and cave. They both stop when they see the death eaters still at the front. It's just them now, and some of them are sitting, while others are walking as they gesture to the river. Clearly, they're trying to find their way across. It's not so easy to go hunting for people without weapons to kill them. Not impossible, sure, but they obviously have their objective.

Everyone else—well, Regulus assumes they all ran when the fighting broke out. Chances are, the death eaters managed to kill at least one, while the others made their escape. There's no body, but bodies are collected to be sent home—if there are bodies left to collect. Regulus reminds himself that James got away. He saw James get away, so he's probably fine.

Evan and Regulus exchange a look after both staring at the death eaters in the distance. Neither of them say anything, unwilling to draw attention to themselves. Like Evan said, no one thinks to look up, so they're as stealthy as they're going to get at the moment. Remaining undetected is the goal.

In silence—and a lot more carefully now—they continue to scoot along the branch. It does get noticeably thinner, shaking more and dipping a little under their combined weight. Evan glances down to measure how far the river is. It's wide, and even with them positioned right over it, they still need to go farther out. He grimaces and looks up, making a face that quite clearly states how unhappy about this he is, but he still waves his hand to indicate that they have to keep scooting.

Regulus really doesn't want to keep scooting, but he's already here, so he has to see it through at this point. The branch dips further, swaying with a harsh creak, and they both freeze. Evan takes a deep breath and cranes his head down, then glances back at the rest of the branch behind him.

"We can't go further," Evan whispers. "The branch will break."

"Can we make it across?" Regulus whispers back.

Evan chews on his lip for a moment, then squints down at the crimson river below them. "We'll have to swing wide, which means we'll have to go lower down on the vine. It's—it'll be risky, and we'll need to be quick, or our friends over there will notice. And—um, it'll probably be uncomfortably close."

"None of that was good information, Evan," Regulus hisses.

"Well, I'm not sure what you want me to do, Regulus," Evan hisses back, waving his hands around jerkily. "Our options are fairly limited. We're already here, so we may as well. Either we die, or we don't."

"I vote we don't."

"Yes, me too, so just—listen to me, would you?"

Regulus clenches his jaw. "Fine."

"The vine will hold you, and you'll need momentum to get across," Evan explains, his voice low as he starts unwinding the vine around his chest. It's actually a few different vines that he twined together, winding them around each other to make them more structurally sound—or so he said. It makes sense, so Regulus believes him. "You'll want to get as far down as you can, almost until you're about six feet above the water. There should be about this much vine left below you."

Evan demonstrates by holding the vine out from one hand to the other, his arms outstretched to his full wingspan, which isn't very much vine compared to all that's left over.

"Hate that," Regulus admits.

"Yeah, I'm not a fan either," Evan agrees with a frown. He sighs and stoops down to start tying off the vine in between them. "Swinging is simple. You hold on and rock your body. You'll need to let your legs hang so you can use them for direction, or else you'll just swing all over. Do not let go of the vine until you've cleared the other side of the river and you're sure you'll propel yourself over. You'll want some air."

"Don't like that either," Regulus mumbles.

Evan grins at him. "Today's the day you fly, lover boy."

"You first."

"Sorry, it has to be you first, I'm afraid."

Regulus rears back. "I think the fuck not. Evan—"

"It can't be me," Evan says with a heavy sigh. "Whoever goes last has to keep a hold of the vine when they make it over, and I don't think you have as much experience as I do to be able to manage it. It's better for you to let go, or else you might swing back into the river. I've spent days—and years before the training room—doing things like this. You haven't."

"I'm not doing that," Regulus informs him bluntly. He doesn't care if that makes him stubborn. "I don't—I'm just not. I won't know how to do it if I don't see you do it first."

Evan runs his tongue over his teeth, eyes narrowed, and then he leans forward, lowering his voice. "Regulus, we need this vine to make it back over, do you understand? You need to trust yourself, and you need to trust me. I'm already trusting you by letting you go over first, because you could easily get a weapon and kill me the moment I touch down. Now, trust doesn't come easily to me—and obviously not you—but we need some level of trust between us to do this."

Regulus stares at him for a long moment, hands gripping the branch tighter. Evan holds his gaze steadily, without wavering, and Regulus tries to ignore the truth in Evan's words. It does make sense, unfortunately, because he understands what Evan is saying. A part of Regulus wants to refuse anyway; a part of him wants to just abandon this entire plan, all because he doesn't know how to work well with others.

That's the thing, though. Sirius told him that, at some point, he would eventually find himself in situations where he'll have to rely on other people to survive. The arena is a lot like life in that way, just more condensed, and a lot more brutal about it. Regulus—if he's going to survive—needs to learn to play well with others. He just didn't expect it to happen so soon, and really, these are less than ideal circumstances. It's so easy to die here. One mistake, and that's it.

You only do what you're willing to do. In there, you have to be willing to do more than you ever have, or you'll die, Sirius had told him. Fuck, Regulus hates when he's right.

Exhaling slowly, Regulus nods. "Talk me through it."

Evan does. He tells Regulus exactly what he has to do, not skipping over any detail, murmuring to him as he ties off the vine and secures it. And then, all there's left to do is—do it.

So, despite every instinct screaming at him not to, Regulus does it. He scoots forward to reach down and grab onto the vine, keeping a firm grip as he hooks one leg around it, then tries to convince himself to swing the other one over. He needs a second, because his body protests it, rejecting any possibility of falling. Then, there's a hand hooking under his knee, and Evan gently helps him down, keeping him from swaying so much. He leans down as far as he can go, then lets Regulus' leg go, leaving Regulus to hold himself up in open air.

Regulus does not like this. His entire body clings to the vine, and his arms are still sore from climbing the tree. Evan nods down at him, murmuring to him, encouraging him to work his way down. Not too fast, and no sliding, or his palms might sting enough to make him instinctively let go.

Yeah, that's not possible. Regulus isn't sure there's a force in this world powerful enough to make him let go of this vine right now. It's actually a struggle to lower himself down, because his body would much prefer to cling to the vine and never move. His limbs tremble, but he goes down anyway.

Hanging into open air over a river that will kill him if he falls into it—well, he's not having a good time, to say the least. As he gets lower, Regulus can see where the vine stops, only just a few feet above the water, which isn't comforting at all.

When Regulus reaches where he thinks he's meant to go, he just hangs there for a moment, breathing hard. His legs are still wrapped around the vine, and it's a battle to convince them to let go, using only his arms to hold himself up. They're starting to go numb, even as they ache and burn. It's very, very unpleasant, and he still has to fucking swing.

Well, he's here now. He can't just stay here, and the ground is within reach; all has to do is get to it. So, with a grunt, he starts rocking his body. It takes him a bit to build up momentum, and he keeps his legs together like Evan told him to, which does keep him mostly going in one direction. The branch creaks and groans above him, but he forces himself to ignore it. He can only worry about so much at one time.

Regulus does build momentum, though, with effort. He can hear himself panting, and his hands are sweaty, which is very fucking terrifying since they're the one thing keeping him from plunging to his death right now, but—no, he's fine. He's actually—he has this. He can tell that he does, because he's starting to see across the crimson river, the ground on the other side like a beacon of hope.

He swings back over and over, sailing forward, then does it once more when he's sure that he's arcing up over the other side. On the next pass, Regulus feels his stomach swoop, and he huffs out a soft, startled breath as he lets go right at the peak—just like Evan told him to. He does, in fact, get air.

For a moment, Regulus is flying.

Well, it feels more like floating, honestly, and then gravity reminds him who's in charge by promptly tugging him towards the ground. Regulus somehow manages to not scream as he falls, but he can't stop himself from groaning as he hits the ground. Evan had advised the loose tuck and roll method, but Regulus doesn't quite manage it. He rolls, alright, but he does it with absolutely no grace whatsoever.

When Regulus stops, he just splays out on the ground, chest heaving as he stares listlessly up at Evan. He's so far up, and he's leaning down to reel the vine up to stop it from swinging too much. The movement might draw the attention they don't want. Regulus' whole body is sore, but he is, mercifully, on the ground. Safely. Not dead. Or hurt. Well, not too hurt, anyway.

"Fuck," Regulus whispers, closing his eyes, and then he releases a quiet, muffled, possibly hysterical laugh.

Regulus doesn't move, just staying where he is, recovering as the rush of adrenaline dulls. He does watch as Evan makes his way down (much faster and with more grace than Regulus, the bastard), doing basically the same exact thing that Regulus did.

As Evan is swinging, Regulus pushes himself up with a grimace, his body not at all pleased with him, especially his arms. Still, he eases to his feet, though he stays crouched. They're around the bend of the cave, so the death eaters are out of sight for now, but it's better not to be too loud or move too much. So far, no one knows they're here, and Regulus would very much like to keep it that way.

Regulus could, theoretically, rush to the cave to get a weapon to kill Evan with, but he won't. Evan has to trust that he won't, just as Regulus had to trust him on making it over here. He stays where he is, watching with a scowl as Evan swings himself over, letting his grip on the vine go slack, but keeping it in his hand with his arm stretched out as he sails down. He hits the ground dangerously close to the river, but he stumbles back with the vine still in his grip.

Evan gets his balance, pushing up on his knees with a grunt, then rolling to his feet. He pulls out the stick he'd shoved into his boot and stomps it into the ground, making sure it's secure before tying the vine to it so it won't swing away.

Regulus doesn't even want to think about the fact that they're going to have to swing back across the river soon enough. That's a problem for future Regulus. Present Regulus is about five seconds from getting his hands on a dagger, preferably more than one, so that's what he focuses on.

"See?" Evan whispers as he comes slinking over, a grin on his face. He claps Regulus on the shoulder. "Trust."

"I'm never trusting you again. That was awful," Regulus hisses, glaring at him.

Evan chuckles. "Sure, lover boy, whatever you say."

"Come on," Regulus mutters, turning to face the cave.

Getting into the cave won't exactly be easy. The cave itself has one entrance, and the back of it arcs down like a hill, closed off where it meets the ground. Their only option is to go inside from the front, which is where the death eaters are. Yes, they're separated by the river, but if they can sneak in without alerting them, that would be great.

It's getting closer to evening now, so they're not in broad daylight doing this, thankfully. Regulus can't help but notice the drop in temperature as the sun fades faster and faster.

In silence, Regulus and Evan share a look before moving over to crouch down beside the cave, moving slowly along the side. The outside of the cave is cold to the touch, like ice. It sends a shiver down Regulus' spine, and he makes sure not to touch it. He's in the front, so he holds out his hand to halt Evan behind him as they reach the side of the entrance.

Regulus peeks around carefully, peering at where the death eaters are. There's seven of them, so none of them have died yet, or were one of the ones to go into the river. Muliciber sits with Avery tucked up under his arm. Quinn, Hodge, and Axus are also sitting, and they're facing Mulciber and Avery. Willa is fully just lying down, looking to be lazily playing with her hair in her face. Bernice is the only one up, and she's moving along the side of the river like she's waiting for some sort of miracle to get her across.

If Regulus had to guess, they've circled the entire river that wraps around the cave, so they know there's no bridge or clear path to get to the other side. Regulus can't hear them, but he's sure that they're all trying to think up some way to get to the weapons. Bernice is thankfully walking along the river in the opposite direction from Regulus and Evan, but Regulus can't be sure that she won't turn around.

If they're going to go, they need to go now.

Frantically, Regulus waves his hand at Evan, then stays low to the ground as he whips around the mouth of the cave, hugging the wall even though it feels like ice. He pushes in as fast as he dares, going further where it's dark and ducking behind the rack of swords for cover. Evan joins him in seconds.

They stay still and silent, holding their breath, but there's no change in the distant sound of voices. No shouts. No threats. Nothing. Regulus exhales quietly and looks over at Evan, who is grinning right at him in pure relief. Helplessly, Regulus feels his mouth tug up at the corners.

Unbelievably, they've done it.

There's still much more to do, but they've made it, and that small victory makes it all worth it.

Inside the cave, there's no supplies. It's all weapons, which means that anything else useful will be outside attached to the poles placed sporadically around the cave. All things they could really need; flashlights, emergency blankets, matches or fire-starting kits, canisters to collect water, and no doubt some sort of nutrition. Having weapons is good, yes, but there's more to the arena than just fighting for your life. There's also fighting to survive.

Regulus is already thirsty, and after everything that he's done to get here, he's tired and hungry, too. It's getting colder by the minute. They're going to have to risk getting supplies, which is going to be hard, since the bags are mostly out in the open.

But first—weapons.

Behind them is a table with various weapons on it, and yes, there are daggers. Three of them, to be exact, and there's a thigh holster for each leg that will hold at least two. Regulus goes right for them, instantly feeling better as soon as he has one in his hand. He straps the two holsters onto his thighs, sliding the daggers in place, but keeps the third in hand.

When Regulus looks up, Evan is holding up the hook with the rope attached to it, lips pursed. That's for Axus, no doubt, and keeping it out of their hands is a good idea, because they're fucking deadly with it. Regulus inclines his head towards it in silent encouragement. Evan likes rope, right?

Shrugging, Evan hooks the hook on his shoulder and winds the rope under his armpit, holding it in place as he finds a tactical knife, multipurpose enough for all uses, including stabbing people. He claims that for himself, too.

Regulus slips his hand up and reaches out for the hatchet on the table, holding it carefully as he bites his lip. He really shouldn't. It's not as if they can just take every weapon, seeing as they only have two hands between them, and they don't have a bag and their pockets aren't big enough to hold them. Still, Regulus can't stop himself from stuffing the handle in the front of his coat, letting the sharp edge hang over the zipper.

When Regulus glances up, Evan mouths lover boy. Regulus swats him on the arm, which makes Evan grin at him.

"We need supplies," Regulus breathes out.

"The farthest pole had two bags," Evan mumbles, not daring to raise his voice. He's shaking a little, likely from the cold. "It's far enough away from our friends that, if we're very careful and very sneaky, we should be able to get them and get away without anyone even knowing we were here."

Well, they've made it this far.

With a nod shared between them, they start making their way back out of the cave, now with weapons that they have, world of wonders, not turned on each other. Hm. Trust, indeed.

They stay pressed up against the wall of the cave, which makes Regulus start shaking, but he ignores it because his teeth aren't chattering yet. Peering out of the cave shows that the death eaters haven't moved. By some stroke of luck, Bernice has joined the others, and they're all huddled close together. Regulus thinks one of them is trying to start a fire.

Again, if they're getting those supplies, they need to do it now, while the death eaters are distracted. Evan leans around to point out the pole he was talking about, and it is farthest from the others, nearly around the side of the cave. It's mostly out of view, and it's not even that far from the vine they tied off.

Regulus nods, and then they go.

They stay low, but they move quickly and quietly. Regulus almost doesn't dare to breathe, and despite how cold it's getting, he's sort of thankful that it's getting darker. Makes it less obvious what they're doing, for one thing.

In the distance, Mulciber lets out a shout that has both Regulus and Evan hitting the ground and lying flat. It turns out to be loud cheering, because it seems someone has indeed gotten a fire started. Cautiously, Evan and Regulus pick themselves back up and keep going.

Regulus' heart is thundering by the time they make it to the pole, and neither of them waste time as they snatch the bags off their hooks. They grab one each without any fuss and immediately continue on, heading right for the vine.

As they move, Regulus stuffs the hatchet in the bag, then copies Evan in looping his arms through the straps so it rests between his shoulders. He really should put his dagger in it in preparation for going across the river, the way Evan has, but Regulus wants to keep a hold of it. He'll just put the handle between his teeth when he swings over.

"Alright, this needs to be quick," Evan whispers as he unravels the vine. "We're not climbing back up, just swinging over and making right for the forest. We have to get a running head start and jump up, keep our legs up, and jump to the other side. I'd like to go back to the tree and pull the vine up so they don't see it and think to use it, but priority is getting across. Watch me, alright? I'll swing the vine back over to you and wait on the other side, so be ready."

"Why do you get to go first?" Regulus mutters.

Evan looks exasperated. "For fuck's sake, Regulus, just trust me, would you? We need to get this done as quickly as possible and this isn't just climbing down. You need to see it. Now, pay attention and be ready."

Regulus huffs, but he ultimately gives in, mostly because things are moving fast and Evan isn't giving him much of a choice, but maybe a little bit because of trust, too.

Staying low, Regulus remains off to the side, watching how Evan winds the vine between both arms and reaches as high as he can go as he backs up. With a running start, he heads right for the river, only to kick off the ground at the last second and curl his legs up as he sails across.

It's fine, at first. Regulus can see that he's going to make it. And then, with no warning whatsoever, there's a very loud crack, and the branch gives way as Evan arcs up over the side. He curses, his body flailing through the air, and he lets go almost desperately as the branch comes falling down. Evan only just makes it to the other side as the branch hits the water with a deafening splash. Pale hands break through the surface to drag the broken branch under, taking the vine with it.

"What the fuck was that?!"

"Did you hear that?!"

"Who's there? Oi, I think someone's over there!"

Evan scrambles to his feet on the opposite side of the river, looking utterly stricken as he meets Regulus' eyes.

Regulus, who's trapped on the other side.

The death eaters can be heard rushing closer, and still, Evan doesn't move. He just stands there, visibly horrified by what's just happened, and he chokes out, "Regulus, I—I didn't—"

I should have gone first, Regulus thinks, even though he knows that, if he did, he would have died. He wouldn't have had the skills that Evan just used to make it across. And there Evan is, frozen in place, his eyes wide and locked with Regulus'. He still isn't moving, even with the others getting closer.

"Evan, you need to go," Regulus hisses. "Go now."

"But—"

"Go!"

Evan stumbles back, breathing hard, and there are loud calls of, "It's Rosier! Get him! Get —"

That's all Evan apparently needs to hear before he's whipping around and tearing across the field towards the forest as fast as he can go. Two of the death eaters—Willa and Axus—go after him, but Mulciber and the others don't. No, instead, they come to a halt across from Regulus as soon as they see him.

"Well, would you look at that?" Mulciber says with a loud, malicious laugh. "Now, Black, how did you get over there?"

Regulus' eyes slip shut.

Well, fuck.

Chapter End Notes

let me go ahead and get this out of the way now: yes, we will see sirius (and remus) while the games are taking place, i promise. just not every chapter. we get them in the next chapter, though <3 right, so, we have a title reference!!! the crimson river. fun fact, i actually had this arena pictured before i ever started writing this story. i did tell you that this fic would be different from the original story in a lot of ways, and that includes what takes place in the arena. there are some similarities, but overall, it is VERY different, and i have written it in a way that a lot of you won't be able to guess what happens next. i do love hearing your theories, though, so let me know your thoughts!!!

ahhh, we got evan!!! and then we immediately lost him again at the end 😭😭😭 evan, babe, come back, you were so funny. lmaoooo him having to work with regulus "i have trust issues" black is so funny to me. he really just got stuck with one of the most suspicious, grumpy bastards in the arena, and now he's on the run. regulus and evan were SO CLOSE. they would have gotten away with it, too, if it weren't for the gamemakers breaking the branch. tsk.

then there's james, vanity, and peter. vanity really is the only one with a braincell between the three of them lmaooo. she's just like: hey, first priority is water, remember? and james is like: oh, right, thanks. i totally forgot that life-saving information. LEAVE HIM ALONE HE'S BEEN THROUGH A LOT 😭😭😭 not peter decking james in his face, he really just started swinging first and asking questions second. vanity fully just beating the shit out of him—or trying to—is so funny to me. listen, they're all frazzled and on edge, okay? give them a break.

and then you've got the fact that regulus is now stranded on the other side of the crimson river. how do you think that's going to go for him? at least he's safe, right? 👀 anyways, that's all for now.

current remaining alive in the arena as of this chapter: 20 those that have died as of this chapter: 4, all unknown

Ice

Chapter Notes

hello, hello!

warnings for this chapter:

-references to torture (bluntly stated, but not described in detail)
-references to child abuse (physical and emotional; Walburga and Orion's A+ parenting again)
-references to addiction (drugs and drinking)
-references to the death of children (happens off-screen and not described, you might blink and miss it)
-child endangerment (due to the arena and those inside it)
-references to past violence (not explicitly described)
-references to past murder (explicitly described)
-explicit description of murder in current time (due to the arena)
-explicit descriptions of blood and violence yes, i will be putting a brief summary in the end notes of who kills and who dies in this chapter for those of you who want/need to be prepared/spoiled, which is perfectly valid!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

"It's starting to get really cold," Peter whispers, hunched over on himself in the middle of the cave, by the small, crackling fire with his arms wrapped around his center as he presses himself forward into his bent legs.

James exhales shakily and sees his breath lightly fog out in front of him. As the evening starts inching towards night, it's growing so cold that it's a legitimate concern. Next to him, Vanity is rattling so hard that her teeth are chattering, and she's practically touching the fire with how close to it she is.

"Y-You know," Vanity says through her shivers, "my m-mentor said th-that f-freezing is the l-leading cause of d-d-death in the ar-re-rena. So, it's n-not looking good f-for us."

"Oh, ye of little faith," James mumbles, his fingers numb to the point they're prickling. "Get over here, Peter."

Like it pains him, Peter shuffles over with a shudder, nodding when James gestures for him to sit down on the other side of Vanity to box her in between their bodies. They all scoot closer to the fire simultaneously without even talking about it, holding their hands out to leech off the heat. Vanity presses tight to their sides, still shivering violently.

"J-James," Vanity wheezes, "if th-the temper-er-erature drops even m-more, then it's n-not looking g-good f-for me."

"Hey, we'll keep you warm, alright?" James says softly, nudging her shoulder with his own. "Me and Pete. And we'll keep the fire going all night, yeah? Promise. Maybe freezing is the leading cause of death, but...not for you, okay? Your mentor was just trying to prepare you, is all."

Vanity gives a tight, jerky nod. "S-She was really kind t-to me and Ho-Hodge. Gave u-us r-really good adv-vi-vice."

"Wait, Hodge?" Peter asks curiously. "He was the other one reaped with you?"

"M-Mhm," Vanity hums.

"Who's your mentor?" Peter murmurs.

"M-Marlene McK-Kin-Kinnon," Vanity stutters out.

James blinks in surprise. Sirius had, of course, been very forthcoming about everything he knew and learned about his fellow mentors, as well as their tributes, but in some cases, there wasn't very much to tell. Some mentors are tight-lipped about these things, especially if they know what's good for them, or so Sirius said, because letting the wrong information slip to the wrong person could be the cause of their tributes dying. Sirius did mention Marlene, though, but he had very little to say other than the fact that she had two young tributes this year, who would—more likely than not—die very quickly.

"Yeah, Marlene McKinnon," James comments gently, watching the small, fond smile flicker on Vanity's face. There's admiration there, and it makes James' heart clench. "Sirius talked about her a bit to us—he's my mentor. Well, he's my best friend, but also my mentor, technically."

"I kn-know," Vanity says, sounding exasperated as she rolls her eyes, despite her shivering. "E-Ever-ry-ryone knows."

James huffs a weak laugh, leaning over into her a little harder, grateful when Peter does the same. They're practically squishing her between them at this point, fighting valiantly to make her warmer. "Right. Well, Sirius told us how amazing she was, you know. And they're friends, he said. You know what that means, don't you?"

"W-What?" Vanity asks, looking up at him.

"That means it only makes sense that we're friends, too," James tells her with a gentle curl of his lips.

At this, Vanity cracks a beaming smile, even while her teeth chatter. She turns and presses her grin into Peter's shoulder, stuttering out a laugh, and Peter laughs along with her.

The night carries on, growing colder with each passing minute, to the point that they're all shivering violently and Vanity has nearly stopped—which, James knows, is actually a very bad sign. She's fallen asleep, and that makes him anxious, but he keeps stoking the fire and rubbing one of her hands between both palms while Peter does the same to the other.

At some point, Peter rasps, "James…"

"Yeah?" James asks, looking over at him. Peter has a pained look on his face, and he drops his gaze down to Vanity before carefully glancing up again. James instantly shakes his head, refusing before Peter even says it. "No. No, Peter. She's—I know it doesn't look good, but she—she'll—"

"James," Peter says more insistently, looking heartbroken.

"She's making it to morning," James snaps, his voice firm, and he rubs her hand harder. It feels like ice between his palms.

Peter opens and closes his mouth, face twisting, and then he looks away without saying a word. He shakily adds another twig to the fire, eyebrows furrowed in the orange glow that bathes over his features and dance on the cave walls. James looks down at Vanity, his chest cramped with concern.

At that moment, a cannon goes off, making James jolt and go tense all over. The first thing he thinks is, immediately, Regulus? Then, following that, he flings a hand up to cup the side of Vanity's neck to try and see if she has a pulse. She's still shivering, just not as much, and her breath hits his arm. It's worryingly slow, but it's there.

"Is she—" Peter can't seem to finish.

"Yeah, she's—she's alive. She's going to live," James says with a deep exhale, dragging his gaze back up to Peter's as he drops his hand to go back to warming Vanity's stiff fingers again.

"Five," Peter breathes out, turning his head to look over at the mouth of the cave. "Who do you think…?"

"I don't know," James croaks, utterly fretful, his stomach cramping as his fear and anxiety spikes. Not him. Please not him. He swallows harshly. "I really don't know."

~•~

Regulus stares up at the sky, though his vision is repeatedly obscured by his every exhale, a billow of white smoke that drifts up every time his breath leaves his numb lips. He's shivering all over, so cold that he's aching.

The sky is littered with stars. It feels like being mocked. There are no constellations that he recognizes, as if the sky was designed without them, just nameless stars hanging like props in the sky. Not real. Even still, Regulus stares up at the brightest one and imagines it's Sirius anyway.

The cave—which feels literally like a fucking glacier—isn't exactly the best place to be right now, honestly, but he doesn't have much of a choice. He's lying back on the curve of the top, on the roof, above the midpoint inside the cave.

His bag fortunately came with an emergency blanket, which is probably his only saving grace at the moment. He's wrapped up in it, trapping the minimal heat he's capable of inside with him. It's possibly the one thing standing between him and death right now. There's a variety of death surrounding him at all sides, which isn't just him being dramatic.

"Come on, Black, no point in hiding!"

Case in point: that.

Regulus would scoff if he could, but he's genuinely too cold to manage it. He doesn't even bother to turn his head, already knowing what he'll see. Mulciber, Avery, Bernice, Hodge, and Quinn are exactly where he saw them last, standing on the other side of the river with rocks in hand, a large fire burning to keep them all warm. Willa and Axus haven't returned yet, and the most recent cannon—the fifth dead—rings in his ears. He hopes it wasn't Evan. He refuses to think it was James.

The death eaters, upon discovering him across the crimson river, had immediately begun heckling him. It didn't take them very long to start pelting him with rocks, chasing him around to no end. Going inside the cave didn't work, because Bernice and Avery have freakishly good aim; the only thing that kept him from being stoned to death was scrambling up the cave where they couldn't get the proper angle to hit him.

That doesn't mean they haven't stopped heckling him, though. There were a few breaks in between, of course—pausing long enough to start a fire when the temperature dropped (and continues to drop), for example—but they always resumed. It's been everything from taunting him, to threatening him, to trying to bait him into coming back down. At one point, Mulciber even dared him to throw one of his daggers, try to get a shot in, but Regulus knows better than that. He's not putting a weapon in their hands, not for anything.

It crossed his mind, of course, to just toss all the weapons and supplies into the river so no one could get to them, but he's wary to do it for multiple reasons. He doesn't know how his time in the arena will go, and this is only the first day, so he'll be quite furious with himself if he needs something in the future and can't get it because he already tossed it. Furthermore, the gamemakers surely won't like it, and he's not willing to give them more reasons to target him than he already has. On top of that, throwing everything away into the river would only be possible if the others aren't around to throw rocks at him. He's still considering it, if the death eaters fall asleep, but even still...he thinks he'd have to be in a very bad emotional state and completely desperate before he just tossed away supplies and weapons that could be useful in the future.

Avery—the idiot—had tried to recruit him. Said they'd spare his life if he'd provide them with weapons and supplies. Just throw it over to them. Regulus had told them to fuck off, just like James, but he definitely wasn't polite about it.

At first, Regulus had mocked them back. Taunted them. Did everything he could to rile them up and infuriate them, which was probably stupid, but it's not like they could get to him, and honestly? He'd sort of childishly relished in it. But, as more time passed, Regulus fell silent and stopped engaging, and now he's far too cold to speak.

Technically, Regulus has the advantage. He has all the weapons and supplies at his fingertips. That doesn't mean shit, though, when he can't make a retreat, or even access any of the weapons or supplies without rocks being thrown at him. He dodged and outran most, but a few clipped him, so he'll no doubt have various bruises blooming by tomorrow.

Yet, the threat of the death eaters seems so inconsequential compared to that of the elements. Regulus is genuinely worried that he's going to freeze to death by morning. It's so cold out now that he thinks a lot of the smaller people are going to freeze to death, frankly. Maybe someone already has. There's a fifth person dead. Who or how remains to be seen.

It doesn't help that Regulus can't start a fire on the cave. He has matches, but nothing to keep the fire going. So, here he is, shaking like a leaf and scowling up at the sky. If he dies like this, he's going to fucking riot.

"Hey! Hey, do you see this? The river is frozen over!" Avery abruptly shouts, and Regulus freezes. Well, he freezes as much as he can when he's shivering so violently.

"Do you think—"

"You try it."

"Get fucked. You try it."

Regulus scrambles up frantically, rolling up his blanket to shove into his bag as he flips over. He's still very cold and stiff, but the way adrenaline floods his nervous system and how his blood starts to pump really spurs him into action. He crawls further up the cave, staying low, dagger in hand.

He reaches the peak just in time to see Mulciber grab Hodge by the arm and shove him towards the river, snapping, "Well? Go on, then. See if it holds."

Hodge stares hesitantly at the river, his arms wrapping around himself, and Regulus tips his head down to examine it as well. It's still a vivid red, even in the dark, but a thick film of ice is layered over the top, almost making it look pink underneath. Slowly, looking utterly terrified, Hodge shuffles towards the edge of the river. He doesn't move for a long moment, and Bernice steps forward to shove him in the back of the shoulder roughly, spurring him into motion.

Regulus tenses when Hodge reaches the river and slowly, oh so slowly, pokes his foot out to press the very tip of his shoe against the ice. Immediately, pale hands smack up against the bottom, making Hodge yelp and stumble back, but the hands don't break through the surface. They just rest in place for a moment, then retreat again, disappearing into the depths.

"Oh, yeah, that's how we get across," Avery declares, a feral grin spreading across his face. Regulus sees his body tense, his foot pressing into the ground, and then he starts running, carelessly sprinting right onto the ice and ignoring the hands that bang up against the ice beneath him.

Alright, Regulus has seen enough.

Surging around, Regulus launches to his feet and takes off running, nearly tripping down the decline of the cave as it slopes down to solid ground. He manages to keep his balance and uses the stumble to give him further momentum, throwing himself forward with everything he has in him.

"He's running!"

"Weapons, weapons, get the weapons first, for fuck's sake!" Mulciber roars. "Avery! Avery, you fucking—"

Regulus doesn't look back or let himself hesitate as he darts onto the iced-over river, hearing the hands that pound beneath his feet, trying to get to him, and not stopping for a second. With his bag on his back and his daggers close, Regulus skids across the ice until he makes it to solid ground on the other side, and then he goes barreling right into the forest.

Someone—Avery, no doubt—doesn't stop to get weapons and, instead, continues to give chase, not letting up or slowing down. Regulus makes it into the forest and goes crashing further inside, barely able to see where he's going, but he hasn't been beside a warm fire for the last few hours. He hasn't had any water (to be fair, neither have the death eaters), and he also hasn't been lazing about all day. Despite being so fast, how cold he is and his exhaustion are serious issues, those that mean Avery manages to catch up to him.

Regulus knows when he's close. He can hear it. He's trying to outrun it, but it's no use. Avery slams into his back and takes him down to the ground, and Regulus lands with a harsh thud. He rolls frantically with the motion, attempting to shove Avery off of him, but Avery just scrambles to get on top of him. He straddles Regulus, slapping at the ground, and then he raises his hand in the dark and strikes Regulus in the face.

Avery is holding a rock. A big one. A cold stone that slices Regulus' cheek open and clips him on the lip hard enough to make the corner of his mouth bleed. Regulus can taste it on his tongue, the thick weight of salt and iron and rust. It's disgusting, honestly, but he swallows it in favor of breathing, because he can't exactly spit it out at this moment.

Breathing hard, Avery seems to grasp the rock better with both hands, lifting it high up above his head, and Regulus becomes abruptly aware that he's about to get his skull bashed in. The world doesn't slow down with his impending death; if anything, it seems to speed up, and Regulus' brain fails to keep up. His body has no such issues, though.

It's reflexive. Just—immediate instinct. Regulus throws his legs up to knee Avery harshly between his legs, making him fold forward with a groan, and then he swings his hand up and buries the dagger in Avery's throat all the way to the hilt.

Avery makes a choking noise.

Regulus can see him in perfect detail, even in the dark. He can see the way he's frozen, his arms still raised like he's a puppet on strings he hasn't realized have been snipped yet. His eyes are wide with shock, mouth opening and closing as no sound comes out. And then, Regulus wrenches the blade back out with a deep, heaving breath. Avery's arms fall, the rock hitting the ground with a thud. His eyes are glassy, and they're visibly dimming, going dull. When Regulus tilts and pushes on him, Avery slumps to the side, blood pouring from his throat.

Before Regulus even stands, the cannon sounds, and Avery doesn't move anymore. Avery isn't breathing anymore. Avery has that unnatural stillness that comes from a lack of life, because he's dead. Regulus just killed him.

The world seems to warp in and out as Regulus stares at Avery's body, frozen in place and wide-eyed. It doesn't really come back into focus until he hears pounding feet on the forest floor, heading right for him.

Swallowing thickly, Regulus glances at Avery for one more second, all too aware of the blood that drips from his blade, from the very tips of his fingers—and then, he turns on the spot and keeps running.

He doesn't look back.

~•~

James is the one who stays up even when Peter falls asleep. Vanity is curled up against him, and they've moved so close to the fire that it's probably technically a hazard, but the warmth has seemed to help. She's shivering again, and breathing more deeply, which James takes as a good sign.

Still, to keep the fire going, wood is a necessity, so he drags himself up to brave the cold alone. It's late out now, the moon hanging high in the sky, and James' eyes are itchy with the need to sleep. He won't be able to, though, not until he finds out who's dead and, more importantly, who isn't.

There's six now. Another cannon went off for the sixth a few hours ago, briefly making James panic when he thought Vanity wasn't breathing—but she was. She's strong. She's a fighter, and she'll fight her way to morning, until it's warm again. That doesn't mean James' panic overall has gone away, because it hasn't, and it won't until he's absolutely sure that Regulus is alive. James thinks he is. Oddly, he thinks he—well, he just feels like he would know, somehow. Just...fundamentally.

More accurately, James knows he's not going to be fully okay until he sees Regulus again. He needs to. As soon as tomorrow, James is going to go find him, because how the fuck can he get him home if he's not right by his side the entire time? Vanity has Peter now to look after her until James gets back with Regulus firmly in tow. Tomorrow, James will find him.

Outside the cave is awful, harsh, just absolutely fucking brutal. The wind is like shards against his exposed skin, unforgiving. It's so cold that his frame rattles like his skeleton is vibrating in an attempt to shed his flesh like a particularly stiff coat. James ducks his head down and grits his teeth against it, planning to make it quick, only gathering the first few sticks he comes across. They just need enough to make it to morning.

James has a tiny armful and is just about to go back into the shelter of the cave—not the best, but better than nothing, that's for sure—but then there's the sound of trumpets and horns that make him drop all the sticks as he whirls around. He tilts his head up towards the sky, wide-eyed as he watches the banners of the fallen tributes begin.

"Please, please, please," James chants under his breath.

It plays out in the order that they died. First, there's someone James doesn't know—one of the ones that refused to talk to anyone—and, despite this, his heart still aches when their face hovers in the sky. Following that is a child—yet another one that James didn't know, but a child all the same, can't be more than seventeen years old. A lump forms in his throat. The third looks to be older—which doesn't make it much easier, honestly—but James remembers when she fell into the river, mere moments before Vanity nearly did the same.

The fourth—James recognizes the fourth. His breath punches out of him, a harsh clench clamping down on his chest as he stares up at Dylan's face in the sky. Dylan, only twenty-one, a best friend at home that will never get him back. Dylan, who didn't really have much of a family outside of his best friend, who was so good at starting fires, like he always wanted to keep people around him warm. James swallows harshly and feels his shoulders sag, trying not to let himself think about how it happened, how it might not have happened if James had been there. A mere few days ago, Dylan was smiling at him shyly, and now he'll never smile again.

The fifth isn't anyone he recognizes either. Another child, though. Very, very young. Heartbreakingly young. It's enough to make tears spring to his eyes, because between that and Dylan, he can't stop himself from feeling terribly upset. The tears sting his cheeks as they fall. Maybe they'll freeze there.

The sixth…

James blinks as he stares up at Avery's face, admittedly startled by this one. The death eaters—that doesn't make any sense. James can't work out why Avery would be dead. Quinn or Hodge, maybe, because they're the ones the death eaters will dispose of first. Avery wouldn't stray far from the rest of his group, so it would be hard to kill him, at least not without the others rushing to kill whoever tried. Did he fall into the river? Eat the wrong plant? It's just—baffling.

The sky grows dark again, and James bows his head, exhaling shakily as he gently closes his eyes. Irene is alive. Mathias is alive. Evan is alive. Vanity and Peter are alive. Yes, so is Mulciber, Bernice, Axus, Willa, Quinn, and Hodge—but that hardly matters. What matters the most…

Regulus is alive. He's still alive. He's still out there.

James lifts his head and looks up at the sky, entertaining the thought that maybe, just maybe, Regulus is doing the same, just as relieved to know that James is alive, too.

"Just stay alive. I'll find you," James whispers on an exhale, then dips down to scoop the sticks back up and go back into the cave, a new weight lifted off his shoulders.

~•~

Sirius regrettably remembers his first day in his games. It had been designed like a mountain, hills everywhere, the very top where the weapons and supplies were. There were a lot of trees, but they were thin and not the kind one would climb. The only shelter to hide in was the random cabins placed all over, completely gutted and offering no comforts, usually without doors as well. On his first day, he spent it curled up in a tiny room in one of those cabins, cooking the rat he'd managed to catch and barely getting any rest.

Sirius didn't kill anyone on his first day. No, that came later. Well, rather soon, actually—he killed two people on his second day, four on his third, three on his fifth, one on his sixth, none on his seventh or eighth, then the final two on his ninth. Twelve people in less than two weeks. Sirius Black, everybody.

Regulus has killed someone before the night is even over.

Rather against his will, Sirius remembers each of his kills in the arena. Every single one, in excruciating detail, so vivid that he can close his eyes and transport himself right back to those moments even ten years later. Sometimes, that happens to him anyway, especially in his dreams. It happened a lot more often in the first few years after the arena, completely out of his control, usually hallucinations that James had to talk him out of. A few times, Sirius was so out of it that he'd nearly hurt James, because he was back there, or because he wasn't free from his own head. James never blamed him for it, and Sirius will never forgive himself for it. What a pair they are, eh?

Sirius' first kill, though. Gunther Biloby, twenty-three years old, coming right at sixteen year old Sirius Black with a mace on a chain made of steel, swinging it at Sirius' head with wild and frightening precision. Sirius had nothing but the wooden spear he'd carved sloppily for himself the first night with a sharp piece of stone.

Nothing could remove the memory from his brain of taking that spear and shoving it right through Gunther's eye, all the way down until Gunther finally stopped moving. The flimsy spear had broken off into his skull, so Sirius picked up the mace before he walked away from his first kill.

Ten minutes later, he was back in his cabin, staring at the blood on his hands and rocking back and forth as he struggled to remember to breathe. He never did really catch his breath after that, and he doesn't think he's breathed the same since.

Sirius wonders, as he watches his brother on the screen, if he feels as fundamentally altered as Sirius did after his first kill. Not his last, and certainly not his worst, but there's something about that very first one. It's—damaging. You can't come back after that. The first one is where it all starts; and yes, the ones that follow aren't easier, or less impactful, but…

Well, the first one has weight. It's a permanent weight, in fact, one you can't shake. That shift from something innocent, to a killer. Because you've killed someone now, and you can't ever change that. It doesn't matter if you weren't really innocent before; murder rips at the soul, and Sirius' is a shredded tapestry, but he remembers the brutality of that first tear.

Regulus has successfully evaded the remaining death eaters by taking refuge in a tree. Not up in a tree, but literally inside a tree. He'd found one with a hollowed out trunk, a small space he could tuck himself into, and he's curled up into it now. The death eaters ran past him a while ago now, and they're not circling back. They're not going to, as far as Sirius can tell. They're settling down for the night, trying to get some sleep.

Meanwhile, Regulus is scrubbing furiously at his trembling hands, despite the fact that he's cleaned all the blood off already. His dagger, too. There's no more blood, but Regulus continues to frantically try to scrub it all away, like he's still seeing it there. Sirius' heart breaks, because he knows what that feels like. He knows what it is to look at your hands and see them stained with blood, permanently.

The only thing that seemed to bring Regulus comfort was the fact that James' face wasn't splayed on a banner in the sky. He'd watched avidly, stiff and frozen in place, and at the end, all the tension had drained out of his body for a brief moment. Sirius knew he was relieved about James, and possibly Evan, too. Still, he hadn't been able to see Avery's face in the sky. As soon as it appeared, he'd looked away and went right back to trying to clean his already-clean hands.

Eventually, the cold seems to catch up to Regulus, and he curls up inside the tree, wrapped up in his blanket and looking so, so small. There's a camera in there, of course, so it's easy to see the anguish in his eyes that don't drift shut.

Yeah, he's probably not sleeping tonight.

As for James, he's fine with Vanity and Peter. Sirius isn't entirely sure that Vanity will make it through the night, but for her sake—as well as James and Marlene's—he hopes she does. At the moment, Peter has woken up again to take the next shift so James can get some sleep, but James is telling him about the six people who died on the first day.

But, really, that's all. The games aren't televised twenty-four seven. The tributes do have to sleep, and there's generally a lot of time where they're just casually surviving—nothing 'interesting' to the Hallows—so it's not long before it's coming to an end as various tributes settle in for the night.

Sirius grabs the remote and watches the screen go black.

For a long moment, he just sits there in silence, trying to make sense of all that's happened already. James, who is with Peter and Vanity, essentially weaponless and taking care of those who Sirius—uncharitably, but realistically—doesn't suspect will make it very far. James can drag them kicking and screaming, but it's only going to hold him back, too. That's a fucked up way to think, and James won't think that way at all, but this is about facts. About survival. James is carrying around dead weight, and if he does it too long, he will sink.

Then there's Regulus, who—to Sirius' surprise and mild despair—has been busy, so far. Day one, and he's already done so much that it's hard to organize it all. There's the bond he's seemed to form with Evan Rosier—which, again, Sirius did not see that coming, not so soon. Maybe not a secure bond, but a shaky foundation of trust, nonetheless. In the arena, things like that can get you far. Case in point: Regulus.

He has weapons and supplies. He worked hard to get them, too. Sirius finds the river around the cave indescribably cruel. He's never seen any arena do something like that before; Horace Slughorn is a sick, creative bastard to think up something like that. It's all so—meticulously designed, the terrain reliant upon the weather. They needed the ice to make it across the river, and the drop in temperature also worked against them. They don't have it easy this year.

Sirius will admit to nearly having eighty heart attacks while watching Regulus get to the weapons and supplies. Knowing he's afraid of heights, but still doing all of that anyway, and also not being entirely sure about Evan's intentions… Yeah, Sirius was holding his breath the whole time, basically.

It was so close, too. That's the tragedy of it all. Regulus and Evan nearly made it. Almost, almost, almost—the most devastating word in the world. Fucking almost.

Watching Regulus get discovered, then get rocks thrown at him, that was hard. Sirius flinched each time Regulus was hit, or nearly hit. That didn't even compare to the absolute horror and dread that stole over him when the death eaters realized they could get to Regulus. And then Avery…

For one brief, terrifying moment, Sirius had been so sure that Regulus was about to be killed. Avery struck Regulus with a rock, after all. It has left him with a split lip and a thankfully small cut on his cheek, nothing that won't scab over and heal fairly quickly. But in that split second, when Regulus was just there on the ground, Sirius' heart had nearly fucking given out from the stress. He was relieved instantly, instinctively when Regulus killed Avery with little to no hesitation.

Still, it makes Sirius feel hollow and exhausted to know that Regulus did it, that he had to. Sirius was under no illusions that Regulus and James would make it through the arena without killing people. They're targets, so there's just no chance of that, honestly. That doesn't mean it's easy. That doesn't mean it doesn't rip Sirius up inside.

"Sirius?"

Exhaling shakily, Sirius sits the remote aside and glances over at Remus, who is still here. Remus, who stayed. Remus, who held his hand no matter how hard Sirius squeezed it. Remus, who murmured encouragement and endless reassurances in Sirius' ears the entire time. Remus, who never judged him for any sound of distress he made, or for every flinch he gave, or for any tears that he had to blink away. Remus, Remus, Remus.

"I need a drink," Sirius says hoarsely, peeling himself up from his seat to shuffle towards the kitchen.

Remus follows him. He's quiet and watchful as Sirius draws out a glass, grabs a bottle, and pours himself some scotch. Something briny, smoky, a curl of the sea set on fire in his throat. It's heavy, but his tolerance is… Well, it takes a lot for him to get inebriated, which comes from consistently doing a lot in the past. But, sometimes, just the whole ritual of it can have a soothing effect on him—get the glass, pour the drink, drink it, feel the burn in his chest. Routine. Or it used to be.

Sirius heaves a sigh and sits down the glass after his second pull from it, feeling himself squint. He always feels—guilty, when it comes to his self-destructive behaviors of the past. Not all of it was his fault, but he's responsible for some of it, and it's probably one of the bigger reasons he doesn't spiral out of control again. Well, that, and James. Regulus, too, he thought at one point in time, but he doesn't try to fool himself thinking that way anymore. It's not like he did anything with his sobriety. Even when Sirius managed to get sober (with James' help and support) and stay sober, he didn't go to his brother to make things right. Regulus barely even knew how bad off Sirius was, honestly. Besides, not being sober wasn't ever the source of his and Regulus' issues. Maybe just a small reason behind their true issues, but that was all.

Remus doesn't say anything, but he leans up against the table with his arms crossed over his chest, fingers cupping his own elbows. It's almost like he's holding himself. Sirius has the most ridiculous urge to just duck down and sneak up in between those arms, so they'll hold him, too.

"Well," Sirius says eventually. He holds up his glass in front of his face and narrows his eyes at the liquid inside, studying how it moves in the patterned crystal glass. In the light of the kitchen, the scotch is the same color as Remus' eyes.

"They're alive," Remus murmurs.

"Yeah," Sirius agrees quietly. He takes in a deep, shuddering breath and reminds himself that they're alive has to be the most important thing. He can't linger on what it costs, what it takes, for that to be true. Later, when they're in front of him—no, when one of them is in front of him, because it can't be both, fuck—when one of them is in front of him, alive but not well for all the ways in which they had to survive, if they do—if they one of them does, only one, and the odds—

Sirius squeezes his eyes shut and drains his glass, hissing through the burn and sitting the glass down with a thunk. He does the mental equivalent of slapping his own mind to get it in order, forcing it to be still for one fucking second. When one of them is home, if they make it home, then Sirius will worry about the repercussions of all that it took to make that happen. The priority first, and always, is—they're alive.

He can't think about Regulus, alone and cold inside the trunk of a tree. He can't think about James, hungry and cold inside a cave. He can't think about what they've already suffered, or what they're going to suffer as each day passes until the end. The only thing he can think about is that they're alive, they're still alive, and how he can help make sure they stay that way.

"Sirius," Remus says gently, and fingers wrap around the glass in Sirius' hand, overlapping with his, starting to pull it from his grip.

Sirius snatches his hand away, eyes blinking open as he harshly snaps, "Don't."

There's a moment, a brief stillness, where their eyes are locked and nothing—nothing at all—is happening. Something shifts in Remus' gaze, and then something is happening, but Sirius doesn't know what it is. In the next second, Remus reaches out to grab Sirius' wrist firmly, not enough to hurt, just enough for Sirius to feel it. He doesn't let go.

"Give me the glass, Sirius," Remus tells him.

"No," Sirius bites out, bitchy about it. "No, I'll keep it, thanks, and just who are you to tell me —"

"I'm your—" Remus falters, only briefly, then huffs. "I'm important to you, am I not? Or am I just a fucking servant to you?"

Sirius blinks, admittedly smacked right out of his bad mood for a moment to be very bewildered instead. "Um, what?"

"You heard me," Remus says sharply. "Do I or do I not have a right to be concerned about you? Someone very dear to you, that's what you said. But, what, just a servant who gets no say when it's convenient for you? Is that it?"

"I—what? No? Fucking—of course not, no," Sirius spits out in a mixture of disbelief and...anger, actually. Genuine anger that Remus would think that of him. "I—fucking hell, Remus, is now the best time for this? Really?"

"It's the best time when I say it's time. Give me the fucking glass, Sirius," Remus snaps.

"Alright!" Sirius bursts out, mildly incredulous and also baffled and agitated and tense and—

He gives Remus the glass.

Remus sits it aside, then drops Sirius' wrist. "I have every right to care about you. You gave me that right, and I'm not letting it go, especially not when you're hurting. You're upset. You're under an unimaginable amount of stress right now. If you want to challenge me, that's fine, but I won't back down."

"It was one fucking drink, Remus," Sirius grumbles, and Remus just arches an eyebrow at him. "It was. I'm not a child. I know moderation, alright? I can have one drink, or even a few more, and it doesn't have to mean—"

"But it does mean. Today it will mean. This week—when they're in the arena—it's going to mean," Remus cuts in, and Sirius clenches his jaw, because he's right. "And I'm not—I'm not blaming you, Sirius. I'm not judging you. What you're going through right now, I wouldn't ever hold it against you how you handle it. But." He swallows, his face softening. "But I won't stand by and do nothing, if I can help. I know there's nothing I can do to fix what's wrong, I know that, but if I can be here for you, and take care of you, then I'm going to. And nothing, not even you, will stop me from trying."

Sirius feels a lump form in his throat, and he just wants it to go away. He's so tired of feeling choked. He's so tired of having things repeatedly shoved down his throat, one horrible thing right after the other, until all he can do is choke. He wants to drown it all out, dull the senses, and swallow it all down until it rises back up like bile when he's clear-headed.

Remus reaches out as if he's about to touch Sirius' hand, and Sirius reflexively pulls away from it. Remus' hand retreats immediately, and Sirius chokes on that, too.

"Sorry," Sirius rasps. "I'm sorry, I'm just—"

"You don't have to apologize," Remus murmurs. "Of course you don't, Sirius. If you don't want me to touch you, then you don't. You can pull away. You can tell me no. You can have boundaries, even in respecting mine."

"It just—I just feel so… I feel raw," Sirius confesses, the words wrenching out of him in anguish. "I feel like an exposed nerve, Remus, and it—it's agony. Because all of this… It's not fair. It's not—all of it is just wrong."

Remus looks pained. "I know."

"I'm not the first," Sirius whispers, his eyes prickling with building heat, and he's so tired of crying, too. He's fucking exhausted with having things to cry about. "That's the thing, isn't it?

I'm not the first to have a brother in the arena. Or a best friend. Regulus and James did it first, didn't they? But it's not just them either. It's—it's everyone. Brothers and sisters. Lovers. Mothers and Fathers, some that never got to be. How fucked is that, yeah? It's not fair. It's not."

"No, it's not," Remus agrees softly.

Sirius shakes his head. "And we just. We swallow it. We choke on it, year after year after year, because what else can we do? That's all we can do. And that's not fair either." He exhales harshly and curls his fingers into the counter. "And I'm no better than anyone else. I am what they made me."

"Sirius," Remus protests.

"No, no, I am," Sirius insists. "Don't you get it, Remus? I play my part just like everyone else. This—I'm a part of it. A Victor. A fucking murderer that they turned me into, and I—I hate them. I hate them. I want to tear them all apart. I want to make them see what they've created, and I want them to die looking at it. I want them to choke on it; I want to choke the life out of them. All of them. Every single sponsor and gamemaker and government official and fucking Riddle."

Remus' eyebrows pinch together. "Do you think you're the only one? Do you think that makes you—bad? Because if so, I am as well. In this...you're not alone."

"I—I just—I feel...dangerous, sometimes," Sirius chokes out, his face twisting. "I scare myself, most days."

"You don't scare me," Remus tells him.

Sirius scoffs out a resigned laugh. "Don't lie. Yes, I do."

"I…" Remus pauses, then sighs. "Yeah, alright, you do. Just not in the way you scare yourself. I'm scared of how you make me feel sometimes, but never, never because of what I know you're capable of. I've seen you drenched in blood, Sirius. I still find you to be the most beautiful thing I've ever seen."

"Did you back then?" Sirius asks. "When I was just a person on the screen, covered in blood, did you find me beautiful then?"

Remus is silent for a long moment, then, "No. I didn't."

"I was ugly, wasn't I?" Sirius whispers.

"Yes," Remus says softly.

Sirius shudders out a deep breath, wondering and always wondering how Remus forever knows what to say. Or maybe he's just perfect, and what he says is the truth. The exact thing that Sirius needs to hear. He wasn't beautiful when he was forged into a weapon, dripping in blood he never wanted to spill. He was ugly, ugly, ugly. Grotesque and misaligned. He would never want to be anything else when doing that.

The Hallows found him beautiful. Thought him beautiful before and after and during his violence. Still find him beautiful to this day, for all the wrong reasons, for all the reasons he hates. He wasn't fucking beautiful. He was scared, and dying, and losing parts of himself he'll never get back. It wasn't something to marvel over. It was disturbing; it was something people should have never reveled in; it was something everyone should have been horrified by.

"If you were drenched in blood now—their blood—I would find you breathtaking," Remus murmurs.

And that. Well, that's something else. That's...something much different, a very important distinction to make. Being forced into murder, into becoming what he is—that's an ugly process. But Sirius doing it himself? Being what he is out of revenge, or his personal perception of justice… Well, that is different.

Sirius is learning that choice and autonomy means something to Remus that it doesn't to most. Considering his position in the Hallow, that makes sense. Individual identity and control over oneself, freedom and equality, that's important to him. He can find beauty in that, and Sirius didn't have that in the arena, which is why he can't find beauty there.

"I don't want to be what they made me, Remus," Sirius admits.

"You're not," Remus tells him. "You may think that you are, but that's not true. Maybe it shaped you. No, it did shape you, because there's no way around that. We are all altered by the hands that teach us layers to pain, me and you and everyone. There's no escaping that, and trust me, I know how infuriating that is, but… That's not all that we are. You, Sirius, you're so much more. Don't doubt that. I don't."

"How can you not?"

"Sirius, literally the day we met, you tried to take my mask off to let me breathe. If you were what you think they've made you into, you never would have done that. We wouldn't be talking right now if you weren't better than them."

"That's just—that was just the right thing to do," Sirius mumbles. "It's barely anything. If I could do more—"

"More?" Remus laughs, high and sharp. "Don't you dare. That was everything to me."

Sirius' mouth snaps shut, swallowing thickly. Remus shakes his head ruefully, and Sirius feels his heart clench. "Oh."

"Never undermine your impact again, not to me," Remus tells him, low and firm, gaze sharp and piercing. "Maybe it didn't mean much to you, but me? It was more than I've had in five years, and you've found ways to give me even more than that since you tried to take my mask off. And it's—sometimes, Sirius, it makes me angry. Do you even know how frustrating it is that I—I can't give you anything back? I—I—"

"You don't owe me anything," Sirius says, the one who's speaking gently now, "and you've already given me so much. What I did—that's just...quite literally the bare minimum, and I don't want you to—to praise me for it, or feel indebted. You deserve that, Remus. You deserve to breathe, to speak, to have freedom and control and so much more. You deserve better."

Remus looks down at his hands, lips pressed into a thin line. His eyes drift shut. He doesn't say anything.

"It's immoral," Sirius continues quietly. "What the Hallow does to servants. Well, what the Hallow does to...a lot of people. I don't know your crime, Remus, and frankly, I don't give a toss what it was. You can tell me, or you can never tell me, and that doesn't change that what you go through is just as fucked as what I do. It's not a competition, though the Hallow would love it if it was, but I won't pretend like it doesn't matter just because they put you in masks and treat you like you're a machine. I know they torture you, or they have before, and you don't talk about it outside of broad terms, but don't think for a second that I'm not aware. I'm not ignoring it. If I could kill them, it'd be for you, too."

Remus' head snaps up as he sucks in a sharp breath. He takes an abrupt step closer to Sirius, then immediately takes a solid step back before Sirius can even react. He blinks. "Sorry. I was about to do something quite stupid, I think. That's—I—you can't say things like that, Sirius. It's… It's really…"

"It's the truth," Sirius tells him.

"Yeah, well, give me a bit of warning next time," Remus mutters, blowing out a deep breath and widening his eyes comically as he reaches up to run his hand through his hair.

Sirius' lips twitch. "Sorry that—well, sorry that you felt like you had to stop. I'm not—it isn't—I'm just—"

"Again, you don't have to apologize for needing—what you need," Remus says, dropping his hand. "You need to not be touched right now. That's okay."

"It doesn't feel—right," Sirius murmurs. "James and Regulus are… Well, it wouldn't feel right if I—"

"Oh, well, that's something else entirely," Remus announces with a frown. "Don't do that. You can't punish the Hallow by punishing yourself."

Sirius feels those words like a punch. Oh, that's—that hits hard. Because that's it, isn't it? That's what he does, because he's been shaped so much by the Hallow and all that it's done to him that he feels like an extension of it. He wants to hurt it, so he hurts himself, because he's already hurt, so why not? Because it's so much easier to hurt himself than anyone else.

"Letting yourself be comforted isn't wrong, Sirius."

"James and Regulus—"

"—don't need, or want, you to suffer in solidarity with them," Remus cuts in, holding his gaze. "Do you think that would make them feel better? They wouldn't want that. They would be comforted to know that you're comforted."

"It's—I—" Sirius swallows harshly, struggling to explain his guilt with the mere thought. They're suffering, and so shall he. James would be devastated, if he knew. Regulus…

"The last night, after dinner, Regulus helped me clean up," Remus informs him, and Sirius' head whips around to focus on him, fully invested immediately. Remus' lips curl up. "We talked a bit. He's really quite interesting to talk to, you know. Very blunt. I like that about him."

Sirius softens helplessly. "Yeah, he's brutal sometimes."

"It was—intriguing to see the differences between you, and also how similar those differences are," Remus muses. "He's blunt, like I said, but also very—guarded. He gets his point across by just saying it, usually with sarcasm. You, on the other hand, are simply transparent."

"I—" Sirius blinks. "What?"

"Sirius, you're as subtle as a brick to the face," Remus declares in fond amusement. "You're guarded, too, though. Just not the same way as him. He shuts down. You...lash out. But, when it comes to getting your point across, you're just very honest and earnest and obvious. I can see right through you. Maybe that's just because I take the time to look, I'm not sure, but I don't think those things are mutually exclusive."

"Do you...like what you see?" Sirius asks carefully.

Remus raises his eyebrows at him. "I can't tear my eyes away from you the moment you're within my line of sight. What do you think?"

"So, you do?"

"Yes, Sirius, obviously I do."

"Oh. Good. That's—yeah, good," Sirius says, clearing his throat. Remus looks exasperated. "I like what I see, too. When I look at you, I mean."

"I know," Remus tells him with a stifled laugh. "As I said, you're not very subtle." His face softens when Sirius instantly starts blushing. "Don't worry about it, yeah? And don't—don't try to change it. Don't try to change who you are, who you really are. I like you for you."

Sirius bites his lip. "Okay, now I really want you to touch me."

"And your guilt?"

"To hell with it. My incessant desire for you has it in a chokehold currently. I'll deal with it later."

"Oh?" Remus chuckles, then shakes his head. "Well, I'm terribly sorry to delay your desire, but I have a point to make that will—hopefully—help with the guilt."

"And how do you make your points, Remus?" Sirius asks, just on the verge of teasing. Remus arches an eyebrow. "Shall I tell you, since you told me how I do? You're not the only one who's observant, you know."

"Go on, then. Give it a go."

"You make your point like you'll never get another chance. Like it's life or death. Like you only get one shot, and you refuse to miss. You make your point like you're arguing for it before it's even a debate, and you know you're right."

Remus stares at him, then purses his lips. "Well, I am right, so—" Sirius snorts, and Remus rolls his eyes. "Right, and how exactly did you come to that conclusion?"

"Remus," Sirius says slowly, "you're the first servant who has removed their mask on their own, ever. You're the first to give their name immediately when asked. You're the first to sit down and have a meal with us. You're the first to just keep taking your mask off on your own, because ah, well, who cares who does it if you'll be killed for it anyway, yeah? Those were your actual words you used, by the way."

"Was I wrong?"

"You also poured a drink on someone, despite knowing you'd be punished for it. You called me sir just to fuck with me. You wanted me to touch you, so you literally just rolled on top of me and demanded I touch you. For fuck's sake, you got me to keep my clothes off the floor by being passive aggressive."

"Well, it worked, didn't it?"

"And now—literally just now—when I eluded to wanting to murder people, you essentially just told me to calm down because so do a lot of people, including you. Oh, and when I said I wanted to murder for you, you looked like you wanted to eat me, and then you weren't even ashamed of responding like that. Actually, you scolded me, like I should have known that would rile you up instead of frighten you. I mean, Remus, I say this with deep, deep admiration, but you're fucking mental."

"Mm, well, sanity hardly gets results," Remus says, lips twitching when Sirius gazes at him with helpless affection.

"I like you so much," Sirius whispers fervently, feeling every inch of how true that is. He likes Remus so fucking much that he feels like he needs to just—punch something.

"Yes, I know." Remus' smile grows, only more lovely when there's more to see. "I do have a point to make, still."

"I know. I'm dreading it. It's going to make me awfully emotional, I can already tell," Sirius murmurs with a sigh.

"Possibly," Remus admits. "Circling back—and nice try with the deflecting—I was telling you that I had a conversation with Regulus after dinner last night. He's fairly...succinct, honestly, but I think we understood each other quite well. He said something, you know, about how you were going to have a hard time while he and James were in the arena."

Sirius swallows harshly. "Did he?"

"He did," Remus confirms. "He told me that I would make it easier, because I'm important to you."

"Suppose he knows me better than I thought he did," Sirius says, and his voice cracks.

Remus' expression is so, so soft. "He asked something of me. He said he couldn't make me, he could only ask, and so he asked. Sirius, he asked that I would take care of you."

A broken, yet muffled sound escapes Sirius' throat. He traps it behind his teeth as much as he's able to, ducking his head forward as he squeezes his eyes shut. His heart stretches in his chest like it's waking up with a yawn and a shudder. It hurts a little bit, and feels so indescribably nice, because Sirius—oh, he didn't even realize how desperately he wanted proof that his brother still cared about him until he got it. Because he didn't know, until this moment.

Regulus, who hasn't asked for anything since he was fifteen years old, not from anyone—as far as Sirius knows. What he was asking for then wasn't from Sirius himself, but from James. Sirius remembers it, one of the few things that he can remember in that awful, awful time right after the arena.

"Please," Regulus had said, his voice strained. "Please just let me see him, James. Why can't I see him?"

James had sounded equally strained when he replied, "I'm sorry, Reg. He's just—he isn't feeling well, is all. Really, he's sleeping a lot right now. When he feels better, he'll come see you, alright?"

Regulus made a low, frustrated noise that was dangerously close to tears. "James—"

"If you need to talk—"

"Fuck off, you're the last person I want to talk to."

"Give me an hour, and I'll come by," James had said anyway.

"Don't waste your time," Regulus had snarled in response, and then there was the sound of his footsteps stomping away.

Sirius, at that point in time, was curled up in bed and dealing with a brief moment of lucidity. He hadn't moved out of bed other than to relieve himself in a week. James tried. Bless him, he really tried to coax Sirius out of bed, tried to coax him to eat more, tried to coax him into a shower or coming down to see Effie and Monty, at least, if not Regulus or old friends, because he wasn't quite ready yet. It didn't really work. Sirius couldn't stand to be around anyone who wasn't James, and sometimes even that was very fucking difficult.

This was before the drinks and drugs; he wouldn't discover them for a few more weeks yet. No, this was during the haze where the only time he felt alive was when he woke up enough to wish that he was dead. When it was all nightmares and hallucinations. Ghosts in the corner of his eye. Gunther used to sit in the chair by the closet with a broken spear poking out of his skull until Sirius asked why James never seemed upset about the dead man in the room. James, upon learning what he meant, removed the chair from the room altogether.

But, on that day, Sirius had come out of his daze at the genuine distress in Regulus' voice. Even then, even so smothered by his depression, he felt a spark at the thought that his brother needed him. That spark went out as quickly as it formed, though, and when James swiveled away from the door to see him staring, Sirius turned over to stare at the wall instead.

Regulus never made that request again. Regulus never made any request again, after that, especially not from Sirius. He hasn't asked for anything involving Sirius since, and yet, he asked Remus for this. To take care of him.

"Why would he do that?" Sirius chokes out.

"Because you're his brother. He wants you to be okay, and he wants you to be taken care of when you're not—just as you want the same for him," Remus replies simply.

"I didn't—he wasn't okay, and I didn't take care of him," Sirius confesses, like he's confessing his greatest sin. "I—I—"

"After the arena?" Remus asks. "When you were likely dealing with insurmountable trauma and reintroduction into society unrelated to the environment that you had no choice but to adapt to whilst in the arena? Having to adapt in reverse isn't easy just because it was something you knew before. In some ways, I imagine it must have been harder."

"It was," Sirius croaks. "Remus, it was so hard. It's still hard."

Remus holds his gaze. "I know he's your younger brother, but it isn't your job to take care of him. It's no one's job to take care of anyone, unless they're a parent or quite literally getting paid to do it. Where were your parents, Sirius?"

"Oh, them," Sirius says hoarsely, then gives a gruff laugh. "Yeah, let's just say they were useless and move on."

"Did they mean well?"

"No, they did not. They—well, before Regulus and I were ever in the arena, we knew what it was to be targets. Our parents… Like I said, useless, but if you go past that, then I think the proper term is abusive. It's—that stopped when we got older. By older, I mean bigger. Like, when we looked like men, they stopped beating us, because it's easier to beat children who can't fight back. I, um—I put my mother through a wall, so… Yeah. That's—that's when it stopped for us."

"You put your mother through a wall?" Remus murmurs.

"She—" Sirius closes his eyes, grimacing at the memory. "I had gone over to—to see Reggie. It was after I moved out. Regulus and I weren't exactly...speaking at the time, but I…"

"You went to him anyway," Remus fills in.

Sirius clears his throat. "I tried to. I went up to his room, and he was asleep, but I saw the bruise on his cheek. My lovely father, no doubt. Mother never left bruises; she was mostly verbally abusive or slaps and scratches. And—well, I...don't know. I can't really remember all of it. I do remember yelling at them, and them yelling back. Regulus woke up and came down to see what all the fuss was about, tried to get me to leave, told me I was making a mess where I shouldn't…"

"Family drama," Remus mutters.

"You have no idea," Sirius tells him. "She—I vividly remember her telling me that I couldn't tell them how to treat their son, and I told her that they weren't allowed to hurt him, or me, ever again. It'd been nearly two years since I got out of the arena, but I was going right back there every night in my dreams, so I don't think it was an empty threat when I told her I'd kill them if they tried. My mother, because she is who she is, grabbed Regulus by the arm, too rough, and then…"

"And then you put your mother through a wall," Remus says.

"And then I put my mother through a wall," Sirius agrees with a weary sigh, tossing up a hand. "It was—I mean, it was just plaster, you know, the sort you can easily put your fist through. She was fine. I think I just—frightened them. Which is. Well."

"Well," Remus muses, "I mean...it worked?"

"I—" Sirius blinks at him, then snorts. "Um, yeah, it did. That's—you find out I put my mother through a wall, and you're just...very calm about this information?"

"It's hardly the—" Remus stops, then seems to think twice, then clears his throat. "Don't forget the important details, Sirius. You put your abusive mother through a wall in the defense of your brother. It's not entirely unjustified."

"I feel like you're just excusing literally everything I do."

"I'm not excusing it."

"You're justifying it," Sirius points out.

Remus squints at him. "Well, if it's fucking justfied—"

"Yes, yes, but who's to say it is?"

"I say."

"Aren't you biased?"

"Shamelessly."

Sirius laughs. "Oh, you like me so much."

"Shamelessly," Remus repeats, gaze warm. It's enough to light Sirius up from the inside out. "Right, well, this has given me new insight to you and Regulus, admittedly. It's—I feel it bears repeating, especially now, but it's not your job to take care of your brother, or anyone."

"I can tell you want me to agree with this," Sirius informs him solemnly, "but I just—don't. I won't. It is my job."

"It's not," Remus argues, because of course he does, because he has a point to make. "You were not brought into this world to take care of your brother, or anyone else, and no one was brought into this world to take care of you. No one is required to take care of anyone else, Sirius. It is a choice to do that, or else there's no meaning in it. None."

"Remus—"

"No, listen to me. The people I take care of here in the Hallow? Was I born to do this? No. It's an obligation. I am forced. I don't do it because I want to; I do it because I will die if I don't. James—I've seen him take care of you. Do you think he does that because he feels he has to? Do you take care of him because you feel you have to? Lily and I—we took care of one another by choice, not out of a sense of responsibility. When you put your mother through a wall, you didn't do that because you felt it was your duty as Regulus' brother. You did it because he was hurt, and it angered you, and because you refused to let either of you be hurt by them ever again. That all has meaning. That's important."

"What you're saying about the meaning in it, that's all true, you're right," Sirius admits. "It is important that people care about each other on purpose, not because they're predestined to. I just—it just feels like… Well, that's the thing, isn't it? I always made that choice to look after him, to take care of him, and then I...couldn't anymore. And that wasn't a choice, Remus. I—I genuinely couldn't."

"You blame yourself for it, even while you're very aware that it's not your fault," Remus murmurs, his eyebrows furrowed. Sirius just shrugs, because yeah, pretty much. "I may be mental, but you're a mess, Sirius Black."

"Never denied that," Sirius says with a huff of laughter.

Remus quirks a tiny smile. "You've been taking care of your brother—and James—a lot recently."

"Is it by choice, though?"

"You could...not."

"No," Sirius declares simply.

"Well, there you go," Remus tells him, eyes soft. "You made your choice, and no matter the circumstances, that means something. Regulus? He made his choice, too. He made the choice to ask that I would take care of you, because it means something to him that you're taken care of, even when it can't be him to do it. And Sirius?"

Swallowing, Sirius whispers, "Yeah?"

"You're going to let me do this for him," Remus murmurs, holding his gaze. "You're going to let me do this for him, for James, for you, and for me. And you're not going to feel guilty about it, because that takes what it means from all of us."

"Okay," Sirius breathes out, feeling like some sort of weight has just fallen off of him. Not very much. More like cutting the dead-ends off of his hair when they start getting tangled so much, then relishing in how easy it is to run a brush through the strands afterwards.

"Do you still want me to touch you?" Remus asks.

"Really very much, yes," Sirius blurts out, then tries so hard not to feel selfish for it. James wouldn't be upset; that ray of sunshine would be utterly delighted. Regulus—well, he cares about Sirius and wants him taken care of, as it turns out, so it's not as if he would be offended.

Remus does touch him, then. Just reaches out to slide his hand up Sirius' arm, then tugs him close until he can wrap him up and hold him. Sirius sags into him with a deep exhale, closing his eyes as he returns the embrace.

Sirius is like wet clay in Remus' hands, completely at his mercy and guidance. Something in him settles as soon as Remus is holding him like this, like the most peaceful place in the world to be is the circle of his arms. If there's really a paradise out there after you die, Sirius wouldn't know he was dead if he died in Remus' arms, because nothing would change. He's found his paradise right here.

Remus' lips graze his forehead, then press harder the moment Sirius sways into it, his heart thu-da-thumping away at the realization that it's a kiss. Remus is kissing his forehead. And then Remus is kissing his temple. And then Remus is kissing the corner of his right eye, one hand slipping to the back of his neck to guide him into tilting his face up. Sirius does, and then he's rewarded for his compliance by Remus kissing his cheek.

He doesn't go any further than that, though, for which Sirius is grateful. Not tonight. Not now. Maybe not ever, because Sirius can't handle that right now, with his brother and best friend in the arena, with them suffering and him knowing it. He just can't do it, and he's so thankful that Remus seems to just know that, and respect it. He pushes for Sirius to let himself be comforted, and that's all, nothing else. For right now, Sirius can handle that, but only just.

"I must say," Sirius whispers, "I feel very taken care of right now."

Remus laughs that lovely laugh of his and folds forward to bury his face into Sirius shoulder and hair. Sirius presses a smile against his cheek and lets himself be held.

Chapter End Notes

for those of you checking the end notes: regulus ends up killing avery in this chapter by stabbing him in the side of his neck with his dagger.

for those of you who finished the chapter, how are we feeling?

so the river ices over at night. not very helpful for regulus, who was just trying not to freeze to death. poor babe. 😭😭😭 speaking of the threat of freezing to death, poor vanity, am i right? james and peter trying to keep her warm has me like. also the fact that marlene is her mentor, AND hodge's. talk about a juxtaposition. that will get touched on more later. we do see marlene (and dorcas) again very soon, actually!

back to regulus. he's having a rough time, isn't he? talk about starting with a bang. day one and he's already killed someone in self-defense. me, as the writer: please just let this man REST 😟 and then sirius and remus. oh, my loves. they're just so... i mean, the way they just talk to each other and open up and slowly, over time, grow closer and trust each other more and more???? im obsessed with them. if anyone is upset because they thought sirius and remus were going to kiss, just be patient. it's the first day of the games, sirius was in no condition to be dealing with all of that on top of everything else.

also, i feel like that topic of, you know, caring about people not out of a sense of obligation but due to choice is just...so important. it's so important that people care about other people because they WANT to, rather than because they feel they're required to. people do that every day. can you believe that? humans look at other humans and want to take care of them when they need it, and that's so fucking special to me. like, the world can be awful, yes, but there's always things such as that to be grateful for. <3 also, not sirius being like: i would kill for you. and then remus has to physically restrain himself from dropping to his knees right then and there. they're both SO unwell, but i love them 🥰 sirius is a mess, and remus is mental. well-suited, i would say.

updates on the numbers and stuff:

remaining number of tributes as of this chapter: 18 those that have died: four unnamed tributes, dylan, and avery.

Stubborn

Chapter Notes

warnings for this chapter:

-references to past injuries (mostly implied)
-references to catching/trapping/killing wildlife for food (nothing explicitly described)
-death of a snake—like a literal one, not a slytherin lmaooo (brief and not explicitly described in detail)
-explicit description of a spider-like creature (for those of you who, like me, are terrified of spiders)
-references to possible future death (due to the arena)
-explicitly stated death (though not explicitly shown)
-mentions of blood

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Once, years ago, Lily told Remus these exact words: Remus, you can't keep doing things you know won't end well and expect them to end any other way. At the time, she was quite upset with him and also in the middle of treating the wounds on his back, and he was just a tad bit delirious from the pain, but the words had weight to them. Weight that he let roll off his (injured) back.

That would come back to haunt them both in the end, because Remus did, in fact, keep doing things he knew wouldn't end well as if the results would be different, and they never were. Well, until they were. Different results didn't mean better, though, which he learned the hard way—blood under his nails and Lily's desperate gasps for air ringing in his ears. You'd think, after all of that, he wouldn't make the same mistake.

Remus knows that this, with Sirius, isn't going to end well, not really. At the very least, they're both going to get very hurt, and that's genuinely the bare minimum of what they can expect. There's also a very real risk of being tortured, or killed, or both, or worse. It's actually foolish of them to be doing what they're doing, what they've been doing from the start, and nothing can really come from it. It's not proper, and Remus shouldn't.

As established, Remus isn't good at being proper, or doing what he should. He never has been.

Sirius looks rough when he comes into the kitchen, like he didn't get much sleep. Remus hates that he couldn't stay with him last night. Eventually, he did have to return to his cell, which left Sirius alone with...literally so much stress that Remus can hardly fathom it himself. It's visibly weighing on him, leaving him with exhaustion in the lines of his face and a slumped slope to his shoulders.

Even still, Sirius comes to a screeching halt, a spark entering his eyes when he sees Remus, and he breathes out, "Oh. Hi."

"Hi," Remus replies, lips twitching. "Are you hungry?"

"Not at all," Sirius admits.

Remus hums. "Too bad. You hardly ate yesterday, or the day before that, and I've already made breakfast. Sit."

Sirius sits, blinking at Remus as he moves over to sit a plate down in front of him. Again, he says, "Hi."

"Hi," Remus repeats, smiling again before turning away to go get his plate, joining Sirius at the table right across from him. Sirius doesn't move, just staring at him, and Remus raises his eyebrows as he points his fork at him. "Eat."

"Right. Thanks," Sirius mumbles, picking his fork up. He dutifully takes a bite, and they eat in silence for a while. Remus is just glad he is eating, so he doesn't plan to interrupt. Sirius does, eventually. "You, um. You didn't wake me up."

"I do recall being told I wasn't an alarm clock," Remus says lightly, and Sirius smiles weakly. "I thought I'd let you sleep in without disturbing you, and you needed breakfast."

"We could have made breakfast together," Sirius points out, almost petulant about it. He heaves a sigh and puts his fork down when Remus stares at him. "I just—I mean, obviously you don't have to do anything, and you're not an alarm clock, but I won't lie and say I didn't like waking up to you. I don't want—" He halts, then swallows. "I'm going to be busy a lot over the next few days, and I won't be here very much, so I'd like—well, if you want the same thing, and you're okay with it, I'd like to spend as much time with you as I can."

Remus takes that in for a long moment, then nods. "I get that. I was just hoping you were getting some sleep, honestly."

"Not really," Sirius murmurs. "Not good sleep, in any case."

"What's your plans for the day?" Remus asks.

Sirius grimaces. "I have to meet with other various mentors, sponsors, and gamemakers for the daily watch party. It's where I'll be trying to make Regulus and James' time in the arena less difficult. I won't be able to—well, I have to act like I'm...just alright with everything, so it's going to be fucking awful. I'll be out all day, most likely, then make it back here in the evening."

"Will they still be airing the games when you make it back?"

"Yes. I'll continue to watch it here."

"Right." Remus purses his lips. "Well, I'll be here cleaning, and cooking so you have something to eat when you make it back, then we'll watch together, yeah? And you won't have to pretend to be alright with me."

"You don't have to—"

"I know, but I want to. It's all a part of taking care of you, remember? And, as for the chores, I don't have much else to do while I'm here."

"Are you going to watch the games, too?" Sirius asks. "While I'm gone, I mean?"

Remus nods. "I thought I would, yeah. It's—I'm not supposed to, and I usually don't care to, but it's...James and Regulus."

"Yeah," Sirius agrees softly, looking down at his plate with a tiny frown. Remus nudges his foot forward to knock it into Sirius', then gestures to the food with his fork when Sirius glances up. Sirius starts eating again, and they're quiet for another long while.

They don't speak for the rest of the meal, and Sirius only manages to eat half before he gives up. Remus stands, grabbing his plate and leaning forward to scoop up Sirius'. He moves away to combine the food on both plates onto one, keeping it stored so he can eat it for lunch, then starts getting ready to clean up. It doesn't surprise him when Sirius follows behind with the glasses and proceeds to help.

With a rising surge of affection, Remus watches as Sirius rolls up each sleeve of his shirt and dunks his hands in the soapy water, needing no instructions on how to do this particular chore and seeming oddly pleased with this fact. Remus thinks he would still be utterly enamored with Sirius even if he didn't, and that's how he knows he's a goner. He'd never accept a man who didn't know how to do dishes otherwise.

"Thank you," Sirius says abruptly.

Remus blinks. "You're welcome. Wait, for what?"

"For taking care of me," Sirius murmurs as he washes a plate and passes it to Remus. He's not looking at him, and there's a far-away look in his eyes. "You don't have to, and yet you are, and that—means something. That has meaning, like you said. I'd say I'd like to return the favor, but I'd never wish for you to be in a position where you need to be taken care of. But I hope you know that I would. And I hope that has meaning, too."

Remus sits the plate down in the sink, shuts off the water, then flicks his fingers. Without a word, he turns and pulls Sirius into his arms. The glass Sirius was holding lands back into the water with a glub and a dull thunk as it settles against the bottom of the sink. In the next second, Sirius' hands come out of the water with a splash, dripping suds as he presses closer eagerly and slides his soapy fingers right into Remus' hair.

Sirius melts into the embrace in a way that, quite frankly, makes Remus feel like a god. It's supremely satisfying to have Sirius sink into him as if there's no other place he'd rather be, and that's nothing compared to how devastatingly wonderful it is to be holding Sirius at all.

"You do," Remus says when he pulls away, completely breathless. "You already do take care of me, Sirius, more than you could ever know."

Sirius hums, eyes still shut as he leans into Remus, looking soft and satisfied like Remus touching him has gotten him a little high. A smile curves his mouth, a tempting slope that Remus wants to press his mouth to—but he doesn't. He refrains, somehow, and settles for pressing a quick, fleeting kiss to Sirius' temple, far too tender to be anything other than a big, flashing sign for how he feels about Sirius.

"Oh, hello. Hi. Greetings. Good fucking morning, everybody," Sirius announces when Remus pulls away, and he's grinning now, then he's tossing his head back and cackling like he's just told the best joke. He sounds exhilarated.

"Stop it," Remus says, amused. He gives Sirius a little push. "Go get changed."

"The dishes—"

"I can do the dishes, Sirius, it's fine."

"I'll help you, then go change," Sirius says anyway, then bites his lip as he gazes at Remus in amusement. "I got suds in your hair, Remus. Let me just—"

Somehow, Sirius' hands in his hair lead to them laughing quietly together, playful and happy, and it takes them a while to actually finish the dishes.

~•~

Regulus jerks awake to the feeling of something cold and strange sliding around his throat. He freezes as he peels his eyes open, and in the dark hollow of the tree, he can only just make out something moving along the length of his arm. He has the sneaking suspicion that he knows what that is.

Because it is what it is, Regulus can't be blamed for how he responds. In the next second, he's flailing as he launches himself outside of the trunk of the tree, hitting the ground and frantically yanking the snake from around his throat before it can complete a full circuit and strangle him. He scrambles up when it hits the ground in front of him, hissing and curling up stiffly, and then it tries to strike, and—

Well, the strike never lands. Regulus has already snapped his hand out, sending his dagger flying into the snake, where it proceeds to pin it to the ground. The snake writhes under the blade, and Regulus stumbles back, breathing hard. He turns his head away, face scrunching as he avoids watching it die, feeling his stomach churn. A few minutes pass with Regulus just standing there, breathing, his fingers touching his throat.

A snake. They nearly killed him with a fucking snake. Sirius wasn't joking about them punishing him. No doubt a gift from Horace Slughorn himself, in exchange for his haircut. Regulus scowls and proceeds to flip off the sky, then quickly stops when he realizes that the gamemakers could, in fact, set loose a thousand snakes on him at the moment.

Exhaling shakily and still trembling a bit from the leftover adrenaline, Regulus runs his hands through his hair and looks around warily. It's morning, but not too early by the sunshine that pours through the gaps in the trees, and it's no longer cold. It's as if it wasn't freezing last night at all, and instead, it's warm and sunny, almost cheerfully so.

There's a theory that Regulus wants to put to the test, but he'll do that later. For now, the most important thing he needs to focus on is getting water and food.

His supplies have a few options for nourishment, but he doesn't want to eat those until he has no other options. With a grimace, he looks at the snake, which is now dead.

Well. It's an option.

~•~

Vanity makes it to morning, much to James' relief. It starts warming up when the sun appears again, and Vanity finally stops shivering and gets some color back to her cheeks. She even gets hot when she sits too close to the fire for too long.

They keep the fire going for a bit, boiling more water to help with their thirst. It's not a short process, considering they're using flat, curved stones that barely hold a swallow for each of them, but it's better than no water at all, and just drinking the water that trickles down the cave walls is a very bad idea. Sirius told them not to drink water without boiling it unless they could see the source of where it comes from.

James is admittedly hungry, and Sirius was right to say that he was going to wish he had eaten more, because he really does. He also wishes he'd enjoyed his last meal, but there's nothing to be done about that now. They've talked about setting up traps to catch something to eat, which James isn't really thrilled about, but there's nothing to be done about that either. They need to eat, so.

Peter and James both know how to make traps, seeing as they both learned in the survival portion of the training room, but Vanity never left the bug station to learn how. It makes James anxious, honestly, and so he insists that she let Peter teach her.

"But I don't want to know how to kill little bunnies and cute squirrels," Vanity tells him, horrified.

"Yeah, it's not my favorite party trick either, Vanity, but we could easily die of starvation," James replies apologetically, lips curling up when she wrinkles her nose. "It could be a while before anything is caught, so you two need to get traps set up as soon as possible."

"You're not helping?" Peter asks curiously, without accusation or judgement, like he already knows that James would help if he didn't have a reason not to.

James sighs and passes Vanity the rock for the third—and his last—rotation of water. "No, I have to go, but I'll be back."

"James, I don't think leaving is a good idea," Vanity comments with a frown. "We're safe here."

There's nowhere safe here, James thinks, but he doesn't say it. The words are spoken in Sirius' voice, and oh, James misses him like a gut-punch. Clearing his throat, he stands up and smiles tightly. "There's something I have to do. If you two catch something, don't wait for me, alright? Eat it. All of it. Don't save any. I'll try to see what I can find while I'm out."

"Be careful," Vanity whispers.

"I will," James assures her, his smile softening before he turns to leave, stepping out of the cave.

He doesn't make it very far before Peter is following and saying, rather sternly, "James."

"Yeah?" James asks, swiveling to face him.

"You're going after Regulus, aren't you?" Peter mumbles. His arms are crossed, and his lips are tipped down in a frown.

"Yes," James admits, not even bothering to lie. "I know he's alive out there, Pete. I need to find him."

"You can't actually expect to find him in one day," Peter says, looking incredulous. "James, you could be killed out there. You have no weapons, or—or anything."

"I know, but—I have to," James insists. "It may take longer than one day, you're right—"

"You'll freeze to death at night if you're alone! You start a fire outside the cave, and that will draw people right to you!"

"Peter—"

"If you leave, you're going to die," Peter snaps. "Is he worth that?"

James just stares at him and says, "Yes."

"For fuck's sake…" Peter drags a weary hand over his face and heaves a sigh. "Look, stop thinking with your cock for a moment, yeah? Just—have you considered how stupid it is? Not just for you, but for the rest of us? Me? Vanity?"

"I—excuse me?" James blurts out, startled.

Peter narrows his eyes. "James, you know Regulus is a target. The death eaters want him, and they will search every inch of this arena to find him. If you bring him back here, you're going to bring them right to our doorstep."

"So, what, I'm supposed to just leave him out there all alone?" James retorts sharply.

"Yes," Peter hisses. "This is the hunger games! It's not a fucking retreat in the forest. I am willing to bet anything that the death eaters are hunting Regulus as we speak, and as long as they're doing that, they're not coming for us. I say—"

"You might want to stop before you say anything more," James cuts in coldly, and Peter snaps his mouth shut. "I understand that you're scared, and worried, and so am I—but I'm not changing my mind. I'm going to find him."

"So, his life is more important to you than mine, than Vanity's?" Peter challenges.

James swallows and rasps, "I didn't say that."

"You didn't have to," Peter replies harshly.

"I—" James looks away, a deep sigh escaping him. It's not about weighing lives, not to him. He knows, realistically, that only one person can make it home, and since he's already decided that he's going to do everything to make sure that person is Regulus… Well, that makes taking care of others who also want to survive much more difficult. He shakes his head and looks at Peter helplessly. "I need to go."

"You're blinded by your feelings for him," Peter announces with something like resignation, "and that's going to get you killed." Oh, you have no idea how aware of that I am, James thinks, because that always was the plan, wasn't it? "I don't like it, because I like you. I want you to be alright, James. I want you to be safe, and—and I don't want to do this alone. Vanity needs us both."

"You and Vanity will be safe here until I get back. You're right, I don't know when that will be, or what it will take, but I will eventually come back," James promises.

"You can't do that if you're dead," Peter whispers, his eyes wide. "I really don't want you to die. You're my friend, and I—I understand that Regulus is important to you, I really do, but I just... I'm worried, alright?"

"Do you not want me to come back, then?" James asks, holding his gaze.

Peter frowns, then shakes his head. "No, James, that's not what I was saying. Just…" He deflates a little, swallowing hard and looking at James as if he's already mourning him. In the end, all he says is, "Just be careful, yeah?"

"Yeah," James mumbles, "you too, Pete."

~•~

Regulus hasn't had anything to drink in over twenty-four hours, which doesn't sound too bad until it's taken into consideration just how active he's been in the last twenty-four hours. The running, the swinging, the freezing—it's all taken a toll already, so quickly, and he isn't really letting himself rest. As sore and exhausted and dehydrated as he is, Regulus wastes no time in trying to find a source of water.

It's turning out to be a difficult task, honestly. He's being very careful today, staying silent and watchful wherever he goes, never lingering in one place for too long. The forest is alive with noise, creaking trees and whistling wind and various wildlife on the run, him among them. He's acutely aware that the death eaters are still out there, looking for him, and there's no doubt that they know he killed Avery, so he's sure they're doing everything they can to find him.

All-in-all, Regulus is having a shit day. His head hurts from the thirst. His face and mouth hurt from the fight with Avery. His whole body hurts from all the effort of climbing, and then being pelted with rocks, and then nearly freezing to death through the night. Everything just fucking hurts, and Regulus is in a very bad mood because of it.

It doesn't help that every snap of a branch, or every rustle of a bush, could be someone coming to kill him, so he's on edge on top of everything else.

His vigilance does pay off eventually, though, when he follows all signs towards water. He knows he's getting closer when he presses his hand to the ground and lifts up leaves, rubbing them between his fingers as he examines them in silence. They're damp. Somewhere around here, there's water.

He finds it less than an hour later, stepping through a break in the trees to find a small brook. It's very thin and runs down the weak incline of the hill before him, a tiny waterfall that trickles past stone. It's fresh, though, and clean. Safe. Regulus can't stop himself from diving for it a little recklessly, cupping his hands together to take a deep gulp, eyes sinking shut.

You should have checked the area, says the voice in his head that sounds very much like Sirius.

"Shut up," Regulus mutters out loud, to no one. Lovely. One day in the arena, and he's already going mad.

After drinking a bit more—not too much and not too fast, or he'll get sick—Regulus takes the time to clean his hands. Properly clean them, getting under his nails and between the wrinkles on his knuckles. Still, if he unfocuses his eyes, he can see flashes of Avery's blood stained on them.

He can't clean his hands forever, so he forces himself to stop and goes into his bag to get the container that will hold water. He fills it, nurses at least half, then refills it. The threat of dehydration held at bay for now, Regulus stands back up, only to go still when he hears a branch snap behind him.

Slowly, Regulus turns around, dagger in hand, then feels a bolt of shock run through him when he sees what's waiting there. It is quite possibly the largest spider Regulus has ever seen in his life, except it's—it's something else, too. The spider only has six legs, instead of eight. Where the face of the spider usually would be, there's a torso protruding out high up, along with two arms, and Avery's face. It's like a...centaur, if instead of the bottom half being a horse, it's a fucking spider. Oh, and Avery's face is practically split in half with deadly pinchers that click in blatant threat, his eyes black and gleaming.

"You've got to be fucking joking," Regulus hisses under his breath, utterly appalled. He knew the gamemakers were sick, and it's not like he's going to be the first in line to say Avery wasn't a shit person, but to disrespect the dead like this? To make them out to be a caricature of themselves? And also, why the fuck can't Regulus catch a break?

Regulus can understand that they're using the visage of Avery to unnerve him, but frankly, a spider the size of a fucking bear would have done the trick. He could do without the extra theatrics, thanks. The...Avery spider...thing sways forward, the legs shuffling in a, frankly, creepy way, and the pinchers click yet again in an ominous pattern.

It's still not lunging, so Regulus tries to think of what the best route is in this situation. Fight? He can throw his daggers, sure, but attacking head on will get his head bitten off, and he knows it. Run? He won't exactly be able to run quietly with this thing fucking chasing him, and it's going to draw attention at some point, unless he can get away in time. Climb? Oh, he fucking hates climbing, and can't spiders climb? He is not about to put that theory to the test. Who does he look like? Evan? No. So, running it is. Brilliant.

With a deep breath, Regulus turns and he runs.

~•~

James has located berries. Safe berries, which he knows for sure because he learned about them in the training room. He's still cautious just to be safe, pressing a berry to his lips, waiting a few minutes, then to his tongue, waiting another few minutes, and when nothing tingles or stings or goes numb, he trusts the berries enough to eat one. When, after a few minutes of nothing going wrong, James gathers more to eat.

It's not exactly a full meal, but it's better than nothing, and he's had a whole lot of nothing to be sure about that. He eats a few handfuls until the throbbing in his temples subside, then takes another handful with him to pick over as he carries on.

He's been walking for a long time now, making his way back towards the murder river and cave everyone started at. Maybe the river has dried up by now, and if no one is around, it'd be a good idea to get some supplies and weapons for himself, but also Peter and Vanity. Besides, when you're a target, having ways to defend yourself is crucial, and James seriously doubts Regulus would go too far from it without at least one dagger.

James himself is lugging around the sturdiest stick he could find on his travels. He doesn't particularly want to use it, but it's dense and strong enough to do damage if he has to.

Boom!

The sound of a cannon going off startles James enough that he drops his berries, his head snapping up as his heart starts to race. Again, his first thought is, immediately, Regulus? A moment later there's a shrill, high-pitched shriek in the distance that makes his blood turn to ice.

Before James realizes what he's doing, he's running right towards it at full tilt without a second thought. That scream was one of pure distress, nothing short of abject terror ringing through the trees. Something is wrong. Really wrong.

James doesn't know how long he's crashing through the forest before he realizes someone is crashing right back towards him, running in his direction like their life depends on it. He makes out that, no, there's the sound of two sets of footsteps, which is confirmed a moment later when he collides with two people so hard that they all go rolling.

"Fuck, fuck, fuck! Run!"

"Wait, wait, Irene—"

There's a groan, and James picks his head up to see Irene scrambling to her feet, frantically patting herself all over her body and looking close to tears. Mathias is working their way to their feet, face scrunched into a grimace as they cup their side. There's a gash under their fingers, looking rough but not fatal, sort of just like they were scraped against a tree.

"Mathias," Irene chokes out, "what the fuck?! What the fuck was that? Did you—did you see what I—"

"The giant fucking spider Avery turned into? Yeah!" Mathias bursts out. "Yeah, I saw it, but—but I don't think it was chasing us, Irene. Look, it's gone, see?"

Irene releases a whimper and gives a full-body shudder, still swiping at her arms. "Oh, I hate spiders. Hate them so much. It was so big. It was so—"

James clears his throat.

"Oh, hi, James," Mathias greets, sounding winded.

"Avery turned into a spider?" James asks, confused. "I thought Avery was dead? Died last night, didn't he?"

"Oh, he's definitely dead," Irene spits out in revulsion. "The spider is Hallow-made, James. One of their creepy fucking creations. So, it's—it's like the top half is Avery, and the bottom half is a spider. And it has these pinchers—it's so bad, you have no idea. It just ripped someone's head off!"

"Who?" James demands. "Who's head?"

"No idea. Some girl," Irene says.

"Nearly got me next," Mathias mutters wearily, gesturing to their side with a wince.

"But it's after—" Irene stops and looks at James, falling silent as she meets his eyes. The look on her face makes dread settle into his stomach immediately. "James…"

"The spider," James croaks, "who is it after?"

Mathias exhales deeply and shares a look with Irene, and then they hold up a hand like they're trying to keep James calm. "It was really unfortunate timing, honestly. Irene and I were just running back after checking the river—"

"It's still there, by the way," Irene mutters.

"Which doesn't make sense, because he had—" Mathias glances at Irene, eyebrows raised. "You saw it, didn't you?"

"I saw," Irene confirms.

"Saw what?" James asks desperately.

Irene clears her throat. "Well, we were running back when, out of nowhere, Regulus comes sprinting right past us like—"

"Regulus? You saw Regulus? Is he—"

"James, shush, I'm getting there."

"Well, talk faster!" James bursts out.

"He came rushing past us like something was chasing him," Mathias picks up where Irene left off. "It happened so fast, and then this girl comes sprinting right across from us, just the wrong place at the wrong time, and the—spider literally ripped her head off right in front of us. Irene screamed, Regulus was still just running, and then the spider lunged at me next. I jumped out of the way in time, but scraped myself on a tree pretty badly, and then Irene helped me up, and we ran in the opposite direction. It's—James, it's after Regulus."

"Fuck," James says. "Fuck, okay, what direction?"

Mathias gapes at him. "James, you can't be serious! That thing is huge, and—and there's no way—I'm sorry, but there's no way Regulus can survive that. He's as good as—"

"I haven't heard a cannon yet," James grinds out. "Which direction, Mathias?"

"Towards the river," Mathias mumbles.

"James, I don't think you'll be able to kill it," Irene says warily.

Blowing out a deep breath, James starts backing up. "Only one way to find out. Hey, if you keep going further into the forest for a few miles, then turn left and keep walking for an hour or two, you'll find a cave. Not the easiest to find, it's fairly secluded, but Peter and Vanity are there. If you find it, make sure to announce yourselves when you're going in. There's water there, and Peter is already setting traps to catch something, and you can burn a fire there without it drawing any attention. Just—it's the safest thing we've found so far, so you can go there if you like. Okay, okay, I have to—"

"James," Mathias hisses, "come with us. Don't—"

"I can't," James calls back. "I need to find Regulus."

Irene makes a sound of frustration. "You're going to get yourself killed!"

James doesn't bother sticking around longer to explain that that was technically the plan from the beginning anyway.

~•~

Fuck, fuck, fuck, fuckshitfuck, Regulus thinks as he runs faster than he ever has in his life, possibly. He can hear it behind him, the scuttle of legs clamoring over the forest floor, and it's fucking horrifying. It's getting too close, and Regulus is—

Regulus is going to die.

"Fuck!" Regulus bursts out, fully just pissed off at this point. He swivels around and throws his dagger with all his might, grunting as he stumbles from the force. It's not an ideal situation to be aiming in, running and zigzagging past trees sporadically to slow the spider down, but Regulus has good aim anyway. It hits the Avery part directly in the chest, which flings it back with a low hiss. Do spiders hiss?

Well, this one does. It hisses as it rolls, the pinchers clicking, and Regulus resumes running. He manages to get some distance this time, and he's instantly relieved when he breaks through the trees circling the original field they all started in. He doesn't slow down. Instead, he picks up his pace, sprinting right for the river that is no longer iced over. So, his theory is correct; it thaws in the day, and the bridge of ice forms at night, meaning weapons and supplies are only available then.

Regulus can hear the spider gaining on him again, especially without any trees to navigate around. Gritting his teeth, Regulus runs straight at the river, chanting, "Come on, come on, come on, you fucking—"

His whole body sways frantically and with no finesse as the spider gets close enough to dart out with its pinchers, only just missing him by a few inches. The river comes closer, closer, so close he could dive right into it, and then—

Regulus abruptly slams himself down, sliding along the ground in a harsh skid as the spider tries to strike down at him, but the momentum keeps it moving forward right above him. He splays out on the ground as the spider goes skittering past, tumbling into the water with a loud splash. Immediately, hands shoot up out the water to grab onto it and drag it under.

On the ground, Regulus slumps on his back, breathing hard, then he starts laughing. It's either laugh, or cry, and so he laughs. It's a hiccupping sort of laugh, and it tapers off fairly quickly as he tries to calm down. Fuck, that was insane.

He can barely wrap his head around what just happened. He can't believe it worked, and that was his only shot as it was, so some part of him had fully expected to die. Not being dead is so much better, frankly. There's something heady and horrible and nausea-inducing about nearly dying, particularly by having your head ripped off by a giant spider mutated with the man you previously killed. It's literally a living nightmare, and Regulus keeps waiting to wake up.

He can't wake up, because this is reality. How? Fucking how?

Blowing out a deep breath, Regulus pushes himself up onto his elbows and squints at the river. He's uncomfortably close to it, so he starts scooting back, not willing to risk it. Once he's far enough away, he stands up and is immediately grateful for the foresight to move away, because he stumbles a bit. The rush of adrenaline is coming down, leaving him shaky and exhausted, but he can't can't afford to rest right now. He gets his balance and draws out a dagger from his right thigh holster.

Great, now Regulus is down a dagger. He huffs and tosses his free hand up, genuinely just—agitated with this entire experience. Not that he expected it to be a vacation or anything, but honestly. It's only the second day, and he's already come close to being dead more often than he hasn't.

He wonders if the gamemakers are annoyed that he used their designs of the arena to his advantage. Well, they can get fucked, if they are. Bastards.

Regulus shoots one final glare at the water, then starts jogging back towards the woods, but on the opposite side this time. He knows better than to stick around. All that running and that scream Irene so helpfully released was surely enough to draw attention, and the last thing Regulus needs is more company.

It's as he's making it to the other side that he hears a shout in the distance, and Regulus doesn't even stop to find out who it is or what it's about. He just puts on a burst of speed with a groan and keeps moving.

Regulus takes a sharp left and sprints for a while, at least until he finds a large gathering of rocks. Very big rocks. Boulders, really. They're all leaning against each other, and Regulus dives behind them, because he needs just one fucking second. If something else is chasing him already, he's going to lose his mind. He just—he has to catch his breath, or he'll die. But, if someone catches him while he's doing so, he'll die.

Frantically, Regulus hunches down to draw his water from his bag, drinking some of it in between his heaving breaths, doing his absolute best to stay quiet. Just for a second, he rests in place, eyes sinking shut as he leans his head back against the boulder he's crouched behind. His body is so sore, but his heart is slowly, oh so slowly, calming.

A cannon abruptly goes off, making him jolt as his eyes snap open, and there's a harsh crack of a stick breaking underfoot. Regulus holds his breath. Waiting. Ears straining. The whole world seems to go quiet, and he flexes his fingers around his dagger, perched on his toes as he slowly turns his head.

There's no water nearby. Regulus knows this, because the leaves are dry. Regulus knows that, because he can hear them crunching as someone moves closer, step after step.

Regulus' heart thumps as his jaw clenches, and he slowly and silently eases himself to his feet, eyes narrowing. The person gets closer to the edge of the rocks. Too close. Regulus has come too fucking far and done too fucking much to die in the middle of pausing for a drink of water. He's just—not doing it. He is not about to die, and he isn't going to run either.

One more step. If that person takes one more step, that's the last step they'll ever take. Regulus will make sure of it.

~•~

James' back thuds against the rock so hard that he loses his breath, and in less than a second, there's a blade tucked up under his chin, giving his throat a cold kiss.

Regulus looks—feral. That's the first thing that James thinks when looking at him. His eyes are sharp to a chaotic point, his pupils shrinking down to a tiny pinprick, the whites of his eyes showing. Like a hunted animal lashing out—that's what he looks like right now. His hair is a mess, there's dirt and grass in it, and his cheek has a bruise blooming under a small cut on it. The corner of his mouth is swollen, his bottom lip split.

Frankly, Regulus looks like he's been through Hell.

He's absolutely gorgeous.

Of course he is. James doesn't think there's a state Regulus could be in that he wouldn't find absolutely, unequivocally lovely, just because it's him. That being acknowledged, James admittedly feels concern more so than appreciation, no matter how beautiful Regulus is, always.

James thinks Regulus was going to kill him. No, he knows Regulus was going to kill him, because he was looking into Regulus' eyes, and he saw it. Regulus fully intended to kill whoever had found him, no hesitation, and then he realized it was James. He saw James, and he froze like someone pressed his pause button. He's still frozen, not even breathing.

It fills James with a sense of mounting dread to think about what has already pushed Regulus to this point. This desperate, ferocious point of defense and survival where murder comes to mind first. A form of self-defense that's become so normal already, only on the second day, that he's doing it instinctively.

There's a shift. Regulus finally exhales, and his fingers flex around the handle of his dagger, which is still poised right against James' throat. Their eyes are locked, and James can feel a tension in the air around them, something charged, like the whole world is holding its breath to see what Regulus is going to do. James already knows what Regulus is going to do, because he's staring into his eyes, and he can see it.

So, James smiles and presses forward into the blade until it digs in just a little, then whispers, "You're hesitating, love."

"Fuck off," Regulus snaps immediately. "I still could."

"Well? Go on, then. Do it," James says, then raises his eyebrows and grins wider, waiting.

Regulus' nostrils flare, his jaw clenching so hard that a muscle in his cheek jumps. He steps closer, eyes narrowing, and the blade presses in further, dangerously close to breaking skin. James holds steady, still just grinning, watching as frustration visibly flashes across Regulus' face.

A beat. Another beat. Then, with a low, furious sound, Regulus snatches his hand back, taking his dagger with him as he whirls away with a sharp curse. He paces away, then paces right back, pointing a finger in James' face.

"I nearly killed you, you fucking idiot!" Regulus scolds, and James doesn't know what makes him angrier—that James nearly died, or that he didn't, because Regulus didn't kill him. He's a complex, complicated man, honestly. "You can't just go up to people like that, James. Not out here. Are you mad? Do you want to die? You could have fucking died!"

"Right, yeah," James says carelessly, peeling away from the boulder to reach out and capture Regulus' chin in his hand, tilting his face to the side so he can look at the state of his cheek and mouth. Regulus huffs, scowling as he turns his eyes away, but he doesn't try too terribly hard to pull back. James lifts his hand to brush his fingers along the outside of the bruise. "How did this happen?"

"Got into a fight," Regulus mumbles.

"With the spider?"

"You saw it?"

"No," James admits. "I ran into Irene and Mathias on the way to you. They told me. Is it—did you lose it?"

Regulus snorts weakly. "Yeah, something like that."

"Reg?" James raises his eyebrows at him.

"It's in the river," Regulus murmurs. "I tricked it into falling in. It's not a problem anymore."

James hums and slides his hand down to gently brush his thumb over Regulus' split lip. Regulus doesn't flinch, but James is being very careful. "So, this?"

"Got into a fight," Regulus repeats, quieter this time. James flicks his gaze up from Regulus' mouth to his eyes, and Regulus looks back without wavering. "With Avery."

"Did you kill him?" James asks softly.

Regulus swallows thickly, but his voice is steady when he says, "Yes."

"He did this to you?" James mutters, tilting Regulus' face again, and Regulus apparently has had enough, because he rips his chin out of James' grasp and steps back.

"Yes, well, you should see the other guy," Regulus says sarcastically as he stomps over to grab his bag. He fakes a gasp, then his voice goes flat. "Oh, wait, you can't. Because he's dead."

"Regulus," James murmurs, his voice as gentle as his hands, because he can see past all his sarcasm and mockery. Looking into his eyes, Regulus is brittle. "I don't doubt it was done in self-defense. You didn't—"

"Shut up, James. You weren't there," Regulus hisses, grabbing up a canister that he screws the lid back on. "How do you know I didn't chase him down and kill him, hm? You don't."

"I do," James replies, just as simply.

"No, you don't."

"Really? Coming from someone who couldn't kill me?"

"Avery isn't you," Regulus says sharply, then immediately grimaces as soon as the words fall out of his mouth. He shakes his head and stuffs the canister in his bag, zipping it up and putting it on. "Don't take that like it means something. It doesn't. You're not a stranger. He is. Well, he was."

"Right, because killing strangers is less difficult than killing someone you know," James replies flatly.

"Well, it's certainly easier," Regulus retorts.

James heaves a sigh. "Look, let's just—we can circle back to morality and murder in a moment, yeah? I have questions. First of all, how did you get daggers? The river—"

"It ices over at night," Regulus cuts in. "You can get across the ice without being grabbed, so that's when supplies and weapons are available. I—are you thirsty?"

"I mean, a bit, but I had water before—" James blinks when Regulus turns his back to him. "Er, what?"

"My bag, James. For fuck's sake, get the water out of my bag," Regulus says, sounding exasperated. When James apparently doesn't move fast enough for him, Regulus looks over his shoulder with a glare that could curl paint. James springs into action, reaching for the bag. "There's a granola bar and a small bag of dried strips of meat. Pick one of those. Oh, and there's a hatchet at the bottom. Take that, too."

"You got me a hatchet?"

"Shut up."

"Aw, Regulus—"

"James, I can still stab you."

Chuckling, James resurfaces from the bag with his loot, politely zipping it up again. "Mhm, sure. So, the river ices over. How did you manage to work that out?"

"Rather against my will, actually," Regulus grumbles as he turns back around. "I got over the river before it iced over. It was—there was this whole thing with Evan and vines and just…" He sighs wearily. "It's a long story. To make it short, Evan made it back across, but I didn't. The death eaters found us, so Willa and Axus went after him, and I was stuck at the cave. When it iced over, they chased me. Avery didn't stop to grab a weapon, so he caught up to me and tried to bash my head in with a rock. Didn't quite work out for him."

"Fucking hell," James mumbles with a wince. Oh, Regulus has been going through it, hasn't he? "And—and the spider?"

"Just showed up," Regulus says. He arches an eyebrow when James stares at him. "Yeah, I'm not pleased about my shit luck either. That's not to mention that Mulciber, Bernice, Quinn, and Hodge are all out looking for me right now."

"And Evan?"

"I'm not sure. I'm assuming he got away, or I'm hoping Willa and Axus met up with the other death eaters again. There's been two deaths since last night, one which was a woman we never spoke to. The other… We won't know until tonight."

James shakes his head. "Eight dead already, and it's the second day. Sixteen left, including us. Vanity nearly didn't make it through the night, almost froze to death, so this is…"

"Brutal?" Regulus asks flatly. "Yeah, I noticed. You said—so, you're with Vanity?"

"Vanity and Peter," James says with a nod. "I sent Irene and Mathias to them when I saw them. There's a really nice cave, very secluded and hard to spot, and there's a source of water there. Traps are being put up, so we'll have food, too."

Regulus nods sharply, shouldering his bag. "Good. Go back."

"Sure, come on," James replies, reaching out to grab Regulus by the strap of his bag and forcibly tug him along.

"James," Regulus snaps, smacking his hand off his bag with a scowl. Of course. Of course he would be stubborn about this. Why wouldn't he? "I said you go back. I didn't say anything about me coming with you."

"Well, you are," James declares, willing to be just as stubborn when the need arises. He makes a swipe for Regulus' bag again, but Regulus dances out of range. James slowly narrows his eyes. "Regulus—"

"Don't take that tone with me, James."

"Oh, that's rich, coming from you."

Regulus mocks a pout. "Oh, you poor, poor baby."

"You're coming with me," James informs him, not at all joking. He means it. "If I have to tie you up and carry you all the way there, Regulus Black, you are coming with me."

"I'd like to see you fucking try."

"Oh, you would, would you? I never took you for the type to be into bondage, but you know, I can make that w—"

"That was quite literally the last moment you should have used as an excuse to flirt, James. What is wrong with you?"

"Listen, I see my opportunity, I take it."

"Oh, please." Regulus scoffs and rolls his eyes, then darts backwards when James lunges for him again. He raises his eyebrows, looking smug. "Stop making a fool of yourself. You know I'm faster than you are, and I will simply run."

"Then I'll chase you," James announces with a shrug.

"That's stalking, and it's creepy."

"Regulus, stop being stubborn. There is water, shelter, and safety that I'm trying to get you to. Why won't you just—"

"There are at least four people—if not six— trying to hunt me down and kill me," Regulus hisses, "and that's not counting that everything seems to go wrong around me. All your little allies, your friends, they'll all be as good as dead the moment I come within five feet of them. I will be fine on my own, as I have been, and you will be fine looking after your little group, of which includes a fifteen year old girl, whose death I refuse to have on my conscience. Now, go back."

James is pretty sure his heart breaks a bit. He can feel his face softening. "Regulus, you're not going to get anyone killed, alright? I told you, it's safe. Let's just—regroup there, yeah? I won't make you stay if you don't want to, but just—at least take a fucking break. You're exhausted. Please just come."

"No," Regulus declares, then turns on his heel and leaves. James follows, of course. "James, I said no."

"Yeah, I know what you said," James mutters, tapping his hatchet against the side of his leg as he walks.

"If you heard me, why aren't you going away?"

"If you won't come with me, then I'll just come with you."

Regulus comes to a screeching halt. He stares at him, that stubborn glint in his eyes again. "No."

"Yes."

"No."

"You know, saying it with more emphasis isn't going to change my answer," James tells him, amused.

"You're not coming with me," Regulus orders, allowing no further argument as he whips around and starts walking again.

James follows yet again, because of course he does. He can be stubborn, too, and he just found Regulus. He's not about to leave him now, not for anything. He's staying with him, all the way until the end, no matter what it takes. His goal is still the same; it's not changing for anything.

Regulus ignores him for a few minutes, then predictably gets agitated enough that he swings back around, and then he has his dagger to James' throat again in a clear warning. James doesn't even flinch, and really, it's sort of cute that Regulus actually thinks the threat of death could keep him away.

"I'm not leaving you," James declares honestly, holding his gaze. "You'll have to kill me."

Regulus inhales sharply.

James touches his tongue to his top lip, then feels his lips tug up into a smirk. "So, what's it going to be?"

Chapter End Notes

okay, you should all know that irene freaking out about the spider is literally how i react about spiders, no matter their size. she's so valid for that, actually. i NEVER rewatch chamber of secrets because the spider scenes genuinely freak me out. like, ron is such a good best friend, because if that was me, i would have abandoned harry in that forest. actually, no, i wouldn't have followed the spiders in the first place 😭😭😭 yall are sleeping on ron. he was braver than me at TWELVE. i would have taken one look at aragog and immediately fainted, like no joke.

the avery-spider was inspired by my own fears, admittedly, because a spider the size of a bear would make me leave this world in a swift exit. i see one the size of my fingernail and im ready to set everything on fire, so kudos to regulus, irene, and mathias for continuing on in spite of what they saw. rip to the nameless woman who died, though 😔 circling back, james basically spent this entire chapter reminding all his allies what his priorities are, and they all basically went: the mean guy with daggers??? the one who looks like he's willing to kill everyone??? bro, you're gonna DIE. and james was just like: yes, im aware of this, did i stutter?

circling back even FURTHER, i find it hilarious that remus and sirius were having a cute little morning—as they deserve—and then it just cuts to regulus nearly being strangled by a snake 💀 remus and sirius: 🥰❤🥺🤱 regulus: 😳😟🐍🤺 lmaoooo the WHIPLASH also, that scene where regulus was running to the river and he sent the spider into it—i want you all to know that sirius was freaking the fuck out the entire time. we get a mention of that in the next chapter, but i think you should all know he nearly had a heartattack while he was watching.

also², i think it's funny that regulus is just so annoyed by everything that's going on. like, he's so fussy and irritated. if he could give a review, he would NOT be giving this arena five stars 😭😭😭 he isn't having a good time, HELP. he's so grumpy, but to be honest, i would also be pissed off about everything if it was me. actually, if it was me, id probably be dead by the first day, so maybe not. regulus, losing one of his daggers: 🙄😒😤 and finally, the jegulus reunion!!! yay, they're back together again. what could possibly go wrong? lmaoooo not regulus three chapters ago being like: i will not hesitate to kill you. regulus now: i nearly killed you, you idiot!!! like, king, where was that energy a couple of days ago??? leave him alone, he is NOT having a good day. meanwhile, james: oh, he was going to kill me... anyway, he's so pretty 🥰 like, babe, you're SO unwell. GET HELP. regulus put his dagger to james' throat TWICE, and this man is thriving.

anyway, let me shut up rambling. let me know all your thoughts and theories, i love them all so, so much!!! thank you for all the comments and lovely feedback!

oh, and the number/people update!

tributes remaining in the arena as of this chapter: 16 those who have died in the arena as of this chapter: avery, dylan, and six unnamed/unknown others

A Reveal

Chapter Notes

warnings for this chapter:

-references to murder and death (because of the whole arena thing, ya know how it is)
-references/discussions of children dying/being in danger (again, because of the arena)
-references to wildlife being killed for food (arena again, but nothing heavy)
-references to past deaths that have already happened
-a little bit of spice 🌶 (nothing too explicit, though it seems like it will be, but i promise it's not)
-angst

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Regulus remembers the first—but certainly not the last—time he thought James was stupid. He was thirteen and James had just kissed a girl in front of him. It was the first time since he was ten years old that he thought James was anything other than wonderful. With one kiss to someone who wasn't him, Regulus felt very justified in finding him stupid, at the time.

For about a week, Regulus hated James, actually. Glared at him whenever he came near, not that James noticed. Stopped talking to him, not that James cared. He even called James stupid right to his face in a fit of pubescent anger, and all that did was make James laugh. But, for a week, James was the stupidest boy in the world, in Regulus' mind, and he hated his guts with a burning passion that rivaled the sun.

Then, of course, James brought him a flower he found on the ground, because he knew Regulus liked to press flowers in between the pages of his journals, and Regulus melted so quickly that being set on fire couldn't have exposed him faster. James didn't mean anything by it, just a mindless gesture of kindness that he was sometimes prone to, usually without any warning whatsoever, but Regulus tumbled right back into his feelings like the slippery slope it already was.

James has always been that infuriating mixture of wonderful and stupid, for as long as Regulus can remember. When he was very young, ten to thirteen, he was completely blinded by his feelings to see all the stupid parts. At twenty-five, he doesn't have those issues anymore.

"James, for the last time, shut up," Regulus hisses, glaring at him over his shoulder. The idiot is beat-boxing. They're in the middle of a death arena, and he's beat-boxing. Regulus should have killed him.

"Sorry," James says sheepishly, tossing his hatchet from one hand to the other. "I'm just...anxious. Do we really have to?"

"Yes."

"But—"

"James, we have to eat," Regulus cuts in firmly.

"Right," James mumbles, "but—"

"Shh," Regulus shushes sharply, reaching back to grab James' arm to yank him down into a crouch. As predicted, the wait has paid off, and there it is—a small deer approaching the edge of the small brook. It could be a doe, or a fawn.

Slowly, Regulus shifts to raise himself up from his perch, lifting his hand as he inhales. Just as he exhales, preparing to launch his dagger forward, a hand catches his wrist and James whispers, "Wait. Reg, wait, look. It's—they're a family."

Sure enough, a doe comes creeping out of the shrubbery to join what's clearly a fawn, their black button-noses meeting for a moment like something out of a wholesome child film. Regulus swivels his head to stare at James, who is looking at him with big, brown eyes and stupidly long eyelashes.

"James," Regulus warns quietly.

"Regulus, it's a baby. A little baby with its mum." James' eyes grow more beseeching, and he sounds so, so sad.

"We have to eat."

"I—I know, but...it's a baby. They just want a little water. Come off it, we have the berries I showed you."

"We need protein, and you know that," Regulus says softly.

James makes a small sound. "We have that dried meat, don't we? We can just—we'll eat that, and the little family can carry on, yeah? Please? Regulus, it's a little baby."

"Perfect size for us to share," Regulus mutters, and James looks more stricken by this than he did when Regulus admitted to killing Avery. Regulus rolls his eyes, then heaves a sigh and reaches out to grab a rock, tossing it towards the doe and fawn without hitting them, shaking his head as they run off quickly. Regulus glances at James. "Your spine has the consistency of a marshmallow. Just what the hell are you going to do when you need to defend yourself, James? Or when you're actually starving?"

"Well, it's not a current issue, so I don't see the point in making it one," James tells him. "We have the dried meat, as well as the berries, and also water. We didn't need to kill them."

"The dried meat is also deer, you do realize?"

"Not those deer. I saved them from their fate."

"Oh, for fuck's sake." Regulus scoffs and swivels on the spot to sit down on the ground with a huff. James looks pleased with himself, the prick. Regulus cannot believe that he's stuck with quite literally the most soft-hearted man in this arena. He tilts his head up to the sky, like he's looking directly at Sirius with an expression that clearly states: are you seeing this shit?

If Regulus closes his eyes, he can almost picture Sirius' grin and hear his faint laughter. Regulus can't close his eyes, though. Not here. Not when it's not safe.

Ten minutes later, Regulus is sitting across from James, sharing the dried meat and berries, as well as passing the canister of water back and forth. It's not exactly a glamorous meal, honestly, but it'll do.

"I wonder what Sirius is doing," James mumbles in between bites, his eyebrows furrowed.

Regulus snorts. "Two days, and you already miss him, don't you?"

"Dreadfully," James admits.

"You always get like this," Regulus says, shaking his head. "Every year when he's mentoring in the Hallow, you just roam around the district like you're missing half of yourself."

"Feels that way."

"Oh, spare me."

James clicks his tongue. "Don't be a prick. I genuinely do get sad when he's away."

"Poor baby," Regulus coos at him, lips curling up when James squints at him. "Fucking hell, you're ridiculous. If you love him so much, why isn't he the one you had feelings for, hm?"

"Well, for one thing, what we have is special and goes beyond the bounds of romance, reaching unfathomable lengths that no one can understand but us, so jot that down," James says primly, and Regulus tries so hard not to laugh at his snooty, defensive tone. It doesn't work, really, and James' eyes grow softer when he sees him laughing. "For another thing, I had my eye on his little brother."

"Scandalous," Regulus comments.

"An outrage," James agrees, chuckling. "I think—I don't know, maybe if our lives had gone differently, maybe we would have ended up together. You and me, I mean. That's wishful thinking, isn't it?"

Regulus rolls a berry in between his fingers, thoughtful. He knows what James means. If Sirius hadn't volunteered, if the games hadn't existed at all, what would they be now? He thinks he knows, and it's sort of heartwrenching. "No, that's not wishful thinking. I think you're right."

"What? Really?" James bolts up, his eyes wide as he stares at him in blatant shock. "You—I mean, you really think so?"

"Like I told you," Regulus says, "we're a great, big tragedy."

It seems to catch up to James then that this revelation isn't something to celebrate, but rather something to mourn. His delight fades out into disappointment like a wilting flower, and Regulus has never hated this world more than he does in this moment. This stupid, fucked up world that took something from them before they even got to have it.

Regulus can picture it clearly, the life they could have lived. One so sweet that it makes his teeth ache. Two days after his birthday, if his name hadn't been called, James' lingering looks would have turned into lingering smiles into lingering touches. He would have shown up at Regulus' door, ruffling his hair nervously, and Regulus would have known instantly what that meant, what it all meant. He wouldn't have believed it at first, but James wouldn't have left him in suspense for long. James is very impulsive, and it wouldn't have taken him much time at all to make a move.

Of course, Regulus would have felt like all his dreams were coming true, and he would have been wrapped around James' finger with no shame. So in love that he was sick with it. Their first kiss, a secret in the dark that left them both with grins and butterflies in their stomachs. Tentative smiles and small brushes of their hands, just two young boys growing up and falling in love, slowly and safely.

It wouldn't all be easy, because nothing ever is. There would be the hurtle in getting Sirius to be okay with it, especially when he was so young and fiercely territorial of his and James' friendship. He would come around eventually, though, because at the end of the day, he would see that they were happy, and he would have understood. Probably would have taken some time and plenty of arguments, but he'd get there.

Then, of course, Regulus would have had issues with his parents, because they never approved of James. They barely tolerated him as Sirius' best friend, but as Regulus' boyfriend? Regulus would have been no better off than Andromeda, completely thrown out for his choice in a partner, but Regulus wouldn't have cared. He would have gone right to James, and Sirius would have come with him, and that would be that.

It would have been a good life. A really, truly good life. Calm. Peaceful. The three of them happy, and safe, and together. Regulus can see it. He can almost reach out and touch it. James chasing him around in the rain before swinging him into a kiss. Sirius running past to shove them in a puddle while cackling. Late nights by crackling fires, soft kisses in the low morning light, the steady comforts of family, and no pain. It would have been a life full of love.

Instead, there's this. There's a name called and a volunteer. There's a freshly fifteen year old boy crying into his pillow every night because he's scared his older brother is going to die. There's a nearly sixteen year old boy coming apart at the seams because he's watching his best friend fight for his life every day, not knowing if he'll win. There's Regulus, so angry at the world that he shuts down and hides away from everyone, even the one boy he adores. There's James, so desperate to do everything he can that he's too much, too relentless, never quitting, even when there's nothing he can actually do.

That's it. That's where it all unravels, until the close-knit reassurance of the lives they could have had comes loose, and this is all that's left. A great, big fucking tragedy.

~•~

"Do you think we would have gotten married?"

It's been a few hours—James thinks, considering the way the sun is starting to set—and they haven't talked since their last conversation, in which Regulus just casually stated that they would have been together if their lives had gone differently.

At first, James had been ecstatic about it, then inevitably got upset when he realized that it would never, could never, be a reality for them. What's more heartbreaking to James than all the things he could easily picture for that life they'll never get to live is all the things he can't picture. The little details he'll never get to know. The different paths they could have taken that he can't even imagine, because they'll never get close to it.

Frankly, it's devastating. James wants something solid, some sort of foundation he can cling to, no matter how much it hurts. Would they have gotten married? It's a niggling thought in the back of James' mind, and he's been working up the courage to ask for a bit now. He's fully expecting rejection.

He isn't expecting Regulus to trip.

As soon as the words leave his mouth, Regulus goes down like a sack of bricks, cursing under his breath as he falls. James' eyes bulge, and he rushes over, but Regulus flings a hand out and glares at him. James comes to a halt.

"What the fuck?" Regulus asks through gritted teeth as he picks himself back up and brushes himself off.

James shifts nervously. "Just, you know, wondering, is all."

"Well, stop wondering," Regulus says with a huff, whipping around to start walking again, but not before James sees the red points high on his cheeks. Oh, he's blushing. James loves it when he blushes. He's the only person in the world who's ever managed to make Regulus do that.

"But I can't," James mumbles as he jogs forward to fall into step beside Regulus, who is still blushing. "It's on my mind, and I'll never let it go until I know. This is important."

"Yes, because theorizing on our fake life we could have had at one point in time is so important."

"It is, actually. I need to know. Besides, if I married you, I would be Sirius' brother-in-law. Regulus, do you even—oh, that would have been perfect."

Regulus sighs. "What are you? Twelve?"

"Sirius would understand," James mutters petulantly, looking up at the sky with a frown. His chest aches because he really does miss Sirius so fucking much. His last words—those two last sentences—still ring in his ears, bringing him such comfort. "Sirius, if you're listening, we could have been brothers in another life. Like, legally. On paper. Oh, we would have never shut up about it."

"It sounds to me like you would want to marry me just for that reason," Regulus says flatly.

James clears his throat. "It wouldn't have been the only—"

"You know, for a self-proclaimed romantic, you are painfully bad at this," Regulus informs him.

"Well, obviously I wouldn't marry you if I didn't want to marry you, Regulus. I wouldn't do that in any life, and neither would you, so I'm asking. Would you—I mean, in that other life, would you have gotten married at all?" James asks.

"If it was you asking," Regulus murmurs, "I know I would have."

"Oh," James breathes out, filled with immediate delight and this fizzy, bubbly sense of giddiness that makes him grin. He swings his hands (and the hatchet), beaming out at nothing like a man who has just gotten the best news of his life.

Regulus glances over at him, then shakes his head and looks away. "Your ability to find things to be happy about, even in the middle of literal life or death fucking astounds me."

"Well, we can't all be miserable little shits like you," James teases, reaching out with his hatchet-less hand to tug on a curl of Regulus' hair. Regulus swats his hand away with a warning look, and James waggles his eyebrows at him. "Some of us like to find things worth smiling about, perhaps especially when smiling is the most difficult thing to do."

"Miserable little shits, as a rule, do not," Regulus points out dryly, and James cracks up helplessly, muffling his laugh behind his hand to try to stay quiet. Regulus' lips twitch as he looks away again, his eyes warm with humor.

There's a rustle ahead of them that makes them both stop, and a tiny bunny darts out and disappears. Regulus stares after it, then looks at James, who mutters, "Don't say it."

"Protein," Regulus says anyway.

"Innocent animals," James corrects. "They're just trying to go about their day, Reg. Literally just let them live."

"You're going to be begging me to do the exact opposite in a few days, when you're so hungry you can't think of anything else," Regulus informs him.

James huffs. "Yes, well, when we reach that point, do me a favor and make sure I don't have to...see it, please. Especially if it's a baby. I'll cry."

"I ate a snake, you know," Regulus says.

"What?" James blinks at him.

Regulus shrugs. "Well, it's protein, and it tried to kill me. I woke up to it trying to choke me, so I had it for breakfast."

"It tried to choke you?" James asks, his voice rising in pitch as he stares at him with wide eyes. "Like, to death?"

"It certainly wasn't giving me a hug, James."

"Fucking hell, just how many times have you nearly died?"

"Too many to count already," Regulus mutters, then he purses his lips as he swivels his dagger lazily—prettily—between his fingers like an afterthought. "I think you might be my good luck charm, though. I haven't gone this long without something bad happening since the games started."

"It's starting to get dark now," James points out. "And cold."

"I'm aware, but that hardly stopped things from going wrong before," Regulus says quietly. "Although, I think it will now."

"Why?"

"The only way to get to the supplies and weapons is to wait for the crimson river to ice over—or do like Evan and I did, but I doubt anyone would. The death eaters know that, so I'm fairly sure they're going back to claim the cave at night to keep others away, or possibly lure them in. They'll be hunting by day and staying at the cave by night, so we're safe from them for now. All we have to worry about is not freezing to death."

"Which would be a lot easier to do in a group setting inside a cave where there's shelter and the opportunity to burn a fire without drawing attention."

"James—"

"I think it's a good idea," James insists. "At the very least, there's safety in numbers, right? We could—I mean, maybe we could do something to...incapacitate the death eaters in some way. Like, if we all came together to form a plan…"

"Incapacitate," Regulus echoes, arching an eyebrow at him, and James grimaces. "Do you mean kill?"

"That's not what I said."

"But that's what you meant."

James clenches his jaw, grip tightening on the handle of his hatchet, and he forces himself to exhale. The truth is, he can't keep circling around reality in his mind, and wanting to get Regulus home means that there are twenty-three other people who won't be making it. As much as he'd love to be a pacifist, he knows that's not possible. Eight people are dead. Six of the remaining sixteen want Regulus dead. So…

"Yeah," James says softly, "that's what I meant."

"Right." Regulus flicks his eyes over James, one eyebrow lifting slightly, just a small twitch. His gaze drags down the length of James' body, then right back up. "Well, looks like you do have some survival instincts in you after all."

"So, you're in?" James asks.

"I'll think about it," is Regulus' flippant response.

~•~

Regulus is very particular about his hiding spots, and he's not changing that just because James is around. If he doesn't like it, he can leave, which he still refuses to do.

Secretly, Regulus is grateful that James is here. He's worked it out by now that people are invested in his and James' little love story, or whatever, so there's no doubt in his mind that the gamemakers are televising every moment between them. If this is what it takes to get a break, Regulus has had enough of a hard time that he'll tolerate how annoying it is. He knows it won't last forever, but for the moment, he's basking in it.

Regulus finds a nice little spot for them to settle into for the night. It's just the ground tucked under an overhang hill that has vines and thorns grown over the front of it. They have to push past it all to get inside—James pricks his finger—but they're relatively safe and secluded inside. It's not the best for warmth, though, and they'll have to get close. They could risk a fire for an hour or two just to warm up, but they can't let it burn for too long, or people will be able to find them.

James is sucking on his pricked finger and pouting in the dark when he settles down, and Regulus rolls his eyes as he reaches over to tug on James' wrist. "Let me see. Oh, it's fine, you big baby. You're not even bleeding."

"Still hurt," James mumbles.

Regulus lets his hand go and starts digging through his bag to find the matches he has. He sits his bag aside when he finds them, and then he starts shuffling around to grab sticks and leaves and proper kindling around the small concave of earth they've tucked themselves into. When he looks back up, James is pawing through his bag curiously.

"What are you doing?" Regulus asks.

"Looking through your stuff," James replies simply, drawing each item out one at a time. "Water canister, tiny flashlight, compass, tape—ooh, small first-aid kit, nice."

"It's just bandages and a bit of antiseptic," Regulus says.

James hums. "Better than nothing. Let's see… Oh, a blanket. Just one. Not very...big." He looks up. "Are we—"

"No, James, I'm going to leave you out in the cold," Regulus cuts in sarcastically.

"Well, I didn't want to assume that we'd share," James tells him with a small smile. "We'll have to get close."

Regulus looks away, fiddling restlessly with his dagger, doing his absolute best to ignore it. That flutter. Damn that flutter in his chest. He recognizes it. "Warmer that way."

"It is that," James agrees, sounding ridiculously cheerful about the fact that they're going to be freezing tonight. "Alright, there's one more thing at the…" There's a pause, and Regulus looks over to see James holding up a pair of handcuffs, his eyebrows throwing a party with his hairline. "Well, now what's this about? Handcuffs, Regulus?"

"Oh, fuck off. It was in the bag," Regulus grumbles. "I didn't pick them out. What would I even do with them?"

James swings them around his finger, eyes sparkling. "I can think of a few things. Actually, if you want to get creative—"

"Shut up," Regulus says, reaching out to snatch the handcuffs and stuff them back into the bag, glaring at James, who just grins at him. "In case it escaped your notice, the whole world is watching you insinuate—things, including your parents. Is this how you want to present yourself to them, hm?"

"Mum, Dad, look away, I'm having impure thoughts," James announces, gasping theatrically as he presses the back of his hand to his forehead. "Oh, the shame."

Regulus tries so hard not to laugh, he really does, but it bubbles up past his lips anyway. He ducks his head forward and pinches the bridge of his nose, shaking his head like he can shake away his smile. It doesn't really work, and then James' head is propped on his thigh, head turned so he can look up at Regulus with that infuriatingly lovely grin of his.

James is just leaning over on his side and elbow on the cold, hard ground, but he looks rather peaceful with his head pillowed on Regulus' thigh, gazing up at him. Regulus looks down at him and fights valiantly not to remember being fourteen and utterly enamored with him.

He fails.

"I really do miss your glasses, you know," Regulus whispers, dropping his hand down beside James' head, careful not to touch. James blinks up at him, and Regulus does miss his glasses. Seeing James without them is disarming, in a way, because James' eyes are big and warm and framed by the prettiest eyelashes Regulus has ever seen.

With his glasses, that's harder to make out, almost like a secret. Regulus has always known it, and it felt like his knowledge, and his alone. He hates that it's so obvious to everyone now, because it was his discovery first. He had so few ways to claim James in his youth, so he instinctively clung to whatever he could, and the muted beauty of James' eyes behind his glasses was one of them.

Also, James just looks unfairly good with his glasses.

"Me too," James says softly, with a pained sort of smile like he may never see his glasses again, and the thought wrenches at Regulus' heart before he can smother the sensation.

Taking a steadying breath, Regulus shoves the feeling away, because that's dangerous. James won't see his glasses again. He can't. Regulus has to accept that. "You know what else I miss?

Heaters. I would kill for a heater right now."

"Er, I sure hope not."

"I meant metaphorically. Well, mostly."

James snorts. "I love it when you threaten my life. Really sets the mood, Reg."

"Yes, I thought so, too," Regulus quips back, lips twitching when James starts shaking against him with silent laughter.

"You could start the fire," James suggests, when he calms.

"I want to wait until it gets colder. If last night is any indication of what we should expect, we don't want to have to put the fire out too early," Regulus mumbles.

"The blanket, then?"

"That's fine."

James looks up at him for a moment longer, and Regulus has to ball his hand into a fist down by his leg so he won't do something as foolish as running his fingers through James' hair. Oh, he used to dream of doing that when he was younger, caught in a daze more often than not until Sirius was snapping his fingers in front of his face and telling him to come back to earth. James would laugh each time, and he always winked if Sirius wasn't looking, like he knew exactly what Regulus was doing. Not that it was hard to work out, considering that Regulus was staring at James' hair wistfully like a little idiot.

It's been ten years. Regulus is no longer that little idiot, so the impulse to touch can fuck off, is what it can do. He keeps his hand balled into a fist and looks away, and eventually James pulls himself up to grab the blanket after putting everything back in the bag, excluding the matches. He scoots himself up and backwards, tucking the blanket around himself and holding the rest of it up so Regulus can slide in.

James is a line along the dirt wall, meaning the open space in front of him is where Regulus is meant to go. That means Regulus will be closest to the fire when he starts it, which James surely did on purpose. Regulus gives him a look, and this only earns him a sweet, lopsided smile from one James Potter.

As always, it feels like he doesn't deserve it.

"Come here," James murmurs, and so Regulus does.

It's some sort of cruel irony how good it feels. Despite the cold, despite being in the arena, despite all the fear and horror and grief, there's still so much comfort in this. In James' arms. He'd always known there would be, all the way back when he was just a child with hopeless feelings. A part of him is gratified to know that he was right, to know that, no matter the circumstances, if he could just have James' arms around him, he would be alright. A part of him hates it, too.

Regulus closes his eyes and sinks into James anyway, wryly imagining the soft sighs and gentle coos of the people who are surely watching right now. It leaves a bitter taste in his mouth, knowing that people are watching something that feels so vulnerable to him. A moment where he gets to let his guard down, just a bit, and they're all witnessing it. He hates it. He hates that he's having this moment at all, that they're thriving on it, no doubt, and he can't stop himself from enjoying it, too.

Sometimes, Regulus becomes uncomfortably aware of how human he is. How weak and brittle he can be. How tired he can get. How he has wants and needs just like everyone else, no matter how hard he fights to rise above such things. He's never felt more human than he does right now, James' arms around him and Avery's gushing throat flashing behind his eyelids. The ultimate tenderness and the grotesque violence, both like a stain on his soul he can't get free of.

"Go to sleep, love," James whispers, sweeping a hand down his back. "I'll wake you when you need to start the fire."

"James?" Regulus rasps.

"Yes?"

"I killed a man yesterday."

There's a long beat of silence, and then James releases a deep breath, sliding his hand up further to cup the back of Regulus' neck, gently squeezing it. "I know."

"I don't think he was a good man," Regulus admits, and he sounds fragile, like he might shatter at any second.

"Well, considering that he was trying to kill you, I can safely say he wasn't," James murmurs.

Regulus swallows harshly. "James?"

"Yes?" James asks, and his tone is heavy.

"I—" Regulus' words catch, and he has to blink rapidly past the stinging in his eyes. "I don't think I'm a good man either."

"It was self-defense," James reminds him gently.

"But I'm so glad I'm alive," Regulus chokes out, and that's it. He loses it immediately, the tears building until they're overflowing, and he tips his face forward to hide it against James' throat and shoulder so all those people watching won't be able to see. He remains quiet, refusing to let them hear, but James can feel it. Regulus knows he can. The shaking, the hot tears on his skin, the way Regulus bites his jacket to make sure no noise escapes at all.

"If that makes you a bad man, then I am too, because so am I," James whispers, pulling him closer. "So am I. You have no idea how fucking grateful I am that you're alive."

"I'd never—that was the closest I'd ever been to—" Regulus sucks in a deep breath, his whole body trembling. "No. That's a lie. Before—even before the arena, I saw—"

"Regulus?" James asks cautiously.

Swallowing thickly, Regulus croaks, "Before I came up into the arena, I was waiting to get ready, and Gideon—"

~•~

Dorcas frowns as she watches the camera abruptly cut to black, the rest of Regulus' whispered words going unheard. Instead, the video feed switches to Evan, who's up in a tree and nodding off. Apparently not interesting enough, the camera cuts to the group hiding in the cave.

Beside her, Marlene goes tense. One of hers is in there. Vanity. She's tucked up between Peter and Irene, close to the fire and still shivering violently. The other one—Mathias—they're sleeping back-to-back with her to try and share warmth. Irene's mentor had sent her warm soup, which they'd all shared, because their traps hadn't caught anything yet.

The camera cuts again to a man by himself, who's wide awake and shivering as he huddles close to his own fire, then it cuts away to another girl, around Vanity's age, who has literally dug herself a hole in the ground to shelter herself in. She's the one who carries around a stick like she's itching to use it and also the one who stomped on a frog earlier, then cooked it to eat.

The last lone tribute is...not looking great. A woman who's curled up in a tight ball as she frantically tries to get a fire going, despite her shaking hands. She hasn't had any water, and she stopped begging her mentor to send her some hours ago. Marlene releases a quiet sigh.

"She's not making it through the night, is she?" Dorcas asks.

"No," Marlene murmurs, "she's not. She's not hydrated enough to regulate her body temperature, and she's not going to be able to get the fire started. She'll be dead within five hours. Over the next five hours, really. It'll be slow. Painful."

Dorcas is a Hallow like no other, and she knows that. She's never been one to shy away from the horrors and misgivings of the Hallow, as well as the Hallows who live within. That being said, the dead tone in which Marlene speaks—how lifeless she sounds—is enough to unnerve even Dorcas.

It's the fact that Marlene knows what it's like to be thirsty, to nearly freeze to death. Dorcas remembers her games. She came so close to dying so many times that it's a miracle she's here now. Freezing nearly got her in the end, and if it hadn't been for the fire she found one person at, she might not have made it. The person hadn't been willing to share, and Marlene looked like an easy target—cold and shaking and hungry—so they tried to kill her. Dorcas vividly remembers being very sure that the 'McKinnon girl' was about to die, only to be stunned when that 'McKinnon girl' shoved someone twice her size right into the fire and warmed herself up while they burned.

Marlene's not your typical girl, that's for sure.

"Hodge," Marlene breathes out when the camera cuts one final time to the death eaters.

Dorcas' heart clenches at the strain in Marlene's voice. It's only night two, and she's surprised her tributes have made it as far as they have already, which Dorcas notes has only made her more stressed as her hope starts to take root. Vanity is fifteen and surrounded by people who are doing everything to help her survive. Hodge is fourteen and surrounded by people who aren't, but he's possibly as safe as he can be, given the circumstances. Being with the death eaters isn't very morally upright, but in Hodge's case, it's how he can survive longer.

The death eaters—like Regulus predicted, Dorcas can't help but note, shamelessly proud of how smart he is—are back at the cave now that the river is iced over. They've got a fire going, and they're taking their time going through all the supplies and weapons. Mulciber has pounded two sticks into the ground, tilting them towards each other at the top, then twining a smaller twig to connect them in an undeniable A.

That A remains on the screen until the camera fades out to reveal Rita Skeeter, who starts the closing segment for the night. Marlene releases her first full breath for what's likely the first time tonight, since they left the party. Dorcas gets the remote and cuts Rita off, in no mood to hear her mouth.

Silence falls around them, thick and heavy. Dorcas wonders if Marlene regrets coming with her here when they left the watch party, because she's just sitting here with a Hallow who literally works with these people that are sent into an arena to die. Marlene has been very composed for the most part, and Dorcas had hoped that she could be a source of comfort, if nothing else, but now she's wondering if she made a mistake.

The Hallow is Hollow necklace she's wearing suddenly feels so much heavier.

They didn't leave the party too long after Sirius did. In fact, they were mostly with him, especially during that time when Regulus was being chased by a fucking spider with Avery's face. Dorcas is pretty sure that Sirius nearly burst into tears when Regulus hit the ground right before the river, sending the spider into the water. He'd had to bend over and press his hand to his chest, winded and laughing breathlessly at the same time and cadence as his brother on the screen. Dorcas remembers rubbing his back and feeling how hard and fast his heart was thumping, and she remembers thinking that it had to be very hard and fast if she could feel it from his back.

Nonetheless, Sirius did leave after James and Regulus reunited, which the entire party had been buzzing about. This early in the games, wasting sponsors on something would be too much of a risk, especially when things are sure to get much worse down the line. The gamemakers were already chattering about what they were hoping the tributes would find, or get into, or do. One way or another, things are going to happen.

Mostly, though, everyone was very excited about Regulus and James. No one quite knows how Regulus feels for James, so they're all invested in cheering James on in winning him over. Hoping for love. It makes Dorcas want to scream at them all, because how can that source of entertainment be more important to them than these people's lives?

Marlene stuck around to sweet-talk some more sponsors, trying so fucking hard to get someone to help her at least send Vanity a blanket. No one would go for it, though. Not one fucking person would offer up anything.

Dorcas would have, if she could. She'd give every damn bit of her money to Marlene, to Sirius, to the mentor of that woman who isn't going to survive the night. But there's a specific process it takes to become a sponsor, and not every Hallow qualifies. Dorcas is among those that don't, though she suspects that's because she would donate too much. It's a delicate balance, the way these games are run, and there's nothing delicate about Dorcas. She's bold, always.

In the end, defeated and exhausted, Marlene had come back to Dorcas to tell her that she was leaving, but it was nice talking to her. This is when Dorcas—bold as she is—outright asked if she'd like to come back to her suite and watch the games with her, in case she didn't want to be alone. She said it just like that, laying it all out, and Marlene had only paused for one moment before she nodded and followed her out the door.

And here they are. Dorcas wonders if Marlene feels less alone. She doesn't think Marlene does, and she can't even blame her.

"Marlene," Dorcas murmurs, turning to look at her.

"Yeah?" Marlene replies, her voice hoarse.

"Tell me what I can do to help you," Dorcas says simply, because that's what it comes down to, and she'll do whatever it is that Marlene needs from her.

Marlene glances at her, eyebrows furrowed. "Are you worried about them? Regulus and James, I mean?"

"Yes," Dorcas admits. "They're—I care about them."

"Can you care about Hodge and Vanity, too?" Marlene asks, and the words come out thick, a shiny layer starting to form on her eyes. "I'm so tired of being the only one."

Dorcas reaches out to grab her hand, only briefly startled by how tightly Marlene grips it back, clinging to it. "You're not the only one. I care about them, too. Hodge is safe right now. Vanity—she's strong, and she'll make it through to the morning again, Marlene. I care. I promise I care."

A wet breath escapes Marlene's mouth, nearly a whine, and then she folds forward into Dorcas like she's not strong enough to hold herself up anymore. Dorcas immediately lets her hand go to wrap her arms around her instead, stroking her hair and letting her cry, her own eyes stinging.

It's such a harrowing thing, utter desolation, because Marlene is doing something, anything, everything for these children, and everyone else is doing—nothing. Dorcas can tell how tired she is, how much it's weighing on her, how it's stripping her piece by piece until she's too worn down to pretend to be anything else. It's Dorcas' first year involved in this outside of being a viewer, but it's Marlene's third year of being a mentor, and the insight to how awful it is makes Dorcas want to set the entire Hallow on fire—well, more than she already does.

"Thank you," Marlene chokes out as she pulls away. "Thank you for caring about them. Dorcas—"

"Shh, it's okay," Dorcas murmurs, reaching up to cup her face and gently wipe away her tears. Her stomach twists with the knowledge that they've come to live in a world where caring about people—living, breathing people whose names are picked in an unfortunate stroke of bad luck—is so rare that she's being thanked for it.

How did it come to this? Why isn't it normalized to the point that it's expected? Dorcas doesn't know how to explain to other Hallows that they should just care about people, no matter what, without question. She tries to, through fashion and expression, one of the few things that seems to move Hallows and make them feel something past their own privilege.

"They're all okay." Marlene releases a scratchy laugh and reaches up to scrub at her face, clearing her throat. She cleans herself up and blows out a deep breath, eyes sinking shut as her shoulders slump. "For now, they're all okay."

"Yeah, they are," Dorcas agrees, her gaze turning back to the blank screen, eyebrows furrowing. Again, her mind turns back to Regulus and James, their final conversation.

"Dorcas?" Marlene asks quietly.

"Did that ending seem—strange to you?" Dorcas murmurs cautiously, glancing back at Marlene, who frowns. "When they cut away from Regulus and James, I mean. Why would they do that when everyone is chomping at the bits for every little second of screen time for them? They were still talking."

Marlene opens her mouth, then closes it, then eyes Dorcas with a more judgemental frown. "Well, it was a heavy moment, Dorcas. Emotional. They deserved their privacy. Surely you don't think you were entitled to—"

"No, I don't, but they do," Dorcas cuts in, shaking her head as she glances back to the screen. "The gamemakers. The viewers. The sponsors. The higher powers, whatever you want to call them. They had to have been salivating over that moment between James and Regulus, so why would they cut it?"

"You think they...did it on purpose?" Marlene says, sounding confused.

Dorcas frowns. "He mentioned Gideon. You heard that, right? Regulus mentioned him."

"Yeah."

"Why would he do that when he was talking about death?"

Marlene blinks. "Um, I...don't know? Maybe Gideon gave him advice? You said Gideon was close with Regulus, while Fabian was close with James."

"I haven't seen them in two days," Dorcas says, gaze fixed on the black screen as her mind ticks over like a timer almost about to go off. "The first day is one thing. Everyone watches the first day of the games on their own, that's normal, but they should have been at the party today. I thought maybe they had just taken the first day hard because they were so worried about James and Regulus, so maybe they got drunk and weren't feeling well afterwards, which is dangerously close to what I almost did, if I'm honest, so I wouldn't blame them. This is—it's a lot harder when it's—when you're—"

"In it?" Marlene asks softly.

Dorcas' gaze snaps over to her, and she can feel her face soften as Marlene gives her a slightly bitter smile. "Yeah, that."

Marlene's smile falls, and she doesn't say anything else. They stare at each other, their hands tangled loosely in Marlene's lap where they'd fallen after wiping away her tears. Slowly, a fire not unlike the one she pushed someone into starts to grow in Marlene's eyes, and her nails push into the skin of Dorcas' palm. Dorcas can almost taste her resentment.

"Do you hate me, then?" Dorcas challenges.

"I hate the Hallow. I hate Riddle. I hate—" Marlene stops, and she gives a rueful chuckle. "I want to hate you, but I'm finding that rather difficult to do. You may not be like the rest of the Hallows, but you're still a Hallow, Dorcas. I should hate you."

"Is that so?" Dorcas says, arching an eyebrow.

Marlene scoffs and digs her nails in harder. "Don't pretend that you don't watch the games from a position of safety. Don't pretend you never enjoyed them."

"When I was a child, I did enjoy them," Dorcas admits. "It was the biggest event of the year. They threw parties and parades. People praised their favorite tributes, and cried when they died, then picked a favorite out of those that were left. The other students at school would gossip about their favorites, and new trends would start that the tributes created, and yes, I enjoyed them, but then I grew the fuck up."

"You—" Marlene blinks, her nails going slack, likely from surprise. "What?"

"I grew up," Dorcas repeats. "What were you expecting? Some tragic backstory where I found my whole worldview changing because something significant happened to change my mind? No. I literally just grew up. I got old enough to have the critical thinking skills to look past all the propaganda to wonder to myself, what if that was me? It's called basic fucking decency, Marlene. Not many Hallows are decent people, but I'm one of the few, and I'm not going to act like I'm not when you want a punching bag. You want a Hallow to lash out at, is that it?"

"Dorcas," Marlene says, an edge to her voice.

"I know I'm a Hallow," Dorcas continues sharply. "That doesn't mean I don't care, or that I'm not capable of caring without seeing how the other side lives, as it were. Why do you think I got into fashion? You don't think I'm not angry that no one cares, Marlene? It's fucking exhausting, I know, but I have to do something. You have no idea what I've—" She halts, then exhales and shakes her head. "My point is, being angry at the Hallows, that's fair. I'm angry, too, and I am a damn Hallow. But don't be angry at a Hallow that wants to help. We're rare enough as it is. So, if you want a Hallow to lash out at, maybe take the time to let me know I'm your target, yeah?"

"What, so you can stand still?" Marlene asks sarcastically.

"Maybe," Dorcas replies, keeping her voice low. She holds Marlene's gaze. "How do you know I wouldn't gladly hold still for you if you don't even ask?"

Marlene's eyes drop to her mouth, then dart right back up, her jaw clenching like she's frustrated by the slip. "With how angry I am, I don't really think I'll be all that gentle."

"Maybe I like it rough," Dorcas shoots back, letting her eyes droop as a slow smile spreads across her face. Marlene is coiled tight with all the grace of a predator about to pounce, and Dorcas is practically taunting her to leap.

"There's not that much space between rough and wrong, you know," Marlene says, taking a deep breath as she leans back, pulling her hands away. "You're right. You've been so kind, and I can't place the blame of all Hallows on you. Your work is incredible, did you know that? It's seen as radical and borderline traitorous, but it's—it's important, so don't think for a second that I'm ignorant to what you do and have been doing since before you became an official stylist. And you care. You genuinely care, and that's important, too. Dorcas, I'm sorry."

Dorcas quirks a small smile, her chest warm. "I get the anger. Sometimes I look in the mirror and feel it when I see my reflection, and not just because I'm a Hallow, but because I'm furious with myself for not figuring out how to sneak my way into Riddle's safe little castle and put a bullet in his brain while he's asleep. Yet. But one day…"

"Oh, so we have the same anger issues about the same things. Nice to know," Marlene teases, and the tension starts to fade into something calm.

"I'm not against working through some of those anger issues with you," Dorcas says lightly, because she would very much like to get the sexual tension back, thank you.

It works. Marlene inhales sharply, then once again studies Dorcas' mouth like she's figuring out the perfect spot to bite. When she exhales, she mutters a warning, "I haven't been with anyone since my games, Dorcas. I still—I don't know how to be gentle sometimes."

"Well, if you want to be with me," Dorcas says, slow and syrupy as she leans back on her elbows, eyelids drooping in the most blatant fuck me look she can make, "it's like I said. Maybe I like it rough."

"Can you throw a punch?" Marlene asks.

Dorcas is admittedly a little startled by this, so much so that she briefly pauses her whole seduction technique. "What?"

"Can you?"

"Um. Yes?"

Marlene crooks an eyebrow. "You don't sound so sure."

"I can...theoretically throw a punch," Dorcas says sheepishly. Her fists are admittedly not her usual choice of weapon.

"Right." Marlene's mouth twitches, and then she shifts to the side to plant her feet on the floor, spreading her legs a little and propping one leg higher than the other. She proceeds to tap it and watch Dorcas with a tiny smirk tugging at the corners of her lips. "Well? Come on."

"Oh," Dorcas murmurs the moment she realizes, and then she hikes up the sides of her dress and knee-walks over to Marlene before easing into her lap, straddling her elevated thigh.

"If I get too mean, or I panic and have some sort of flashback to the arena, think you're trying to kill me or something, then you're going to fling yourself off my lap, pick that bottle up off the table, and smash it over my head," Marlene says.

"I am absolutely not going to do that," Dorcas replies.

Marlene sighs. "For your own safety, Dorcas. I told you, I haven't done this since before the arena, so I—I just want to be sure. That's all."

"We don't have to do this, you know," Dorcas says softly, reaching out to gently push Marlene's hair back from her shoulder, revealing the faded scar on the side of her throat.

"I know, and if you've decided you don't want to, then that's fine," Marlene responds calmly. She's really quite relaxed, actually, not seeming bothered by Dorcas in her lap and eyeing her scar at all. "But I do want to, if you still want to. I'm a person, and I should be able to do these things just like anyone else. I just—I don't know how it will go, because you'll be the first. I don't think it will go wrong, but I can't be sure until…"

"Right, well, you let me be the judge of what I can and cannot handle, alright?" Dorcas declares firmly.

"Oh, I'm sure you're more capable than anyone knows," Marlene murmurs, gaze dropping down to where her hand cups Dorcas' bent knee before slowly sliding up her leg. Her grip is firm, not light and teasing.

Dorcas chuckles breathlessly. "You have no idea."

With that, she rocks forward to duck in and kiss Marlene with enough force and intensity that her head tips back. It's their first kiss, and it is not gentle, or tentative, or sweet. It's hot and sharp, a little rough, but not enough to hurt. Marlene does bite her lip, and Dorcas' head spins as soon as she does it. The kiss has no concept of zero to one hundred when there was no zero to start with; it's immediate one hundred from the moment their lips meet, open-mouthed and desperate.

Marlene's hand clamps down on her thigh, digging in hard, and then she's shoving her hand up further, with more urgency, pushing at Dorcas' dress to grab onto her side and fully just haul her closer. Dorcas kisses her harder as a reward, and then she's the one that gets a prize, because Marlene releases this lovely little moan that drags out into a full-blown whimper, and Dorcas has never gotten so hot everywhere so quickly in her life. In the next second, she's frantically tugging at her dress, carelessly trying to snatch it off.

"Off?" Marlene mumbles as she pulls away from the kiss, her hand twisting the fabric of Dorcas' dress like she's about to rip the fucking thing to shreds.

Dorcas swats at the side of her hand, and Marlene instantly lets go, blinking up at her almost like a kicked puppy. Dorcas sways back to reach around to unzip her dress. "I make nearly everything I wear, so there will be no ripping of my clothes when we're together, yeah? I won't have my time and energy wasted just because you're trying to fuck me faster."

"Say fuck me again," Marlene breathes out.

"Fuck me," Dorcas repeats, slower this time.

Marlene groans and folds forward to latch onto the side of Dorcas' neck, sucking harshly and nipping a line down to her shoulder. She pulls back quickly when she realizes Dorcas is shimmying out of her dress, though. Her hands slip up the side of Dorcas' body like she's pretending to help, but all she's really doing is feeling all the new skin that's revealed.

"Dorcas, you are flawless," Marlene whispers reverently, her eyes practically all pupil as Dorcas lazily lets her dress pool to the ground behind her. "Did you plan this? Your knickers match your—wait, is that a set? You did plan this."

Dorcas snorts, because she can't help it. "Actually, no. Some of us just like to wear sets. This is one of my favorites."

"I can see why," Marlene says, gaze firmly latched onto Dorcas' chest like you couldn't pry it away with a crowbar.

"Eyes up here, sweetheart," Dorcas teases, reaching up to slowly drag her fingers through Marlene's hair.

Marlene's eyes do come up to meet hers, eventually, slowly. She shakes her head. "You're like a fucking siren. This is—you are—fuck, I would absolutely drown myself trying to swim out to you."

"Anyone else would be alarmed by such a compliment, but I would like you to know that I am very flattered," Dorcas informs her as she dips in to press kisses along Marlene's jaw, heading right back to her mouth, drawn there again and again.

Marlene is grinning when Dorcas' mouth finds hers, and they're right back to it, but this time with less clothes in the way. Marlene takes advantage, her hands running all over Dorcas, mapping her body out but never lingering for long, like she's too overwhelmed by what else there is to stop in one place. Dorcas grinds down against Marlene's thigh, which was the whole point to this position to begin with—this isn't her first thigh-riding experience, so she's already in the know.

She does it once, twice, resituates herself, then does it again and moans. Yes, there. Right there. Marlene breaks away with a low hum, her mouth trailing down Dorcas' throat as her hands grasp her hips. Her grip is tight, and she starts to tug and pull at a ruthless pace, making Dorcas' head fall back as her mouth falls slack and her eyes fall shut.

"Don't pull my hair," Marlene whispers into her clavicle, then nips at her skin before mouthing her way down to the dip and curve of her chest.

Dorcas goes to great efforts to unclench her fingers from Marlene's hair and grab onto her shoulders instead, fully aware that she can't trust herself not to yank on Marlene's hair at the moment. Her body is writhing of its own accord, her chest heaving. She feels like she's burning inside and out.

A shrill ring pierces the air, and Dorcas freezes. Marlene mumbles something like ignore it into her chest, where she's apparently trying to smother herself, and Dorcas would love nothing more...except she knows that ringtone.

"Fuck. I have to take this," Dorcas pants out, and Marlene groans but dutifully falls back, equally breathless. Dorcas leans in and presses a quick kiss to her mouth. "Give me one second, and then we'll be right back to it, I promise."

Marlene nods and leans her head back with a hum, watching Dorcas through half-lidded eyes, face flushed and mouth swollen. She looks so good that Dorcas finds it a genuine struggle to rip herself away, but she forces herself to. She moves over to answer the call, only standing across the room. Even with her back towards Marlene, Dorcas can feel her gaze roaming all over her body.

There's a beat of silence, then, "Patronus?"

"Starfish," Dorcas replies quietly, so quiet that she won't be overheard.

"Fabian and Gideon are dead. They got them," is the reply, and then the line clicks.

Dorcas stands there for a long moment, just breathing as she stares at the wall. Something inside her cracks open, and she squeezes her eyes shut so tight that spots dance behind her eyelids. Her fist curls in front of her, nails biting into her palm until she's sure that she's not going to make a noise.

Slowly, she exhales and opens her eyes. She swallows the lump in her throat. Oh, Fabian, Gideon, not you, she thinks, that space in her chest cracking open wider. Not them. They were being so careful. How did it go wrong? Why—

Dorcas blinks hard and rolls her jaw, peeling her hand out straight and forcing her body to relax. She keeps her voice level as she says, "Yeah, thanks for letting me know."

With that, she drops her hand, sits her cell down, and takes one more second. She taps her finger to the table beside her phone, then turns around.

"Everything alright?" Marlene asks.

"Yeah. That was just Fabian. He and Gideon got too attached to Regulus and James, and they couldn't handle all of this, so they decided to leave and try a different career path. Can't say I blame them, really. It's—hard, as you know," Dorcas murmurs as she pads back over.

Marlene frowns. "It is, but running away from it doesn't change anything."

"They're good men," Dorcas whispers. "Wherever they are, I hope they find peace."

"Is it…?" Marlene's face softens. "You were close with them. I'm sure you're going to miss them."

"Very much," Dorcas confirms and forces herself to smile.

"If you're not—if you don't want to continue, we don't have to, Dorcas," Marlene tells her gently. "I'll still stay. We can just—"

"No. No, it's fine. Where were we?" Dorcas says softly, sliding right back into Marlene's lap, because she has a hole in her chest and she knows exactly how to fill it.

"Right here, I think," Marlene replies, then leans in to help Dorcas do just that by kissing her.

Chapter End Notes

POV UNLOCKED!!!! in a baseball player's voice DORCAS IS SAAAAFE. please imagine that i just did the thing where i swing my arms through the air to indicate that dorcas is safe, like the baseball players do. (ive never played or watched baseball lmaooo) anyway, yes, dorcas is safe!!! she will NOT be dying!!! some people thought she was gonna be cinna-ed, but she will not, in fact, be cinna-ed.

we got a looooot of information in this chapter, so ill ramble about jegulus first.

imagining james beat-boxing while strolling through the forest in a death arena is SO FUNNY to me. he's so cute, i love him. regulus is over here trying to feed them and make sure they survive, and james is just like: but they're a FAMILY, regulus 🥺🥺🥺 you can't kill it cause it's a BABY. in his defense, if that was me, i would literally do the same thing. bambi scarred me as a child, so i get it.

i wouldn't be surprised if a lot of people were surprised that regulus just flatout admitted that he and james would have ended up together if sirius never went into the arena, but i would like to remind everyone that this fic isn't heavy on the miscommunication. like, everything regulus says to james, he genuinely feels that way—or at least believes that he does. so, when he says that he hates james, when he thinks about how he got over james, that's all real to him.

him being blunt about what they could have been is just him being honest again and saying what he feels/believes/knows. and he's right. in this world, if sirius hadn't gone into the arena, they would have 100% ended up together, gotten married, and lived a long, semi-happy life (as happy as anyone can be in this setting, at least). but that's not what happened, which is where the angst hits. that shit is so sad to me, im not even gonna lie. like, i wrote it, and im like: damn, that's fucked up :/

but lmaoooo, regulus faceplanting when james asked if they would have gotten married 😭😭😭 GOODBYE. he was literally taken out by that question. someone help this poor man. he's just trying to live his life and survive this death arena, and then there's james being all sweet and constantly flirting with him. poor james just wants to cling to as much happiness as he can, and he's fully expecting to die at some point, so you can't really blame the guy.

then of course the Sad Time when regulus breaks down over avery. him thinking he's a bad person because he's glad to be alive, even if it meant killing someone else. im SAD.

but the gideon mention... 👀

so, back to dorcas!!! she's safeeeee, and she's...apparently more involved in Things than anyone realized. and so were gideon and fabian!!! no i will not elaborate, you will see in due time, it'll all come out eventually, but i TOLD YALL that i didn't just kill them for no reason. im excited to hear your theories, though!!!

also, dorlene my beloveds <3 we see more of them, i promise. we see some more dorcas POVs in the future as well, if that excites anyone!

also², the evan mention probably appeased many of you, as well as the vanity mention. yes, peter and vanity are just chilling with irene and mathias in a secluded cave right now. i feel like it's important to remember that james established allies with these people BEFORE the arena, so like, it's not completely out of left field for all them to be working together.

also³, yes the A that mulciber was posting on the ground was for avery.

anyways, let me shut up now. feel free to drop comments of your theories/thoughts. i adore them all, and i adore all of you the same! thank you so much <3

tributes remaining in the arena as of this chapter: 16 (still) tributes who have died as of this chapter: dylan, avery, and six unamed/unknown others.

Man Down

Chapter Notes

hello, hello!!!

warnings for this chapter:

-references to death (because of the whole arena thing)
-explicit depictions of murder (yes, another person dies, and not just in the background, so i will be putting a more in-depth warning for what happens in the end notes for those of you who need/want to be more prepared)
-explicit depictions of violence (VERY explicit, and i will also be putting a more in-depth warning for what happens in the end notes for those of you who need/want to be more prepared)
-descriptions of blood
-depictions of injuries
-angst

please be warned, this is a very heavy and fast-paced chapter, and it will likely put some of you on edge/make you anxious, so take care of yourselves FIRST, always. highly recommend reading where you're settled in and can clutch a pillow or something.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

"What about fish?" James asks, then tosses his last berry into his mouth and raises his eyebrows at Regulus.

"How is that any less immoral?" Regulus replies, visibly unimpressed as he walks next to him.

James shrugs. "Well, you know… Er, do fish even have brains?"

"Obviously fish have brains. All living beings have brains," Regulus tells him. "Well, except for you."

"Ha!" James bursts out laughing, then immediately clamps his hand over his mouth to muffle the sound. Regulus gets upset with him when he's too loud (which is often), and considering the very real danger they're in at all times, James can't blame him. It's just not exactly in James' nature to be quiet.

Regulus looks exasperated. "Why are you the way you are? I've just insulted you. Why do you find that funny?"

"Not sure," James admits, once he's calmer. "Suppose I have a few wires crossed." He pauses, then knocks his shoulder into Regulus' and sing-songs, "Or maybe I have a little crush, and I'm just delighted by anything you say. Sound familiar?"

"Every time you open your mouth to speak, the urge to kill you grows stronger," Regulus informs him flatly.

"You used to be so sweet," James coos, and Regulus instantly scowls, which is, quite frankly, so fucking adorable that James can't stop himself from grinning. "Okay, no, do you remember when you were twelve—"

"Do not," Regulus hisses, head snapping around as he glares at him, his face turning red immediately.

"No, I am. This is too brilliant. This story deserves to be heard by all," James declares. "People watching at home, settle in and prepare for the cutest fucking—"

Regulus is abruptly right in front of him, the flat part of his dagger pressed against James' mouth. His gaze is sharper than the blade. "You can live without your tongue, James, did you know that? Why don't I show you?"

"You know," James mumbles carefully, very carefully, "I think I really do have a knife kink of some sort. I am so attracted to you right now."

"I hate you," Regulus mutters, then smacks the flat part of his dagger to James' mouth before pulling it away. "Tell that story and I'll cut your fucking tongue out."

"Still attracted to you," James announces, breaking out into a grin as Regulus huffs and turns to keep walking. "And what story? How do you know it's the same story?"

"I know what story it is."

"Would it be the same story—"

"James," Regulus warns.

"—where you found a new route to take after school and just had to go collect all the pretty rocks, taking two jars, and then you gave me the prettiest one with a sweet little smile while you gave Sirius the other one, which was only half full, and you told him not to eat them?" James continues anyway, his voice cheerful. "That story, by chance?"

"First, I couldn't be sure that Sirius wouldn't eat them. He's an idiot, so that was an extremely valid thing to say to him. Second," Regulus says, swiveling his dagger between his fingers, "you really don't value your tongue, do you?"

James hums, raising his eyebrows. "Not as much as you would, if only I had the chance to prove it."

"But you don't, and you never will," Regulus reminds him, because he's so, so mean.

"Well, I don't know," James muses as he continues walking next to Regulus, "I didn't exactly expect to have a chance with...other things. Your gifts at twelve were a lot different than they are at twenty-five, I'll just say that."

"Yes, James, that's called maturing. I realize that it's a concept of which you have no basic understanding, but—"

"Why are you the way you are, hm? Let's talk about that. You're always insulting me. Feels very...pointed, and frankly, you can't expect me not to like it, because it makes me feel very singled out. Special, if you will."

"You're just desperate," Regulus says.

"Well, yes, but I'm no fool. You're meaner to me than anyone else." James chuckles. "Unresolved feelings, maybe?"

Regulus huffs a laugh, like he finds James' theory incredibly amusing, as if it's so absurd that it can only be funny—which is a bit of a blow, if James is honest. "Your optimism has somehow managed to circle into delusion."

"Can you blame me? I mean, your parting gift alone…" James looks over and catches his gaze, pleased that Regulus holds it without pretending he has no idea what James is referencing. He can't believe that Regulus is actually willing to talk to him about this. "You can't blame a bloke for the effect a gift like that can have on his greater sense."

"The goal was not to give you hope, James."

"Right, well, you mucked that up quite nicely."

"It didn't mean anything," Regulus says. "You know that."

James purses his lips, wishing he had more berries to chew on so he could bide his time to figure out the best way to respond. He settles for tossing his hatchet from hand-to-hand. "I don't know that, actually. It was indulgence, yeah?"

"Obviously."

"But just for me?"

"Did it look like I got anything out of it?" Regulus asks, but now he's looking away, and there's a certain set to his jaw…

"Oh, fuck," James breathes out, his eyes widening. "Shit, Reg, you did get something out of it. You—"

"James."

"You enjoyed it."

Regulus cuts him a sharp look, but he's already blushing, so his protests are futile. "Will you please just stop talking?"

"No. This is the best day of my life," James declares brightly.

"Right, and a good day for it, no doubt. A nice stroll in the woods with someone who will never indulge you again inside an arena where death is imminent," Regulus says sarcastically. He waves his empty hand. "Yes, what a lovely day."

The last word has barely left Regulus' mouth before, with an abruptness that James doesn't see coming, everything proceeds to go wrong all at once.

~•~

Something drops down from the tree above them with no warning whatsoever and slams into Regulus' back hard enough to shove him to the ground. He lands on his front and gets a mouthful of leaves and dirt for his troubles, and the weight on his back shifts desperately, leaning, reaching... Regulus scrambles to crawl forward and reach his dagger first, because it had slipped from his hand when he went down. A pale hand stretches past him, broad and not familiar. Regulus knows for sure that it's not Evan, because he has no scar on the side of his thumb the way the owner of this hand does.

The hand closes around his dagger, and the only thing Regulus can think is, no one ever thinks to look up.

Fuck.

Frantically, Regulus tries to buck the person on him off, but he only succeeds in half-turning over, the person on top rocking with the motion and using the momentum to slam Regulus to the ground flat on his back. Vaguely, Regulus recognizes the man as one that didn't really speak to anyone, and now here he is, raising Regulus' dagger up and clearly getting ready to bring it back down. Regulus scrambles to reach for his third dagger, and then a hatchet is sticking out of the man's head.

It's just there, suddenly. Regulus barely even saw it swing in, like he blinked and missed the moment it was buried into the man's skull. There's a hand still gripping the handle, and Regulus knows that hand. He has that hand memorized.

James.

The cannon goes off, and Regulus' dagger drops down rather anticlimactically against his chest, then slides off without even harming him. The man's face is slack, head split open around the hatchet, and there's a grotesque crack and a sickening squelch as the hatchet is yanked free. Blood immediately starts pouring, and the man's body slumps to the side.

Regulus scrambles up in just enough time to see James raise the hatchet again, which propels him forward to catch James' wrist before he can bring it down. James' head whips around towards him, and his eyes are wild. He's breathing hard.

"He's dead," Regulus says firmly. "James, he's dead."

"What?" James croaks, like he's confused, and Regulus realizes with a pang that he is. "He's —but you—are you—"

"I'm fine," Regulus murmurs, gently tugging James' hand down and slowly easing the bloodied hatchet out of his grip. He nods. "I'm perfectly fine. Not a scratch on me, see?"

James fumbles to grab Regulus' arm, patting his way up, over his shoulder, into the curve of his neck. A punched-out breath escapes him. "You're okay?"

"I'm okay," Regulus confirms.

"I thought—" James cuts himself off, choking on the rest.

Regulus nods. "I know."

James just stares at him for a long moment, his eyes wide and startlingly innocent for someone who just buried a hatchet in the side of a man's head so deep that it cracked the skull on the way back out. Regulus is uncomfortably aware of what force James must have swung with to actually manage to get the hatchet in so firmly at all. He hit that man like he was planning to take his fucking head off.

There's blood on James' hands, and Regulus steps forward to tug on the bottom of his shirt on the side where he cleaned his hands when they were the ones covered in blood. Far more gently than he did for himself, he carefully and meticulously wipes away the blood as much as he can without water and without looking, still holding James' gaze to keep him looking at him instead of his hands or the dead body on the ground.

James' fingers aren't shaking.

His voice is, though, when he says, "I thought he was going to kill you."

"He was," Regulus replies.

"Why?" James whispers.

Regulus frowns, tempted to glance at the dead man like he can glean information from him, but he refrains because James isn't looking away as long as he's holding his gaze. "I'm not sure. There could be a variety of reasons. Maybe he wanted a weapon, or he thought we had food, or he just thought he could kill us both quickly and better his odds."

"Why would he do that, though?" James insists, and his voice cracks, rising in distress. "We weren't hurting anyone. I would have helped him if he—but he just—he attacked you, and I —"

"James," Regulus says softly.

"I couldn't let him," James croaks. "He—he was going to kill you, and I couldn't—I can't—I had to—"

"I know," Regulus tells him yet again, because he does know, even though James can't get his words out properly. "I need you to do something else for me."

James blinks, then rasps, "Anything."

"Close your eyes," Regulus murmurs, and James does. He's shaking now, rattling from head-to-toe. "Now take five careful steps back and turn around."

Without a word, James listens to him. Regulus immediately swivels to crouch down by the man, picking up his dagger to slip in his thigh holster, then grimacing as he cleans the hatchet on the man's shirt. The sight of him is just—bad. Blood and gore. Brutal, like Regulus knew it would be.

Regulus is quick about making it back to James, pausing in front of him and just looking at him in pure sorrow. James still has his eyes closed, and his breathing is a little wobbly. Less than five minutes ago, he was flirting with Regulus with a grin bright enough to make the sun jealous. That's how fast it all happened; that's how quick everything can change.

And now, the James who never killed anyone is gone. He can never be that person again, and he let that person go without hesitating because he was protecting Regulus.

Regulus is so tired of seeing people destroy themselves just so he'll be safe.

"James," Regulus says, keeping his voice low and melodic, but he only speaks to give a warning before he reaches out with his free hand to slip his fingers into James'. Their fingers curl together with familiarity, slotting into place like they were made for this, like they've done this a thousand times instead of three. Regulus tugs on him. "Come with me."

James comes with him, and Regulus leads him away.

~•~

Ten people are dead. It's day three. Six by the first night. Eight by the second night, and a ninth in the middle of the night after the banners had already played in the sky. Here's the tenth. James didn't even know his name.

It's such a strange thing to be fixated on, but James feels like there's a distinct lack of honor in killing someone without even knowing their name, at least so flippantly. He didn't even hesitate, that's the thing. It happened so quickly, the man fumbling for the knife and raising it up, and it only took a measly few seconds. James—who fully expected to falter in such a situation—had swung the hatchet as hard as he could without even a moment of hesitation.

Just like that. Just that quick. Just that simple.

The baffling thing is, it's not like James made the conscious decision to do it. Yes, he was in complete control of himself, but he never had the thought, oh, I'm going to kill this man now. There wasn't really time for that, or any thoughts at all. It came down to one moment, faster than a breath, and it was about what James was capable of. If he wasn't capable of killing, then that would have been the moment he learned that. It wasn't, though, because James apparently is capable of killing, and he proved it. Effortlessly. Immediately. Instinctively.

He saw Regulus on the ground, seconds from death, and James killed the man. Not knowing his name, if he has a family, or friends, James just fucking killed him.

It's crushing to James to realize that he's capable of such a thing. He thought… Maybe it was naive of him, but he really believed that he was on the outside of it, like he and violence were parallel lines that could never cross. Oil and water. It just didn't go together, and James never really expected that he could do it. Sure, he told himself that he would, if it came down to it, but deep down in some hidden chamber within him where he's always clung to his innocence, he was convinced that it was all bravado, because him? Killing? No, never.

Never is now, forever is out of reach, and James has just killed a man. It was not self-defense. The man didn't attack him; maybe he would have, after killing Regulus, but James didn't wait long enough to find out. James killed the man in defense of Regulus, and he wonders if that should sicken him.

It doesn't.

Regulus didn't ask him to, and James makes his own choices. This choice was one he made from the beginning. He knew what it entailed. He spent hours thinking about it, going over every possibility in his mind to see just how far he would go to make sure Regulus makes it home. No matter what scenario crossed his mind, James' choice was always the same.

It's quiet out, excluding the random creaks of the trees and the muffled sound of running water in the distance. Regulus is leading him towards it, still holding his hand. They've been walking for a long time now, neither of them saying a word.

When James looks down at where Regulus is holding his hand, he can see blood stained on their tangled fingers.

It feels like James checks out for a bit. Like he's on autopilot. His mind feels like it's limping, like killing someone wounded his ability to function, to think, to make sense of anything. He has the disjointed thought that his parents must have seen that, as well as Sirius. The last people in the world who would judge him for it, and he still wonders what they're thinking.

What does Regulus think? He's very quiet, and he's being startlingly gentle with James right now, more gentle than he's been in years. James feels—untethered, and Regulus keeps holding onto him, like he knows and he's determined not to let him slip away. There's something secure about him at this moment, and James just wants to sink into him and close his eyes to shut the rest of the world out.

James goes in and out like static, his brain buzzing like it's full of bees, and then they're at the stream. A new one they've never seen before. Regulus takes him to the edge of it, crouching down and encouraging James to do the same by tugging on his hand. James does, and Regulus dips their hands in the water together, keeping them touching even as he cleans the blood off. In the water, it looks pink.

"Did you know his name?" James croaks.

"No," Regulus murmurs as he pulls their hands from the water, letting them drip without doing anything else. The hatchet lying across his thigh is clean, and James isn't sure how that's even possible. It looks untouched. "Did you?"

"No," James chokes out, squeezing his eyes shut and ducking his head. He's right next to Regulus, so he ends up pressing his face into his shoulder, sucking in deep, gasping breaths.

"Shh, breathe, James," Regulus whispers tenderly, so tender, and one of his hands breaks away to cup the back of James' head. His fingers push into James' unruly hair, which makes James feel so much better and so much worse all at once.

James breathes. He's not crying. It feels like he should be; all the usual symptoms are there—the tightness in his throat, the pain in his chest, the struggle to breathe. And yet, no tears come. His eyes remain dry. Everything just hurts.

Regulus sways back a little, and James reaches up to grab his arm with both hands. "Don't leave. Regulus, please don't—"

"I'm not leaving," Regulus says softly, carding his fingers through James' hair again. "I just need to refill our water, that's all. I'm not—I'm still right here, alright? But we can't stay long. I'm sorry, James, but we have to keep going."

"Just—just give me a minute," James begs, and Regulus makes a quiet, soothing noise that sounds like agreement. Oddly, James thinks Regulus would give him anything right now.

All James wants is him.

Regulus stays true to his word. He doesn't leave or shake James off. He lets James hold onto him as he shifts around, getting his bag and drawing out the water canister. James briefly pulls away to drink some when Regulus nudges him in the head with it, insistent even when James ignores it. He drinks it and feels a little better, which makes him feel guilty for some reason, and then Regulus finishes off the rest before refilling it. He does it with James' face pressed into his shoulder and James' arms threaded around one of his, limiting his mobility quite a bit, but he never complains.

Afterwards, Regulus gives him a little more time. James turns his head and stares at the water. It's moving rapidly, a long gorge through the earth and rocks, taking everything downstream. Fresh water replaces the spot they're at every second, and James wonders where the water that contains the blood of the man he killed is at now. Gone, like the man.

"Well, isn't this sweet?"

In seconds, Regulus has the hatchet in hand as he shoots to his feet, snatching James up with him. They whip around at the same time to watch Mulciber stroll through the break in the trees, his approach unheard over the rush of the water.

Mulciber has a sword in his hands, and he's not the only one walking out of the trees. It's all the death eaters, excluding Avery, and they all have weapons. Willa and Axus are back, and Axus has a hook with a rope like they used in the training room. Even little Hodge has a weapon—just a knife, but still.

"You two," Mulciber says, pointing the tip of his sword at them, "have been hard to find. It's almost like you just wanted some time alone together. Sorry, did I break up an intimate moment?"

Regulus' nails dig into James' arm where he's gripping it. James flicks his gaze between everyone. Bernice has a sword, too. Quinn has a spear. Willa has a bow with a quiver of arrows on her back. Her hand is slowly pulling an arrow free.

"Run," Regulus whispers, a mere breath, and then his nails go slack. Immediately, he and James whip around and crash directly into the stream, running as hard as they can while the others automatically give chase.

~•~

Run.

Run.

Run.

That's it. That's all there is. Just running. The world is a blur around Regulus as he pushes his legs as hard as they'll go, winding around trees and never going in a straight line. James is right next to him, his legs long enough to keep up with Regulus' speed. They're both sprinting like their lives depend on it. They do.

An arrow whips past them, landing in the trunk of a tree with a loud thunk. Regulus snaps it in half as he goes past, cursing under his breath when another one shoots right by him, so close that it would have hit if he hadn't stumbled a bit.

Regulus can hear the others chasing them, their feet pounding on the ground, their loud shouts and whoops of laughter. Taunting them. They have them in their sights now, and Regulus knows they're not going to stop until he and James are dead. The problem is, Regulus and James—even with weapons—can't fight them. They're outnumbered.

Crashing through the forest, Regulus can hear his heavy breathing, as well as James', and everything is going too fast for him to come up with a proper plan. Getting away is ideal, but not really feasible when the death eaters are closing in. And they are. Regulus can hear them getting closer.

So, just run.

Run.

Run.

Fucking run.

For how long? To where? Regulus doesn't know. He doesn't know what to do; he can't fucking think. Another arrow sails past him, nearly hitting James, who—by some miracle—evades getting it right in the back by splitting around a tree, going right as Regulus goes left. Run, run, run. What else?

Come on, think. What do you do when you're being hunted? When you're outnumbered and overpowered? What do you do? Sirius, what do I do? Regulus thinks as he gasps for air, his whole body screaming from how hard he's pushing it. No answer comes to him. Sirius isn't here.

Maybe there is no answer.

Maybe...this is it.

They can't get away. They can't climb, or hide, or run fast or far enough to evade the people who are after them. Regulus has a hatchet in his hand and two daggers strapped to his thighs. If he could take out Willa first—but no, she'd have an arrow in him the moment he stood still. If he could—

A hook buries itself in his shoulder, yanking him so hard that he's lifted clear off his feet and slammed to the ground with such impact that he nearly bites through his tongue. Blood fills his mouth, and he's been here before. For the second time, he swallows his own blood just to breathe, and if that isn't a perfect metaphor for survival, Regulus doesn't know what is.

Regulus, despite the suddenness of everything, is quick to react. He was just rocked, hard, but he still fumbles to snatch the hook out of his shoulder. It isn't very deep, but it hurts like a bitch anyway, and lovely, now there's a hole through his coat and shirt. Not the primary issue at the moment, honestly, but Regulus is enough of a miserable little shit to be angry about more than one thing at a time. See? He has talents, too.

Tossing the hook aside, Regulus scrambles to his feet to see James a few steps in front of him, his chest heaving as he turns around to look at him. Every line of his face is set, and Regulus knows he's coming back for him before James even takes one step. I'm not leaving you, he'd said. You'll have to kill me.

Even under pressure, James stays true to his word.

The issue is, the others have gained on them now. It takes twenty seconds, at most, for the group to converge on them, circling around them so they can't go anywhere. And this… Well, Regulus knows there's no way out of this.

But if he's going down, he's taking at least two of these bastards with him, because he's genuinely just that pissed off. Murderous rage floods through him, and he can recognize the feeling for what it is. After all, he is a murderer now, isn't he? This predicament has infuriated him so much that he grips the hatchet with no shame about how he's going to use it.

Regulus has all plans to fight.

And then Mulciber grabs James and pulls him in front of him, holding the sword to his throat as he grins right at Regulus.

~•~

James can safely say he doesn't have a knife kink. Blade kink. Sword kink. Any of that—he doesn't have it. No, it's just Regulus he likes, and anything to do with him. When Mulciber has a sword to his throat, it's not sexy at all.

Holding very still, James stares at Regulus, who looks—well, frankly, he looks rather terrifying, but in a sexy way. Now really isn't the time, and maybe James is just biased, as well as a bit hysterical from the rising panic that's taking root, because oh, fuck, he's about to die, he's about to fucking die.

Regulus is bleeding from his shoulder, but he's standing like he's perfectly unharmed and completely willing to fuck shit up. His gaze is latched right onto Mulciber, no one else, and his eyes are cold. It's admittedly a bit disturbing, because James knows his eyes, and he hasn't ever seen anything like this in them before. Yes, when James discovered him, he looked ready to kill. This is different.

Regulus has fucking murder in his eyes. It's cold and calculating, a window into the no doubt chilling thoughts that are rolling through his mind right now. It's bad enough that James almost feels...concern for Mulciber.

"No, no, leave him," Mulciber says, and Bernice steps back from where she was about to grab Regulus. "He's not going to do anything. I've got his boyfriend, don't I?"

"He looks angry," Willa sing-songs, an arrow docked in her bow and ready to set loose as soon as she lifts it. She sounds so young. James thinks she's Vanity's age. "Kill him, Mulciber. What are you waiting for?"

"Not yet," Mulciber snaps. "Go on, Black. I want to know how you did it. How you killed Avery. When we made it to him, they were already lifting his body out."

"I can show you better than I can tell you," Regulus declares sharply, an edge to his voice that makes James' heart skip a beat for a moment.

Mulciber snarls in James' ear. "I've known Avery my whole fucking life, you worthless cunt. You're going to tell me what you did to him, or I'm going to cut your boyfriend's pretty face up one little slice at a time."

"If you so much as make him flinch, they'll be lifting you out in pieces," Regulus warns, and James swallows, because that's his I'm not fucking around voice. He. Oh, he actually means that.

"Is that so, Black?" Mulciber laughs, and then the sword raises up to press against James' cheek. He drags it slowly, pressing in hard, and James hisses as he flinches back, but Mulciber just snatches him by the hair and holds him in place.

"Ow, fuck," James grits out, wanting so badly to fight, but one wrong move could cost him his eye, or more importantly, it could cost Regulus his life.

James struggles to no avail, and the slice goes up the side of his face until Mulciber puts the sword back to his throat. It stings and aches, a line of heat that blood slips free from, pooling down to his jaw and in the crevice of his neck. His face is twisted into a grimace, but he can still see how stiff Regulus is, his jaw clenched and his nostrils flared wide.

"Do you want to talk now, or should I do that again?" Mulciber asks. "No? Here, let me just __"

"Don't," Regulus snaps, taking a step forward.

"Ah, ah, ah," Mulciber sing-songs. "Come any closer and he'll be swallowing the sword, yeah?" Regulus stops. "There we go. Got you on a leash now, don't I? Didn't your brother tell you not to reveal your weakness, Black, or is he as useless as you?"

Regulus gets visibly more pissed off at the insult to his brother, and James can relate. James also remembers when Regulus was thirteen, and one of his classmates called Sirius an idiot to his face. It wasn't at school, but rather in the middle of the market, and James was with Sirius. Regulus had wandered off, no doubt going to browse for a new journal, and when they went to find him, a boy was essentially bullying him.

James and Sirius had started over at the same time, both ready to do the same thing, but they never got the chance. Regulus was generally quiet around other people, a bit shy, and he honestly didn't like most people who weren't—well, James, basically. Sirius is his brother, so that's a little different.

Anyway, they got close enough to see Regulus being a snarky little shit, because for all that he was shy, he wasn't afraid to verbally rip someone to shreds if they were annoying him, even then. The boy said, "You won't do anything, especially when your idiot brother isn't around," and he'd barely finished talking before Regulus punched him in the face so hard that he crashed into the table of—predictably—journals. Regulus kept right on hitting him, too, at least until Sirius and James pulled him off and dragged him away before the Aurors got involved.

After all that verbal abuse the boy threw at him, it was one offhand comment about Sirius that set Regulus off.

In short, if Regulus gets his hands on Mulciber, he's fucked.

For some reason, this makes James laugh. This isn't really the situation where laughter is appropriate, but it bubbles up anyway. He can't help it. He's under a lot of stress, his face hurts, and he's terrified that they're about to die—and he still laughs, because oh, Mulciber is going to regret that.

"Something funny, Potter?" Mulciber asks sharply, yanking him by his hair to get him to shut up again.

James grinds his teeth, but nevertheless says, "You're an idiot. Mercy on your soul, Mulciber, because you just made a very big mistake. You think Regulus cares about me? No. No, Sirius is his weakness, and you fucking fool, he's not here."

"James," Regulus says sharply, and that's all he says, but that's all he has to say. The unspoken command rings loud and clear.

With a grunt, James recklessly presses into the sword, getting a sharp—but thin—slice for his troubles, all so he can toss his head back into Mulciber's face. Mulciber curses sharply and rocks back, his hand lifting slightly, which James turns his head to clamp down on hard enough that he tastes blood.

The sword hits the ground, and James lunges for it as Mulciber stumbles back with a shout. He gets it in his hand and sucks in a sharp breath as something glints out of the corner of his eye. Bernice is there, sword sailing right for him. He lifts the sword he just grabbed to block it, falling backwards and trying frantically to make it back to his feet.

Chaos immediately unleashes all at once. An arrow goes flying, but Regulus manages to dodge it in the midst of launching himself right at Mulciber. Bernice is downright ruthless with her sword, swinging at James again and again so quickly that he can only block over and over to keep his head from being sliced cleanly from his body.

Axus swings their hook in the air like a lasso, and James sees it go right for Regulus, and—it doesn't miss. It hooks into the same spot as before, but Regulus doesn't even slow down. He just grabs the rope part and yanks so hard that Axus stumbles to the ground, cursing under their breath as the rope slips through their hands rapidly enough that it likely burns. Regulus rips the hook right out and throws it carelessly to the side, making it disappear through the trees. Axus curses vibrantly and darts off to go get it.

Quinn rushes after Regulus with her spear, and James manages to knock back Bernice's sword with enough force to get the time to make it to his feet. Hodge is there, so small with his knife raised. He doesn't move, so James doesn't either. The three of them—James, Bernice, and Hodge—proceed to have a silent stand-off, their weapons at the ready.

James' heart thumps loudly in his ears, and his mind is racing. He's distracted worrying about Regulus, even though Mulciber has no weapon. Quinn is over there, though, and she has her spear. Regulus has a hatchet, at least, but Mulciber still has his fists. Also, James is not some god with a sword. He barely knows how to hold the fucking thing, and it's a lot heavier than he was expecting it to be. Bernice holds hers like she knows how to use it, which is concerning.

A sudden blood-curdling scream makes them all freeze before snapping their heads over instinctively to follow the sound. Mulciber is on the ground, and Regulus is ripping the hatchet out of his arm, then bringing it right back down.

"Pieces! I fucking told you you'd be in pieces!" Regulus roars, and he swings back down, stomping on Mulciber's hand until he breaks all the way through. The sound of it is sickening, and the blood—there's so much blood. Regulus snatches the hatchet up yet again, then kicks Mulciber's hand away from where it was separated from his body.

"Oh, fuck," Bernice chokes out, sounding like she might vomit, and honestly? James knows the feeling.

Mulciber screams and writhes on the ground, frantically clawing at his own arm, and Regulus just looks down at him like he's a twitching bug that can't get up off its back. He raises the hatchet again, looking to be going for the head this time, and he's so focused that he doesn't see Quinn behind him. She draws back her spear.

"Regulus!" James shouts, and the name rips out of him in nothing short of pure fucking terror.

~•~

The spear catches Regulus along his side, just a bit above his hip, and it glances off as he stumbles away from it with a loud curse. Two inches to the left, and the spearhead would have been in him. Maybe his luck is turning up after all.

Maybe not, though, because Quinn just starts to lunge for him again, and he's not steady enough to fully block this time. It's going to land right in the center of his stomach, and again, James yells. Regulus sucks in a sharp breath, his ears ringing, and then a vine shaped into a noose drops down over Quinn's head and snaps tight around her throat.

Quinn proceeds to get lifted clear off her feet, raising in the air and dropping her spear as she scrambles at her throat and chokes, kicking in the air. As she goes up, Evan comes down, the end of the vine in his hands. It's like a pully system over the branch he falls from, him sinking down artfully as she thrashes her way higher. He wastes no time in rushing to the tree to tie the vine around the trunk, securing it there so Quinn won't fall back down.

On the ground, Mulciber is weeping.

"Fuck! Fuck, Hodge, we need to cut her down!" Bernice bellows. "Willa? Willa, where the fuck are you?!"

"Run!" Evan shouts at Regulus.

"James!" Regulus shouts back, like an answer, and then they're both running right for James, who is currently trying to throw Willa off his back. She has no more arrows, so now she's resorted to attempting to strangle him with her arms.

Mulciber is still flailing on the ground, Quinn is still flailing in the air, and Bernice and Hodge have abandoned James in favor of getting her down. Axus is still trying to find their hook, probably, and now Regulus is grateful that he threw it.

James does manage to throw Willa off of him, fully just shaking her off because she's so small compared to him. He stumbles back, sword still in hand, and he could kill her. He could, easily, but he doesn't. He sees Regulus and Evan racing right for him, and he starts backing up to meet them at a full sprint as they start crashing through the woods.

Run.

Run.

Run.

And so, they're running again.

This time, no one is chasing them, and now they have a third person with them, someone that Regulus—at this point—is sure he trusts. No one is following, and they still run like their lives are at stake. They can't be convinced that they aren't.

No cannon sounds, not even when they've been running for so long that Quinn would definitely be dead by now, which means that they managed to cut her down. Mulciber—well, he can survive without a hand, so long as he doesn't bleed out. Regulus isn't too happy about it, honestly. He didn't chop off Mulciber's hand out of mercy. He was going to kill him.

Regulus still wants to kill him. The murderous rage is still pumping through him, not letting up. Later, maybe he'll be sickened by how he just lost it, but for now, he remains fucking furious.

"Regulus. Regulus, stop," James wheezes, and he starts slowing, which makes Evan and Regulus do the same.

Slowly, they all come to a stop, breathing hard. As soon as Regulus gets still, his injuries make themselves known, and he groans as he cups his side and bends over slightly, eyes squeezing shut as he tries to catch his breath. Nothing is fatal, he knows that, but it still fucking hurts. The threat of infection is a concern as well, so stopping to dress their wounds is a must. But not here, not out in the open.

"Shit," Regulus gasps out, forcing himself to straighten up. He blinks at Evan in a daze, and Evan gives him a weak grin, also catching his breath. "Evan, what the fuck?"

"No one ever thinks to look up, eh, lover boy?" Evan says with a breathy chuckle.

Regulus stares at him, then busts out laughing. He isn't sure where it comes from, but he just —laughs. A full-bellied laugh that actually hurts him a bit, so it doesn't last long. Shit, his body hurts. He can feel the rush of adrenaline seeping out of him, letting in the exhaustion that makes him tremble.

"You're hurt," James mumbles, stumbling over towards him with wide eyes. His face is still bleeding.

"Yeah, no shit, James," Regulus replies with a grimace as he peels up his jacket and shirt to look at his side.

James hisses between his teeth. "Oh, that's—"

"It's not fatal," Regulus cuts in. "I'll live."

"Not if we don't clean it," James retorts. "Reg, we need to get you cleaned up as soon as possible. Infection might—"

Regulus eases his shirt and coat down. "Yeah, alright, but not here. We can't stay out in the open like this."

"Do you really think the death eaters are going to chase us down after all of that?" Evan asks incredulously.

"Of course they are. As soon as they get Mulciber's arm wrapped, they'll be on their way," Regulus mutters as he reaches out and grabs James' chin, turning his head so he can narrow his eyes at the cut on his cheek. There's a smaller one on his throat, too, but it's already stopped bleeding. The one on his face is slowing down, at least. "They have supplies with them, so it won't take long to recover. Mulciber will be on a warpath, no doubt. James, stop moving."

"I'm fine," James insists, trying to lean his head back.

"Let me look at it, you idiot."

"I said I'm fine. You're worse off. Let me see your shoulder—"

Evan clears his throat. "If you two are done, there's a stream not too far from here with a little cave close by. Feel free to stop flirting at any time."

"Piss off," Regulus grumbles, but he dutifully drops his hand and turns towards Evan. "I saw Axus got their hook. Do you still have your knife?"

"Willa and Axus chased me for a long time," Evan says wearily, heaving a sigh. "Willa stole my knife; she's a crafty girl, I hate to admit. I managed to shake Axus by assuming they'd chase the hook if I tossed it, and I was right. I still have my supplies, obviously." He reaches up to pat the strap of his bag. "I just don't have any weapons. Didn't let that stop me, though."

"Here," Regulus says, holding out the hatchet to James, who stares at it without moving. His eyes crawl up to meet Regulus' gaze, and he swallows thickly. Regulus nods at him, which makes him take the hatchet slowly and carefully. It's covered in Mulciber's blood. Regulus takes the sword; James doesn't protest, just letting him have it. He holds it out to Evan, who blinks at it. "Here."

Evan only waits one moment before he reaches out to take it, then he mumbles, "Thanks."

"Lead the way," Regulus replies, sweeping out his hand.

"The death eaters know the stream, but not the cave," Evan explains as he turns and starts walking. "I've seen them go to the stream from the trees, but I don't think they've realized there's a cave near it. Should be safe for a few moments."

"Unless they've already recovered enough to start searching for us again," James points out.

"Yes, so maybe pick up the pace, yeah?" Evan suggests, and they all start up a light jog, which is about all they can manage with how sore and exhausted they all are.

Regulus presses his hand to his side with a wince, but he keeps going past the pain. "Did your supplies come with anything even vaguely medical?"

"No, but I have a cloth that should help clean you two up, and a bowl we can carry water in," Evan replies.

"Lovely," Regulus mutters with a sigh. "Not that I'm not grateful, Evan, but what were you doing in that tree?"

"I heard Mulciber scream," Evan says, and Regulus keeps staring straight ahead as James and Evan both glance at him from either side. "I wasn't too far, actually, and I was...curious, so I got close and climbed up to see what was going on. A right fright you were while chopping away, lover boy."

"Yes, well, you missed the part where I warned him that would happen," Regulus says. "Not my fault he didn't listen."

Evan whistles low, then clicks his tongue. "Can't imagine what he did to make you give a warning like that. I can guess, though. Threaten your boyfriend?"

"Mocked his brother, actually," James corrects.

Both, Regulus thinks, then grimaces as soon as he's had the thought, because James isn't his boyfriend. Regulus is just—look, he's injured and tired and dealing with a lot, okay? Give him a break. He can't be blamed for the thoughts he has under these circumstances, especially when he's essentially being guided into them because he knows that Evan means James when he says your boyfriend. Fuck, Regulus needs a nap.

They're all quiet until they locate the stream Evan is taking them to. He points out the cave, but they stop by the water first. It's clear and clean, less of a stream and more of a pond. The water is startlingly still outside of a few ripples that come from the wind and nothing else. Regulus can see all the way through to the bottom, and there's not one fish or anything else inside it.

Evan goes further down away from them to gather water in his canister and bowl, while James and Regulus crouch down to clean the blood off their hands for the second time today. It's getting a little bit later, but not late enough that the death eaters will retreat for the night. There's still time.

Regulus can feel James looking at him. He's not brave enough to look back, because now his anger is down to a simmer, just quietly festering under the surface. He has the space for shame and discomfort for his own actions, at this point. He doesn't know how James will be looking at him.

Vaguely, Regulus wonders what Sirius must have thought, seeing him chop off Mulciber's hand. That's a bit stupid, isn't it? Sirius did things in his games, too. Horrible things. He vividly remembers being fifteen and watching Sirius bite someone's finger off before spitting it out, using the advantage of their agony to finish them off. He was ruthless, unafraid to do anything and everything—even grotesque things—to stay alive. The worst part is, he never would have done those things at all if no one had tried to kill him in the first place.

If Mulciber hadn't cut James' cheek and made him flinch, then maybe he would still have his hand.

Regulus thinks Sirius wouldn't blame him, or see him any differently. Strangely, Regulus doesn't feel any different, but he's rational enough to work out why. Mulciber isn't dead. Yes, he's missing his hand, but Regulus didn't kill him.

He still wants to, though. Just because his anger has settled down doesn't mean it went away. It's still there, mostly just resting at the moment.

It's going to weigh on him. He knows it will. Already, he can see the blur of blood without even closing his eyes and hear Mulciber's shrieks of pain ringing in his ears even after they've stopped. Regulus will deal with it in his nightmares.

"Regulus," James says.

"I'm fine," Regulus replies reflexively.

"Regulus, look at me," James orders firmly, and there's something authoritative about his tone that Regulus responds to immediately. He looks, and James meets his gaze steadily, his expression calm. "You're not fine."

"I can't afford to let that matter," Regulus admits, because no, he's not fine. James is not fine. No one in this damn arena is fine. It's not possible, and they all have to carry on anyway. It's not a choice. "Just leave it, James."

"I don't—blame you," James murmurs.

"No?" Regulus raises his eyebrows. "I just mutilated someone. Tell me, how exactly are you going to excuse that?"

James shakes his head. "I'm not excusing it. I'm looking at it logically, and don't make a snarky fucking comment about me not having any logic, Regulus. I'm not in the mood, and this isn't a joke. We are in an arena where we have no choice but to fight and kill to survive. I buried my hatchet in a man's skull less than three hours ago."

"That was different."

"How?"

"I didn't have to chop off Mulciber's hand to survive, James. I did that because I—" Regulus cuts himself off and looks away.

"Because you were angry, and scared, and fighting under intense circumstances where dying was so much of a risk that everything—all of it—was survival instincts," James insists, swaying forward to catch Regulus' gaze again. "I know it came from a place of anger, but murder isn't delicate, Regulus. It's not clean. Sometimes it's brutal, like that, like the things Sirius had to do when it was him. You don't think I haven't had this same conversation with him before, hm?"

Regulus swallows, then reaches out to gently take the hatchet from James, dipping that in the water. It's his mess, after all; he should clean it up. "I know that, here in the arena, the perimeters for what must be done to survive are different than out there, but James...I don't want to get lost in that."

"Regulus," James whispers, and his hand comes down to cover his wrist, his eyes soft and sad.

"Can't you feel it?" Regulus whispers back, searching his eyes, desperate to find understanding. "It's like this—this pit. Like we're being pushed and pushed until we're frayed. Ragged and hungry like animals. But we feel—we feel, James, and not the way animals do. Deeper. Stronger. With higher intelligence, usually. So, our rage, our pain, our fear—it can become a weapon. And this arena, it's just this pit we fall further into until everything else, all the rules and—and what's right, just gets farther and farther out of reach. This place sucks the humanity right out of us. Can't you feel it?"

James takes a deep breath, then slowly exhales and nods. He looks pained. "That's why I didn't want to kill the animals. I actually—I wasn't as against it at the start, but then I saw them, and I thought… I don't know. The feeling of—of having to kill them was like this...vice around my throat. I didn't want to have to, just like I didn't want to have to kill that man, but I did. I can feel it, Regulus. You're not alone."

"I don't want to lose myself," Regulus rasps, "and I'm—I'm scared that I already have."

"You're so like Sirius sometimes," James murmurs tenderly, with a smile that's tinged with a mixture of fondness and pain. "I'm scared, too, but we're still here and we're still trying."

Regulus huffs a weak laugh. "That has to count for something, doesn't it? Is that what you're saying?"

"Almost. I think it counts for a lot of things," James replies, his smile growing warmer. His hand slips down into the water so he can squeeze Regulus' fingers between his own. "We're okay. We'll be okay, love."

"For now," Regulus says softly.

He looks away and pulls his hand free from James' grip, because his touch, even under the water, puts that stupid flutter in Regulus' chest. It's senseless. This is the worst possible place to go about having fucking heart flutters because James Potter has touched him, like he's suddenly fourteen again. For fuck's sake, he needs to get a grip. He's literally in a life or death situation at all times.

Regulus finishes cleaning off James' hatchet, then gives it back to him. Their hands are clean, but there's still blood on them from their wounds, and also on their clothes. That will just have to dry into it, because it's not as if they can wash their clothes at the moment. It's getting too late, and none of it will be dry by the time the temperature drops. So, for tonight, they'll be sleeping in clothes stiff with blood.

Evan approaches with the bowl and cloth, holding them up with a smug little smile. The prick is unharmed, of course, so he's completely free of what's surely about to be an irritating process. It's likely going to hurt, but it's necessary.

"Alright, let's get into the cave in case our friends head in this direction," Evan declares, nodding for James to walk ahead of him while Regulus grabs his bag.

"They won't be able to find us if they do, right?" James checks, turning around to walk backwards and face them both.

"The cave is behind loads of shrubbery and vines, so it's barely even visible to the eye. I actually only found it because I was avoiding Axus and Willa. Practically fell in," Evan assures him with a chuckle. "So long as we're quiet, they'll come through and never even know we were here."

There's a distinct click of a mechanism releasing, and then James is howling at the top of his lungs and crumbling to the ground. His scream of pain echoes off the trees, so loud that birds take flight, and Regulus can't even blame him.

James just got himself caught in a bear trap.

Chapter End Notes

for those of you coming to the end notes for the more in-depth warnings:

the explicit depictions of murder:

IF YOU WISH TO SKIP, THEN STOP READING WHEN IT SWITCHES TO REGULUS' POV AND PICK BACK UP WHEN IT SWAPS TO JAMES' SECOND POV.

if you just want the in-depth warning: regulus is attacked without warning by—as of now—an unnamed man, pinned to the ground and nearly stabbed. james swings his hatchet into the man's head, killing him. it's described in a bit of detail, but only briefly. there's descriptions of blood.

As for the explicit depictions of violence:

IF YOU WISH TO SKIP IT, STOP READING AFTER REGULUS' SECOND POV WHEN MULCIBER GRABS JAMES AND PUTS A SWORD TO HIS THROAT AND PICK BACK UP WHEN IT'S REGULUS' THIRD POV AND THEY'RE RUNNING AGAIN

if you just want the in-depth warning: regulus and james get into a fight with the death eaters. mulciber slices james' face with his sword. regulus cuts mulciber's hand off with the hatchet—and this is described in a bit of detail, mentions of blood and regulus stomping on his hand. regulus is sliced on the side by quinn with her spear. evan also shows up, and he does so by dropping a noose made out of vine around quinn's throat, falling from the tree as she gets raised in the air. both mulciber and quinn survive these things.

for those of you who have finished the chapter...

whew, what a doozy, huh?

let's get into it, i guess.

once again, i led you all in with a false sense of security. i do have a terrible habit of doing that. i would apologize, but i fear i will do it again. whoops 🤭

it started out so nice, right? like, james was chilling, flirting with regulus—ya know, as one does—talking about cute little memories and stuff. the rock story 😭😭😭 pls, im such a whore for the idea of regulus being a sweet, shy kid (to people he likes, at least) who ends up growing into this mean prick of an adult. also, regulus and james talking about the Parting Gift. it was bound to happen eventually, but they couldn't have picked a worse time.

then BOOM. 💫 murder 💫 james' first kill. that was so sad. he looked hot while doing it, though, so... 🤷‍♂️

NO LET ME STOP 😭 that was a joke. i have to deflect with humor, or ill genuinely get very sad, because james is sad about it, and i LOVE HIM. yes, i know i wrote it. i still have the right to want to hug him anyway. that's okay, because i made regulus coddle him afterwards, AS HE SHOULD. james literally just killed for him, you're damn right regulus coddled him.

unfortunately, things just Got Worse. james didn't even get to properly deal with anything before his life (and Regulus') was in danger AGAIN. that whole running scene was such a rush to write, i hope you all know that. i had run boy run by woodkid playing and it was genuinely so thrilling. that makes me sound like a bad person, maybe, but i mean from a writer's standpoint, mostly, because i was In The Zone while writing it. you haven't LIVED until you're writing something and you look up to realize you haven't moved in 3 hours.

anyway, regulus being a menace seems to be a running theme in my fics. like, i always give him at least one Unhinged Moment where we're all like: oh, he is Very Unwell. he actually has more than one in this fic, but that's besides the point. this first one was chopping mulciber's hand off and then feeling exactly zero remorse for it. in his defense, he LITERALLY told mulciber what would happen if he made james flinch. like, you cant say he didn't warn him. he's just a man who keeps his promises, if you think about it. and also, mulciber insulted sirius, too. i will defend regulus with my life, okay?

then EVAN!!! OUR BOY IS BACK!!! evan, my beloved <3 he really just swooped in and saved the day. king behavior. i am swooning.

(side note: regulus thinking of james as his boyfriend by accident, then immediately dismissing it. my brother in christ, you are fooling NO ONE) finally, The Bear Trap. heh, who put that there anyway? those damn gamemakers, just a bunch of assholes, am i right? 😅 poor james... you're not gonna believe me, but i really do love him so much.

yeah, listen, you can yell at me, that's fine, i have accepted the consequences of my choices. that was mean to leave on a cliffhanger, wasn't it? 😬 again, i would apologize, but...well. it will unfortunately happen again, and anyway, it's not that long of a wait!

alright, let's do numbers:

remaining tributes as of this chapter: 14
tributes that have died, as of this chapter: dylan, avery, and eight unnamed/unknown others.

Loss

Chapter Notes

hello, hello!

warnings for this chapter:

-graphic depictions of violence
-graphic depictions of injuries
-descriptions of blood
-murder/death
-depictions of grief
-angst

(i will, as always, be putting a little spoiler-y in-depth warning in the end notes for those of you who want/need it, which is valid!)

this is another heavy one, unfortunately. it has its light moments, but overall, it's sad as shit. so, i recommend reading with something to cuddle close by! also, maybe read where you can cry without anyone seeing you!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

There's the sound of Evan's bowl hitting the ground, and then the first thing James feels outside of the searing, white-hot agony centered on his leg is hands on his face.

Regulus has thrown himself down on the ground next to him, his face alarmingly pale. He's cradling James' cheeks, but only for a second, and then he's ripping himself away to go to the trap on James' leg. James stares down at it as he gasps out choked noises of pain, whimpering and biting his lip so hard that he nearly bites clean through. Fuck. Fuck, fuck, fuck.

It hurts so fucking bad. James has never—he hasn't felt pain like this before. He's never even broken a bone, so seeing the trap clamped down on his leg is just—so much. It is so much, and James' head reels from how much pain there is. And to think, there are worse things to experience, and greater pains to feel. James can't even fathom it, any of it. He thinks the entire concept of pain is just stupid. It shouldn't exist.

"We—we have to pry it open," Regulus says, his voice sounding strained. James can see his hands shaking. "Evan—"

"I know. I just." Evan exhales and grimaces. "Fuck. Okay, James, this is going to hurt, like, really bad. As soon as we get it open, you need to move your leg free. Regulus, you get one side, and I'll pull the other. Firm grip now. Regulus."

At the sharp call of his name, Regulus gives a violent blink and jolts into motion. He nods at Evan, and they both reach out to carefully grip the sides of the trap. Neither of them pull.

"Just—fuck, just do it," James grits out. He can feel the teeth of the trap buried in his leg, deep enough to scrape bone.

"Together," Regulus rasps. "One, two, th—"

"Wait," Evan blurts out. "On three, or after three?"

"Evan!" Regulus shouts, glaring at him and looking frazzled.

Evan huffs. "It's a valid question!"

"Three!" Regulus bellows, and they immediately start pulling at the same time, which is when James starts screaming bloody murder again.

It almost hurts more being pried open than when it clamped shut, honestly. James' leg immediately starts throbbing harder, wave after wave of pain radiating from his leg all through his body. As soon as he has room, James lifts his leg free and scoots himself back, his shouts tapering off into whimpers as his foot drags along the ground.

When Evan and Regulus let go of the trap, it snaps shut with a clang, blood staining the teeth where it meets. In seconds, Regulus is back at James' side, hands cradling his cheeks once more. James looks at him, blinking tears out of his eyes.

"You're fine," Regulus says breathlessly, his eyes wide, and he's still so pale. "It's fine. You're fine, James. It's not even that bad, yeah? Don't be a baby about it."

"It fucking hurts," James confesses, nearly whining.

"I know, I know, I'm sorry. You're fine, baby. It's fine," Regulus rambles, his fingers trembling as they pat down the sides of his neck, more unsteady now than he was in the aftermath of cutting Mulciber's hand off.

"Regulus, you need to get him up, now," Evan hisses. "There's no way the death eaters didn't hear that. I wouldn't be fucking surprised if everyone heard that. Get him to the cave. Go."

"I—I don't think I'll be able to walk," James chokes out, his panic rising until he almost can't breathe around it. Not being able to walk out here, in these conditions, that's a fucking death sentence. He immediately starts spiraling.

"I'll help you. It's fine, I'll help. Shh, you're okay, I'm going to help," Regulus chants, and then he's shifting forward to get an arm around James, helping haul him up.

It's not a graceful process. The difference in the position changes the feeling of pain, somehow, which doesn't even make sense. Maybe it's the gravity that tugs at his leg once he's upright, or maybe it's the bolts of searing pain that shoot up his leg when he nearly stumbles and puts even a hint of weight on his foot, or maybe it's the drag of cloth against his wounds as it shifts on his skin. Whatever it is, it has him clamping down on Regulus and clenching his teeth so he won't yell.

Sweat drips down James' forehead, and Regulus tucks himself into his side, an arm around him. He supports most of James' weight and begins helping him limp towards the direction of the cave. It's slow-going, honestly, but they make some progress before Evan catches up with them, having refilled the bowl of water and gathered his things again.

As soon as Evan reaches them, he ducks under James' other arm without a word and helps support him along the way, as much as he can while holding so many things at once.

Getting to the cave is difficult; getting inside is a fucking trial and a half. It's a little bit elevated, and it's behind a wall of vines and shrubbery, like Evan said. Evan has to dart inside to put everything down, then come back and peel open a gap big enough for them to fit through. It doesn't work really well, so James and Regulus stumble inside, which makes James step down with his bad leg, and that rips a whimper from his lips.

"I'm sorry, I'm sorry, fuck, I'm so sorry," Regulus apologizes, and he sounds absolutely fretful, so much despair in his voice that it actually breaks James' heart a little bit.

"It's—it's okay," James wheezes, doing his best to pretend he's not in as much pain as he's actually in. Putting on a brave face. Trying to soothe Regulus more than himself, at this point.

Regulus helps him over to the cave wall next to where Evan sat his things, slowly easing him down with care. James holds his breath until he's settled, his legs stretched out in front of him, and then he exhales explosively and tips his head back, eyes drifting shut for a moment. Just from that small walk to the cave, he feels like he's about to pass out.

"We need to look at it," Evan mumbles, and James opens his eyes to see him kneeling by his leg. He looks up and makes a face at James. "This…is also going to hurt. Sorry."

"Just give him a fucking minute to breathe," Regulus snaps.

"Listen, I get that you're fretting right now, lover boy, but we don't have time to do this gently," Evan replies. "We need to see how bad it is, and so does your mentor, because James may need medicine we don't have."

"All I've got is a tiny bottle of antiseptic and a few bandages," Regulus admits, pulling his bag off to dig for it.

"Wait, what about you?" James asks. "You're hurt. You—"

"Shut up, James," Regulus cuts in distractedly, not even paying him any mind as he pulls out the compact kit. He pops it open to reveal a depressingly small bottle and three bandages that are also very tiny. He holds it up towards Evan almost desperately.

"Let's just see how bad it is first," Evan mutters, eyeing the kit with a grimace, like it's pathetic. "Alright, James, ready?"

James blows out a deep breath. "No. Do it anyway."

Evan does it anyway. In his defense, he does try to be gentle when he slowly, carefully starts rolling up the clothes over James' leg. It's just that every shift and tug causes fire to lick up and down his nerve-endings in the worst way possible. He tenses up and grits his teeth, squeezing Regulus' hand so hard that he's going to feel bad about it later.

But Regulus is right there, leaning in to murmur nonsense in his ear, just a steady stream of, "You're fine. It's fine. I know it hurts, I'm sorry. Just breathe, James. It's fine. Shh."

"You—you called me 'baby' before, you know," James gasps out, his chest heaving as he rolls his head to the side to gaze at Regulus, more than willing to do everything in his power to avoid what's going on down at his leg.

"No, I didn't," Regulus denies instantly. "I told you not to be a baby about this, and you're failing miserably."

James flinches when cloth drags over where the teeth of the trap bit into his leg, and Regulus immediately backtracks.

"Sorry, no, you're doing great," Regulus blurts out, his voice pitched higher with distress, and now he's squeezing James' hand back almost as hard.

"Right, but—ah, fuck." James grimaces and struggles not to shift, not to try to squirm away from the pain. He gives his head a literal shake, like he can just…shake it off. It doesn't work, but he focuses on Regulus anyway. "But yeah, you said that, and then you called me 'baby'. Like, you know, tenderly."

"Tenderly?" Regulus repeats, bewildered.

"A pet name. Term of endearment. Whatever you wish to call it," James explains. "You said it."

"You did," Evan confirms.

"You stay out of this," Regulus says warningly, then glances back at James. "I did not call you baby as a term of endearment or a pet name, though it would be very fitting, because you're absolutely being a baby about this right now."

"But you did, though," James insists. "Do it again."

"James."

"I could die. You don't know."

"You're not going to die," Regulus snaps. "Shut up."

Evan snorts, drawing their attention. "No, James, sadly you don't get to use the dying card, I'm afraid. Not yet, at least. It's…bad, yes, and you definitely need medicine, but it would take days to kill you."

"How bad? Let me see." Regulus pulls away to go examine James' leg, and all the color that had returned to his face proceeds to drain right back out.

"Not good?" James asks weakly, but he doesn't need to ask. He can see it from here. The wounds are deep, very deep, and they're still sluggishly pouring blood. The skin is angry red and swollen, inflamed already.

Regulus swallows, then clears his throat. "This is—fine. Evan, give me some water. James, hold still."

Evan passes him the bowl and cloth, and Regulus dips the cloth before giving James a warning look, waiting to receive a nod before he squeezes out the cloth over James' leg. The water cascades down, washing away blood and dirt, and it's terribly cold. James raises his arm and bites down into the side of his coat, pounding his free hand against the floor.

Gently, Regulus cleans his leg as much as he can, eventually using the cloth to carefully wipe around the entry wounds. He goes for the antiseptic next, using every drop and ignoring James when he tries to protest. Evan chuckles when James complains, but he doesn't intervene, just letting Regulus do whatever he likes. James, of course, fusses.

"At least keep one bandage for yourself," James demands, utterly aghast when Regulus starts peeling them open. "You have that gash on your side. Regulus, please just—"

"Shut up, James," Regulus says dismissively, yet again, then carefully covers James' wounds in every single bandage, somehow managing to make them all fit.

"You're not going to be able to walk," Evan informs him. "Not for a few days, at least. Not unless you get medicine sent in by your mentor."

"Which is going to happen," Regulus says, then tips his head back to glare directly at the ceiling of the cave. "Sirius, you're going send something to fix him, or so help me, when I get out of here, I'm going to rip all of your hair out right from the scalp until you're fucking bald."

There's a long beat of silence, and James blinks at Regulus, startled. Regulus is very… agitated. Fussy. Frantic, almost. He's clearly on edge, like maybe he doesn't like to see James in pain, and James thinks he doesn't. It puts a soft glow of warmth in James' chest to realize that Regulus is concerned about him.

James thinks that realization alone could cure him, because despite the pain all over, he breaks out into a grin and feels like he could hop up and run around. He doesn't test the theory, but he feels it nonetheless.

"His hair, Reg? That's a bit much, isn't it?" James teases.

"It's just enough for him to know I am not joking," Regulus grumbles, then huffs and dips the cloth in the bowl, wringing it out. He shifts to come back to James' side, freezing when he looks at James' face. "What are you grinning about?"

"You're upset because I'm hurt," James whispers, beaming at him. Regulus presses his lips into a thin line, but doesn't deny it or confirm it. "Also, you called me 'baby'."

Regulus rolls his eyes. "Fuck off, I did not."

"Did too," James says. "Evan heard it."

"Evan did hear it," Evan agrees. "You said it, lover boy. Might as well own it."

"I like you," James declares cheerfully, and Evan winks at him.

"Shut up, both of you," Regulus says, shaking his head as he settles on his knees next to James and lifts the cloth to start cleaning the blood off his cheek. He's very gentle about it.

James holds still and flicks his gaze over Regulus' face. He has a bruise at the high point of his cheek, but the cut there is scabbed over and healing now. The split lip isn't swollen anymore, and it's also visibly better than it was the day prior. Something about seeing him get better soothes James, like a reassurance that everything that happens here is something that will one day fade. James knows better than that, through Sirius and even his mum, but he still finds it within him to have that hope anyway. One day, Regulus will heal.

The thing about healing that no one talks about is, it's painful. Getting better hurts. It's not something that's just easily done and over with. Bruises have to ache before they fade, and cuts have to bleed before they scab, and breaks have to set before they mend. Sometimes, healing is harder than being hurt.

Regulus carefully drags the cloth around James' slice on his cheek, eyebrows furrowed as he looks at it. He seems displeased about it, even more than James is. He knows it's not fatal, so he's not too worried about it, honestly. Sure, it hurts, but not very bad and it's nothing compared to his leg.

"It's fine," James murmurs.

"It might scar," Regulus shoots back, sounding unhappy.

James raises his eyebrows. "Have a problem with scars, do you?"

"No," Regulus says. "Scars themselves aren't a problem, but he had no right—he only did that because I—" He stops and shakes his head, looking and sounding very frustrated. Even still, he remains gentle when cleaning James' neck. "I should have put the hatchet between his eyes for this."

"You know, I've noticed that you get really offended about things involving my appearance," James muses. "You were upset about my glasses, the idea of my hair getting cut, and now this. What's that all about, Reg?"

Regulus frowns, and he doesn't speak for a long time, not until he pulls the cloth back. James can feel his damp skin prickling in the soft breeze that flows into the cave. He watches Regulus exhale deeply and reach up with his free hand to carefully brush the tips of his fingers under the cut on James' cheek, his touch so light that it doesn't even hurt.

Regulus swallows. "I don't want them to change you."

James feels the impact of those words in his chest, because he instantly understands what Regulus means. He's somehow found the words for it, so succinct to explain something with such depths, and James is pretty sure his heart fucking breaks.

The thing is, it's more than just change, especially surface-level changes. Regulus—like Sirius—doesn't handle change well. When they're settled into something, comfortable with how the world is when it makes sense to them, any difference that comes in to shake that up will upset them. James thinks it's a result of their childhood, the constant abuse from their parents, never having a sense of stability because every day was a different battle they couldn't prepare themselves for. So, the things that give them a sense of stability—they cling to them, and if that changes, it's more upsetting than anything.

It's not about how James looks, not really. It's more of a representation for the stability he offers just as himself, because through everything, he's remained a constant. Sirius and Regulus were changed when Sirius volunteered. Forever altered with barely any resemblance to who they were before it happened. James changed, too, but in little ways. Quieter ways. Hidden ways, safely tucked behind closed doors where Sirius and Regulus could not see. He didn't lose too much of himself for it to become obvious the way they did, and he's just now realizing that—like Sirius—Regulus takes comfort from that. He's protective of that. Defensive of it, just the same as Sirius.

I don't want them to change you, Regulus said. It's more than just taking his glasses and giving him scars. It's a plea for James to get through this unscathed. Because he was always the one with a bridge to who they all used to be. He's closest to it, like a connection they can reach out and touch, a reminder of what they lost when they're in danger of forgetting that there used to be anything at all.

James thinks that Sirius and Regulus have many different fears, and one that they share is how easily the Hallow and the games can alter everything. The fact that they want to protect James from that, both of them, is…heartbreaking. Because they can't. Because there's absolutely nothing they can do to save him from it, and he would know, because he tried everything in his power to save them.

He failed. He failed them both.

Taking a deep breath, James reaches up and gently sweeps Regulus' hair back over his temple, tucking some of it behind his ear, staring right into his eyes as he whispers, "They already have, love."

It's spoken in a tone that is weighted with remorse and regret, because he's not happy about it either, but he won't lie. The moment he killed that man, that was it. There's more, too. The fear, the desperation, the repeated surge of the need to survive; it all molds him every second, his shape ever-changing.

James doesn't have the heart to tell him that it's been like this for years. Even before he killed a man. Even before he entered the arena. Even before his name was called. Ten years ago, he was changed, too, just from the sound of Regulus' name and Sirius walking to the stage in his place.

"No," Regulus denies quietly, his voice a mere breath, and he looks like he's just been slapped. He shakes his head minutely, his eyes wide and a little wet, almost like he's betrayed by this.

He sounds so innocent. So young. Twenty-five and James can hear the fifteen year old in him, on the verge of breaking, like this is the most devastating thing to happen to him since he watched his brother take his place in the arena. It's like he's trembling on the inside, like that scared boy is trembling within him. Still trembling. Always trembling.

"Yes," James tells him gently, but he knows something that they don't, something that they struggle with when he doesn't, and never has. "It's okay, though. Do you want to know why? They can mold me, shape me, but what I'm made of, what I am; that doesn't change. Who we are—that's ours, Regulus. No one can take that from us. If nothing else, we always have that."

"I don't want them to touch you," Regulus snaps, and now he sounds almost—petulant. Frustrated. Indignant. He shakes his head and then, without warning, folds forward to press his face into James' shoulder, leaning into him.

This is. Well. This is a bit different, in that Regulus now sounds quite bitchy, and also wildly possessive, which is. Yeah. Yeah, that's something. Confusing, mostly, but something.

Regulus, in his greatest moments of emotion, has always done one of two things. He either shuts down and shuts it out until he can figure out how to properly ignore it, or he rides it out until he can wrangle it under control, usually while hiding. In the arena, James has noticed that Regulus doesn't let himself shut down, almost like he's afraid of it. Feeling is a connection to one's humanity, and when you're in an environment that's trying to wring that out of you, not letting yourself feel will only help it in the long-run. So, even in just riding his feelings out, Regulus is being a rebellious little shit, basically.

James is admittedly confused about the nature of Regulus' feelings at the moment, about him, but he's aware that they're important. He can make some of them out, and he knows what they mean. Possessive, protective, concerned, gentle—all of it curls up in James' chest like a purring cat, because he knows it means something. It has to.

James wants to ask. Do you still hate me? You said you always would, but are you sure that's true? He can't bring himself to say the words, because he's in enough pain as it is, and right now, he's not willing to risk more.

So, instead, he lifts his hand and cups the back of Regulus' head, carding his fingers through his hair and never feeling as powerful as he does when tension seeps out of Regulus' body with each swipe. James smiles fondly at the top of his head.

"Sorry to break this up," Evan says, and all of the tension slams back into Regulus' body immediately as he pulls away with a sharp inhale. James shoots a glare at Evan, who is standing by the entrance to the cave. James wasn't even aware that he wandered away to give them some privacy, but he's suddenly ending that kindness as he swivels to come rushing back over to them, eyes wide. "We have a problem."

Regulus heaves a sigh. "Don't we always?"

~•~

The problem, as it turns out, is the distant sound of the death eaters getting closer. Regulus stands at the entrance of the cave, his heart racing as he hears them approaching. They're going to make it here soon.

"You said they don't know the cave?" Regulus asks, keeping his voice low so James can't hear. They're both being very quiet, not wanting to alert James to the current issue.

"They don't," Evan confirms warily, "but that doesn't mean they can't find it if they're determined enough. We need to move, Regulus. Now."

"We can't," Regulus grits out. He glances over his shoulder at James, then looks away. "He can't."

Evan grimaces. "If they discover him, he won't be able to run on that leg, or even…fight, really."

"Maybe they'll keep going," Regulus murmurs.

"Regulus…" Evan looks at him with a strain around his eyes. He slowly shakes his head. "This is where the screams came from, and it's a source of water. They're going to check around thoroughly before they continue on."

Regulus clenches his jaw, flexing his fingers down by his side as his mind races. The thing is, he knows Evan is right. It's what he would do if he was hunting people down to kill them. A part of him is unnerved by how easy it is to put himself in their shoes. The mind of a murderer—he has it. Sirius does, too. Regulus has known that since he was fifteen.

James doesn't. Hopefully, he never will.

"Alright," Regulus says softly, taking a deep breath. "Well, if not letting them get here is the goal, I suppose the only option is to lead them away."

"Oh, you're mental, lover boy," Evan breathes out, eyes wide.

Regulus ignores him and whips around to move over to James, dropping down next to him. James looks startled as Regulus pushes the hatchet into his hands, forcefully wrapping his fingers around the handle.

"Regulus?" James mumbles.

"I need to step out for a bit," Regulus says calmly, and James' eyebrows pinch together. "I'm just going to get firewood, is all. Evan is going to stay here with you."

James frowns, then opens his mouth like he's about to reply, then slams it shut when the distant sound of taunting drifts into the cave. It's the death eaters, getting closer, and James looks at Regulus in confusion only for one more moment before his eyes light up with realization. Instantly, he sucks in a sharp breath and starts shaking his head.

"No. No, absolutely not," James declares.

"James, if they find you, they will kill you," Regulus states firmly. "You won't be able to run. You won't even be able to stand up to fight, not six fucking people."

"So, what, you want to give them a willing target to focus on instead?" James spits out, sounding more furious than Regulus has ever heard him in his life. "Since when did you start caring so much for my fucking life that you'd put yours on the line? What happened to not hesitating? What happened to that?"

Regulus reaches out to grab him by his jaw, forcefully holding his head still as he leans in to lower his voice to a low hiss while staring directly into his eyes. "Make no fucking mistake, James, I still hate the very breath in your lungs. Don't think for a second that I care about you more than I care about me. I don't care about you at all. I have no use for you."

James glares at him. "Then why the fuck would you go out there?"

To that, Regulus has no answer. He tightens his grip around James' face and struggles very, very hard not to kiss him. The impulse reaches up and digs its claws in until he almost can't shake himself free. They're both furious, and James looks unfairly good while angry, and Regulus' greater sense flees him when he's angry and also when James looks good. Kissing is obviously not the solution to their disagreement, but the temptation to do it anyway persists.

Regulus hates, hates, hates James Potter so much that he could just—he could fucking kiss him. Kiss him, and kiss him, and kiss him until they forget how to breathe.

Making a derisive noise, disgusted with himself for the urge, Regulus drops his hand away from James' face and starts to turn away. Immediately, James surges forward to grab onto his arm, holding on so tight that it hurts.

"Wait," James says desperately. "Wait, please don't. Please don't go, alright? Just—"

"What?" Regulus hisses. "Stay here? Let them find us and kill us? Leave you here alone and let them kill you? There is no fucking solution, James. I can lead them away, and I actually have a chance of getting away, but you don't. So, shut up and wait for your fucking medicine."

"Regulus, please," James begs, staring at him with big, sad eyes and genuine panic in his face. "Don't do this. If they find you, they'll kill you, and I—I can't—"

"I'm not dying for you," Regulus cuts in sharply.

James swallows. "I know, but you can still die." Regulus can't argue against that, so he says nothing. James makes a small sound and digs his fingers into Regulus' arm harder. "Just come back. If you have to go, then make sure you'll make it back. Promise me you'll do anything it takes to get back."

Regulus looks at him for a long moment, and there it is again. That stupid, senseless heart flutter. It gets stronger each time it happens, more obvious to the point that he can't ignore it anymore. It's growing in frequency, and it's turning him into the idiot he thought he left behind ten years ago.

Shaking his head ruefully, Regulus rocks forward on the perch of his feet, bringing one hand up to cup the side of James' head. He ducks in and presses a kiss to James' forehead, a result of the heart flutter and the earlier impulse to kiss. He's sort of resigned to how weak it makes him, at least at this moment when he's about to go running directly into danger in a move so uncharacteristic to who he is as a person that it sincerely makes him feel a little ill.

The kiss lingers, and James leans into it, his hand coming up to cup the back of Regulus' where it rests against his cheek and hair. Regulus can't keep his eyes from drifting shut, and he holds there for one beat, then two, and then three before slowly pulling back. James immediately tilts his face up as he draws back, his eyes wide and confused.

Okay, that's fair. Regulus did just tell him he hated him and didn't care about him at all less than twenty seconds ago. This is a big leap from that, and Regulus knows it. He should probably feel bad about the mixed signals he's sending at the moment, but he honestly doesn't have the time or the luxury.

"What was that?" James whispers, sounding breathless.

"A parting gift," Regulus whispers back, and then he stands up and snatches himself away when James tries to hold onto him.

Regulus wastes no time in pushing himself out of the cave, drawing out both daggers from their holsters. He's left his supplies with James, and given James his hatchet in case of an emergency, and that will just have to be enough. Does Regulus plan to die? No, he doesn't. Is he aware that there's a good chance he might? Also no, because he's ignoring that.

There's a few seconds where Regulus stands in place, his mind already trying to work through a plan for the best way to do this. It's not too long until it starts to get dark, and cold. The death eaters will retreat back to the cave once they can cross the crimson river, but not if they're on Regulus' heels, so he's going to have to find some way to lose them—only after he's gotten them far enough away from James.

In other words, Regulus is going to have to keep the death eaters chasing him for the next two hours, then disappear well enough that they'll give up in favor of getting warm and just try again tomorrow. It's not impossible, but the chances…

What was it that Sirius said one day, sounding so bitter that it was like the words were coated in poison? The odds are never in your favor. Yeah, well, Regulus is going to beat them anyway.

"Psst."

Regulus jumps, head snapping up from where he's waiting by the bank, eyes on the woods where the death eaters are steadily getting closer. Evan moves next to him, lips pursed and sword in hand.

"Evan?"

"Do I look like your boyfriend's babysitter to you? That's your job, lover boy, not mine," Evan mutters. "I'm not staying here to watch him fret about you."

"Oh?" Regulus arches an eyebrow at him. "So, what, you'd like to trade places, is that it? I'll stay here while you go running around with all of them chasing after you?"

Evan hums and gives him an appraising look. "I'm sure you'd love nothing more than to stay with him, but no, I have a different idea. What do you say we…better the odds?"

"The odds of…?" Regulus narrows his eyes.

"Your survival, and his, and mine," Evan explains. "There's six of them, and they all have weapons. We want to draw them away, yeah? Well, what if we split them up?"

Regulus raises his eyebrows. "Easier to get away from, and easier to fight if it comes to that, and they'll all have to give up more quickly to meet back up as one group."

"Brilliant, isn't it?" Evan grins at him. "So, you go one way, and I go the other. How does that plan sound?"

"Considering your first plan failed—"

"I beg your fucking pardon? That plan was flawless, and it worked. Well, at least until that bit at the end, but let's not talk about that. Trust me, this is a good plan."

Trust me. Those two words roll around in Regulus' mind, and he looks at Evan for a long moment in complete silence, coming to terms with the fact that he does. He trusts Evan. He was going to trust Evan alone with an injured James, and now he's going to trust him about this.

"Alright," Regulus says, finally. "You go your way, and I'll go mine. And Evan?"

"Yes?" Evan asks.

"Be careful," Regulus mumbles.

Evan grins at him. "Oh, I'm always careful."

"Is that so?" Regulus asks.

"Don't you know, lover boy?" Evan waggles his eyebrows playfully. "I can climb, and no one ever thinks to look up."

Regulus shakes his head, lips twitching. "Come on. If we're doing this, we need to go now and get their attention before they even start to look around."

Evan nods and starts moving, but Regulus hesitates just for a moment to look back at the entrance to the cave, where James remains alone. Injured. Unprotected. Anything could happen to him. Anything. But something will happen to him if they don't lead the others away, and the risk of that is much greater. Regulus swallows, then turns and forces himself to go.

Quickly, Regulus moves with Evan to stand in place on the other side of the pond. The layout unfurls in Regulus' mind. James is towards the east, and the death eaters approach from the west, which is some kind of fucked up irony. A cruel metaphor for how this could play out. After all, the sun rises in the east and sets in the west. If James is the sun, then Regulus isn't about to let him set today. Fuck that.

It takes a few moments more for the death eaters to reach them. Mulciber is on a warpath, as Regulus predicted. They had the supplies to take care of where Regulus cut off his hand; it's wrapped up securely, and he's holding a sword in his other hand. Bernice's, by the looks of it, because she has Hodge's knife, leaving him with nothing but a stick he must have picked up along the way. Axus has found their hook, and Willa has retrieved one arrow, so she's not completely empty-handed. Quinn has her spear, and she's also sporting raw bruises around her throat.

"You," Mulciber snarls as soon as he sees Regulus.

Regulus smiles and playfully wiggles his fingers in a mocking wave. "Me." He tilts his head. "You seem upset, Mulciber."

"You cut off my fucking hand!" Mulciber snaps.

"I did do that," Regulus agrees.

Mulciber's face twists into a sneer. "I'm going to take your fucking head for that, Black."

"Well, that's a bit excessive," Evan says. He stacks his hands over each other in the air. "Really seems to be escalating things a bit. Have you considered anger management?"

Axus snorts, then disguises it into a cough when Mulciber shoots a glare in their direction. Evan grins at them and winks, as if they never even tried to kill him at one point. Axus looks flustered by this response, and Regulus cannot believe this is happening right now. Evan's attractive enough that he probably could flirt his way out of being killed. His cheekbones are weapons in their own right.

"Where's your boyfriend, Black?" Bernice calls. "He and I have a bit of unfinished business."

"Oh, just on his way to the cave," Regulus lies with a smooth laugh. "He's going to clean that place out as soon as the river ices over. Shame you'll be too busy with us to stop him."

"He's bluffing," Quinn says immediately.

Regulus gives a lazy shrug. "Am I? I don't see him around here anywhere. Do you?"

"Willa," Mulciber says slowly.

"Yeah?" Willa asks, hand on her last arrow, even though she hasn't pulled it out yet.

Mulciber narrows his eyes at Regulus, then grits out, "Go back to the cave. You need arrows anyway, and wasting that one on them would be pointless if you can't be sure that you'll manage to hit them. If you see Potter there, kill him."

"You think he's not prepared for that?" Regulus asks, arching an eyebrow as Willa instantly starts backing up to turn and go jogging deeper into the forest.

"I think Potter is too soft," Mulciber retorts. "When it comes to killing, he'll choke."

"Unfortunately for you, I don't have that problem," Regulus says, twirling a dagger between his fingers lazily. He tips his head to the side, lips curled up. "I certainly didn't have that problem when I killed Avery."

"You're dead," Mulciber hisses, raising his sword to point it at him, pure fury flashing in his eyes.

Regulus chuckles and starts backing up. "You'll have to catch me first."

"Get them!" Mulciber shouts, and with that, Regulus and Evan turn to run, splitting in different directions. Regulus goes north, and Evan goes south, and the others break up to follow.

James remains safely to the east.

~•~

A parting gift.

The words ring in James' ears. Regulus has only said them once before, following the declaration that James might die. A parting gift for that purpose—because of possible death.

This time, James isn't the one at the highest risk of dying.

James muffles a small sound in the crook of his elbow and squeezes his eyes shut. They sting, and his heart thumps to a steady beat that feels like Regulus, Regulus, Regulus.

It's not right. It's not fair. James is supposed to protect him, to do everything he can to get Regulus home, and he's stuck here while Regulus is out there being chased by people who want to kill him. James has only ever felt so useless and so frustrated one other time in his life, and that was with Regulus, too.

Somehow, it's always Regulus who makes him feel powerless, like no matter what he tries, he's never doing enough. Like he can never do enough. It just makes James want to try harder, and every failure feels like a brand on his heart.

James was supposed to take care of Regulus at fifteen, too. It was Sirius' last request before he went into the arena, the last words he might have ever spoken directly to James, if he hadn't made it home. As hard as James tried, he never could get it right.

Regulus, like Sirius, is stubborn. He was going through something that no one should ever have to deal with. He wanted to be alone. Never wanted to talk. Always disappeared to places that James could never find him.

James used to sit outside on the street waiting for Regulus to come home where he disappeared off to after the games stopped showing in the courtyard. Every day, he tried to talk to him. He begged him to come over to his house. Asked him to dinner, because he was getting so thin. Suggested he stay over at least for a night to get proper rest, because he always looked so tired. Begged him not to go home, because his parents were furious with him every time he ran off, so much that he would have to face their wrath as soon as he went through the door.

Without fail, Regulus brushed him off. With each passing day, he got meaner and more distant, growing sharper when he told James to back off. It bubbled up into an explosion until Regulus was yelling at him. You're not Sirius! You'll never be Sirius, so stop trying to be, he'd shouted.

The thing is, James understood. Regulus wanted Sirius. He wanted his brother, and no one else was ever going to connect with him when his brother was gone, when Sirius was brushing up against death every day, never safe. James was just a living, breathing reminder of what was lost to them both.

But James was trying so, so hard. He was doing his best to keep it together and giving Sirius' last request his all. Regulus wasn't the only one fraying because Sirius was gone. James had lost his best friend, too. So, James had bubbled over along with him. Yeah, well, you're not him either, he'd replied, a tangle of spiking emotions and unwavering hurt.

If James had to guess the exact moment that Regulus really started hating him, it would be that one.

James regretted it, of course. He was fifteen, nearly sixteen, and he was dealing with a lot as well, but that didn't stop him from feeling remorse for hurting Regulus. Not only the boy he had feelings for, but someone he'd known for years, and the person Sirius begged him to take care of. So, he apologized. Not that it changed anything. It all stayed the same, and everything fell apart anyway.

At this age, learning all that he has, James knows it wasn't his fault. It wasn't Sirius' fault. It wasn't Regulus' fault. None of them are to blame for this, for where they are now, for all that they've suffered. James is aware that taking care of Regulus now isn't required to make up for how he failed to before.

But he really, really wishes that it would.

James made this choice for many reasons, past mistakes and keeping a promise to Sirius among them. Most of all, though, he decided this for himself. A selfish, selfish desire to save the man he's helplessly in love with. And he's failing again.

After all this time, you'd think he'd be used to that by now.

~•~

When Regulus was younger, he used to play hide and seek with Sirius, and eventually James when he came into the picture. Regulus was the best seeker, but that was probably because James and Sirius were terrible at being quiet when they hid. It was more than that, too. Regulus has always been observant, and he's got a sharp eye for finding the things he's after.

As for hiding, well, he was always good at that, too. All the hiding and seeking from his youth has prepared him in more ways than he could have expected.

It's certainly helping him now. Mulciber, Bernice, and Axus all chased after him, while Hodge and Quinn went after Evan. Regulus is faster than them, and he uses this to his advantage, staying ahead of them at all times. He runs, and runs, and runs, like maybe he could run forever.

He can't, and neither can those that follow him. Humans are creatures of endurance, so of course they can't just chase each other around for hours on end. Regulus begins a pattern, one that's going to help when it's time to retreat.

Over and over, Regulus gets ahead of them until he finds a good spot to hide in. Behind a tree, usually, or a bush. He waits for the others to catch up, then gets 'discovered' and takes off running again. He leads them further and further away from James in spurts, dangling himself like bait.

They fall for it every time.

Staying one step ahead is key, which is why it's so devastating when Regulus realizes that Mulciber is missing. Bernice and Axus are still hot on his trail at all times, but Mulciber stops showing up. This can either mean that he's gotten lost, fell back due to exhaustion, or found something else to chase after instead. Regulus has no idea where Evan is, but he's heard Quinn and Hodge in the distance a few times, so Mulciber could have gone to help them. Either that, or he's gone back to the crimson river to see if James is really there.

Whatever it is, Regulus doesn't like it. In hide and seek, knowing where the other players are is one of the most important parts to help you win. In this game, it's him, Mulciber, Axus, and Bernice. Losing one is concerning.

Unfortunately, it eventually gets late enough that worrying about Mulciber isn't an option. He needs to circle his way back to James, which means shaking Bernice and Axus off. This part won't be simple, but he's made it more simple by leading them into a pattern they're used to by now.

It's the same thing as before—find a place to hide—but, this time, the goal is to not get discovered. Bernice and Axus will keep looking while he sneaks off, waiting for that moment of discovery he's not going to give to them.

"Come on out, Black!" Bernice calls, sounding winded as she and Axus break through the trees. Regulus has stopped running, so they unconsciously know he's hiding.

"Fuck, I'm tired," Axus wheezes. "Bern, we can't keep doing this. We have to head back soon; the temperature is starting to drop. Mulciber said—"

"I know what Mulciber said," Bernice mutters. "Just spread out and look for him, alright?"

"What if we don't find him?" Axus asks.

"Then we'll go meet up with Willa. Maybe Quinn and Hodge will have better luck with Rosier," Bernice says. "But we'll find him. You hear that, Black? We know you're here!"

Regulus rolls his eyes. Yeah, yeah, he hears that, and them knowing he's here is the whole point. Idiots.

They're only two people, so they can't really cover much ground, which he uses to his advantage. The thing is, he was always better at hiding than Sirius and James because he was good at being quiet. He uses that, too.

People have this thing where their minds fill in information that isn't necessarily true. For example, Regulus can't be crouched near a large rock because they didn't see him in front of it, and when they move past it, he's not behind it either. They don't come over to check, because 'discovering' him has been easy so far; he's made himself obvious and loud on purpose, for this exact reason. It makes them sloppy.

So, with an ease that's almost pathetic, Regulus slips around the rock as they move past it, and the further they go, the farther he gets in the opposite direction. Slowly and silently, he backs away, hiding in places they've already checked and won't think to check again. And then, when he's far enough back that he loses sight and sound of them, he leaves.

Just like that.

It's a lot easier to get away from two people than it is six, especially when he has a head start and he's alone.

Regulus starts making his way back to James, quiet and careful and watchful. He stays alert, even as he puts as much distance between himself and the others as he can. He doesn't know Mulciber's location, so he isn't being reckless.

More time passes, and the temperature continues to drop, the sun dipping low enough that it's growing dark. If the death eaters are smart, they'll be heading back to the original cave now to stay warm for the night, where there's food and supplies waiting for them as well. From what Bernice said, that's the next course of action.

As for Regulus, he's getting closer to the pond, and it's making him eager. He wants to get back and set his eyes on James to make sure he's alright, which is…

Oh, fuck off. No. Absolutely not. Regulus isn't doing this. The heart flutters can shrivel up and die, is what they can do. It's happened before; it will again. This is the hunger games, and he is not about to—

A small twig hits Regulus on the side of his head from up high.

Regulus very nearly crawls out of his skin. He crouches down behind a rock instinctively, raising his dagger, his heart racing in his chest. He follows the direction the twig came from, his head tipping back where he spots Evan in the tree above him. He's grinning down at him as he swings his legs like the lunatic he is. Regulus exhales, relaxing slowly.

Evan makes a vague gesture in the direction of the pond, and Regulus nods. He holds up two fingers, and Evan shrugs. For some reason, they both know what all of that means. Yes, Regulus is heading back to James, and so should Evan. No, Evan doesn't know where Quinn and Hodge are, but he's in a tree, so he's assuming they lost him.

Evan makes a face at him, and Regulus flips him off, fighting a small smile. Evan laughs, seeming unable to help it, and the sound carries.

No one ever thinks to look up—until there's a sound.

It takes only seconds. One moment, Evan is grinning at Regulus, and the next, a spear is flying up to hit him right in the stomach. Evan's smile falls before his body does.

"No," rips free from Regulus' mouth, breathless, and then he stands up and spots Quinn a few steps away from the tree, Hodge standing right next to her.

Regulus' dagger is flying through the air before he's even had the thought. It buries itself directly in Quinn's throat, making her choke as she stumbles back and hits the ground at the same time that Evan does. Hodge makes a weak noise, spooked, and turns to run away.

Regulus doesn't chase him. He goes to Evan.

Evan has landed badly. He fell from up high, and his leg is sticking out at an awkward angle. The spear is still impaled in his stomach, and he's dragging himself back with low noises of pain like he can get away from it. He pushes himself up to lean against the trunk of the tree, hand braced on the handle of the spear as he groans through clenched teeth.

"No, no, don't take it…" Regulus trails off as he hits his knees next to Evan, who has just snatched the spear out with a deep gasp. He shakily drops it, and blood instantly starts flowing. Regulus swallows thickly. "Out. Don't take it out."

"Ow," Evan rasps, his trembling hand coming up to cover his wound. Blood seeps over his fingers.

Regulus leans forward and presses his hands to the wound, too, fingers immediately slick with blood. "Okay, this is—it's fine. If we can get the blood to stop, then we—"

"Regulus," Evan says.

"No," Regulus replies.

Evan huffs out a weak laugh. "I think I broke my leg."

"I'll carry you," Regulus tells him firmly. "I don't doubt that Sirius has sent medicine for James by now, Evan. Just don't bleed out, and you'll be fine when we get there."

"Just don't bleed out, he says," Evan mutters. He shakes his head and looks down at his stomach. "Yeah, I hate to be the one to tell you this, but that's a bit out of my control."

"You're fine," Regulus insists.

"I'm really not," Evan counters, and then he proceeds to cough, and when he does, blood bubbles up past his lips. He grimaces and groans through it, fumbling one hand up to swipe the blood away. "Oh, that's a bad sign."

"Shut up," Regulus croaks, his eyes starting to burn.

"I'm about to, I think. For good," Evan mumbles, his gaze rolling a little unsteadily before finding its way to Regulus. He smiles, just a bit. "Did you get her? Quinn?"

"I got her," Regulus confirms.

"No cannon."

"Yet."

"You're a scary bastard sometimes, you know that?" Evan says, then jolts when the cannon does sound, then winces through the pain of movement. A quiet gasp escapes him.

Regulus glances down and struggles to breathe at the sight of blood slipping through his fingers. Evan's life, slipping through his fingers. He looks back up.

"I'm sorry I left you on the other side of the river," Evan whispers, looking right at him.

"I told you to. You had to," Regulus murmurs.

"I know," Evan agrees, "but it still felt wrong."

Regulus swallows. "You're a good person, Evan Rosier."

"That's the thing, though. I'm really not." Evan blinks at him slowly. "I just—like you. Isn't that mental?"

"Certifiably insane," Regulus says, his chest feeling tight.

Evan waves his free hand lazily. "I don't mean the way your boyfriend likes you. Just… person to person, I suppose. It's a shame, really. I think—well, I think you're my friend."

"I—" Regulus chokes off, struggling to speak, finding it impossible to say anything of importance. He forces it out, nearly gagging on it, because he knows he wouldn't say it if Evan wasn't dying. He wouldn't have to, because Evan would be alive to just—know. "Yeah, I'm your friend, Evan."

"Have many of those, do you?" Evan asks.

Regulus snorts weakly. "Not really. I'm not exactly…the easiest person to get on with."

"What? No. You're a fucking delight, what are you on about?" Evan mocks through a shit-eating grin.

"No one's ever—" Regulus exhales shakily. "I have a friend at home, just one, but that's… different. I think you two would have gotten on well. But he's—" Regulus stops, because he's not sure how to even begin explaining Barty, who is his friend, yes, but not the way Evan has been. "Well, I'm not the type to have a best friend, but if I were, it would have been you."

"Pity we never met before this, eh?" Evan swallows harshly and looks down at his stomach, then closes his eyes and leans his head back. "Best friends tell each other things that they don't tell anyone else. I'm dying, so you have to indulge me. Didn't expect I'd be using the dying card so soon, but desperate times and all that."

"Yeah, alright," Regulus mumbles, pretty willing to give Evan whatever he wants at the moment, and he has the niggling feeling that there's something Evan wants to say.

"I've never had a friend before you," Evan croaks. "So, you know, thanks for that, I suppose. It—it was nice while it lasted."

"You—" Regulus fumbles for Evan's hand, and their fingers clasp around each other, slipping from the blood. "I'm—Evan—"

Evan hums, and he's slurring when he says, "Your turn, lover boy."

"I miss my brother," Regulus confesses in a whisper, his vision blurring as he feels Evan's grip get looser. The words wrench at him, but they're true. He doesn't say that he's missed his brother for the last ten years, but that's true, too.

"Won't have to miss him for long," Evan breathes out, his hand falling slack. "You're going to win. You…"

Evan doesn't speak after that.

Regulus sits with him, holding his hand, and it's not long before the cannon sounds again. He flinches when it does, then feels such a strong surge of emotion take over him that he quite literally just bursts into tears.

It's instant. He starts weeping so hard that it hurts, and he folds forward to press his face to Evan's shoulder. He's still warm, and it's not fair. It's not fair. It's not fair.

"Please," Regulus chokes out. "Sirius, please."

He doesn't know what he's begging for, really. For Sirius to find some way to fix this. For Sirius to hold him in his grief now when he didn't before. For Sirius to just—be here, because Regulus has just lost the best friend he never even got to have, and because Regulus misses his brother so, so fucking much.

Nothing changes. Sirius doesn't show up, Evan is still dead, and Regulus is left alone with a corpse.

~•~

The gut-wrenching, heart-rending sound of harrowing sobs that falls out of his little brother makes Sirius want to set the world on fire. It makes him want to get his hands on anyone who had anything to do with it and rip them apart.

Regulus never had very many friends growing up. When he was really young, he was too shy, and Sirius was always the one who wasn't afraid to talk to people. Sirius had friends in school, even before he met James, but Regulus never did. He's always been quiet, and even that young, he didn't really like people. Even James wasn't really his…friend, now that Sirius is thinking about it. It didn't matter how well they got on or how much Regulus actually, genuinely seemed to like him, James was always Sirius' friend. His best friend.

Regulus never had one of those. A best friend. There's Barty, and Sirius knows they are friends, but it's not… Well, there's something else mixed up in all that they are for them to be best friends. Uncomplicated, simple best friends—the way James and Sirius are. Regulus has never had that.

Until now.

Or something like it. Something that could have been. Maybe in another life, they would have been just as close as Sirius and James are. Maybe not. Either way, sometimes there are people that just—recognize each other. Like whatever you're made of, you might be lucky enough to find someone holding a little bit of you in them, and without even knowing it, you've been carrying around a little bit of them before you ever even met.

So, when you do meet, it's like something inside of you starts wriggling around that says hey, that's me, that's ours, that's us. Recognition. Connection. Something really, truly special.

Regulus has just watched that die.

Sirius stares at the screen, unable to do anything as Regulus releases a muffled shout into Evan's shoulder. It's utterly chilling, a raw scream of pure grief.

The worst part is, Sirius knew it was going to happen. He saw the death eater girl there with her spear. He saw her take aim, then let it fly, and there was nothing he could do. He could only sit here and watch, and cling to Remus' hand, and fall apart just because Regulus is.

Regulus, who said I miss my brother. Sirius has been crying ever since. Regulus hasn't said that, or anything even close to that, in ten years. Something he doesn't tell anyone else—that's what Evan asked of him, and that's what Regulus went with.

I miss you, too, Sirius had thought, and maybe he whispered it, maybe Remus heard him, or maybe not. He's been crying too incoherently to know. But it's true. He's been missing Regulus for the last ten years.

"I'm sorry, Reggie," Sirius rasps, even though Regulus can't hear him, even though that doesn't change anything. He is so, so fucking sorry. He wishes he could fix this.

He can't, and Regulus continues to weep.

There's often these moments in the arena, when those inside have been pushed and pushed and pushed, when they've been nonstop suffering every variety of torment—and then they break. They always break. Everyone has a breaking point. The saddest part is, there's generally multiple breaking points.

Some people don't get back up after they reach that point. Most do, but they don't get back up the same person. A few can, and they figure out how to recover as much as they ever will. It usually depends on how badly they've broken down.

Despite the brutality of Regulus' breakdown, he nonetheless gets back up. It's a bit of a process, one that shows just how stubborn he is down to his core; maybe that's a Black family trait, even to their detriment, because Sirius has that same streak within him. In this case, it serves Regulus well.

He cleans his face. He stands up, marches over to rip his dagger from the dead girl's throat, then moves back over to crouch down beside Evan. He starts carving into the trunk of the tree, his shoulders blocking the view of what he's doing.

"Evan's name?" Remus murmurs. He's been rubbing soothing circles into Sirius' hand since they started watching together. Sirius has been a wreck from the moment he came in through the door, rushing to see what had happened when he left the party after getting medicine sent to James.

Not very much had been happening, at the time. Regulus was still playing hide and seek, which Sirius recognized instantly. He's a smart little bugger, there's no denying that.

"I don't know," Sirius mumbles, waiting to see what Regulus will reveal when he moves out of the way.

It takes a while, and then Regulus stands up and walks away. Sirius sucks in a sharp breath the moment he sees what's there, and Remus curses softly in shock.

Hallow is Hollow

On the screen, the tree goes up in flames.

Sirius swallows harshly and can't bring himself to be upset about how much damage control he's going to have to do tomorrow. Regulus is grieving. Sirius would be no better in his situation, frankly. Hell, he might have been worse. The world doesn't know what will hit it if James dies.

Besides, Regulus has made himself very popular. The people love him right now, because not only is he entertaining them with all that he's dealing with, he's also dealing with things very well. He's smart and capable and fucking ruthless at times. There were literal cheers and chants of his name while he was chopping off Mulciber's hand, though Mulciber's mentor—Lucius—had been visibly displeased.

James, too, remains beloved by many. When he killed the man he did, people cheered for him as well. And, well, they're all living for Regulus and James' little…romance, or whatever it is. Sirius can't think about it too hard, because he knows them, so he knows that they're not just—playing it up. No, that's them. Every touch, every little comment, every shared look; that's all real, as real as Sirius has ever seen them.

Still, Sirius isn't above using it, if he has to. He sure did, without shame, going to sponsors with their little love story to get every donation he could to send James the medicine he needed to heal his leg. And Sirius will do it again, if he has to.

"Sirius," Remus blurts out, sounding strained, and he's suddenly strangling Sirius' hand.

"What? What is it?" Sirius replies, immediately panicking.

"I found out what Mulciber is doing," Remus says warily, and then he points to the screen, where Mulciber has returned to the pond and is kneeling down next to the closed bear trap, squinting at the blood.

Sirius can practically see the light bulb go off over Mulciber's head. With dread in his veins, Sirius watches as Mulciber stands up and begins his search.

The search for James.

Eyes sinking shut, Sirius whispers, "Fuck."

Chapter End Notes

i want to tell you all how to skip the hard parts, but like, this entire chapter is hard, so??? ill do my best!

for the injuries: it picks up right out the gate from where james got his leg stuck in a bear trap. there is a lot of mentions of pain, as well as blood, and the injury is described briefly in detail. regulus and evan do help him get out of it, and the injury is eventually cleaned and bandaged as much as it can be until the proper medicine can get sent to him.

for the death/murder:

IF YOU WANT TO SKIP THIS PART, SCROLL PAST WHEN REGULUS GETS HIT IN THE HEAD BY A SMALL TWIG AND CROUCHES DOWN BY A ROCK, AND PICK BACK UP WHEN IT'S SIRIUS' POV (but beware that sirius will reference the death that just took place)

if you just want the warning: evan dies, sadly. he is up in a tree and thinks he's managed to evade quinn and hodge. regulus makes him laugh, which catches quinn's attention from where she's close by, and she throws her spear up to hit evan in the stomach. regulus immediately stands up and launches his dagger at her, hitting her in the throat. evan falls out of the tree, breaks his leg, and bleeds out while regulus sits with him.

to everyone else, who has finished the chapter... im not even gonna ask how you're all feeling, because i can take a pretty good guess.

on a high note, regulus called james baby! the progression of regulus going from calling james a big baby in a mocking way, to calling him baby in tender way makes me go feral. also, the fact that he didn't even notice??? genuinely, he has no idea that he actually did it—and, in his defense, he was too busy losing his collective shit because james was hurt. which, hey, get a clue, reggie. again, in his defense, he's mostly oblivious purely by circumstances, because every time he starts to acknowledge the change of his feelings, some shit goes down that takes all of his focus.

the way that regulus—and sirius—want to protect james and keep him safe and make sure he doesn't get changed the way they've been changed. STOP THAT'S SO FUCKING SAD. what's worse is that james is ALREADY changed, and has been, and there's nothing they can do about it. sirius and regulus are just like me! i, too, want to wrap james up and keep him safe—which none of you probably believe, because i have been putting him THROUGH it.

regulus was a bit of a mess of mixed emotions during their little spat. all tangled up about it. he was quite literally that thing that's like: "you should be addicted to shutting up // you want to fuck me so bad that it makes you look stupid" 😭😭😭 literally, he was like: god i hate you, i wanna make out with you SO BAD. yeah, he's unwell, too.

but then the forehead kiss. why did he have to make it sad by calling it a parting gift???? leave him alone, he was dealing with a lot at the time. he was doing his best, okay? and james deserves forehead kisses.

and then...evan...

oof, that hurts. because, well, he's been a delight in this fic. not saying he was a good person—he actually had all plans to kill everyone from the trees and make it home. like, that was his goal from the start, but then he met regulus, and that plan got derailed. he made a friend, and it got him killed. but, if it comforts anyone to know, he didn't regret it you know, when i wrote evan's death, i was pretty fucking emotional, because i got super attached to fanon evan through writing just lovers and intermission, so writing him dying was just. really hard. but then, out of nowhere, Another One Bites The Dust started playing on my playlist, and i was literally just sitting there, laughing and a little teary-eyed because evan would have thought that was the funniest fucking thing. he would have been DELIGHTED to know that song played while he died. rip evan my beloved <3 you will be missed.

—being regulus' friend for that short time. all of his plans failed, but he didn't really mind, because he had a friend. that's so fucking sad, let me stop.

also, briefly touching on sirius. he is STILL going through it, yes, but that whole part where regulus said he missed him and was calling his name as he pleaded for him to do something??? gut-wrenching. the fact that they both miss each other and have been for the last 10 years??? devastating. we do see more of sirius and his feelings on everything next chapter. we see a lot of wolfstar over the next few chapters!

number update:

tributes remaining: 12
tributes who have died so far:
dylan
avery quinn
evan (😔)
eight unnamed/unknown others

Shutting Down

Chapter Notes

warnings for this chapter:

-graphic depictions of violence
-murder/death
-mentions of blood
-dissociative amnesia from an outsider's perspective
-vague hints to torture (you might not notice, it's very blink-and-you-miss-it, but still, just to be safe) as always, i will be putting in depth warnings in the end notes for those of you who need/want it to be spoiled for you, which is always valid!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

James hears the scuff of a shoe outside the entrance of the cave, and his heart leaps as he whips his head towards it. There have been two cannons, one right after the other, and he's barely been breathing ever since.

Maybe it's stupid, but James refuses to even consider the possibility that it's Regulus, despite knowing that the chances are… Well. He simply doesn't accept that, not without proof, and there's still some part of him that's sure he would know, somehow. It's not just a silly, romantic notion; he genuinely thinks that, on a fundamental level, everything would shift if Regulus wasn't in the world anymore.

His optimism wilts when the vines are sliced through carelessly, making a large gap for Mulciber to step into. James is moving before he even makes the decision to, bracing one hand on the wall and putting all his weight on his good leg as he hobbles to full height. He keeps his hatchet gripped in one hand and keeps the other against the cave to remain steady.

Mulciber stands still in the entrance with a sword in hand, his other wrist wrapped neatly where Regulus removed his hand. He looks at James up and down, then snorts.

"Well," he says, gesturing towards James' leg with his wrapped wrist, "it looks like both of us are at a disadvantage, hm?"

"A bit," James admits.

"Suppose that evens things out between us," Mulciber muses.

James purses his lips. "Well, I don't know, it's definitely different, isn't it? I mean, you could actually just turn around and walk away, but I don't have that option."

"True," Mulciber concedes, nodding, "but you can use two hands to fight, and I can't."

"Right, but you still have both elbows," James points out.

Mulciber hums. "That I do, and you still have both knees. Might hurt to move that leg, but you still can. I really do think this is evenly matched, honestly."

"I'm not sure if that's how it works," James mutters.

"Maybe not." Mulciber shrugs. "But, well, I actually wouldn't care if it was an even match either way."

James sighs. "Should've seen that coming."

"You really should have," Mulciber agrees with a chuckle. He swings the sword lazily in his hand in a move that James doesn't want to admit is cool. "Your boyfriend is very clever, Potter, do you know that?"

"I do know this about him, yes," James says.

"It's just, his confidence in his own cleverness makes him forget that he's not the only clever person in the world. I just so happen to be rather clever myself," Mulciber tells him, lazily leaning up against the cave wall. "He got us to send Willa away, said you were heading to the starting point to steal all our supplies, and he's a good liar, I'll give him that."

"Sounds to me like you're not as clever as you claim to be."

"Oh, I wouldn't call that a moment of stupidity. I'd say it was more…caution, just in case. I won't lie, I did fall for his little plan to start with. Chased after him for quite a bit, but I can't be blamed for that. I really wanted to kill him."

"Failed with that, did you?" James asks lightly, flexing his fingers around the handle of his hatchet, his heart thumping hard in his chest. He just. He needs to know that Regulus is alright, and if he can get Mulciber to slip up…

Mulciber just grins at him, looking far too pleased with himself, which makes James' heart sink. "Don't get ahead of yourself, Potter. See, I had a thought. I mean, it was your screams that drew us in this direction, you know. I started thinking, and I wondered…if you were fine and heading to the starting point, why were you screaming so much? I gave it a bit more thought, and I asked myself…why was Black just waiting for us? Seemed almost eager to be chased, didn't he? And of course he'd never get too far away from his precious boyfriend, would he? So, where were you?"

"Well, you found me. Want a sticker?" James says sarcastically.

"You're a funny man, Potter," Mulciber replies with a laugh, and it's a mean laugh, sharp and triumphant. "I couldn't be sure, of course, so I decided to check back here to make sense of it all. Imagine my surprise when I find a closed bear trap with blood on it. That told me all I needed to know."

James stares at him blankly. "Yes, yes, very clever. Are you done gloating now?"

"You know, it's a shame you didn't join us when we offered," Mulciber says, shaking his head. "I think we would have worked well together."

"You're delusional, then," James announces.

Mulciber clicks his tongue. "Oh, come off it, Potter. You're strong, there's no denying it, and if you weren't so fucking soft, that would actually mean something. We could have made you into something, you know that? And Black? Well, we would have let you look away as we killed him, slowly."

James goes still, his face dropping as his gaze sharpens on Mulciber, whose lips curl up into a malicious little smile. It's like the temperature in the cave drops, and James' skin crawls as his ears start to ring. The insinuation makes bile rise in James' throat, but more than that, there's pure fucking fury.

There's barely a breath between Mulciber's last word and James launching the hatchet right at him with all his might, not even hesitating as the instinctive need to protect rises up in him, and there's also the need to remove this fucking scum of a human being from the world. Mulciber raises his arm to block it with a look of surprise flitting across his face, and then he's roaring in pain as the hatchet buries itself in his arm that's already missing a hand. He drops his sword to fumble for the handle, ripping it out with a scream.

James doesn't give one fuck about his hurt leg at the moment. In his anger and adrenaline, he barely even feels it as he launches himself forward, tackling Mulciber to the ground. They go sailing back through the cave, rolling down the incline until they hit even ground.

Mulciber lands on top, and he still has the hatchet, which he promptly raises up with a snarl and immediately brings down. James yelps and dodges to the left, staring wide-eyed at where the hatchet is buried into the ground right where his head just was. Mulciber starts to tug it out, but James punches him in the face, throwing his weight to the side.

They roll away from the hatchet, and James slams him down, then proceeds to punch him in the face again, then again, then again, and then once more. His hand aches. Mulciber has blood on his face, but he just bears his bloodied teeth into a grin and kicks James right in his injured leg.

"Fuck!" James shouts as pain explodes through him, his leg giving out, making it easy for Mulciber to shove him off.

Mulciber tries to hold James down with his arm, but the wound where the hatchet landed makes him cry out and fall forward. He's bleeding profusely, and it gets on James' throat, on his face, in his mouth. Mulciber self-corrects and lifts himself up, holding his injured arm close to his chest as he balls his other hand into a fist and hits James hard.

James grabs a handful of dirt and leaves, tossing it in Mulciber's face—his eyes, primarily—to make him flinch. He hisses and rocks back, which James uses to his advantage to flip him. They scramble over each other with grunts and low snarls of anger and pain, like two animals in a fight to the death—and that's what they are, isn't it?

That's what they've been turned into.

"I'm going to kill you, Potter," Mulciber spits out, reaching up to dig his fingers into James' cheek where he was sliced earlier, causing it to bleed and sting.

Again and again, they roll and hit each other over and over, making each other bleed. It's all going so fast, and James is stripped down to the relentless need to survive, fighting as hard as he can. There's no space for anger, because everything narrows down until all he knows is the heart beating in his chest and the determination to not let it stop.

They end up next to the hatchet again, and James stumbles to his feet, yelping at the pain when he puts weight on his bad leg. He limps and stumbles, but manages to snatch the hatchet out of the ground. As soon as he's standing over Mulciber, breathing hard, seconds from burying it in his chest until he stops fucking moving, Mulciber kicks out with force and slams his boot directly into James' leg.

James crumbles helplessly, the hatchet falling from his grip and skidding away across the ground. Instantly, he and Mulciber start crawling for it, and James is closer. He's just snatched it up when Mulciber grabs him by the back of his hair, snapping his head back before shoving him face-first into the ground. It hurts, a throbbing pain immediately starting up, but James doesn't think anything breaks. There's blood in his mouth, and he doesn't know if it's his.

On the next yank, James sends his elbow back as hard as he can, which makes Mulciber gasp and loosen his grip. James immediately throws himself to the side and desperately flings himself on top of Mulciber with the hatchet in hand. He raises it up and brings it down, but Mulciber catches it by the handle with his hand, his fingers overlapping with James' as his arm shakes from the exertion of trying to not let James push it down into his chest. James pushes harder.

"What—what are you even fighting for?" Mulciber grits out through clenched teeth. "Your boyfriend is already dead."

James falters.

He can't help it. Those words take him out at his knees, hurting worse than anything that's happened to him so far. Mulciber laughs and elbows him in the face, ripping the hatchet from his hand and pushing to get on top.

"That's right," Mulciber declares triumphantly, his words coming out in sharp bursts as his chest heaves. "You heard those two cannons, yeah? One was your boyfriend."

"No," James chokes out, hands flinging up to stop the hatchet when Mulciber swings it down. The blade of it slices into one palm, but Mulciber keeps pushing.

"Yes," Mulciber counters gleefully.

"You're lying!" James bursts out, because he refuses—he just won't believe that. He can't believe that.

"I made sure it hurt, Potter. He was crying and begging for his brother," Mulciber grits out, throwing his weight forward to push the hatchet down further.

The words get to him. It's—well, survival is about will, even more than capabilities, and there's some sort of inner strength it takes to keep fighting. The idea of what Mulciber is saying saps that strength right out of him, which translates rather literally. His arms give out a little bit, and the blade of the hatchet presses into his chest, almost pushing in.

James remembers when Pandora said that the hunger games are more than just physical; they're mind games, too. He's never felt that more starkly than he does at this moment.

Mulciber presses forward, and James gasps as the hatchet pushes into his chest, a low whine escaping him from the pain that just radiates everywhere. It's nothing, nothing, compared to the pain at the thought that Regulus might be dead. The thing is, pain reminds you that you're alive, and if it's true—please, please don't let it be true—then there's still one last thing James has to do before he loses the will to survive altogether.

"His brother won't even fucking recognize him after I got through with him," Mulciber hisses. "I made him—ow, fuck!"

James shoves his knee up between Mulciber's legs a second time, and this time, he pushes with all the strength he has left. Mulciber goes sailing to the side, groaning as he lands on his back, and then James is on him.

Hitting him. Hitting him. Hitting him.

Mulciber doesn't even get a chance. James just keeps hitting him until the hatchet drops to the ground, Mulciber's wet, labored breathing ringing in his ears. James can't really see him in the low light, and he wouldn't be able to in broad daylight, because his vision is blurring with tears. It's anger, and pain, and so many other things, and somehow nothing at all. James chokes out a harsh breath and fumbles for the hatchet, and this time, Mulciber is too beaten to stop him.

The hatchet lands in the middle of his chest. Mulciber chokes, his whole body jerking from the impact. As soon as James pulls the hatchet free, Mulciber coughs up blood.

James brings it down again.

Again.

Again.

Again.

The cannon sounds.

Again.

Again.

Again.

Mulciber isn't moving anymore.

Again.

Again.

Again.

James chokes on a sob, staring down at the chest in front of him. It's practically ribbons. There's blood everywhere on everything. The hatchet, his hands, the ground, the body. Blood. So much blood.

The hatchet hits the ground, and James slumps to the side, landing on his back next to Mulciber's body, where he proceeds to weep so hard that it's hard to breathe. His mind is one long litany of Regulus, Regulus, Regulus.

Regulus.

Regulus.

Regulus.

~•~

The sound of a cannon shakes Regulus out of his daze. It rings in his ears as the world snaps back into focus. He feels simultaneously like no time has passed since Evan died and also as if it's been years. Everything has a fuzzy quality to it, and there's a steady pulse of pain in the center of his chest.

That pulse of pain shifts into panic immediately when the cannon sounds, and then he's running.

Regulus isn't too far from the pond, so it doesn't take long to break through the trees. He instantly starts towards the east because that's where James is supposed to be, only to come to a screeching halt when he sees the shape of two bodies lying towards the west. One of them is James.

"No," Regulus whispers, breathless, the very tips of his fingers tingling as he scrambles to throw himself in that direction. He sprints around the edge of the pond, rushing right for the bodies. "No, no, no. James?"

There's a soft sob, and it's James, and Regulus has never been so relieved to hear such sorrow in his life. He tosses himself on the ground next to James, who sucks in a deep gasping breath and shifts towards him. Regulus is already reaching for him, dragging his top half into his lap, arms wrapping around him as he curls up and presses his face into Regulus' stomach.

"James," Regulus says, and then he can't stop saying it. He chants the name like a prayer. "James, James, James."

James.

James.

James.

Regulus doesn't even care about Mulciber's body right next to them. That doesn't matter. Nothing matters but James right now, alive and breathing. Regulus folds forward and presses his face into James' hair, holding him close.

He doesn't know if they're both crying, or if they're not. He doesn't know how much time passes, or if it even does at all. Everything narrows down to this, and it could be seconds or hours before the world creeps in around the edges again.

They breathe. James is making little hitched noises in his throat, but he's no longer weeping. His whole body is shivering, and Regulus doesn't know if it's because of the cold or because of…what happened.

What did happen? Regulus raises his head to look at Mulciber. He's… It's bad. Brutal. There's a lot of blood, and Mulciber's chest is cracked open and caved in, a complete mess.

Regulus stares at it, feeling numb.

"Okay," Regulus says out loud, his voice shockingly steady. He exhales and focuses back on James. "Okay, let me look at you. Are you hurt? James?"

James unravels away from him, slowly easing himself up from Regulus' lap, moving like he's in a lot of pain. He exhales heavily, then sways harshly, his eyes fluttering. His face is swollen and bloody.

"Reg'lus," James slurs.

"Hey. Hey, look at me," Regulus says sharply, hands lifting to cup James' face. He immediately sags into his palms and goes limp, crumbling forward. Regulus curses under his breath and catches him, James' head rolling on his shoulder. Regulus pats his cheek, the one that's not bleeding again. "James?"

Nothing.

"Fuck," Regulus mumbles, blowing out a deep breath. James is still breathing, so he's just passed out.

Right, well, maybe that's for the best. Regulus can get him back into the cave easier that way, at least without causing him too much pain.

James is bigger than him, and taller, and Regulus is really fucking exhausted and sporting injuries of his own, but nothing short of immediate death could stop him from getting James to safety, where Regulus can check him over. And it's cold now, the sun officially gone and the temperature sinking at a rapid rate. They're going to need a fire tonight.

So, with a grunt, Regulus shifts to gather James up in his arms, then pushes to his feet. He falls right back down, not at all prepared for James' dead weight. Not dead, Regulus snaps in his own head in a reprimand. Somehow, the mere insinuation infuriates him enough that he manages to stand back up from his knees. He curses, then grits his teeth as he starts to walk.

He practically runs and stumbles to the cave, trying to make it there as quickly as possible, which is difficult to do in the dark like this. He's groaning by the time he makes it, but he does indeed make it. The entrance is conveniently cut open for him, at least, but then he nearly trips over a sword that he assumes Mulciber must have dropped.

Regulus puts James down as gently as he can, lying him out flat. The first thing he does is fumble for his supplies, finding his matches. He curses again and bolts to his feet to rush outside to get sticks and proper kindling, pausing long enough to grab the hatchet before rushing back.

His hands are shaking so bad that it takes him a few moments to start the fire, but the inside of the cave lights up when he does. Regulus immediately starts looking around for the medicine he wholeheartedly knows Sirius sent them, but he can't find it. Frowning, he pushes to his feet and leaves the cave, swinging his head around as he looks.

In a tree. The parachute hanging on a branch. Lovely.

Regulus scowls, his jaw clenching. The gamemakers send those in, and they can put them wherever they want, which means they purposefully kept it out of James' reach, knowing he wouldn't be able to climb to get it.

There's already so much anger at the gamemakers because of Evan, and now this. All of this. Regulus' fingers twitch with the urge to do something very, very fucking awful.

Shaking his head, Regulus rushes forward to go to the tree, a lump forming in his throat when he thinks about how easily Evan would have scaled up to get it. Regulus does it with a lot less finesse, and it's so stupid that he's still scared. After all that he's seen, that he's done, how is he scared of this?

But he is, and he does it anyway. He climbs up and cuts down the container, then scurries right back down, breathing easier as soon as he's on solid ground. Snatching up the container, he heads right back towards the cave.

Halfway, the sound of a Hallow heli-carrier approaches, the trees swaying and the wind whipping as it gets closer. Regulus can't stop himself from looking back to watch the coffin-like cage that opens into a claw sink down and scoop Mulciber's body up, lifting him out before flying away again.

Regulus watches it go, feeling nothing, and then he continues into the cave.

James is still passed out.

Exhaling deeply, Regulus moves over and sinks down to settle beside him. First he opens the container, and he could cry when he sees the two wrapped rolls of bread on top. A weak noise escapes him, because he hasn't eaten anything since the dried meat and berries that he and James had…yesterday.

Yesterday feels like a lifetime ago.

Hands trembling, Regulus lifts the rolls out like they're made of gold, and he tips his head back to breathe out, "Thank you," hoping that Sirius knows he's talking to him and no one else.

Regulus sits the rolls aside, then digs out the smaller canister. He unscrews it, tipping it towards the fire to see it better. It's paste, colorless and odorless, but Regulus doesn't doubt that it's the Hallows special brew. They have access to medicines that work miracles; it could save many lives in the district, but the Hallow doesn't let them have access to it.

Putting that down, Regulus reaches in to draw out the last thing that's in there. A small, white card—the message that Sirius can send with it. The messages are seen before they're sent in to keep any helpful information from being given, like it's cheating in some way, as if survival is a game. Sirius can't send in instructions or give up locations or any other tips that betray the other tributes. He can, however, send coded messages that Regulus and James would understand or work out because they know him so well.

On the card, it just reads: "Baby"

That's it.

Regulus stares at it, lips pressed into a thin line, mind working in circles. The quotations were put there on purpose, and it doesn't take Regulus long to realize that Sirius is quoting him. When he called James 'baby'. Because apparently he did. He doesn't remember doing it, and to be fair, he was a little busy freaking out about James' leg to care too much about what was falling out of his mouth. Why does that even matter?

It doesn't make sense, not at first. Sirius wouldn't waste a message just to tease him. Actually, no, he would probably be very tempted to, and he'd love it if he could manage to tease Regulus at the same time that he's helping him, but how exactly does this fucking help?

He glances from the card, to the rolls, to the medicine, to James, then back to the card—and that's when it clicks.

You've got to be fucking joking, Regulus thinks in a rising sense of disbelief, his face twisting into a scowl. So, the medicine and food was about James and Regulus' relationship? The people love them so much that this is like a reward to them? So, what, if Regulus doesn't play into it, they won't get anything else? Life-saving offers are dependent on how much they please the Hallows with their fucking love story?

Regulus wants to scream. He squeezes his eyes shut, then crumbles the card up in his fist, grinding his teeth. Slowly, he exhales through his nose and opens his eyes, tossing the card into the fire with a glare. He's just—he does not have the emotional stability to deal with that right now.

He focuses on James instead.

First, he handles James' leg. He has to go out and get fresh water in Evan's bowl, freezing the whole way there and then back. It's getting dangerously cold again. Once he's back, he wrings out the cloth and reveals James' leg, taking off the bandages with care.

It's worse than it was when he last saw it. Now there are dark bruises that put a lump in Regulus' throat. Guilt threatens to choke him as he cleans James' leg carefully, and James doesn't stir, not even when Regulus smooths the salve on his leg.

Next, Regulus goes to his cheek. There's blood all over his face and throat that Regulus diligently cleans away, repeatedly dipping the cloth and wringing it out over and over again. His hands are freezing, but he doesn't stop. Regulus puts the salve on his cheek, and that's when James wakes up.

"Reg?" James rasps, his eyes fluttering open.

"I'm here," Regulus murmurs, ducking his head and gently pushing James' head back to smear a line of salve along James' throat where Mulciber's sword nicked him earlier. It's just a thin line, but Regulus does it anyway. "Are you hurt anywhere else, James? Did Mulciber get you anywhere else?"

"He—my chest—the hatchet—" James sounds disoriented, still a little out of it, still half-asleep.

Regulus inhales sharply, his heart dropping. He slowly reaches out with numb fingers to open James' coat. His fingers bump into something, a cold pin that makes his breath hitch. It's in the shape of the sun, and he thinks about his own star pin, the one Gideon gave him. James told him that they killed Fabian in front of him, much the same way they did Gideon.

That infuriates him, too, but it also…scares him. All of this goes beyond just the arena and gamemakers. Behind it all is Riddle, and he's a very, very powerful man. The type of man who kills people in the form of a warning.

Regulus thinks about the message he carved into the tree by Evan's body, and he goes cold all over. He doesn't have a lot of people in his life who matter to him, but there's Barty. There's Sirius. He even thinks of Remus, Pandora, and Dorcas. Even his parents—horrible as they are—cross his mind.

And James. Oh. James.

Riddle could kill them all.

Swallowing harshly, Regulus feels his defiance flicker like a candle in the wind. He's so tired, and the fear makes him want to curl up and never move again. Never make a mistake again. He takes a deep breath and tucks the pin out of sight, in the fold of James' coat, then focuses on the wound on his chest.

There's so much blood that it takes Regulus a bit to find it. James' shirt has a tear through it, and when he pushes it open, he can make out where the hatchet was pushed into the flesh. It's not too deep, but the sight of it makes Regulus' stomach cramp. He carefully wipes away the blood and applies salve to that, too, then zips James' coat back up.

"Regulus?" James says, like he's discovering him all over again. He blinks harshly, as if he's not sure this is real.

"I'm here," Regulus tells him again, because he'll tell James that as many times as he needs to hear it. He can't say what he should, can't get the words out. I'm sorry I left. I'm sorry I didn't make it back in time. I'm sorry, I'm sorry, I'm so sorry.

"You're here," James repeats, and then he's surging forward with a surprising burst of strength to drag Regulus into his arms. He clings to Regulus, hugging him so tight that it hurts, and Regulus lets him. James snatches back quickly, hands flying up to frame Regulus' face. "Is this real? He said—he said he—I thought he—"

"Mulciber?" Regulus asks, and James' mouth snaps shut with a harsh click. His hands slip off Regulus' face as he sways back, and he looks—hurt. All twisted up inside. Something passes through his eyes, and then he lowers them, like he can't bear to meet Regulus' gaze. "Give me your hands."

Wordlessly, James complies. Regulus cradles James' hands in his lap and gently, carefully cleans the blood off of them. His knuckles are busted and swollen, so Regulus applies salve to those as well, which draws James' attention.

"What's that?" James asks.

"The medicine Sirius sent. I've already taken care of your leg, face, and chest," Regulus says quietly.

James shifts to sit up further, craning his head to locate the canister, and then he's tugging it towards him with one hand while Regulus smears salve on the slice in his other palm.

Regulus' head is ducked, so he starts a little in surprise when he feels James' thumb glide along the cut on his cheek that is already mostly healed by now, the one Avery gave him. James' touch is gentle, and Regulus looks up at him through his eyelashes and a curtain of curls.

James keeps stroking his cheek, even when there's no need to, and they don't say anything. Not a word passes between them as Regulus cradles his other hand and James cradles his face. Despite everything, Regulus still has his heart flutters.

This isn't really the time or place, though, and they've dealt with too much today for it to be anything other than weak within him. It's not even yearning. Regulus is too tired, too worn out, too hurt to yearn for anything at all.

"Let me see your shoulder," James murmurs, dropping his hand to gently tug at Regulus' coat.

Honestly, Regulus forgot about where Axus' hook caught him in the shoulder—twice—but the reminder makes him realize that there's a twinge there. James helps him pull his coat and the collar of his shirt to the side, down over his arm, revealing where the hook got him. From the angle, the hook thankfully didn't dig in too deep, but it's obvious where it caught his skin. There's a puncture wound—rather shallow—and a red scrape that runs up a bit.

James is gentle when cleaning away the dried blood, then just as tender when applying the salve. His fingers are warm, and Regulus' eyes flutter shut at the intimacy of this moment. It's just the front of his shoulder, but the feeling of James' fingers there feels both entirely too good and far too important.

"Side," James instructs next, pulling Regulus' shirt back into place before wringing out the cloth.

Regulus does as he's told, dutifully leaning back and easing up his coat and shirt as he cranes his head to peer down at the gash on his side with a grimace. He hadn't forgotten about this one, very aware of the pain, but he's been ignoring it.

It looks bad, which is confirmed a moment later when James hisses between his teeth like he's just been burned. Regulus presses his lips into a thin line, looking at the wound. It's red and swollen, completely inflamed. He wouldn't be surprised if infection already set in, but maybe it hasn't. Maybe, even if it has, the medicine will fix it anyway.

James is so, so very careful when cleaning away the dried blood. It still hurts enough for Regulus to squeeze his eyes shut tight, reaching one hand up to brace it against James' shoulder, holding on too tight and not even meaning to. James murmurs apologies, using his free hand to rub soothing circles into Regulus' arm where it's raised.

There's not much salve left. It's not like they sent very much, unwilling to give them too much help, so James honestly has only a bit to work with. He drags his finger along the inside of the canister, gathering every last drop to gently apply it to the puffy wound. Regulus bites his lip and tries his best to swallow a whimper, but the skin is so raw that even breathing on it would feel like poking him with a branding-iron.

"I'm sorry, love. I know, I know, I'm almost done," James whispers, and he's not lying. A few seconds later, he draws back and nods for Regulus to lower his shirt and coat.

"Thank you," Regulus says quietly, settling back down and reaching over to dig around for the water canister in his bag that's still full from earlier. He sits it down and picks up the bread, offering one roll to James, who blinks at it in pure shock. Regulus' lips twitch weakly. "Sirius says hi."

James looks like he could cry. He chokes out a soft laugh and reaches out to take the bread, legitimately bringing it up to his face to inhale deeply, eyes fluttering shut. He presses a kiss to it and looks up to mumble, "Sirius, I fucking love you."

The lack of a response is deafening.

"Drink some water," Regulus murmurs, pushing the canister towards him, then focusing on his own bread.

In silence, they drink water and slowly, oh so slowly, eat their bread in tiny pieces, cherishing it next to the crackling fire. Neither of them speak or look at each other. Regulus is really tired, as well as cold, and he doesn't know what to say. He doesn't want to say anything, because the idea of talking just exhausts him more. He doesn't even want to feel right now.

Due to the cold, he's numb pretty much all over, and he sort of prefers it. He wants to be numb on the inside, too, but he can't figure out how to—disconnect. Everything is just too much. Trojan Horse, he thinks almost desperately, inwardly pleading for it now more than ever. It's not working. All he can think about is Evan.

When the water and bread is gone, Regulus 'cleans up', just to give himself something to do. He puts the canister for the salve aside with the paper that was wrapped around the rolls inside it, then puts his empty water canister in his bag so he can fill it again tomorrow. He drags out the blanket, passing it to James, who takes it without a word, and then he adds a few more sticks to the fire. The silence drags on.

Eventually, James breaks it to whisper, "Regulus?"

"Yes?" Regulus replies quietly.

"Is…?" James trails off, and Regulus looks over to see him swallowing harshly. There's a sad quality to his big, brown eyes, and Regulus knows exactly what he's going to say even before he asks, "Where's Evan?"

Regulus stares at him, feeling that awful pulse in his chest, and then he looks away as he says, flatly, "Dead."

James is silent for a long moment, and then his voice is so soft and remorseful as he replies, "Regulus, I'm so sor—"

"Don't," Regulus cuts in sharply as soon as James' hand reaches out to settle on his arm. He pulls away from it, snatches away, and he feels his anger spike again.

He wants to yell at James, even though it's not his fault. He wants to rewind time and force Evan to stay behind with James, because then maybe all of the things that went wrong wouldn't have, but it's too late for that now. He wants to rant about how unfair it is, because all of it is unfair—the fact that the one person Regulus has ever chosen or dared to trust by learning to is lost to him; how all of James' fucking allies are perfectly fine in some cave somewhere while doing nothing; the way none of them should even be in this fucking arena in the first place; or even the injustice in having found a friend different from any other in just enough time to lose him.

"Regulus," James says, his voice strained.

"Stop. Just stop. Just leave me alone," Regulus bursts out, fully turning away as his eyes start to sting, and just like that—just that easily—he disconnects. He shuts down immediately. There it is. Trojan Horse. Fucking finally.

James retreats and falls silent.

Regulus lets him.

~•~

Remus' heart aches as he watches the banners play out on the screen. It's clearly visible to James and Regulus inside the cave from the angle of the entrance, because they're both watching it. Peter and Irene have exited their cave to see who's gone, leaving Mathias to keep winding thin logs together, while Vanity's main job seems to be not freezing to death. Bernice, Axus, and Hodge all made it back to the original cave and made it across the iced river where Willa was waiting for them, and they're all watching as well. The last girl on her own—Juniper—has once again burrowed into the ground, and she doesn't come out to see who's dead.

It goes in order.

First, there's the woman who died the previous night from dehydration and hypothermia after the banners had already played. After that is the man James killed that attacked Regulus.

James makes a small sound on the screen, staring up at the sky, his throat bobbing harshly. Regulus looks at him briefly, but he doesn't speak, and he looks away when James drops his gaze in obvious shame.

There's Quinn, who Regulus killed. Following that is Evan.

When his face appears in the sky, James once again makes an obvious attempt to comfort Regulus, who shakes him off and scoots further away from him. His face is blank. He doesn't cry; he doesn't look sad, or angry, or hurt; he's just—empty. James retreats again, looking back at the sky.

Lastly, there's Mulciber. As soon as James sees his face in the sky, he presses his lips into a thin line and looks away. He doesn't move until the banners stop playing.

Peter and Irene go back inside to update the others, and everyone seems relieved that James is still alive. The death eaters are upset. Axus starts ranting about their numbers dwindling, sounding genuinely terrified, and Hodge cries. Bernice remains stoic, only her eyes blazing with emotion. It's anger. Pure rage. A woman scorned.

The camera cuts back to James and Regulus. James is spreading out the blanket, mumbling, "Regulus, you need to get warm. Please just—"

"I'll come when I put the fire out for the night," is Regulus' cold response, and his tone allows for no further arguments.

James says nothing else, curling up under the blanket, and Regulus remains next to the fire, hunched over with his knees pressed to his chest. He's still looking at the sky. James turns his back to him and closes his eyes.

It's not long before the arena fades out, and Rita comes on screen, immediately chattering away excitedly. She starts off about how fiercely James fought Mulciber, and then the screen goes black as Sirius lifts the remote, then puts it down.

Silence drapes over them, heavy.

Remus can't tear his eyes away from the screen just yet. It's been five years since he watched the games, and he's only just now realizing how the distance from it has affected him. Despite the fact that he watched them his whole life, the brief pause in between has made him forget how fucking cruel they are. Well, no, he never forgot, but he's not as desensitized to it as he was. Or maybe it's just because he cares so much about James and Regulus, as well as Sirius.

Whatever it is, Remus struggles with his discomfort. How anyone could watch that—any of it—and be genuinely entertained is beyond him. It sickens him.

This is hard. Really, really fucking hard. Having to watch this is a different form of torment, and they do have to, because it's imperative that they know what Regulus and James are doing. Sirius, especially. Remus wishes he could just—shield Sirius from it, even if he had to watch alone and give Sirius a watered down summary of the events, but that's not possible. Sirius is trapped in this just as much as his brother and best friend, just from the other side. It's all fucked.

Sirius has had it rough today. Well, he's had it rough this entire time, but he's genuinely been a wreck tonight compared to the previous ones. Between James' first kill, he and Regulus being chased, then captured before getting away with Evan's help, then James stepping into a bear trap, followed by Regulus and Evan leading the death eaters away, which led to Evan dying, and then James' fight with Mulciber—well, Sirius has likely felt every emotion on the possible spectrum for humans to feel, and then some. He's been so fucking stressed.

Sirius has cried. He has shouted in fear. He has held his breath and held Remus' hand in a death grip, and he has let go. He has fallen silent, stood up to pace, sank down to the floor while rocking back and forth with his hands in his hair. He has crawled back into his seat and gone very, very still.

That's what he's doing now. When Remus looks over at him, Sirius is just—sitting there. With one look, Remus knows he's gone. He can't pinpoint when, exactly, it happened, but Sirius did become strangely quiet mere moments after Mulciber pressed the hatchet into James' chest. He got back into his seat without a word, and now he's here, but he isn't here.

Remus swallows. "Sirius."

Immediately, Sirius looks over at him and blinks, but it's not… It is him, but he's hidden away, like a curtain has come down within him. Remus can tell by his eyes. There's just something different about them when this happens to him, which Remus has only seen one other time.

"Alright," Remus says softly, "I'm going to get you a glass of water. Stay here for me, yeah?"

"Alright," Sirius replies quietly.

Sighing, Remus stands up to go into the kitchen, making Sirius a glass of water like he said he would. When he comes back, Sirius hasn't moved, and he takes the glass as soon as Remus offers it to him. He drinks it slowly, staring at the screen.

Remus doesn't say anything, just sitting next to Sirius and waiting. He doesn't really know what to do when this happens. The last time, Sirius had been in the middle of sobbing his eyes out, so Remus had held him instinctively. Now, Sirius is, for all intents and purposes, rather calm.

When Sirius drinks his water halfway down, he sits the glass on the table in front of them, then leans back. Glancing over at Remus, he murmurs, "Can I lean on you?"

"Yes," Remus answers immediately, because there is no version of Sirius, or any state Sirius could ever be in, where Remus would deny him this.

Sirius shifts over to lean into Remus' side, lying his head over on his shoulder. Remus wraps his arm around him, but he doesn't do anything else, and won't until Sirius gets back to himself. Sirius breathes, and Remus breathes with him.

It takes a while, but Remus knows as soon as the change occurs. Sirius stiffens, and his breathing immediately goes erratic. He surges up with wide eyes, all the color draining from his face as he whips towards Remus.

"James?" Sirius chokes out.

"He's alive," Remus says quickly, hands darting out to cup Sirius' trembling fingers between both palms. "Sirius, he's alive."

"I need to see," Sirius declares, diving away from Remus to fumble for the remote.

Remus falls silent, letting Sirius do what he needs to do. The screen comes back on to Rita talking about Juniper, who is surprising everyone by how long she's lived and how well she's doing on her own as a sixteen year old girl.

Sirius just rewinds, not stopping until it gets back to the fight between Mulciber and James. Remus looks away, but he can't do anything to stop himself from hearing it. He closes his eyes, trying to drown it out. Even still, he reaches over and gently bumps his hand into the side of Sirius' leg in offering.

Sirius takes it, threading their fingers together and holding on tight. Knowing that James lives seems to help him get through it, but that doesn't stop him from crying right along with his best friend after Mulciber is dead. Sirius does that rocking thing he does when he can't be still, especially in moments of distress. Remus thinks it soothes him.

He watches all the way through, making quiet noises and murmuring soft words under his breath that Remus knows aren't meant for him, so he respectfully doesn't try to listen to what they might be. Sirius is calmer by the end, and just as he did before, he turns the screen black the moment Rita comes on. There's another round of silence and breathing.

"Reggie isn't doing well," Sirius mumbles, eventually. He's frowning when Remus glances over at him. "He's—you can see it, can't you? He's shutting down. James is… This is hurting him. All of it. They're both so—" He shakes his head, his throat rising and falling on a harsh swallow. "I don't know how they're going to—"

"Sirius," Remus cuts in gently, and Sirius looks over at him, still so pale. "Start small, remember?"

"Right." Sirius takes a deep breath and nods. They've done this once before the previous night when Sirius was stressed, and it seems to help him, so Remus is sticking with it. "Right, so first, they're alive."

"They're alive," Remus agrees, nodding, because that's the first priority. Everything else—that's something to deal with after acknowledging the relief that they're alive. That alone always calms Sirius. Helps ground him. It soothes Remus, too.

"They've gotten medicine that will have them healed by morning," Sirius lists off slowly. "They've had bread to eat, so they're not sleeping on empty stomachs. They have water and a way to stay warm. They're safe, for now."

Remus hums. "Yes, they are. You helped them today, Sirius. Don't ignore that. I know you worked hard with the sponsors."

"I wish I didn't need to help them at all," Sirius mumbles. "I got them medicine and food, but that doesn't mean they weren't hurt. That doesn't just go away. I can't—"

"You're right, it doesn't, and it's not fair that they're going through this," Remus agrees, "but even just getting what you sent meant something to them. That's important."

Sirius opens his mouth, then closes it, then nods. His eyebrows furrow. "I'm fairly sure that Regulus got my message that I sent with the medicine and bread."

"Can I ask?" Remus murmurs, and Sirius nods. "You just wrote baby. I'm not… I don't get it. Am I missing something?"

"I'm really glad that you don't understand, because that means you aren't thinking like them." Sirius spits the last word like it's poison, his lip curling. "The fucking Hallows are loving James and Regulus' little romantic moments, which I can't even begin to explain how fucked that is on so many levels. Regulus called James baby, which…" He pauses, then wrinkles his nose and clears his throat. "Well, I'm quite sure it just slipped out because he was panicking about James being hurt, because he would never be so soppy in front of the entire world on purpose like that. Maybe in private, but… Well, that's it, unless he's freaking out, apparently."

"Can't blame him there," Remus muses.

"No? Not one for pet names?" Sirius asks curiously.

Remus shrugs one shoulder. "Generally, no. I had one boyfriend call me sunshine and, unfortunately, Re-Re ."

"Re-Re," Sirius repeats flatly, one eyebrow arching up with so much judgement and sass packed into that one twitch of muscle that Remus laughs.

"Yes. Awful, isn't it?" Remus asks.

Sirius purses his lips like he's tasting something sour. "It's more than just awful, Remus. That's a crime against nature. Re-Re?" He scoffs, his face scrunching up. "And you still dated him after that? Willingly?"

"He sucked cock quite well," Remus says dryly, "so yes, I was willing to take the bad with the good, as it were."

"Oh, did he?" Sirius sniffs primly. "Have some standards, why don't you?"

Remus bites back a smile. "It was a short relationship anyway. So, I'm gathering that you don't like pet names."

"No, I do," Sirius replies, relaxing now that they're no longer referencing Remus' past boyfriends. He breaks out into a soft smile. "I'm a lot like James that way, I suppose. Did you see how happy he was about it? Regulus calling him that, I mean. Even in all that pain, he was ecstatic. He's pathetic."

"A bit, yeah," Remus says softly, amused by how fond Sirius currently sounds. "He's really quite smitten, isn't he?"

Sirius sighs, his smile fading. "Yeah, he is."

Remus nods. "Right, so—sending that word."

"Oh! Yeah, that," Sirius says, back on track. "Basically I just told Regulus that they'll have more support if they play into the whole love story thing. He looked peeved about it, so I figured he worked out what I meant."

"Can't blame him for that either." Remus frowns and shakes his head. "I would hate it, too. Having to deal with the fact that your worth is measured in how entertaining you can be for others involving something that's personal—and your survival is dependent on that? Oh, I would be furious."

"Anyone would," Sirius mutters with a scowl, "but they never care when it's not them."

"It's never them," Remus murmurs, his jaw clenching.

Sirius closes his eyes and takes a deep breath, drawing his hands away from Remus' to scrub his palms up and down his face. He rubs at his eyes, then presses his fingers into his cheeks and moves them around like he's massaging them. He then proceeds to tap both cheeks and roll his jaw, like he's trying to reset himself and work the tension out of his face. Smacking his lips, he drops his hand and opens his eyes.

"Okay, next," Sirius says with a deep exhale. "Evan died."

"Yeah," Remus replies with a frown. His heart gives a pang just thinking about the way Regulus had sobbed when it happened, and he once again breaks out into goosebumps thinking about the short but poignant message Regulus carved into the tree.

"Regulus isn't handling it well," Sirius mumbles. "He's going to continue not to handle it well, and I can't fucking blame him. It's—grief. Normal. Human. He should be allowed that, at the very least, but there's no space for it in the arena. If he just shuts down… Remus, I'm worried it'll get him killed."

"Regulus has been doing very well," Remus says. "He's stubborn, like you. As unfair and awful as it is, I don't think he's going to let this stop him from surviving."

"He has to be hurting. He's going to be so—"

"Sirius."

Grimacing, Sirius nods. "Right. Focus on the now. Worry about the later when it's here. One day at a time."

"One day at a time," Remus repeats quietly, because that's really the only way Sirius can handle this, and even that's a struggle for him—which is fair and makes complete sense.

"James was hurt," Sirius continues, a strain in his voice.

"You said he'd be fine by morning."

"He will. They both will. I just—well, I hated seeing him in pain. Either of them. But yes, they will heal. The medicine was very expensive, but it'll work really well. I think they might have scars, but maybe not."

Remus clears his throat. "You…have scars."

"A lot," Sirius confirms without batting an eye.

"So do I," Remus murmurs.

Sirius blinks at him, then says, "I'll show you yours if you show me mine." He frowns. "Wait."

Remus busts out laughing, unable to help it, and Sirius breaks out into a sheepish grin as his cheeks start to glow. Oh, but Remus adores this man. He's silly, yet so smart. Bashful, yet so brash. Kind and kaleidoscopic. Magical and mercurial. Sirius is a mess, like a container that things of all colors and shapes and sizes were overturned into, impossible to sort through it all, and it's so, so lovely. He's just so lovely.

"Well, fumbled that quite nicely, didn't I?" Sirius says with a snort. He reaches out and swats Remus gently on the leg with the back of his hand. "Stop laughing, you prick. You know what I was trying to say."

"Something about showing me my scars?" Remus teases.

"Oh, nevermind, forget it." Sirius rolls his eyes, lips twitching as he shakes his head. "Anyway, moving on."

Remus sobers instantly. "Right. Next, then?"

"James killed Mulciber," Sirius says, no longer even close to smiling, and it's like shadows are passing through his eyes.

"He had no choice," Remus points out.

Sirius nods. "I know that. He knows that, but that never makes it any easier, Remus. It's just fucking awful. I know he won't let that stop him, because his motivations are a little different than Regulus'—or, well, actually they're not different at all, but my point is…it's still going to get to him. He's James. Worst case scenario, it gets to him so much that he falters next time something goes wrong."

"James is strong, and he's fought hard," Remus says. "When it comes down to it, he's not going to give up. Don't think about what might happen, not now. Just focus on what you already know, and what you need to do for them."

"Right, well, I have to…" Sirius grimaces. "Tomorrow, I'm going to have to smooth over Regulus' little note he left after Evan died. It's too—defiant. They're not going to like it, and they might hurt him for it."

Remus forces himself not to ball his hands into fists. "Alright, and how do you plan to help?"

"Play up his grief and say that he meant the Hallow was hollow like he was when losing Evan, like he wasn't alone in feeling that way, like they brought him comfort," Sirius replies immediately, because of course he has a plan already. He's so, so fucking smart and completely unafraid to use his brilliance to James and Regulus' advantage.

"Okay." Remus nods. "So, James and Regulus are safe. They were hurt, but they've had medicine and food, and they'll be warm through the night. You helped them today, and you're going to help them tomorrow. Everything else—all the worry for what hasn't happened yet—that will just have to wait."

Of course, Remus knows it's not as simple as that. Sirius is going to fret and worry about everything regardless, all that has happened and all that could. But breaking things down like this seems to be the only thing that helps, as much as he can be helped in this situation.

Sirius has been letting Remus take care of him through this, at least in part. He lets Remus calm him so he can be focused, and he lets Remus comfort him when he returns to watch the games with him, but that's it. After the screen goes off and they've talked, Sirius keeps his distance. He'll occasionally make flirty comments, but that's as far as he'll go when it comes to their…? Whatever this is.

They haven't embraced since the morning before the second day of the games—and frankly, Remus doesn't mind. He knows this is really hard on Sirius; there's too much going on for him to really care about romance, of all things.

Remus just worries he's not letting himself be comforted enough. Not letting himself have the things he wants in a form of punishment, or guilt, or both.

Remus doesn't push it. He never pushes it, and he never will. It's a privilege just being with Sirius at all. In a way, Remus is sort of…grateful for the distance they don't cross, because he's painfully aware of the life they'll never get to have together.

It would have been such a lovely life, too.

"Earlier," Sirius says abruptly, "you knew I was—having issues. Did I—what did we—"

"Nothing," Remus assures him. "We just sat together. I made you a glass of water, and you asked if you could lean on me, then did that when I said yes."

Sirius nods, immediately trusting him, and there's no doubt in his expression at all. "Thank you."

"You don't need to thank me."

"You've done something kind and helpful. It's only polite to share my gratitude."

"Who taught you such manners?" Remus asks, raising his eyebrows at Sirius. "Not your parents, surely."

"Oh, yeah, definitely not." Sirius chuckles. "They cared about manners involving how we presented ourselves, not manners involving being a decent person. No, that honor goes to Effie and Monty. James' parents."

Remus smiles slightly at the admiration in Sirius' voice. He clearly holds James' parents in high regard. "They adopted you when you moved out, right?"

"Basically," Sirius admits. "But honestly? They looked after me and Reggie a lot when we were children. Hard not to when we were in and out of their house so much. Well, me more than Regulus, generally, but he was around before—" There's a pause, then Sirius sighs. "Anyway, yes, Effie and Monty took me in as soon as I showed up, no questions asked. Effie…"

"She was your mentor."

"Yeah, she was. If not for her, I wouldn't be alive right now, in more ways than one. She and Monty are brilliant parents; I've been wishing they were mine since I was eleven. I can't even imagine what they're going through right now…"

"They sound lovely," Remus murmurs.

Sirius blinks rapidly and clears his throat, glancing over at him with a tight smile. "They are. What about you?"

"What?" Remus asks.

"I just—I feel like we talk about me a lot, but I'm curious about you, too," Sirius mumbles. "Obviously you don't have to tell me, but if you wanted to…"

"My parents?"

"If you want to tell me about them, sure."

Remus takes a deep breath, then slowly lets it out. "Yeah, they were brilliant. My mum was a seamstress, which is not the convenience you might think it would be."

"No? Why not?"

"Hope Lupin didn't believe in throwing clothes out, and considering how hard it was to come by nice, new clothes, I can't really blame her. But she was a bit fanatical about it, if I'm honest. If I got holes or tears in anything, she just sewed them shut. You wouldn't believe the amount of patches I had on my clothes at all times. Lily used to say I dressed like a grandpa, but that was because my mum believed in handing clothes down as well, as long as they fit."

"I bet you looked sexy dressing like a grandpa," Sirius teases, and Remus huffs a quiet laugh, shaking his head. "Hope sounds like a practical woman."

"She was," Remus says softly.

Sirius hesitates, clearly debating the question that Remus just knows he wants to ask. He apparently decides not to, choosing instead to murmur, "And your dad? What's his name?"

"Lyall Lupin," Remus recites, dropping his gaze. "He was—"

"You don't have to tell me," Sirius offers, when Remus falters.

Remus shakes his head. "No, it's fine. He was, ah, an Auror for our district. Signed up when he was eighteen, just to feed his family. You know they have to be in service for twenty years without being married or having kids, so it's… I mean, he was in love with my mum, but he felt like he had to take care of his family, or they'd starve, so he—he became an Auror and told my mum to live her life without him, because he couldn't really give her much of one as an Auror."

Sirius says nothing. He just watches with keen eyes, visibly giving Remus all his focus.

"But my mother was a very stubborn woman," Remus continues, lips curling up sadly. "She waited for twenty years."

At this, Sirius' eyes go wide. Breathlessly, he asks, "She did?"

"Indeed she did," Remus says, nodding. "She used to tell me how she would flirt with him and try to get him to sneak off and have a secret affair, even though it would get them both killed if they were ever found out."

"And did they?" Sirius presses, a gleam in his eyes that betrays satisfaction and humor at the thought.

Remus sighs. "My dad held strong. Didn't so much as touch her for twenty years. He said he gave up trying to convince her to live a life with someone else about fourteen years in, but he still wouldn't give in. Showing any loyalty to anything other than the Hallow would have gotten them killed. It's funny, though. A week after the twenty years were up, my parents were married, and I came less than a year later."

"That's really sweet," Sirius says softly.

"Suppose it is. In the end, they didn't get as much time together as they spent apart," Remus murmurs. "She died when I was seventeen, only three years before—"

Remus bites off the rest of that sentence, swallowing it, even though it's too bitter. He remembers the day his mother died, sick in bed with Lyall right by her side as they talked about how the life they had together was worth the wait. He remembers three years after, when blood splattered a shirt his mother had sewn for him and he ran with Lily's hand in his, knowing he'd never get to go home again.

"Remus?" Sirius asks cautiously.

"Before I ended up here," Remus finishes, which wasn't what he was going to originally say, and by the expression on Sirius' face, he knows it. He doesn't push it, though. "My dad retired when he was fifty, only five years before my mum passed. That's when the new wave of Aurors came in, since most of the others had aged out, like my dad. I was twelve."

"It's always difficult going through that change," Sirius mutters with a grimace. "The new Aurors are usually nothing like the ones before them, and you're already used to how things were before they got there, and then suddenly it's on you to adjust to new rules and procedures to avoid getting into trouble? It's utter shit."

"Yeah, pretty bang on," Remus agrees wryly. "The new Aurors weren't… Well, they weren't as lax as the ones before them. They came straight from district two, where they're trained, and you know they're basically just—Hallows. Anyway, my dad was usually a calm, level-headed man. Just—well, imagine a load of new people coming into the job you did for thirty-two years and completely going about it wrong, particularly just to abuse their power. It was…" He runs his tongue over his teeth, then gives Sirius a tight smile. "Let's just say it didn't end well and leave it at that, yeah?"

Sirius is curious. Remus can tell that he's curious, and he can't even blame him, but to tell him… For some reason, Remus really doesn't want to. It's nothing good, and Sirius already sees so much of his worst as it is.

Despite his curiosity, Sirius doesn't push any further.

"I'm sorry about your mum," Sirius murmurs. "It's a shame I'll never get to meet her. I think we would have gotten on."

"Oh, yeah, she would have loved you," Remus admits with a fond chuckle, lips curling up. "It's a shame I'll never get to meet Monty and Effie."

"They'll know of you, though," Sirius assures him. "I'll be telling them all about you."

"Will you?" Remus asks.

Sirius gives him a lopsided smile, cute and boyish. "They worry about me, so it'll comfort them to know that I had you through all of this. I wish I could tell them now. Your mere existence would help them sleep better at night, I just know it." He chuckles. "Just like it does for me."

Remus melts like butter over an open flame. He's nearly overcome with the urge to reach out and touch Sirius, to hold him, to kiss him. He refrains with effort, turning his head away and taking a deep breath to calm himself.

For the first time in years, Remus' mind turns to his father. All their fights, all their disagreements, all the push and pull of where they couldn't meet halfway on how to act, especially after Hope died. Remus was too—radical, honestly. Defiant. Rebellious. Always in trouble and unafraid to cause more, while Lyall was hard on him for it. These days, Remus knows why, even though he couldn't understand it back then.

This. This is what Lyall was trying to warn him away from. Exactly what happened and exactly where Remus is now. Lyall could see the smoke-signal for what it was, and he knew how bad things could get. He tried to save Remus from this fate, but he hadn't managed to. Remus didn't let him.

They had a fight on that last day. A screaming match, in fact. Lyall ranting and lecturing while Remus shouted and tossed a glass at the wall the moment Lyall dared to bring what Hope would have wanted into it. Their worst fight—and that's the last memory Remus ever has with his dad.

Remus can just imagine what it was like for Lyall when he heard the news. When he found out that his son—his son—

Swallowing thickly, Remus pushes the thoughts away. There's a reason he doesn't think about it, mostly because it hurts to. He can't go to his dad now and tell him that, even if he still doesn't agree, he understands what Lyall was trying to do. And he's grateful. All Lyall ever wanted to do was protect his son, and Remus… Well, Remus had his own way of doing things. Look where that's gotten him.

There's something else Remus understands now that he never could before. Being chained to the Hallow and being so very aware that one mistake could end in death, or worse. The only difference is, Lyall had to deal with it for twenty years, and Remus is sentenced to life.

It's some kind of cruel irony that Remus would find himself in a situation like his parents, but unlike them, he and Sirius will never get their happy ending, even as brief as it was.

Remus glances over at Sirius and smiles slightly, because if there's one thing that Hope and Lyall taught him about love, it's that a happy middle is just as special.

Gently, Sirius smiles back.

Chapter End Notes

for those of you who want warnings and need to know where to skip:

IF YOU WISH TO SKIP THE GRAPHIC VIOLENCE/DEATH, THEN JUST SCROLL PAST WHERE JAMES THROWS THE HATCET AT MULCIBER UNTIL IT'S REGULUS' POV AGAIN (after it says "Regulus" three times)

if you just want the summary/warning: mulciber does find james in the cave. mulciber taunts james, and he makes a comment about killing regulus slowly, which spurs james to throw his hatchet at him. mulciber manages to block it, but james tackles him. they get into a rather brutal fight, in which it's described that mulciber kicks james in his injured leg multiple times, as well as shoves the hatchet down into james' chest, but only a bit—only to break the skin, really. they hit each other and fight, and mulciber lies to james to say that regulus is dead. james ends up managing to fight him off, hitting him until he swings the hatchet into his chest multiple times, even after mulciber is dead. it's really quite brutal and described in detail.

as for the dissociative amnesia: it's sirius again, but it's from remus' POV, so it's not really described in detail. it's fairly brief, sirius is rather calm this time, and remus takes care of sirius until he comes back to himself.

for everyone else, who has finished the chapter...

yeah, that was another rough one. i think, for me, this was the second most uncomfortable chapter for me to write—or at least the first portion of it. the one that was most uncomfortable for me to write hasn't been posted yet.

i will say that things do calm down for a bit. like, we do get a break and the chance to breathe from here, at least for a few chapters. things don't get really, really bad again until chapter 20, if that helps.

so, let's get into it, i guess.

i don't really have much to say about james and regulus right now. like, they're clearly going through it, both of them. it's just a really bad time for them, very heavy and very hard. they had that moment of comfort in all the hurt when they were using the medicine that sirius sent, at least (hurt/comfort my beloved <3).

oh, and i feel like i should mention—im kinda going on the HP Universe/Wizarding World rules for advancements in medicine as far as what the Hallows have access to, so like. yes, that salve will heal them and leave only minor scars, if that, because i said so. it was REALLY expensive, though, so just know sirius put in the work for that! put some respect on his name!!!

oh! i can say this about jegulus, at least. regulus is so transparent at this point that, if not for everything going on and all that he's dealing with otherwise, he would 100% realize that he—at the very least—cares about james. however, shit isn't simple or going well for him, so he literally does not have the space or time or emotional well-being to examine his feelings.

but anyway, the real main characters of this chapter were none other than remus and sirius. finally, they're BACK. oh, ive missed them. we see plenty of them over the next two chapters, i promise, and it's GOOD, too. im very excited.

im particularly excited for the next chapter, honestly, for multiple reasons, but we get there when we get there.

anyway, back to sirius and remus. they're so cute and sad, i wanna BITE THEM! and also hug them. like, sirius is obviously going THROUGH it, but remus makes it better.

i think the best part of this chapter was sirius "ill show you yours if you show me mine" black and remus "oh, is that so?" lupin just—having soft/light moments together. jealous sirius black strikes again. he was so offended by "Re-Re" 😭😭😭 PLS HE WAS SO UPSET LMAOOO i adore him. also, them opening up about their parents>>> we got more hints of remus' history, which was exciting. the auror thing is basically what the peacekeepers were in the hunger games books/movies, but for those of you who havent read/watched or just don't remember, ill give a brief summary, short and sweet.

basically, they're people from the districts—usually district two, but can come from anywhere—that are trained like civilian soldiers to keep order in the districts and provide protection in the Hallow. they're completely under the Hallows orders, and they're the ones who capture criminals and keep the districts in line. depending on the district, they can be relaxed, or they can be strict. oh, and it was aurors that killed fabian and gideon on riddle's orders. we will get a bit more information on that later, i promise!

anyway, i think that about sums everything up, so let me wrap up.

numbers:

tributes remaining: 11
tributes who have died as of this chapter:
dylan
avery
quinn
evan mulciber
eight unnamed/unknown others

The Break

Chapter Notes

hello, hello!!! finally, an easier chapter! im so stupidly excited about this one, you all have no idea.

warnings for this chapter:

-references to death/murder (because of the whole arena thing AND the whole corrupt government thing)
-references to previous deaths/violence
-brief depiction of violence (VERY brief)
-brief description of animal death (to eat in the arena and not described in detail)

i will be putting a short in-depth warning in the end notes for the brief violence in this chapter. it's not as bad as we've seen so far, but it's there just in case anyone wants/needs it, which is, as always, valid!!!

okay, without further ado, ENJOY :D

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Sybill likes to cut holes in her shirts and put paper clips through them because she thinks it gives her flair, which Lily isn't against, per se. It's not that she protests individuality and style—no, of course not—but she does take issue with Sybill doing things that's going to end with her crying later.

"How are you even hiding that from Dumbledore?" Lily asks as she tugs on the line of clips. She's reaching for a cigarette with her other hand, which Sybill looks at pointedly. "Oh, this isn't nearly as obvious. I have a place to hide these."

Sybill squints at her, and Lily reaches up to scoop her arm under her chest, fumbling for the pack of cigarettes before she tucks it underneath. When she lets go, the pack disappears beneath. Sybill looks down at her own chest, frowning, then looks back up with a thoughtful look on her face. "Will you—"

"No, I will not use my tits to hide things for you," Lily cuts in, tugging the pack out so she can scoop her lighter from it, cigarette trapped between her lips.

"Not all of us were blessed with—" Sybill drops her gaze and bites her lip. "Goodness, Lily."

"Blessed?" Lily mutters. "You think back pain, uncomfortable fitting clothes, and common heat rashes is blessed?"

"No, you're right, that's awful. Still, you have extra hiding spots, and also…it sure is a blessing to look at them," Sybill says with a dreamy sigh, then promptly folds over and rests her head on Lily's chest with a happy hum.

Lily quickly grabs her cigarette so it won't catch Sybill's hair on fire, her free hand cupping Sybill's head as she grumbles, "Oi, watch it. I'm smoking, Sybill."

"Yeah, yeah, I know your routine by now. Same way Wren, Miranda, and Ember know," Sybill tells her with a snort. She lifts her head and shifts across the grass, throwing her leg over Lily's lap and leaning up to pluck the cigarette from Lily's mouth, turning it to put it in her own. Inhaling, her cheeks hollow out, and she parts her lips to let the smoke escape slowly. "Let Lily Evans fuck you, then watch her chainsmoke like she's trying to set her lungs on fire."

"Well, if you know, then what makes you think I'm willing to share?" Lily reaches out to take her cigarette back, raising her eyebrows. "These aren't easy to come by, let me tell you."

"And yet, I've never seen you without them after we fuck. Wren, Ember, and Miranda all say the same."

"Stop talking to the other women I fuck. It's weird."

Sybill grins. "Stop fucking so many women."

"Can't do that. You'd all be so disappointed," Lily teases, then inhales and tips her head back to watch the smoke billow up from her lips. Her eyes flutter shut for a brief moment.

"That we would," Sybill agrees with a chuckle. "Besides, it's not like the Phoenix has enough room to keep us unaware of it. Fuck, Lily, we all eat meals together. Wren is literally my best friend. What did you expect to happen?"

Lily doesn't bother responding to that. If she's honest, she doesn't really give a shit. "You never answered me." Reaching out with her free hand, she tugs on the paper clips. "How are you getting those past Dumbledore?"

"I stole them from his office," Sybill says. "If he acknowledges them, then he has to acknowledge that someone managed to break into his office."

"You broke into his office?" Lily asks sharply, sitting up so quickly that Sybill nearly topples out of her lap.

"Yeah, I did," Sybill admits, looking smug. "Difficult to do, if I'm honest, but worth it for the paper clips. Of course, he'll probably just have someone confiscate them, and I'll end up sobbing again. But, you know, it's worth it."

"They look lovely," Lily feels compelled to point out, if only to make Sybill happier. Sybill brightens instantly. "How did you do it? Break into his office, I mean."

"Wouldn't you like to know?"

"Trelawney."

"Evans," Sybill teases, but Lily stares at her, staring her down, and Sybill's smile fades. She swallows. "I snuck out after curfew. Remember that alarm that went off in the Great Hall last night? That was me."

"Did you look at anything else?" Lily asks, and Sybill hesitates, biting her lip. Lily nods. "You did. Tell me."

Sybill frowns. "Lily—"

"Tell me," Lily repeats sternly.

"I—" Sybill grimaces, then huffs and scoots out of Lily's lap, drawing her legs up to her chest, where she wraps her arms around her knees. "It wasn't much, alright? I didn't want to risk too much, so I took a look at the most recent file."

"What is it?" Lily grits out.

"The Prewetts," Sybill murmurs. "Fabian and Gideon. They're dead. Killed on orders from Riddle."

Lily takes a deep breath, then slowly lets it out. "Dorcas?"

"Still alive," Sybill says.

"Well," Lily replies, and that's as far as she gets.

Neither of them speak for a long time. Lily keeps smoking, ignoring the faint tremble to her fingers as she looks up at the treetops above them. It's a nice meadow, because Lily likes a decent setting to fuck in, and the inside of the Phoenix leaves much to be desired. A whole lot of grey, mostly.

An underground bunker called the Phoenix should be a bit less drab, in her opinion, but this has been her reality for the last five years. Metal walls and too many rules. Not much more than a prison, really, if you sit down and think about it—and Lily sits down and thinks about it a lot.

The Order—those living in the Phoenix—consists of a lot of good people, at least. Most of them have been living this way their whole lives, unaware of the world outside. When you haven't had a taste of fresh air, you don't feel like you're suffocating underground, Lily has learned. She remembers the look on Sybill's face the first time Lily coaxed her outside with honey-coated words and heated promises in her soft touches.

Lily, who has had a taste of fresh air, constantly feels like she's suffocating inside the Phoenix. She feels trapped more often than she doesn't. It makes her itchy.

"Evans," comes the call from Kingsley through the radio.

"Fuck's sake," Lily snaps, sucking down the last bit of her cigarette before stubbing it out and diving for the radio with a scowl. "King, I've had one smoke."

"Not my problem, Red," Kingsley responds in amusement. "I'm supposed to be retrieving you from your room."

"What? Why?"

"You have two minutes."

"Shit," Lily blurts out, launching hastily to her feet as Sybill looks up at her with wide eyes. Lily holds her hand out, wiggling her fingers. "Come on, Sybill, time to go."

Sybill looks fit for crying. "Lily, if—if they find out—"

"They won't find out," Lily insists. "Well, they won't if you get a move on."

Groaning, Sybill takes Lily's hand and lets her tug her to her feet, complaining under her breath as Lily snatches her into a run. She's grumbling breathlessly about how she lets pretty, mysterious girls get her into trouble, as if she's not fully capable of getting into trouble on her own. She broke into Dumbledore's office. Really, she's Lily's favorite of all the women she's been with for that alone.

Lily admittedly enjoys the thrill of running to get back into the Phoenix, especially pushing a time limit. The severe lack of excitement in her life in the last five years makes it impossible not to enjoy this, honestly. She's grinning by the time she comes tumbling out of the hatch through the air vent in her room, Sybill right behind her.

First, Lily slots the vent cover back into place, then she dives for her pillow to dig into the pillowcase and find the small, near-invisible tear that she pushes her pack of cigarettes into. She smooths her pillow out, then sits down and grabs Sybill's wrist to drag her close in between her legs. Sybill looks startled, but she melts the moment Lily pulls her into a kiss.

Right on time, there's a knock on the door, only a brief warning before it swings open. Lily and Sybill break apart to stare at Kinglsey, Poppy, and Bones.

"And what if we were naked?" Lily declares immediately, glaring out at them.

Kingsley looks amused, but he turns away at the same time that an exasperated Poppy Pomfrey and a scowling Edgar Bones do. Bones would be scowling, though. Lily used to have a thing with his sister, Amelia, which didn't end well, so seeing her with Sybill likely irritates him.

"Ms. Evans, your recreational time is set between nine and eleven am," Poppy says with a sigh.

"Ms. Pomfrey, two hours simply aren't enough for all the…recreational things I get up to," Lily replies, smiling at Sybill, who chokes on a laugh that she pretends is a cough.

Bones scoffs and mutters, "If you're done working your way through half the Phoenix—"

"I wasn't, actually," Lily cuts in, "but I've made quite the progress. Don't sound so bitter, Bones. I'd give you advice on how to satisfy a woman, if you need it, and I'm a reliable source. Just ask your sister."

"Alright," Kingsley says smoothly, catching Bones when he starts to whip around. He holds him straight and looks over at Lily like can you please behave? "Sybill, if you would return to your room, please."

"Sure thing, King," Sybill replies eagerly, beaming at him.

Kingsley's smile turns gentle and warm as Sybill passes him. She has her arms wrapped around herself, blocking the paper clips on her shirt, and she wastes no time in beating a hasty retreat. Kingsley watches her go for a moment, and Lily is quite sure that he did see the clips, but he says nothing as he turns to focus on her again.

"Follow us," Kingsley murmurs.

Lily heaves a sigh, as if she's not burning with curiosity at the moment. "Yeah, alright. Where are we going?"

No one answers her as they lead her away, and she crosses her arms as they head through the compound. Curiously, they're not leading her towards the infirmary, where she works the mid shift from three pm until one am, replacing Arthur Weasley, who works from four am to three pm. They're both on call from one am to four am, and so are those that work on the shifts with them—assistants, mostly, because Arthur and Lily are two of the few healers the Phoenix has. There's Poppy, the leader of the infirmary, but she's also a field medic and has other responsibilities as well.

Lily's agitation with not being told anything melts away into genuine trepidation when she realizes that they're leading her to Dumbledore's office. She drops her arms and stands up straighter, sharing a brief look with Kingsley, who holds her gaze until he reaches the door.

He knocks three times with the heavy gargoyle-shaped knocker, and they all wait for a calm response granting them entry before they go in.

Immediately, Lily's eyes find the screen that's on the side wall. She only gets to watch the games while in the infirmary, because there's a screen there for the patients, which would usually be playing old films, but the only thing broadcasting on any screen during the games are the games.

On the screen are James Potter and Regulus Black. They're getting ready to leave the cave they settled into the previous night, neither of them speaking or looking at each other.

"Ms. Evans," Dumbledore greets, dragging Lily's attention to him. "Thank you for joining me. Have a seat."

"We interrupted her with Sybill Trelawney," Bones announces, sounding as if he's relishing in doing so.

"Ah," Dumbledore says, then hums. "Yes, thank you, Mr. Bones. I'd ask that you, Mr. Shacklebolt, and Ms. Pomfrey leave Ms. Evans and I alone."

Lily struggles not to fidget as the others file out, shutting the door behind them as they go. She's never been alone with Dumbledore, not even when she first arrived five years ago. He did visit her in the infirmary while she was healing, but there were people in the beds, so they weren't technically alone.

Albus Dumbledore is an older man—much older—with a long white beard and long white hair, and he wears half-moon glasses perched on his crooked nose. He's a man admired by many—calm and steady when addressing his people, even kind when requiring order within the Order. As the leader, he's the one everyone looks to for anything, and he's the one everyone respects and believes in. He holds the promise of one day winning the war for freedom, or so it's said.

So far, Lily hasn't seen much of this so-called 'war'. Whatever war is taking place, it's fairly damn quiet. Dumbledore has been in power a long time, from what Lily knows. Around fifty years, at the very least, and he's pushing eighty at seventy-four.

It shows. Not because of his hair, or because of his wrinkled, withered hands, or the aged softness of his voice—no, it's the gleam of knowledge in his eyes. They're wise. This is a man who knows things, who knows more than anyone else, who knows what no one has even dared to begin thinking about yet. Knowledge like that—it's dangerous. It's deadly.

"What do you think?" Dumbledore murmurs, turning slightly to incline his head towards the screen.

Lily flicks her gaze to it. Regulus Black is crouched down beside the pond, refilling his water. James Potter is watching him from a few steps away, hatchet in hand. They're both still not speaking, and they've healed really well, all visible wounds just thin lines that likely won't even scar.

"I'm not sure what you mean," Lily admits, ripping her gaze away to focus on Dumbledore again.

Dumbledore is silent for a beat, then he says, "Do you have an opinion on who will win?"

Lily frowns, her eyebrows tugging together as she stares at him. One thing she's always appreciated about the Order is the way the games are treated; they're seen as barbaric and utterly immoral, something that needs to be stopped at all costs, and not a form of entertainment to be speculated about. No one's asked her for her opinion on the games in five years, which she actually likes, so the fact that he is now makes her…uncomfortable, honestly.

"Um," Lily mumbles, clearing her throat. He keeps waiting, so she actually thinks about it, and it doesn't take her very long to form her honest answer. "Regulus Black."

"Hm. Regulus Black," Dumbledore says softly, tapping his finger to the desk as he looks at the screen. "Why?"

"Why do I think he'll win?"

"Yes."

Lily glances at the screen again, still frowning. "Well, he's undeniably skilled and willing to do what it takes to survive. He's smart, and he has James Potter with him, who is also a strong fighter and incredibly smart."

"Why not James Potter?" Dumbledore asks, looking at her, and Lily blinks. "Why don't you think he will win?"

"I—" Lily opens and closes her mouth, because she doesn't know. She doesn't have the answer.

"Love," Dumbledore murmurs. "It's because of love. Even unconsciously, love has its influence, Ms. Evans."

"I'm—I don't understand," Lily admits, which frustrates her. She doesn't like feeling stupid, or out of the loop.

Dumbledore's beard twitches with his smile. "Some would say that sacrifice is the strongest form of love. Do you agree?"

Against her will, Lily's mind turns to Remus. It hurts to think about him, as always, and a lump forms in her throat when she remembers his sacrifice. Him for her. His capture for her freedom, and here she is, locked away in an underground bunker while doing nothing with what he sacrificed himself for. They caught him, and they killed him for his crimes. Her crimes, too, but she got away. He made sure she did, and she sometimes wonders for what? For this? He's dead, and she's just sitting here, wasting the life he granted her.

"Yes, I agree," Lily rasps.

"James Potter has made his feelings for Regulus Black very clear," Dumbledore announces calmly. "So, that begs the question—one most don't dare to ask themselves. If, at the end, it is just them, who will win? But you have your answer before you even ask, don't you? Regulus Black will win, because James Potter will ensure it. Why?"

"Love," Lily whispers. "Sacrifice."

"And you knew this before you even thought to work out why you knew it," Dumbledore says. "We all know it, because to be human is to know love. That is how strong love is. It causes a sense of faith. Hope." He holds her gaze. "Power."

Lily swallows. "So, Regulus Black will win because of love."

"Yes," Dumbledore confirms simply. "Do you want to know the most devastating thing in this world is? The most destructive thing? It's not fear. It's not war. It's not pain, or loss, or fury. It's not even death."

"Then what is it?"

"It's love."

"Love," Lily repeats quietly.

Dumbledore hums. "The most powerful thing in this world is love." He glances back at the screen. "People will kill for it. People will die for it. But, most importantly, people will fight for it. Love is a dangerous, dangerous weapon if one knows how to wield it."

"And you do, I'm guessing," Lily declares boldly.

"I do," Dumbledore agrees without shame, focusing back on her again, and something passes in his eyes like a shadow that sends a chill down her spine. "Love is how I will win a war."

Lily presses her lips into a thin line. "How do you plan to do that, exactly?"

"You let me worry about that," Dumbledore replies without batting an eye. He turns and gently threads his hands together on the desk, focusing on her. "Do you know why I called you here today, Ms. Evans?"

"No," Lily grits out.

"Because you don't love anything," Dumbledore says, and she briefly stops breathing. "Everything you loved was taken from you. Your mother, father, sister, and best friend were all killed. You drift between your lovers here, but none of them matter to you, not really. You have friends here, but you don't let yourself be close to them, not genuinely. Five years, and you've refrained from forming one meaningful connection here, which I must assume is a conscious choice you've made. You love nothing, because you've decided not to."

Lily feels his words like a tiny slice into her skin, each one cutting deeper and deeper. She remains stiff in her seat, her whole body cold and a gaping emptiness in her chest. The reminder of her family, what they suffered because she got away, will forever set her heart on fire. Mum, Dad, Petunia. They suffered for her crimes, and sometimes she wonders how she lives with that knowledge every day.

"Love gives us purpose," Dumbledore murmurs, never breaking her gaze. It feels like he's looking through her, right down to her fucking soul. "It gives us all purpose, but without love, what is your purpose?"

"I don't know," Lily croaks.

"In this war, love is a weapon that will be wielded by all sides. Do you know how important it is to have soldiers that are immune?" Dumbledore asks.

"To love?" Lily asks sharply.

"To the destructive nature of love. I can win a war with that, and I can just as easily lose it because of that, so those that are unaffected by it are invaluable to me." Dumbledore inclines his head towards her. "You have nothing. No one to care about, no one to love, and no one to lose."

Lily works her jaw, balling her fists in her lap as she blinks harshly to try escaping the way her eyes sting. Dumbledore doesn't apologize, and she doesn't expect him to. "What do you want from me?"

"Nothing you're not willing to give," Dumbledore informs her, leaning back in his chair. "I want to start training you to be a field medic. It will be some time yet before you find yourself in the field, because we have some time yet before the war makes itself known. It's coming, Ms. Evans, and when it does, I want you to be fighting on the front lines. Does that entice you?"

"Yes," Lily says instantly, almost gasping the word out in pure relief, because finally, finally, she won't be wasting Remus' sacrifice or the loss of her family. "I'll do it. I want to do it."

Dumbledore's eyes twinkle. "Yes, I thought you might respond like this, if for no other reason than because you're tired of escaping through the vents to go outside."

Lily freezes, feeling a sense of dread crawl through her. He knows. He knows that she's been going to the surface, and how she's been getting out. She could be put in solitary for that.

"I believe that will be all for now, Ms. Evans. We'll begin with you soon," Dumbledore says. "You're excused."

Lily's never left a room so fast in her life.

~•~

The games are a delicate balance. Sirius has always known that from the moment he became a mentor, because having an insight to what goes on behind the scenes taught him that. Most people assume it's like a machine made of steel, completely indestructible with no broken parts.

In all actuality, it's a web carefully weaved, made of gossamer material that could so easily fall apart. But that's the thing; you don't want it to fall apart, because if it does, people die.

"Eleven left now," Frank says, watching Irene and Mathias check the traps outside of the cave they're at with a furrow in his brow. They're his tributes, so of course he's concerned about any and all moves they make.

"And it's only day four," Emmeline murmurs, shaking her head. Juniper is still sleeping in the ground—and okay, Sirius has to ask, at this point.

"Did you teach Juniper to dig holes and hide in them?" Sirius blurts out, because he's genuinely curious.

Emmeline glances over at him, arching an eyebrow. "Actually, she came up with it on her own. Evan—" She halts, her throat bobbing, and Sirius' heart gives a pang because he doesn't doubt Evan's death hit her hard, too. In fact, Evan's death seems to have hit a lot of people hard, including Hallows, shockingly enough. "Well, he used to say something about climbing. No one ever thinks to look up, he always said, and one day, Juniper made the comment that no one ever thinks to look down either. Suppose she was right, in the end."

"Em," Frank says gently.

"Yeah, I know," Emmeline murmurs, despite the fact that Frank hasn't said anything. He doesn't have to. They all say the same things every year when they lose their tributes. She looks at Sirius steadily. "I just—I want to say that what your brother did for him was—it was appreciated. Stupid, yes, but it meant a lot to me, and I know I'm not the only one."

Sirius just nods, because he can't really say anything else. She's not thanking him, really, but she knows as much as he does how important it is to say these things to each other. When things really matter, leaving them unsaid in the moment often means they'll go unspoken forever, because there's always something else that happens next.

"How are mine doing?" Marlene asks, walking over with a glass in hand, which Sirius side-eyes in vague concern.

"Vanity is up and working on the bridge with Peter," Frank informs her, "and Hodge has set out with the death eaters. They're out for blood, predictably."

"Your blood," Emmeline mutters, nudging Sirius with her elbow. She grimaces apologetically when he shoots her a glare.

"That was brutal last night," Marlene says quietly, briefly pressing her shoulder into Sirius'. "With Mulciber, I mean. Evan, too. Sorry, Em."

"Thank you," Emmeline replies, equally quiet.

Sirius takes a deep breath, then slowly lets it out. "Well, on the bright side, James and Regulus are all healed up, so that's…" He swallows, then clears his throat. "Anyway, Lucius is out of line-up now that Avery and Mulciber are dead."

"And it's yours that killed them," Frank points out. He shoots him a curious look. "Malfoy will take that personally."

"I don't much care, honestly," Sirius says. "Let him. I'll rip his fucking head off if he tries anything."

Marlene snorts. "So much for family loyalty, even extended as it is."

"He's no family of mine," Sirius declares. "I don't give a toss if my cousin married him; I have no relation to that prick. It's no less than he deserves, in any case. I don't doubt he encouraged Avery and Mulciber to hunt down Regulus and James."

Emmeline gives a mean little smile. "Didn't work out so well for him, did it?"

"He's still here, though," Frank grumbles, inclining his head across the room where Lucius is talking to Dolohov and Yaxley, both who still have death eaters alive.

Sirius eyes him across the room in disdain, a bitter taste in the back of his throat that makes swallowing difficult. Most mentors stop showing up to watch when their tributes die, as do many sponsors that were planning to support those tributes and those alone, no one else, completely unwilling to support any other after they're dead. At least a third of the sponsors have ceased to show, now that Mulciber is out. A lot of people expected him to win, and maybe if James and Regulus weren't his competitors, he would have.

It's a bit fucked up for Sirius to feel satisfaction about that, even a bit of pride, but it's there anyway. He knows that's sick, in a way, because no part of him wants Regulus and James to have to suffer as they have. It's just that Lucius is a cruel bastard who brings home Victors more often than anyone else. One of his tributes doesn't win every year, but it's still a high rate. Lucius has been a mentor since before Sirius was even a tribute himself, but only by a few years. He won his games seven years before Sirius won his.

Lucius is the type of man who relishes in the games, always a mentor of death eaters. He's also the man that Narcissa ran off to marry when she left the district with Bellatrix in tow. There is absolutely no warmth between him and Sirius.

"Sirius," Marlene says, nudging him and nodding at the screen, which gains him immediate focus.

James and Regulus are moving through the forest in complete silence. They're going a bit slow because James has a mild limp, which will no doubt clear up by tomorrow. They haven't spoken one word to each other or looked at each other since waking up. Regulus looks blank, and James looks so fucking sad. Sirius wants to hold them both, just wrap them up in his arms and promise them that they're going to be okay, even when that's not a promise he can really keep.

He can track their position on the full map layout in the corner of the screen, and whether they know it or not, they're heading in the direction of the cave where Peter, Vanity, Mathias, and Irene are. If they keep going, they might reach it by tomorrow, so long as there are no interruptions.

Thankfully, the death eaters have no idea what their location is, and they're going in the opposite direction. The arena is one big loop, however, so they'd all eventually run into each other at some point. Maybe not today, though.

The games are a delicate balance, as established, and that comes with the knowledge that the gamemakers have their thumbs on each and every pulse in that arena. Every choice reflects that, and they decide what tribute may or may not have a bad day. They also decide what tribute needs a break.

Sometimes, if they push too hard, they'll end up pushing too far. Survival instincts are far more fragile than most people realize, and under too much strain, they will snap. Being consistently tormented can completely ruin the goal that the gamemakers are always striving for—make an entertaining game. It's not fun when the players are too broken to play.

So, it seems that Regulus and James are getting the space to breathe, because not being allowed to breathe will eventually suffocate them, regardless of their skills and motivations.

Unfortunately, James and Regulus are not taking this time to do anything entertaining. There's no flirting. No teasing, or talking, or touching. No stolen glances or further planning. There's absolutely nothing, and Sirius can't blame them. They have to be fucking exhausted; not only are they dealing with everything they've been through and had to do so far, but they still have to constantly think about surviving in the present. They have grief and pain and anger to deal with, along with basic survival needs like water and food.

With everything they're dealing with, that doesn't leave much room for their little love story that everyone is so eager to see.

"Day four," Frank announces with a deep breath. "Let's see how it goes, yeah? Good luck."

"It's going to be a long fucking day," Emmeline says with a world-weary sigh, and then they all split off at once.

While James and Regulus get their much needed break, as brief as it may be, Sirius goes to work.

~•~

Dorcas looks up from her cup when she hears the knock at her door. Frowning, she dips the teabag a few more times before gently lifting it out and sitting it on the small plate her teacup is resting on. She draws her robe around her and gives a quick glance towards the screen on her way to the door.

Regulus and James haven't had much happen to them so far, but it's only mid-day, so that's subject to change at a moment's notice. Regulus has flung out one of his daggers to catch a bunny as it darted past, which he and James did stop to eat, and James didn't even protest or make one comment. He just sat down against a tree with his head ducked while Regulus handled the whole process. They haven't been speaking.

Dorcas wonders how Sirius is doing today, after the previous night. She's tempted to go check on him, but the thought of leaving her place right now is—too much. After learning about Gideon and Fabian, she left her suite and came home instead, which isn't uncommon for those that aren't mentors to do. Most design teams and handlers go home to watch the games at their own leisure, or with their family.

Dorcas will go back. She plans to; she just needs a little more time. As much as she wants to be there for Sirius, and for Marlene, she has this horrible knowledge she's carrying that she can't tell anyone, and she's working out how to handle it.

Sighing, Dorcas checks the belt on her robe one more time, making sure it's tied tight, then opens her door. On the other side is a short, curvy woman with red hair and startlingly bright blue eyes. She's a Hallow, just from the way she's dressed, and her hair is cut into a wavy bob.

"Dorcas Meadowes?" the woman asks.

"Can I help you?" Dorcas replies, eyebrows furrowed.

The woman tilts her chin up. "My name is Molly Prewett. You know my brothers, Fabian and Gideon. They work with you."

Shit, Dorcas thinks.

"Yes," Dorcas says softly. "Right, Molly, they mentioned you. It's lovely to meet you. Would you like to come in? I'm having tea, if you'd like to join me."

"Please," Molly replies with a fierce gleam in her eye that makes her polite request seem more like an order.

Dorcas smiles as warmly as possible and steps back to let Molly in, then takes the lead towards the kitchen. Her back turned to Molly, she lets her face twist through various emotions, then wrangles them all as much as she can. When they reach the kitchen, Dorcas immediately starts making Molly her tea, pouring out the boiling water and slipping the teabag inside before carrying it over.

"Sugar's just here," Dorcas murmurs, gesturing to the artistic tin holding the sugar cubes with a small pair of tongs to use to put them in their tea.

"Thank you," Molly says, and yet again, she speaks in a would-be polite way, except her gaze is sharp on Dorcas' face as she adds some sugar to her tea.

Dorcas is admittedly uneasy at the moment. "Like I said, it's lovely to meet you, Molly. Fabian and Gideon only had nice things to say about you. I should tell you, your brothers were incredibly talented, and I enjoyed working with them."

"Yes, they've always been very good at what they do." Molly frowns slightly, swallowing harshly, and then she looks down at her tea as she stirs it. There's a furrow between her brows, and her fingers are shaking, making the spoon clink against the ceramic. "They've always admired you, Ms. Meadowes."

"Dorcas, please," Dorcas mumbles, trying to ignore the lump that forms in her throat.

Molly looks up, holding her gaze. "They've always admired you, Dorcas, and your work. When they found out that they'd be working with you, they were…" Her face softens for the very first time, and she smiles. "They were ecstatic. Wouldn't shut up about it, really. It was their dream, you know."

"I admired them just as much," Dorcas tells her, and it's true. It's so true. Such brave, brave men. "They taught me more than I could ever explain."

"You're close to them, then?"

"I did get close to them, yes. I was their friend."

"Have you heard from them at all?" Molly asks.

Dorcas stirs her own tea with a frown, feigning thoughtfulness while Molly watches her. "You know, I can't say that I have. It's a shame. I'm assuming they went home when the—"

"They didn't," Molly interrupts sharply, taking her spoon out and sitting it down with a clink. She doesn't drink her tea; no, she braces her hands on the counter and stares Dorcas right in her eyes. "For one thing, they wouldn't. They would see their job through until the end. Gid and Fab always did. But I did check, just to be sure, and they didn't go home."

"Oh," Dorcas says, nodding. "Well, maybe we just haven't crossed paths, that's all. I've been home recently, so—"

Molly cocks her head, her eyes cold. "But that doesn't make any sense, Dorcas. I know which tributes Fabian and Gideon worked with, because they talked about them to me, and you've surely seen how rough those tributes have it in the games. I know it's hard to watch. Fab and Gid would reach out to check on you, at least, especially if you're their friend."

"I've been really busy," Dorcas murmurs calmly, lifting her tea to take a careful sip, trying to calm her racing heart and the pain that twists in her chest.

"Gideon and Fabian have been missing for four days," Molly announces harshly, her voice a low hiss. Her whole body is shaking, and there are tears forming in her eyes. "Four days, Dorcas, and I haven't heard a word from them. No one has heard from them. You are, as far as I know, the last person who interacted with them."

"That may be so, but I don't have the answers," Dorcas replies stiffly, inwardly begging her to just let it go.

"Gideon left me a voicemail," Molly informs her, reaching in her pocket to pull out her cell. She sits it on the counter and holds Dorcas' gaze as she plays it.

"Hi, Molly," Gideon's voice filters through, and just hearing it feels like a blow to Dorcas' chest. "I know the games are about to start soon, so you've got your cell off, but I just…" There's a long beat of silence, just the sound of his breathing, and then he clears his throat. "I just wanted to ring you up to check in and tell you I love you. Fabian and I—we love you, Molly."

Dorcas feels like her heart is lodged the wrong way in her chest, all mashed up. He knew. Gideon knew; or, he suspected, at least. She can't work out where it went wrong, or why Riddle ordered the hit, but Gideon somehow saw it coming. That only makes it more tragic.

Dorcas takes another sip of her tea for the excuse to clear her throat, working to keep her expression neutral. "That's lovely. I'm not sure what you're implying—"

"Don't lie to me!" Molly bursts out, slamming her hand down on the counter so hard that the teacups rattle. Her eyes are full of tears and fury. "Gideon and Fabian don't ring me up to tell me they love me; they ring me up to tell me stupid jokes and tease me when I complain about my problems. That—" She points at her cell. "That was a message to specifically tell me they love me, and they wouldn't do that for no reason, Dorcas. Something happened to them, and you know what it is."

"I don't know anything," Dorcas denies, remaining calm, unwilling to escalate the situation.

"Then why have you been talking about them in the past tense, like they're already gone?" Molly rasps, and when she blinks, her tears fall.

Shit, Dorcas thinks once again. She's spent the last two days mourning Fabian and Gideon, overly aware that they're dead, and this is the worst way for it to manifest. An unconscious shift from is to was, because they are already gone.

When Dorcas has been silent for too long, Molly chokes out, "Tell me. Please just tell me. They're my family, Dorcas."

"I don't know anything," Dorcas repeats, her heart clenching in her chest, but she remains steady.

"You're lying."

"Molly, I'm not lying. I'm sorry about your brothers, alright? I really am, but I don't know anything."

"Yes, you do," Molly snaps, and with that, she grabs her teacup and proceeds to launch its contents right at her.

Dorcas flings herself back with a shriek, because the tea scalds her skin. She crashes into her pantry door, hands flying up to cradle her face, cheeks burning. Due to this, she doesn't see Molly coming, so she's not at all prepared to be slammed back into the door, Molly's forearm pressing into her throat.

This is when Dorcas learns that she can throw a punch. It's not just a theory now, proven by the way Molly stumbles back with a groan from the force of Dorcas hitting her in the face. Even still, Molly is a woman scorned, driven by grief and the need for answers as well as closure, so she just keeps right on coming. In seconds, she's flinging herself forward to wrap both hands around Dorcas' throat, throwing her to the floor.

Gasping for air, Dorcas claws at Molly's arms as she climbs on top, squeezing at her throat until Dorcas is choking. The lack of air makes her brain scream, and no matter how hard she fights, Molly just holds her down—until, abruptly, she lets go.

"Tell me!" Molly bellows, glaring down at her with tears streaming from her eyes. "Tell me, or I swear I'll kill you!"

"Please," Dorcas croaks.

Molly's face twists, and she dives for Dorcas' neck again, audibly weeping. "Just tell me. Just —please just—"

"Th-They're dead," Dorcas chokes out on a wheeze, and Molly's hands instantly go slack around her throat. Dorcas sucks in deep, painful breaths, her chest heaving.

Molly looks stricken, her face sagging with immediate sorrow and grief. She shakes her head, making a small noise, and then she slumps right off of Dorcas to scoot back against the cabinets beneath the sink. In seconds, Molly is sobbing as she covers her face with both hands.

Slowly, Dorcas sits up, pressing her fingers to her tender throat, still shaking from the assault. Her heart is racing and terror has cold hands wrapped around her spine. She's never been so close to—well, anything like that, honestly. Violence has only ever existed to her in theory, and she's not at all prepared for how it feels in reality.

It's more painful than she was expecting. Her hand throbs from where she hit Molly, and her head is fucking pounding. It hurts to swallow, and her throat is sore from the inside out.

And yet, Dorcas thinks the one in the most pain right now is Molly. She's sobbing like she's dying, just these horrible, raw sounds of pure agony. This is only part of what Dorcas was trying to save her from, and it makes her heart ache.

"I'm sorry," Dorcas rasps as she shuffles over and carefully wraps her arm around her. Molly instantly folds over into her arms, weeping into her shoulder. "I'm so sorry, Molly."

"No, no, no," Molly moans. "No, it isn't true. Please tell me it isn't true. Not them. Please, no…"

"I'm sorry," Dorcas says again, because that's all she can really say. "They were such good men. Brave, honorable men. They knew the risks, and they still chose to do the right thing. I know it's not fair, Molly, I'm sorry."

Molly lifts her head slowly, sniffling. "Risks? What risks?"

"I—" Dorcas grimaces. "They wouldn't want you involved. It's not—it isn't safe, do you understand? Don't keep pushing. Just let it go, please."

"My brothers are dead," Molly declares, and her voice cracks. Again, tears well up in her eyes, but there's a lot of anger and grief within them as well. "If you think I'm going to stop now, then you know nothing. What risks?"

Dorcas takes a deep breath, wincing at the pain it causes. Well, Molly is in this now, isn't she? Frankly, Dorcas doesn't see any other way around this, and all she can do is send a mental apology to Gideon and Fabian, who would have wanted their sister safe. But it's too late for that. "Alright, let's get up so I can clean up the glass all over my floor, take care of my face, and throat. Then I'll tell you about the Order of the Phoenix."

~•~

Sirius heaves a sigh of relief as he steps through the door to the suite. It has indeed been a long fucking day.

He's spent it doing exactly what he expected he would have to, smoothing over Regulus' reaction after Evan died. Most people seemed appeased by Sirius saying it was a response to his grief and the message was intended as a solidarity thing, but because of that and the lack of any interaction between him and James, the support for him has waned. Even James is sort of disappointing people at this point, because he's not flirting with Regulus like he was before. He's not talking at all.

Sirius' stomach tangles into knots with the thought. A quiet James is a cause for concern, because James is rarely quiet. Of course, he has his quiet moments, like when he's really invested in a book, or when he's briefly distracted by something shiny, or those random times when he'd get so deep in thought about something that he'd just fall silent because he's so focused. In general, though, James isn't really a quiet person.

It's just not a good sign. Sirius is worried that neither of them are going to manage to bounce back from what's happened so far, and that's unfortunately unacceptable, because there's still so much they have to do. The games aren't over yet, so giving up is not an option, not for either of them.

Thankfully, there's been a break. Regulus and James have been traveling all day, but they're taking their time, seeming to embrace the chance to just—adjust. It's a small breath of air in all this shit, and Sirius can't blame them for how they're using it. Sometimes, interacting with people is hard when your life is falling apart on all sides, and it doesn't matter who the person is. It can be someone you grew up with, or even the man you love, and it's still fucking impossible. Sirius understands.

As for Sirius, despite all the sweet-talking and the work he's put in today, he's had something of a break himself. Not having to see James and Regulus fight for their lives or come within inches of death has worked wonders on his nerves. It's his little breath of air after suffocating, one he desperately needed. He's still fucking terrified at all times, but the break has left him basking in the lack of stress too high to handle.

The games are still on, of course, but there's not much happening. No one has died, and the gamemakers are wrapping the day up sooner than normal, dropping the temperature before the sun even sets.

It forces the death eaters to go back over the river, Juniper to dig herself a hole, and the others to settle into their cave. Regulus and James didn't find a cave this time, so they're camping outside next to a big boulder. It's mostly secluded, but it means they won't be able to light a fire through the night for very long without risking someone or something finding them, which forces them to huddle for warmth. Still, it could be a lot worse, and they're so close to the allies that are still hoping for James' return.

Sirius is surprised to see the screen off when he comes inside, because usually Remus is waiting for him to watch. He can hear distant voices from the kitchen, so he follows it warily.

"There he is," Pandora says warmly as soon as he comes in. She breaks out into a smile and pushes away from the counter, where she and Remus seem to be in the middle of making…a pan of brownies? Pandora moves over and immediately wraps Sirius into a tight hug. "Been waiting for you."

"Been missing you," Sirius replies softly, hugging her back as he flicks his gaze to the hologram screen in the corner of the room. Pandora has it set up for them, he's assuming, so they don't have to watch in the sitting room. On it, James and Regulus are passing water back and forth in complete silence while getting ready to settle in. Sirius rips his gaze away and leans back to look at Pandora. "How is your father?"

Pandora presses her lips into a thin line. "Not—not doing well, honestly. He insists he'll be fine, though, so he kicked me out and told me to get back to work. He knows how worried I've been for you."

"I'm sorry, Pandora," Sirius whispers, swallowing thickly. Her father is very sick, and has been since the previous year; she would usually stay with Sirius during the games full time, otherwise, but he knows how important it was for her to go check on him.

"No," Pandora assures him. "It's—well, the caretaker is handling him just fine. I'm a handler for you, for our tributes, so I should be here."

Sirius frowns. "If you need to—"

"Stop, Sirius. I want to be here. It's really fine," Pandora says with a heavy sigh.

"Well, if it makes you feel better, I'm glad you are here," Sirius declares sincerely, dipping in to kiss her cheek, pleased when she smiles.

Pandora beams at him. "Remus is making me brownies for my efforts, and my woes."

"Is he now?" Sirius flicks his gaze over to Remus, who gives him a tiny smile as he stirs brownie batter.

"I'm helping," Pandora adds cheerfully. Remus shakes his head behind her back, but there's humor in his eyes.

Sirius chuckles. "I'll help, too."

So, that's what they do. They all come together to make a pan of brownies, and they all clean up the dishes they use, and they all eat warm brownies with a scoop of ice cream when they're ready. Sirius doesn't finish his plate, because he's painfully, viscerally aware that Regulus and James are currently going without such luxury at the moment. In fact, throughout all of this, James and Regulus show up on the screen a few times (not very often, because they're not being 'entertaining'), and they're always just sitting in silence.

Sirius stares at his brownie and ice cream and wishes with all that he has in him that he could just—give it to them. So, yeah, his appetite practically vanishes, and he doesn't finish it.

Still, Sirius feels his chest ache and also go warm with the thought of James and Regulus sort of being here with him right now, even if they don't know it. They're as safe as they'll ever get in the arena, at least for now, and so Sirius feels like he can breathe easier. Of course, them being on a screen isn't really them being here, but it's…better than nothing.

If they were here, though, Sirius would nudge Regulus' once, twice, and then a third time until he finally looked over with an exasperated sigh. Sirius would cross his eyes and wiggle his eyebrows to make Regulus smile, like he used to when they were children, and Regulus would try so hard to fight it, but a smile would spread across his face anyway.

And James. Oh, James would be the heart and soul of all the joy and laughter they would all be having if he was here. A grin on his face, warmth in his voice, bouncing around and making them all crack up and tease each other. Tugging on one of Regulus' curls like he used to do when they were young, when he thought Sirius didn't notice, and it would make Regulus scowl instead of blush the way it did when he was a child. Chattering away to Remus, entertaining him with endless little fun facts, getting Remus comfortable with opening up one warm laugh at a time. Teasing Pandora, stealing her brownie when she's not looking, pretending he's innocent when she squints at him suspiciously. Breathing in perfect sync with Sirius, because they're always doing that, always breathing at the same time; even now, every time James inhales and exhales on the screen, Sirius matches him.

It's when he starts cleaning up with Pandora and Remus that it happens. He's wrapping the brownies individually so they can just grab them and eat them whenever they like, and also so Pandora and Remus can wash the pan. He's fighting with the thin plastic wrap when he sees Regulus hold up his finger, indicating for James to give him a minute before they actually curl up under the blanket together.

Their camp is already set up. They have a place to make a quick fire if they get too cold, all the tools within reach and ready. They've had water, but they'll need to refill it tomorrow when they find a source for it. They've had food—the rabbit earlier and also the berries that James had picked for them. So, they're safe, and they've had a relatively calm day, compared to all the ones before it.

Regulus is clearly leaving to take a walk around and make sure they're as secluded as they can get, just one last check that he takes seriously, because he has his dagger in hand. It comes from a sense of paranoia, Sirius knows; if it'll help him actually manage to sleep tonight, Sirius can't begrudge him that. It's clearly cold, though, because Regulus' breath billows out in front of him in a white cloud as he moves silently.

The camera cuts to James suddenly, who has his head tilted back as he looks up at the stars, whispering, "Sirius, I hope you had a better day than I did."

At the sound of James' voice, the kitchen goes silent. Sirius quickly wraps the last brownie and gives James his undivided attention, his heart clenching in his chest.

"It's, ah—well, I don't even know if you're seeing this, if they're showing it to you, but I just…" James swallows thickly and blinks rapidly up at the sky. "I miss you, you know. Maybe it's selfish of me, but I wish you were here. Not here here; just here to talk to, I guess. I—I really wish—" He halts, clearing his throat, and then his voice gets softer. "Do you remember when…? I mean, do you remember all the things I said to you? All of it was true, you have to know that, but I—I feel like a hypocrite, because it's—it's so much heavier than I could have ever imagined. I, um, get it now."

Sirius is pretty sure his heart breaks. He has to brace his hands on the counter to keep his legs from buckling, because he knows what James is saying. What he isn't saying, more accurately. How hard all this is, how heavily it weighs on you; he gets it now. Sirius can't think of anything more tragic.

James releases a weak laugh, sniffling. "Yeah, I get it now. You are so—you're the strongest person I've ever known, Sirius, and I'm so fucking sorry you had to be. You say—you've always said you admire me, but you really don't know how much I've always admired you, especially now." He takes a deep breath, slowly letting it out. "But it's—it's going to be okay. It will be. I'm still in this, alright? The plan is still the same. I'm just… I was just having it a little rough, but I'll keep trying. I'm not giving up. Neither is he. We're still in this; we're still here."

Sirius' eyes flutter shut, those words washing over him like a balm to his soul. It's like being gently electrocuted, tenderly shocked awake, so much purpose and relief making something inside him vibrate. He feels—driven, and also soothed. When his eyes peel open again, James is smiling more sincerely.

"I really, really hope you've eaten something today. Something like…so good. Like, mouth-wateringly good," James says, then groans quietly. "I'm thinking pornographic thoughts about cake right now, and you can't judge me for it, because I have every right. Did you see what I had today? Fucking rabbit."

Sirius doesn't realize he's crying until a wet laugh bursts out of him, a little choked and hitched, his shoulders bowing in as he raises the back of his wrist to his mouth. It's so strange how he suddenly becomes aware of the tears spilling out of his eyes, despite the fact that this might be the best he's felt in days. Acceptable tears. James always makes things better.

"Just a cute, little bunny going about his day," James says solemnly, heaving a sigh. "It's alright, though. It's—"

"James, who the fuck are you talking to?" Regulus snaps in a low hiss, abruptly stepping around the boulder.

James jolts, hand flying up to his chest. "Fuck, Regulus, don't do that. You nearly scared the piss out of me."

"Well, if you were more alert, that wouldn't happen," Regulus says coldly. "Why are you talking? Shut up."

"If you must know," James mutters, "I was talking to Sirius."

Regulus arches an eyebrow. "About?"

"Er, cake, mostly," James mumbles sheepishly.

"Cake," Regulus repeats flatly.

James clears his throat. "I could really go for some cake right now. What about you?"

"Stop talking, James," Regulus says sharply, moving over to snatch up the blanket so he can climb underneath it.

"Shit, Reg, you're freezing. Come here, love."

"Don't touch me."

"A bit fucking difficult to do when we're cuddling, you utter bastard. Stop being stubborn and —ow! Hey, watch it."

"You watch it."

"Then where do I put my hands?" James complains, the mounds of their bodies shifting under the blanket as Regulus visibly struggles to not be close to James even while needing to be close to James to be warm.

Regulus huffs. "Stuff them down your pants for all I care."

There's a pause, then James says, "Or I could—"

"Don't," Regulus snaps.

"I'm just saying, maybe you'd appreciate it if I put them down yours instead," James teases.

"Another word out of you, and I'll put my hands down yours just to rip your fucking cock off," Regulus hisses, then makes a low noise of fury as he essentially burrows himself as close to James as he can get, clearly furious about his circumstances.

James falls silent at the threat, as any smart man would, but he seems mostly appeased by the fact that he's holding Regulus now. Sirius exhales slowly in relief, because yeah.

Yeah, they're still in this. They're still here. They're still trying. Somehow, they're going to bounce back and keep going, and this is the first step. They remain quiet, and Sirius watches his brother fall asleep slowly, fitfully, in his best friend's arms.

For now, they're safe, and that's enough.

It's not long before the camera cycles through all the other tributes and Rita comes on the screen. Pandora immediately moves over to blip out the hologram, releasing a deep breath as she turns with a small smile.

"Alright?" Pandora asks him.

"Yeah," Sirius whispers, surprised to find that, for tonight, it's mostly true. "Yeah, I'm alright."

Pandora nods. "Good. Well, I'm in a desperate need of a shower and some sleep. The brownies were good, Remus, thank you. Sirius, I'll see you in the morning, yeah?"

"Of course," Sirius says.

"Goodnight, Pandora," Remus murmurs as Pandora gathers her hologram projector and returns the sentiments before leaving the room with a wave.

Sirius breathes for a little bit, then turns around to find Remus leaning up against the counter behind him, his hands resting by his hips, leaving the target of his torso wide open.

Sirius attacks it.

In the least violent way possible, Sirius slams into Remus' chest and practically melts against him with a deep exhale, his eyes sinking shut. Remus needs no time to catch up; he has his arms around Sirius in seconds, holding him like he was born to. For a long time, they just hold on and breathe.

Sirius doesn't cry. He feels—good. As good as he can feel in his situation. He knows it won't last, and he wants to make the most of it. Just…for right now, for tonight, he has relief and hope coursing through him, and he wants to hold onto the feeling. He wants to hold onto Remus, and be held in return, and he lets it happen. Lets himself have it.

"Hi," Remus whispers.

"Hi," Sirius whispers back.

"Good?" Remus asks, his lips moving against Sirius' temple as he speaks.

"How do you always know?" Sirius whispers, tilting his face closer, hoping to feel more of Remus' mouth. He pressed kisses to his temple and cheek last time, and Sirius wants it again. He wants that, and more.

"I'm assuming you're essentially granting yourself the things you want because you're in mildly better spirits," Remus explains, because he's so smart, and he has Sirius all figured out already. How he's managed this, Sirius doesn't know.

"Pretty much," Sirius admits, because now is the best time. There's no guilt for right now. No stress. Maybe it makes him weak, but he wants to bask in it as much as he can. Or maybe that just makes him human. Sometimes, he forgets that he is.

Because Remus always, always knows, he gently presses kisses down the side of Sirius' face. Sirius' breath hitches helplessly, his heart thumping heavily in his chest, his entire body fully just tingling by the time Remus' lips graze his jaw. Remus pulls back slowly, looking at him, studying him. Sirius sees his eyes flick down to his mouth, then right back up.

Sirius sways forward like a worm on a hook.

Remus' lips twitch.

"Do you need to brush your teeth?" Remus teases, lifting his hand to gently card it through Sirius' hair as he leans in.

"Shut up. I panicked, alright?" Sirius mumbles, a little breathless because of Remus' proximity. "Are you—I mean, are you going to kiss me? Is that allowed?"

"Is that—" Remus chokes on a laugh and leans back to stare at him like he's something amazing. "Sirius, what? What does that even mean? 'Is that allowed'?"

"It has just hit me, very belatedly, that this was maybe a bit ridiculous of me to say—"

"A bit?"

"—but, in my defense, I temporarily forgot that it's quite literally not allowed for you, considering your position, but also really acceptable while you're in the suite, should you so wish," Sirius continues to explain, in a ramble. "Not that you have to, obviously, but if—if that was something you...wanted to do, then of course you could. Just—I mean—"

"Sirius," Remus says, amused.

"It's—I only mean it's your choice to do it if you want, or not if you don't. Not—I'm not saying—well, you know, you have that freedom here. With anyone." Sirius pauses briefly. "Wait."

Remus tucks his lips in. "Yes, do go on. I would love to hear how you talk yourself around that one."

"Um," Sirius says, frowning. "Well."

"Waiting," Remus reminds him.

Sirius frowns harder. "I don't like it."

"No?" Remus arches an eyebrow. "So, my freedom doesn't extend past the borders of what you like? I can only live in the perimeters of what pleases you, is that it?"

"I—no, of course not. You can do whatever you want, as I've said many times before," Sirius mutters, "but I should tell you, if you kiss anyone else other than me, I'm going to be terribly jealous."

Remus' eyebrows fly up. "Oh, just right to it. No talking around that one at all. I barely even got to fuck with you."

"I'm learning."

"I'm oddly proud?"

"Is that—" Sirius pauses, chewing on the inside of his lip, then he blows out a deep breath. "Is it...too much? To feel—to be that way when we're—when this is…" He takes another second and feels his eyebrows tug together. "To be honest, I don't even know what this is. What we are."

"What we are," Remus echoes, his voice softening. "I'd say what we are is tragically inevitable and woefully pointless."

Sirius feels like he was just struck. Like Remus just struck him. Well, shit, that hurt more than he was expecting. Oh, he's in deep, isn't he? "Pointless. We're...pointless?"

"Reality has never felt the need to be kind," Remus says gently, looking so very sad. "Sirius, we are irrefutably barreling at full speed towards something, but we can't get anywhere. We'll go nowhere. Tell me you know that."

"I don't know that," Sirius croaks.

Remus sighs. "This is my life, Sirius. My servitude to the Hallow is—that's my future. I can't offer you anything else, and I won't try to pretend otherwise. In less than a week, you'll leave the Hallow to go home, and I'll still be here."

"I—I did know that," Sirius confesses, even if he hasn't really allowed himself to think about it. He's had enough to be fucking upset about, hasn't he?

"All that we do here, it means something. Our unavoidable conclusion doesn't take away from that," Remus murmurs, pulling his hand back to cup Sirius' cheek. "We are something, but we can't be everything. I—I do wish that we could be. Or I wish we could at least try. If it's easier to be nothing, because we can't be everything, then I understand."

Sirius breathes for a moment, then says, "I don't think I can be nothing with you."

"Is that so?" Remus asks, and it's so soft it's nearly a croon.

"I feel too much," Sirius confesses in a whisper. He exhales shakily. "I—I do have to come back every year, you know. I can bribe the right people to get you assigned to my suite every year, Remus. If—if that's something you'd want."

Remus hesitates for a long moment, lips parting, and then he looks pained. "I can't ask for that, or even expect it. Sirius, you can—you can have a life, one I can't give you. You can have someone who doesn't already belong to other forces out of our control. Someone you can see more than a few weeks out of the year. I can't give you everything, but someone else can."

"I'd take being something with you over being everything with anyone else," Sirius tells him.

"Oh, now why would you say that?" Remus breathes out, like he's just been punched.

"It's just the truth," Sirius says softly.

"I told you to warn me," Remus whispers, then slips his hand further down to cradle Sirius' jaw, the only warning he gives before he dips in and kisses him.

Just like that, Remus kisses him.

It's tentative, a little slow, not deep at all. He's being careful, and Sirius' mind has gone blank. All thoughts come to a screeching halt, and he's just frozen in place, not doing anything. He can't help it, because Remus is kissing him. Every cell in his body is vibrating at a frequency that's a little concerning, actually, as if he's about to spontaneously combust on the spot. His nerves are pinging all at once, lighting up and flooding him with an overwhelming sense of everything.

Sirius doesn't kiss him back, mostly because the whole world seems to have stopped for a moment, and he hasn't the faintest fucking idea what he's meant to do with that. The last time he kissed anyone, or was kissed by anyone, was ten years ago. He doesn't remember if it felt like this; he doesn't really remember it at all, because his memory is shit.

Remus pulls away, careful, and Sirius doesn't remember closing his eyes, but he opens them now to see Remus staring at him cautiously. "Should I not have done that?"

"No," Sirius croaks. He releases a shaky breath, not entirely sure if there's enough oxygen getting to his brain at the moment. He's a little worried he's going to pass out here in a second. "If—I mean, if you like, you—you could do it again."

Apparently, Remus would like, because he does it again after only one pause. Just ducks back in and kisses him a second time, as gentle as the first. Sirius is a bit more prepared for this one, so he tilts his face up into it, letting it wash over him how much he likes it. Oh, but he really likes it. Remus' lips are soft, and he slides one hand down from Sirius' cheek to cup the side of his neck, warm fingers brushing over very sensitive skin. Vaguely, Sirius wonders if Remus can feel the harsh fluttering at the pulse in his throat; his heart is racing.

Remus doesn't pull away this time, and Sirius finally kisses him back, still ridiculously pliant, yet helplessly curious for more. There's a moment where it's just the tender brush of mouths, warm pressure pushing in and then alleviating before coming right back. It's almost a tease, and Sirius sways eagerly into the kiss, one hand reaching out mindlessly to settle on Remus' side. He keeps his touch light, trying so very hard not to do anything that he shouldn't.

Then Remus' hand that's still on his cheek pushes back into his hair, and there's the first hint of tongue, just a small, hot swipe along Sirius' bottom lip, and all of Sirius' thoughts of being careful promptly evaporate on the spot. His hand clamps down on Remus' side, fingers digging in slightly as he helplessly rocks forward, seeking more. This seems to please Remus, because he releases a quiet hum of approval against Sirius' mouth and kisses him deeper, now with the added bonus of tongue that Sirius is very much in favor of.

Gradually, Remus goes from kissing him to really kissing him, and Sirius can't actually describe the difference between the two, but there is a shift. There's more tongue, for one thing, and the whole mood has changed. It's instinctive the way they're both coming closer together, drawn in naturally as the world around them falls away—the cause behind every bit of distance they've adhered to with one another. It's gone, just like that, and Sirius isn't sad to see it go in the least.

It's like something in Sirius just—snaps. Or maybe it clicks into place. Or maybe it's both, a break that has to be reset, a boundary shattering just to be built anew somewhere else. Whatever it is, he's shaking all over and unable to stop himself from curling into Remus, sliding trembling hands up his chest to wrap arms around his shoulders, pressing them as close together as they can get. Remus responds in kind, kissing him harder, deeper, with more urgency.

But it slows again. With effort. Mostly Remus, because Sirius is currently gone on all levels. Remus pulls away, letting them calm as he rests their foreheads together.

Yeah, Sirius is never coming back from this. He's ruined. All that worrying that it'd be him, and it turns out to be Remus. If anyone is in shambles, it's Sirius. Just from one kiss. One taste.

Sirius' eyes flutter open so he can look at Remus, and he thinks, is it too soon to be sure I love you?

"What we are…" Remus pulls back slightly and slides his hand forward to cup Sirius' jaw, gently dragging his thumb over Sirius' bottom lip. "What we are is something. We're something, Sirius."

"As long as we're not nothing," Sirius whispers.

"No, never that," Remus whispers back, reassuring him, and he lets Sirius tug him back into his arms. In silence, they lean into each other and hold on.

It's a long time before they let go.

Chapter End Notes

IF YOU WANT TO SKIP THE VIOLENCE, THE SCROLL PAST WHERE DORCAS APOLOGIZES TO MOLLY AND SAYS SHE DOESN'T KNOW ANYTHING ABOUT GIDEON AND FABIAN!!!!

if you just want the warning: molly stops by dorcas' place to basically interrogate her about gideon and fabian, looking for answers. dorcas repeatedly lies to her, and in her grief and desperation, molly attacks dorcas. she throws hot tea at her face, and dorcas punches her, and then molly pins dorcas to the floor and briefly chokes her while demanding answers. she immediately stops the moment dorcas admits that fabian and gideon are dead.

for those of you who have finished the chapter...

LILY LILY LILY!!! LILY MY BELOVED!!!! you all have no idea how long i have been waiting to share this chapter, because we finally get to see her. and we have confirmation that she will indeed live!!! LILY IS ALIVE AND SHE IS SAFE!!!

she is also...Dealing With A Lot, clearly. yes, lily is a total rule-breaker, and she's out there sweeping every woman in her age range off their feet, unapologetically and with no shame. a girlboss!!! not letting herself have any meaningful connections in the last five years out of grief, less girlboss of her, but it's valid!

dumbledore.... that man. oh, That Man. i can't really get into depth about him yet without spoiling anything, but there is So Much going on with that man. can't wait to hear everyone's theories!!! also, if he could leave my girl lily alone, that would Be Great. but nooo, of course not, he's decided to Put Her On The Frontlines, whatever that means. we'll see more on that later, i assure you. it'll be a while, but. well, at least now you know she's alive and safe and won't die!!! awful that she believes remus is dead, though :(wonder how she's so sure about that...

(also, side note, kingsley and sybill are gems, i love them so much!!!)

okay, next we got a brief moment with all the mentors, which i think was nice. it was exciting to get to show more of frank and emmeline, who we haven't seen much about just yet. we'll see more of them later.

then you've got dorcas, as well as molly!!! a tense, fraught first meeting, admittedly, but a necessary one. you have to understand where they both were coming from, in this situation. molly knew her brothers were missing and had a feeling that something awful had happened to them, due to gideon's voicemail, and she was desperate and terrified, which made her lash out. meanwhile, dorcas was lying to molly to attempt to protect her and keep her from getting involved, because she thought fabian and gideon would want their sister safe; she was trying to do the right thing.

so, it was one of those things, like, they weren't fighting/having issues because they actually had a problem with each other—they just were in a very shitty, tense situation. we will indeed see molly again!

moving along, we got pandora back!!! now we know why she left to begin with; her father is sick, sadly, but she's back for good now!!! pandora my beloved <3 also that whole scene between james and sirius? heartwrenching, but like, in a good way??? regulus and james still aren't doing well, obviously, but we'll see more of them the next chapter. at least they got a day to just...rest/breathe.

finally, wolfstar!!! oh, wolfstar my loves <3 THEY KISSED!!! i mean, there was a bit of angst bc of their situation. quite literally star-crossed lovers, in this case. like, the whole thing about them being pointless? devastating. and yet they still made the conscious choice to choose each other anyway??? im throwing myself at walls. i adore them so, so much.

tragically inevitable and woefully pointless... so, wolfstar in canon, basically? but never nothing. never that.

alright, let me do numbers:

tributes remaining: 11
tributes who have died as of this chapter:
dylan
avery
quinn
evan mulciber
eight unnamed/unknown others

hope you all enjoyed. as always, thank you all so much for the support and lovely comments. i genuinely can't express what it means to me <3

Full Circle

Chapter Notes

hello, hello! hope everyone's having a good weekend!

warnings for this chapter:

-references to animal death (because of the whole arena thing, and it's brief, and it's not described in explicit detail)
-references to death/murder
-discussions of dissociative amnesia (just an honest, open conversation about it) and that's it! enjoy <3

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Remus knocks on Sirius' door without a moment of hesitation.

Just raises his hand, by his own choice, and knocks. No fear, no worry, no restraint. His inner restrictions have been clipped away, and he feels really, really good about it.

It doesn't take Sirius very long to open the door, and then there he is, standing in place with bright eyes and damp hair. He looks more rested than he has in days, though the bruises under his eyes from the lack of overall sleep remains, even if they've faded a bit overnight. He's gorgeous, of course, and the first thought Remus has is that he would like to kiss him.

This is…probably rude, honestly, but the thought persists anyway, wild and defiant and wanting. No hello? Get it together, Lupin, he thinks, but in his defense, he now knows what it's like to have Sirius' mouth against his own. His lips are so, so unbearably soft. Remus is obsessed already, after one kiss.

"Hi," Sirius breathes out, fidgeting with the doorknob mindlessly as he looks right at Remus with a flush steadily rising in his cheeks.

"Hi," Remus responds, lips curling up.

"I was—I mean, I've been up. Awake. I just had a shower. I wasn't avoiding you," Sirius blurts out.

Remus arches an eyebrow. "I didn't think you were. Why would you be avoiding me?"

"Do you remember last night?" Sirius asks, his voice strained.

"Hm," Remus hums, lips twitching again. "Last night… Last night… We watched the games, then we made brownies... Yeah, I remember."

This doesn't make Sirius smile or blush, like Remus was expecting it to. Instead, he looks… uncomfortable, or maybe anxious and vaguely upset, or all three. "Remus, you—um, just don't—don't fuck with me about...memories. I have this—I have memory issues, so it's—complicated."

"Memory issues," Remus repeats, a surge of guilt rising within him in an instant, because he was fucking with Sirius. He had assumed that Sirius' reaction yesterday and the starting day of the games was something of a trauma response. He wasn't aware that it was a common thing, a recurring problem in day-to-day life, even on good days. Or, mostly good days.

"It's not—" Sirius heaves a weary sigh. "It's not from my time in the arena. Well, it is, but not physically. Like, it's not from a head injury or anything. I mean, I have a lot of different issues I accumulated from the arena, and most of them affect my mind more than my body. I just—sometimes, I sort of...blink out of existence, it feels like, and I can't remember anything that happened while I was gone. My body carries on, but I'm not present, really. Like you said, when it seemed like I was gone for a little while; that's because I was."

"Oh," Remus says softly, his heart clenching. He knew, or he could guess, but he didn't have all the details before this. "Is that—are there triggers for it?"

"Sometimes, yeah," Sirius admits. "Could be a form of defense, I think, because it can happen when I'm...really upset, or angry, or stressed. Too much of it to handle, and my brain just sort of—blocks it all out. But sometimes, no, it just happens. Nothing I can really do about it, honestly. It used to be much worse when I was younger, so it's gotten easier to live with, but it's still—well, it's never going away."

"You don't get the memories back?" Remus asks.

"No. Never," Sirius tells him quietly. He takes in a shuddering breath and starts fiddling with his shirt. "My memory is pretty shit. It's really spotty, especially before the games, and I barely remember my first year after the games at all. The games themselves—of course I remember them, every single second, which is just—" He scoffs. "The one thing I'd like to forget, and it's what I remember the most."

Remus grimaces. "That's…"

"Fucked up? Bad luck? Yeah, I know." Sirius tosses up a hand, looking agitated, and he has every right to. "Anyway, memory is a complicated, delicate sort of thing for me, so… And, well, sometimes I have really happy memories that aren't—they're not real, or I can't be sure they are, or they're really disjointed and out of order. Who knows what the fuck my brain is doing, honestly? So, if—if I have really, really good memories that feel too good to be true, I...tend to doubt them."

"I see," Remus says quietly, aching for the man across from him. The man who doesn't deserve this. No one deserves this, but Sirius… Oh, it's breaking Remus' heart. It makes him want to get a hold of every person who had a hand in hurting Sirius and fully just—rip them apart.

Sirius clears his throat. "Right, so I have this really very good memory of last night that I'm desperately hoping I didn't just dream up in my head. Please tell me we actually kissed."

"Yes, we did. It was lovely," Remus tells him, and tension eases out of Sirius' shoulders instantly. His eyes absolutely light up, and then there's that grin of his, the one that nearly turns Remus into a puddle each time he sees it. As sad as it is that Sirius had to ask, it's sort of sweet that he gets to be this happy about it a second time. He was this visibly happy the first, too.

"Brilliant!" Sirius declares with genuine delight, like he really is an outside audience having a thrilling theory confirmed and ceaselessly pleased to be right about it. Remus has never seen something so simultaneously tragic and adorable all at once. Sirius gives him a playful sultry look, and perhaps his 'smoulder' is meant to be a joke, but it looks...unfairly good, actually. "Was it as good as I remember?"

"It was exactly as good as you remember," Remus assures him, amused when Sirius grins wider and pretends to bow.

"Thank you, thank you," Sirius says grandly, as if he's winning an award and giving his acceptance speech. "I'd like to thank Mary Macdonald, my pillow, the side of my hand, and James Potter's cheek that time I licked him to assert my dominance and stake my claim when I was thirteen and Zachary Zilloway dared to call James his best friend."

Oh, he really did give an acceptance speech. This idiot. Remus huffs out a weak laugh and covers his face with his hand, so helplessly smitten that it's pathetic. "You licked him?"

"Like a dog, just right up the side of his face, then stared directly into Zilloway's eyes until he was so uncomfortable that he literally just left," Sirius says cheerfully.

"And what did James have to say about this?" Remus asks in amusement as he drops his hand.

Sirius chuckles. "He thought it was hilarious."

"Of course he did," Remus says. "You're both ridiculous."

"I believe his exact words were oh, just piss on me next time, why don't you? And then I told him not to challenge me, because I absolutely would. And then he dared me to do it the next time, and I would have, mind you, but Zilloway got a new best friend a week later. James says he was unfaithful, but I like to think he knew I had defeated him," Sirius explains with a shrug.

"Why does that not surprise me?" Remus mutters.

"In my defense, I was only thirteen." Sirius' smile slips a bit, his eyebrows furrowing. Then he frowns. "I think. Or maybe twelve? I don't really—I mean, I know we were young. I do know that. Ah, it doesn't matter, really. You get my point."

Remus offers him a gentle smile. "I do, yeah." He pauses, then takes a deep breath. "Can I… ask? If you're uncomfortable talking about it, of course we don't have to. I just—"

"No, it's fine." Sirius clears his throat. "Ask away."

"It's just…" Remus trails off, trying to figure out how to word what he wants to say. "Well, what would you like me to do? When it happens, I mean. You just—carry on as usual, so I suppose I'm asking how you'd like for me to help."

Sirius blinks. "Oh. Well, I—don't know, honestly. I mean, before you, no one ever realized I was…gone. Because, like you said, I just carry on, so it's hard to notice."

"Okay," Remus says. "If there's anything you don't want me to do, you can tell me that as well. I mean, I wouldn't do anything anyway, really, but you get my point."

"Yeah, I know. It doesn't bother me," Sirius tells him. "I mean, well, obviously it bothers me that I'm just forgetting shit all the time against my will, but that's not what I meant. Just, it doesn't bother me that it happens around you, or however you respond to it. I trust you."

He says it so flippantly, so casually, like it's a fact that's set it stone, one everyone should know already, not even a big deal. He clearly doesn't seem to think this is a big deal at all, not even batting an eye about it, like he's known it forever.

Remus feels his heart swell until it almost hurts, like it might fucking explode. He's not aware of how he's going to reply to this until the words are already tumbling from his mouth in a breathless rush. "Please tell me you've brushed your teeth already, because I would very much like to kiss you again."

Sirius breaks out into a grin, stifling a laugh, and then he reaches forward to grab Remus by his collar and slowly, oh so slowly, reels him in. He teases, "You're in luck; my teeth are, in fact, brushed," and then tugs Remus in a kiss to prove it.

There's no hesitation this time. Sirius goes for it eagerly, like he wants it just as much as Remus does. He cups Remus' jaw and winds his other hand into Remus' hair, kissing him and kissing him and kissing him so deeply that Remus sort of loses track of…everything, honestly. Anything that's not Sirius in his arms and Sirius' mouth against his own just does not matter.

Remus pulls Sirius closer to better feel him, and he's so—fuck, he's just perfect. Everything about him is wonderful; the heat of his mouth, the soft feeling of his hair, the shape of him as he leans forward to press them closer together. There's the soft drag of Sirius' tongue, experimental, and then he's making a quiet noise into the kiss as he turns mindlessly to push Remus up against the door. Remus goes willingly, already distracted by his hand in Sirius' hair and the feeling of Sirius' teeth nipping at his bottom lip, testing, exploring.

It's almost—novice? Like he's not entirely sure what he's doing, what he enjoys, or what he doesn't…so he's figuring it out. Remus doubts that's true, but he can admit that he likes how thorough Sirius is, taking the time to make the kiss really, really good. It's mind-blowingly good, so his efforts are not wasted. The longer they do it, the more settled into it Sirius becomes, and Remus is more than happy to stay right here and let Sirius take his time to do whatever he wants.

However, Sirius' bottom lip is eventually too tempting to ignore, and he just needs to feel it between his teeth. Actually, he needs to do a lot of things, and he sets out to do them because Sirius is letting him. In fact, he seems on board and in full support, if the soft moan that escapes him and the way he curls into the kiss are anything to go by. He's so, so responsive; reacting to it all like he's never felt it before, like Remus himself is introducing him to what it is to feel good. Remus knows that's not possible, but he relishes the feeling anyway.

The kiss breaks as Sirius sucks in a deep breath, his fingers flexing in Remus' hair, a shudder rippling through him as he takes a second to breathe. He's panting. Remus chuckles, low and warm, then ducks his head and mouths along Sirius' jaw, heading right for his neck.

"Oh, that's—mm, that's really—" Sirius cuts himself off with a choked noise, his head falling back as Remus apparently finds a sensitive spot. Sirius must really like it, because he arches closer with a muffled groan.

Remus pulls back minutely, with a truly impressive amount of patience. "I shouldn't do that too much. You bruise so easily."

"Don't care. Do it," Sirius whispers, tugging on Remus' hair.

"People will see," Remus warns. "They'll come up with their own conclusions and make assumptions—

"Let them," Sirius cuts in breathlessly. "I don't care what anyone thinks when they look at me. Don't let that stop you, because it's certainly not about to stop me."

"No one will know. They'll look at you and think you've gone to bed with some sponsor; they'll look at the marks and be jealous of some made-up rich person in their head. Some people will even claim that it's them, but no one will know. No one but you, when you look in the mirror," Remus murmurs, giving in and dragging his mouth back to Sirius' neck. He starts slowly, humming when Sirius practically vibrates against him. "And me. I'll know, too."

"Yes, yes, yes," Sirius chants, his voice pitched high, and he sounds like he's just heard the best news of his life. At this moment, Remus thinks he could get Sirius to agree to absolutely anything. He's so eager. So earnest.

Remus does it on purpose then, and does it with purpose, too. Single-minded focus. He leaves marks on Sirius' throat, up and down the side, high and low. Throughout, Sirius breathes hard and gasps and hisses between his teeth, and Remus closes his eyes to bask in the beautiful sounds of him. Sirius squirms against him, tugging restlessly on his hair, so Remus drops both hands to his waist to hold him still.

Sirius proceeds to curse under his breath and slam his free hand against the door right next to Remus' head, over his shoulder, and Remus reflexively jumps a little and pulls back to make sure Sirius is alright. Sirius groans and says, "Sorry, sorry, I'm—shit, I'm sorry. That was—I just wasn't expecting this to feel so good. Sorry. Don't—you don't have to stop, I'm fine. I am so fine right now, Remus."

"Okay," Remus says, stifling a laugh. He wrinkles his nose playfully and leans in to bump it against Sirius', earning a soft huff of laughter. "Just don't break the door. Or your hand."

"I'll do my best," Sirius mumbles, sounding winded.

Remus grins at him and teases, "What, no past lover ever made it good for you before?"

"Um." Sirius clears his throat. His pupils are blown and his face is already flushed, but Remus can tell when he's blushing from being flustered, rather than riled up. He shifts a little and gives Remus a weak smile. "Well, that's the thing. I've never had past lovers. I'm—I've never been with anyone."

"You—" Remus blinks, genuinely startled. "What?"

Sirius frowns. "I know my reputation suggests otherwise, but I thought you said you didn't believe any of that shit."

"I don't," Remus says quickly, eyes wide. "I just assumed—I mean, maybe at home? Or maybe a Hallow here or there, just not as much as they say. Which is—that would be fine, Sirius."

Sirius huffs. "Well, no, I haven't. The only thing I've ever done is kiss Mary Macdonald when I was sixteen and nothing else since. Believe it or not, becoming a sex object for the Hallows tends to put one off sex."

"Okay, that's—that's okay, Sirius," Remus murmurs, holding his gaze. "I mean, actually, no, that's not okay. That's awful, and I'm sorry you've had to deal with that. But I mean, it's okay as in—we don't have to do anything."

"Well…good," Sirius snaps, clearly defensive. Somehow, Remus has offended him, or upset him, or both. He pulls away, not looking pleased at all. "Good, because we're not."

Remus holds his hands up in surrender. "Of course."

Sirius frowns at him some more, and they just stand there in near-stifling silence for a few minutes, and then Sirius is right back on him like he never even left. In seconds, he's kissing Remus again, basically pinning him to the door with his enthusiasm, groaning into the kiss like a man discovering a miracle. Remus laughs breathlessly, unable to help it, and Sirius mumbles smug bastard against his lips before essentially shoving his tongue in Remus' mouth to give him something to do other than laugh. Remus takes it like the gift it is.

They're still going at it (rather thoroughly, too) when a yelp makes them both split apart to see Pandora clapping her hand over her eyes as she half-turns away. "Oh! I didn't—I was just going to wake Sirius. I'm sorry."

"It's fine." Remus clears his throat and straightens up. "Really, Pandora, you're fine."

"I made breakfast," Pandora says weakly, still not uncovering her eyes. Her lips curl up. "Sorry to interrupt. I wasn't aware that you two had…made it to this point."

"It's a new development," Sirius mumbles.

"Well, that's lovely," Pandora declares cheerfully. "I'll just go, then. Leave you to your… development. Right. Excuse me."

"Thank you for making breakfast!" Remus calls after her gratefully, and Pandora just waves over her shoulder with a quiet giggle as she disappears up the hall.

Sirius groans and drops his forehead against Remus' shoulder, gently banging his head to it. "I didn't even hear her coming."

"If it makes you feel any better, neither did I." Remus reaches up and cards his fingers through Sirius' hair, then gently nudges him to tilt his face up. Sirius does, and Remus leans in to give him a sweet, short kiss that makes Sirius sigh softly when he pulls away. Remus smiles. "Come on. You have a long day ahead of you, and you need breakfast."

"Right," Sirius says. "Yes. That."

Chuckling, Remus reaches down to grab Sirius' hand to tangle their fingers together, then tugs him up the hall. Sirius follows after him with a lopsided, triumphant grin.

~•~

James knows where he and Regulus are, but he's taking care not to mention it. He's planning to just casually go, "Oh, look at that convenient cave over there," and then drag Regulus inside before he gets suspicious. Surely that will work.

It's day five. Eleven tributes still remain. No one has died since Mulciber, and the fact that a group of people have lasted in a cave undetected and safe for this long means that James wants almost fervently to get Regulus there. Just for a day or two, at the very least. They'll outnumber the death eaters that way, too, and since he and Regulus killed three out of seven of their members, he feels it's in their best interest to get somewhere they won't be easily found. They need more time.

The previous day was—bad. Very, very fucking bad. Well, all days have been bad, frankly, but regardless. James and Regulus spent the previous day not speaking or looking at each other, the both of them too lost in their own head, dealing with their own pain and grief and anger.

It has carried over into today. They've gotten a late start, because they both kept waking up from nightmares, so neither of them really slept well. Regulus is being quiet again, and James is so fucking exhausted that he's tempted to join him in silence. It suddenly feels like the hardest thing to do to crack jokes and find things to talk about; Regulus has shut down, and James would swear that some inner light in himself has gone out.

Still, James meant what he said to Sirius last night. They're still here, and they're still trying, and the plan is still the same. James is getting Regulus through this, and nothing is going to stop him. There is no force in this world that could stop him, at this point. Really, it's his most driving motivation now, especially inside the arena. It's the one thing that's keeping him going when he wants to sit down and just—weep.

In a way, James wants to thank Regulus for that, because even now—even here—James is finding comfort in him. Purpose. Hope. Without him even knowing it, Regulus is giving him something to live for, to fight for, simply with every breath he takes.

In just knowing that, and experiencing the arena, James is starting to learn things about himself that he never really stopped to think about before.

For one, he's a caretaker. He likes to take care of people. It makes him feel better to make other people feel better, and he generally knows how to do that. It comes naturally to him and gives him a sense of accomplishment. Sometimes it's tiring, and sometimes it drains him, and sometimes he forgets that he needs to be taken care of, too, but overall—it's the most rewarding thing he's ever done in life.

Another thing, he's a bit too attached to his morals. He thinks, if Regulus wasn't in here with him, he would struggle to fight as he has. Having a purpose to focus on, a goal that supersedes what he's willing to do to survive, might just be the one thing that's helped him survive this long. He's killed people. Like, he's taken lives. He's not sure if he would have been able to do that if he wasn't fighting for something—or someone, more accurately—because he doubts he would have been willing to put the importance of his own survival over anyone else's, in which case he would have been dead by now.

Lastly, he's a lot more resilient than he ever realized. He has now suffered things he's only been exposed to through those closest to him, and he honestly never thought he would be strong enough to handle it, and yet he is. Somehow, he is. Somehow, despite everything, he's still going.

He just keeps going.

That means something to James. That's important to James. Maybe it makes him an optimist, he's not sure, but he really believes what he said to Regulus. Who he is, who they really are, that's theirs; no one can take that from them. It can be altered, and it can be shaped beyond recognition, but what they're made of, what makes them up as people, can't be erased. And James is still holding onto that, refusing to ever, ever let go. He'll be him until his last breath.

So, James ruminates on these things for the first hour of the morning when he and Regulus are getting ready and setting out in silence. It's actually a bit of a soul-searching moment for him, if he's honest, and it helps settle him more than he's expecting it to. Of course, the fact that they still have a long way to go and a lot ahead of them also helps him essentially get his shit together, as much as he's able to.

Next is Regulus himself, who has most definitely gotten as distant as he possibly can whilst stuck traveling with James. It's eerily similar to the way he was at fifteen, how he's just pulling away, refusing to let anyone get close to him. Losing Evan was a major hit for him.

Frankly, James is upset about it because Evan was nice and helpful and funny, and death is upsetting, but it's not hitting him as hard as Regulus, who actually got close to him seemingly by accident. Of course he would never do that on purpose, purely to avoid exactly what he's feeling right now, but it was one of those things that just happened anyway. Without even meaning to, he made a friend that he trusted, and then he lost him. James' heart aches for him.

James doesn't know what to do about this. How to help. He doesn't even know if he can help, because this is one of those things where Regulus should be allowed to hurt for it. He should be allowed to take the time to grieve how he needs to.

The problem is, they're in the hunger games, and they're not afforded such luxuries. Regulus can't slow down to grieve. He can't shut down and retreat into himself. He can't do all the things he should be allowed to do in response to losing a friend, because if he does, he could die as well.

James spends a lot of time trying to figure out the best way to help, but he genuinely can't think of one thing to do or say, which oddly gives him anxiety. Then, out of nowhere, Regulus abruptly changes direction away from the cave where the others are, and James has his opening.

"Wait, wait, where are you going?" James blurts out, skipping forward to whirl in front of him and cut him off.

Regulus blinks, dead-eyed. It's unsettling. "That…way?"

"Why?" James asks, baffled.

"Because we can't keep going that way," Regulus says slowly, like he's talking to an idiot. He points in the direction they were just going in, the direction James really wants them to continue going in, because they're so close now. "It's not smart. We'll just loop back around, and eventually, we'll run into the death eaters if we keep going."

James purses his lips. "You don't know that."

"Yes, I do. This place is a circle, James. The woods wrap around in a ring."

"How do you know? Have you completed a circuit?"

"I—" Regulus huffs, looking offended. "No, but I don't need to. The crimson river wraps around the cave and the entire forest wraps around the crimson river. It's just common sense."

"You think you're so smart, don't you?" James asks, hands on his hips.

Regulus narrows his eyes. "I do, actually."

"Yeah?" James inclines his head in the direction he wants to go in suggestively. "Prove it."

"I don't have to," Regulus snaps. "There's no need for me to prove I'm right. I'm just fucking right. Now, shut up and walk."

"I think you do have to prove it this time," James hedges. He knows he's pushing it, but—well, desperate times and all that. He raises his eyebrows. "This time, I think you're wrong."

That does the trick. Regulus' eyes light up. With fury, yes, but they do light up. James is taking his wins, at this point.

For the next twenty minutes at least, James dissolves into a long-winded bickering war with Regulus about his sense of direction, which James doesn't actually have a problem with in reality, but if there's one thing James has learned in the last decade, it's how to get on Regulus' nerves. Really, James takes great pride in the fact that no one annoys Regulus like him.

At one point, James has admittedly let Regulus' tirade fade into the background a bit, but that's not his fault, really. He can't be blamed for it. Regulus has a flush on his cheeks, and his eyes are brighter than they've been since the third night, and he's just—he's so beautiful. Even here, having gone four days without soap and a shower, only water to essentially have quick bird-baths with, still covered in dried blood and flipping his dagger carelessly, mindlessly through his fingers—even right here, like this, he is so fucking beautiful.

Frankly, James is having borderline inappropriate thoughts, which is how he comes to the conclusion that he is severely depleted of his need for affection. He feels like he's going to go insane if he doesn't get to touch someone the way his fingers itch to. Not even in a sexual way; he wants to just—bump shoulders with someone, or just sit with his thigh pressed to someone else's, and he'd probably collapse if someone just so happened to hug him right now. Fucking hell, he's touch starved. Literally starved for touch.

Holding onto Regulus at night honestly might be the only thing that's kept him sane so far, but he's overly aware that Regulus doesn't want to be touched, especially recently. There was, of course, all the gentle touches between them when they were using the salve, but that was in the aftermath of violence. There's so much violence, and James wants… Well, he wants affection for the sake of affection.

He wants Sirius, frankly. They're always affectionate, and have been since they were children. Regulus, less so, even when he was a child, though he sometimes let Sirius be his exception. Even when Regulus had a crush on him, he was never one to go out of his way to touch James; he let James touch him, even seemed to get flustered and pleased every time James did, but of course James took that for granted and didn't do it very often. By the time he started wanting to, it was already too late.

James wonders how many days, how many weeks, months, years Regulus went just hoping that James would touch him, and now James wants to do exactly that so badly that his hands fucking ache, only for Regulus to be perpetually out of reach, even when James could just reach out and touch him. It's not wanted, and that makes all the difference in the world.

"—just basic circumference, and the cave is the midpoint of the diameter," Regulus is ranting, utterly oblivious to how much James wants to hold him right now.

Blinking violently, James clears his throat and says, "Oh, yes, keep talking about math. There's absolutely nothing more attractive. You're a swot. If you tell me what the mitochondria is, I'm not sure I'll be able to restrain myself."

"The mitochondria is the powerhouse of the cell," Regulus mumbles, then frowns. "First of all, that's science; that's not even close to math. Second of all, I'm not a swot."

"You're absolutely a swot," James replies with a snort. "You've always been a little nerd, what are you on about? Don't think I've forgotten about your journals, all that writing you used to do, your obsession with sad boy poetry. Oh, I remember."

Regulus scowls at him. "Sad boy poetry? Fuck off."

"Baby Black and his little diaries with the flowers pressed in between the pages," James teases, helplessly fond. He's always found that unbearably cute, quite frankly. "You know, I'll bet you used to write about me, didn't you?"

Regulus scowls harder, his face growing even more red than it has so far, and he very aggressively does not answer.

James chokes on a stunned laugh. "Wait, actually? You did?"

"Fuck off, James," Regulus grinds out.

"No, shut up, that's adorable," James declares breathlessly, more delighted than he's been in days. "You had a crush on me and wrote about it in your journals. That is so… You cannot imagine how pleased I am by this. Go on, what did you write?"

"Why would I remember that?" Regulus grumbles. "Obviously I haven't written anything about you in the last ten years."

"No?" James asks, oddly disappointed, because even if Regulus was just writing about how much he hated him, then at least he'd still be writing about him. "Well, I mean…surely you've read your old journals, Regulus."

Arching an eyebrow, Regulus says, "No, I haven't, because I burned them."

"You—" James is inexplicably betrayed by this. "What, why?"

"Because, when you're a fifteen year old boy, that's what you do to get over your first—" Regulus halts, that sentence hanging there in the resounding silence after he snaps his mouth shut so hard his teeth clack together.

James raises his eyebrows. "First…?"

"Crush," Regulus fills in, and it's like pulling teeth. Actually, James is pretty sure that Regulus would much prefer to rip his teeth out one-by-one from the root than admit out loud that he used to have a crush on James. "When you're fifteen years old and getting over your first crush, you burn all the journals that have any shameful, incriminating evidence of said crush, so at least four years of journals are ash thanks to you."

"That's really… I don't know, love, that's a bit much, isn't it? Seems like it came from a place of passion, if you ask me."

"I didn't ask you."

"Well, I'm just saying," James murmurs, tipping his head to the side. "It's a shame about the journals, really. Maybe if you read them again, you'd remember what you liked about me."

"Oh, I never forgot," Regulus says. "I just grew to hate it."

James' lips twitch. "So, what did you like about me, then? What was it you grew to hate, Regulus?"

Regulus looks at him for a long moment, and James doesn't think he's going to answer at first, but then—shockingly—he whispers, "You made me feel."

"Feel what?" James asks, his heart racing.

This time, Regulus doesn't answer. He just turns and starts walking away, leaving James to stare after him as his mind struggles to figure out what exactly he made Regulus feel, and how he could possibly do it again.

Though, really, there's no point in trying. James knows how this ends, so every single moment that feels like something important, something special, can't go anywhere. James just finds himself lost in it over and over, compulsively seeking it out, because he can't help how he feels. To him, there's so much meaning in it, in all they get to have, in every interaction and stolen slices of time they have left together.

That's another thing James is learning. His love is a lot like survival. It just keeps going, no matter what. Survival is an ugly process, and here they are, still so hideously alive; much the same, James is still so hideously in love.

"No, really, feel what?" James insists, rushing to catch up to him, quite literally desperate to know.

Regulus continues to ignore him, clearly reaching his quota for sharing today. James knows he's not getting anything else out of him, not now, so he sighs and internally puts a pin in it. He will be returning to that later.

For now, the goal is to not alert Regulus to the fact that he's going back in the direction James originally wanted him to go in. Another twenty minutes of walking, and they'll reach the others. Honestly, James is eager to see Vanity, especially. He's been worrying about her during the cold nights. It'll be nice to see Peter, Irene, and Mathias, too.

He starts getting mildly nervous as they get closer, because he's just—assuming that they're there. For all he knows, they could have moved days ago. James has been gone since the morning of the second day. He's not entirely sure if the gamemakers would have just…left them alone, but at the same time, there was so much activity over the last few days with them and the death eaters that maybe the gamemakers didn't feel the need to bother with anyone else.

The viewers can only watch a few things at one time. The gamemakers wouldn't want to overwhelm them with too much too quickly. Sirius did mention that fact and how it might be used to their advantage, so James is hoping that the others are safe at the moment and still where he left them.

As they draw closer, James really hopes that's the case, because there's rustling in some bushes that makes him and Regulus both freeze. They both have their weapons raised and at the ready in an instant, always a little bit on edge now, just this persistent paranoia and preparation to fight.

Regulus is closest to the bushes, and he moves even closer in complete silence, his dagger held in his hand. The bushes rustle harder, and then a form comes bursting out of it, which Regulus responds to immediately. In seconds, he's sweeping whoever it is off their feet and crouching down to put his dagger to their throat, cutting off their sharp yelp.

"Peter?" James blinks, then brightens. "Peter!"

"James?" Peter asks, his voice shaking.

"Hey!" James says cheerfully, rushing over to beam down at him. There are discarded mounds of fur on either side of him that James is pretty sure he had in his hands; animals from traps, no doubt. "Oh, collecting food?"

Peter makes a quiet noise of pure terror. "Ah, yes."

"Alright?" James asks with a frown, and then it belatedly hits him that Regulus is still pinning him to the ground with a blade to his throat. James' eyes bulge, and he dives forward to quickly peel his wrist away. "Fuck's sake, Reg, it's just Peter."

"Thank you," Peter wheezes, shakily pushing himself up. He blinks at them, taking a deep breath as he reaches up to press his trembling fingers to his throat. "Um, nearly dying aside, it's brilliant to see you, James. We've been worried."

"I told you I'd be back," James informs him with a grin. He can't actually remember if he promised that or not, not anymore, because it feels like a lifetime ago now—but, well, it feels like something he would have said. "Is Irene and Mathias here? I sent them this way."

"Yeah, they're here," Peter confirms, nodding as he reaches out to gather what he dropped.

Abruptly, Regulus launches to his feet and stalks away without a word, making James stare after him. Peter blinks, then looks at James in visible confusion.

"Just, er, give us a second," James mumbles.

"Having a bit of a domestic?" Peter asks wryly.

James heaves a sigh. "You have no idea."

~•~

Regulus is going to kill James. Considering his current setting and situation, this isn't an idle threat. He hasn't heard a cannon in a while, and a part of him is itching for it, signaling that he's closer to the end. James being dead; one step closer.

Oh, Regulus is absolutely going to murder him. Just—just take out his dagger, put it to his throat, watch the way he gets that look in his eye every time. A gleam. A twinkle. That arrogant, self-assured confidence that Regulus could smother right out of him by sliding that blade slowly, so slowly, across his throat until blood bubbles up, and maybe James' breath would hitch, maybe he'd moan—

"Oh, I'm fucked up," Regulus mutters under his breath, utterly furious. Lovely, he's gone fully mental. So exposed to violence that it's even starting to blend with sex.

Growling under his breath, Regulus stomps further away into the forest, his whole body itching. He's angry, yes, and also reluctantly impressed that James managed to guide him here purely because he knows him so well, knows exactly what buttons to push. Oh, Regulus hates that he fell for it. James fucking swindled him into this. Manipulative prick.

Regulus comes to a halt, taking a deep breath before slowly releasing it, dagger in hand and ears straining as he listens for sounds of any possible approach. Reflexively, he glances up to scan the trees. He always thinks to look up now.

Evan is never there.

For a moment, Regulus lets his eyes drift shut. Things have been—difficult. He's been feeling like he's moving under water since Evan died, since James killed Mulciber. Fussing at James earlier sort of felt like…resurfacing for a bit, which he hadn't seen coming. He'd thought he was appreciative of how muffled everything had gotten, like it was all coming from a distance and he was left in a fugue state.

He's been on autopilot, but only in the sense that the plane has been crashing in slow motion. Shutting down, as it turns out, isn't quite the simplest thing to do when he's overly aware that doing so could kill him. It's like his survival instincts were at war with the feeling that he was already dead inside.

So, no, he wasn't expecting for it to feel—good to just…be, for a moment. Like coming up for air he desperately needed, even though he didn't even know he was hoping for it. Just hearing the sound of his own voice, the life in it, left him feeling less disoriented. Hearing James' voice, seeing his smile, feeling the warmth of his gaze… Well, strangely, it turned out to be the most comforting thing to happen to him in a while.

Which is a shame, because Regulus is going to kill James.

In a moment. Whenever he catches up.

Regulus doesn't doubt that James is going to follow him, even with his stupid allies within range. It's sort of nice being alone for a few minutes, though. He's been in such close quarters with James for the last few days with barely any breaks, and he hasn't been able to get away, even for a moment, at least not in situations that didn't involve running and fighting for his life. And that… That's been suffocating in its own way, which is bewildering, because how can James be both a breath of fresh air and the sensation of being smothered?

Regulus just—he just needs one moment.

He gets it.

For a longer than a moment, even longer than two, Regulus is left completely, entirely alone. At first, it's good. He breathes. He takes the time to just breathe, inhaling deep and exhaling slow. His mind is empty, wiped clean, and for a bit, he's completely calm. Just sort of existing, really.

And then Regulus looks around. He's careful about it, making no noise as he swivels in place, looking for something. It takes him an embarrassingly long moment to realize that no, he's not looking for something at all, but rather someone. James. Less than a minute without him, and he's searching for him.

There's a creeping sense of doubt crawling through him that maybe James isn't going to follow him. He's found his allies, hasn't he? Maybe he's done with all Regulus is indirectly (and sometimes directly), yet indisputably responsible for putting him through. Frankly, if Regulus could cut himself loose and get away, he would the first chance he got, all while saying good fucking riddance.

Swallowing, Regulus stands in place and feels ridiculously small. Like a lost child unsure how to find his way home. Fumbling in the dark, desperate for some light.

Then, like the living embodiment of the sun that he is, James breaks through the trees with his hatchet in hand and a wary, yet determined expression on his face. Regulus hears the tiny, quiet exhale of relief that escapes his own lips and hates himself for it.

James, of course, is clearly expecting an argument, but it's obvious from his demeanor that he's ready to put up a fight. Regulus, of course, is absolutely going to argue with him, just as soon as he shakes off the urge to go over and crawl into his arms and never, never leave them again.

Why is he having heart flutters now? James hasn't even done anything! He's just—there.

Yeah, Regulus is going to have to kill him.

"I'm going to kill you," Regulus announces.

"Listen—"

"No. Absolutely not."

"Just hear me out, yeah?" James says, his voice strained. He moves closer almost cautiously. "You remember when you said you would think about it?"

Regulus glares at him. "I haven't exactly had the time to do much thinking about it, have I?"

"No, maybe not, but you don't need to," James tells him. "Reg, they are secluded and safe. With them, we outnumber the last four death eaters, and maybe we can actually do something with that. The death eaters have a place to go back to, and they move in numbers, don't they? That's because it's smarter."

"Yes, and look where that's gotten them, James."

"Having numbers and a base claimed isn't the reason they've lost three already. We're the reason, so don't even try it."

"I know," Regulus murmurs, because he's very aware of what he and James have done. It's imprinted in his brain. "I just—"

"There's a steady source of water, and they've plenty of traps set up that actually catches things," James continues in a rush, shaking his head. "They've insulated the cave to be warmer, or so Pete says, and you can burn a fire in there without drawing attention. Irene and Mathias are fairly good fighters, and even Peter can throw a punch, so it's not like they're all helpless. I mean, even Vanity is willing to beat the piss out of someone if she has to. I've seen it. She really had a go at Peter when we first showed up here, you know. And—and they've survived here for days, Regulus. Days. So, we can, too."

"James—"

"And I know you're worried about the death eaters because they're no doubt looking for us, and they have weapons, but apparently the others are working on a way to get weapons for themselves as well, and I think we should help them."

"I don't trust them," Regulus snaps.

James hesitates, then heaves a sigh. "Alright, fine, you don't trust them. I'm not asking you to trust them. You trust me, don't you?"

"No," Regulus mutters.

"I—what? No?" James sputters incredulously. "You better be lying, Regulus Black. If you don't trust me after all we've been through and all we've done together, then—then—"

Regulus arches an eyebrow at him. "I don't trust you. I don't trust anyone. Better that way."

That's not true, whispers a sinister voice in his head, and it makes a lump form in his throat. It's right, because Regulus trusted Evan, and it got him killed. Regulus trusted him, and he's dead now. Gone. Regulus killed him. Regulus—

"Oh, for fuck's sake," James says, sounding exasperated. He reaches up and shoves his hand through his perpetually messy hair. "That's shit, and we both know it. But sure, fine, stick to whatever suits you. Clearly you don't need to trust people to tolerate them, considering you've been with me for the last few days, so just do the same thing with the others. They really do have a plan to get weapons, and they'll need help, so I think we should help them. The death eaters will be easier to stop if we have help, Regulus, and you can't deny it."

"I'm not denying it. I'm asking—and then what?" Regulus declares, raising his eyebrows at James, who falls silent. "Go on, James. What's next after that, hm? Say we do handle all the death eaters, and then it's just us and Juniper out there wherever she is. What do you expect to happen? Are we all just going to play as pacifists until…what?"

James doesn't say anything. He swallows, a strain around his eyes, and Regulus knows he's upset.

"Turning on each other isn't an isolated event only the death eaters know about," Regulus continues firmly, refusing to back down about this. Maybe it's harsh, but it's reality. "What do you think is going to happen when this little group is all that's left, especially if they have weapons?"

"They're not—"

"I know you think you're a good judge of character, James, but you're really not. You just see the best in people, and out here? That doesn't mean anything."

"Well, maybe you see the worst in people," James snaps, clearly agitated about this entire subject.

"And maybe that's necessary in a place where the worst is dragged out of people no matter how hard they fight it," Regulus replies calmly, gesturing around to encompass the entire arena as a whole. James gets his point. "I'm just—I need you to think about this, alright? Really, properly think about it. Best case scenario, we help them get weapons, and they help us deal with the death eaters; let's say, by some miracle, we all manage to survive. And then what? How long will it take before all water sources dry up and all the animals disappear, so we have no way to survive other than fight?"

James presses his lips into a thin line. "Regulus…"

"I know you hate it," Regulus says, his voice softening, because he can't help it. "I just need you to really think about this. Yes, maybe it's smart in some ways central to the present, but the future? It's a risk. A really big risk."

"I know that, alright? I do, but I just…" James heaves a sigh, his shoulders slumping. "Maybe it's my bleeding heart, but I care about them. I—I want to help them, and if they help us at the same time, then brilliant. Let's…compromise."

"Compromise," Regulus muses, raising both eyebrows.

"Yeah, you know, we meet halfway for a solution we both can feel comfortable with," James explains, as if Regulus might not know the meaning of the word. Regulus does, even if he's never actually done it. "My parents do it all the time."

Regulus purses his lips. "Yes, well, they're married, James."

"Well, in another life—"

"Don't."

James grins, his eyes sparkling. "You already know, so I don't even have to. So, compromise?"

"I'm not very good at compromising, I don't think."

"Have you ever even done it?"

"No."

"Why does that not surprise me?"

Regulus rolls his eyes. "Shut up. My solution is that we leave and keep moving."

"That's not even close to a compromise," James mumbles, looking baffled. "Regulus, that's not—no. Just…no. Look, how about this? We help them, yeah? They have some sort of plan, so I think it's worth it to at least see what it is. And, if they're willing to help with the death eaters, we let them do that, too. But we don't have to stay. Two days, max. That's it."

"And then what?" Regulus challenges, yet again. "Because, if we do that, they'll have weapons. Which means that they'll be a threat. You think just because they're your friends means they won't kill you? Because they will."

"No one's killing anyone," James says wearily.

"We're quite literally in an arena to do exactly that," Regulus reminds him, and it makes his chest go tight to see how tired James looks as soon as he's said it. "What are you going to do? I mean it, James, what are you going to do? What happens when one of them thinks to kill you because you don't want to fight them and they think you're an easy target?"

"They won't," James whispers.

"You say that, but you don't know," Regulus insists. "What will you do when it's just them remaining? Let them kill you?"

James looks away, his eyebrows furrowed.

A spike of sudden and visceral fear scrapes down Regulus' spine at the thought, and he doesn't know what he's going to say until the words are tumbling from his mouth, firm and sure, "I'll kill them if they try it. I'll kill them all before they ever got a chance to lay a hand on you."

James' gaze snaps to his, startlingly intense and full of wonder. There's surprise, too, but not as much as there should be, considering that Regulus is really fucking shocked by the announcement, as well as alarmed. Regulus' brain scrambles to make sense of that, but it can't, really. What an incredibly ridiculous and violent thing to say. He doesn't even know if he meant that, but he sure sounded like he did. Frankly, for a moment there, he'd sounded quite dangerous, actually.

James exhales an astonished laugh, reaching up to swipe his hand over his grin as he looks away, then down at his shoes. When he drops his hand, he's still grinning, and when he looks back up, his eyes are warm with delight. "Sure, love, whatever you say. Fine. There's our compromise, yeah? If anyone tries to kill me, you do whatever you need to do. Does that suffice?"

"I can work with that," Regulus admits.

"Brilliant," James chirps, clapping his hands together as he bounces on his toes. "In that case, let's go."

Regulus heaves a sigh, but he does, in fact, go.

Chapter End Notes

starting out with wolfstar!!! the discussion on sirius' dissociative amnesia was so, so important. like, remus knew about it, in a way, but he didn't know all there was to know about it overall, and it's obviously not something sirius shares with just anyone, so it was a big show of trust. sirius TRUSTS remus, and that's so, so special to me <3 also lmaoooo, not sirius getting offended because remus just assumed that he'd been with people before. remus obviously didn't mean it in a bad way, but sirius is touchy about these things for obvious reasons. he has some issues with sex/pleasure that are addressed later, i assure you. remus is so respectful, though. mr. "five years ago, i would have fucked him by now" being like: okay, we never have to do anything, don't even worry about it, babe, im just happy to be here 😭😭😭 an icon!!!

i better not see any pandora slander for interrupting them. sirius has work to do anyway, and he can't just stand around and make out with remus, as much as he might wish to.

don't worry, pandora redeems herself for interrupting later, plus she's so supportive, i love her to bits <3 and then jegulus...

well, they're clearly still struggling, but at least they're trying. or james is, at least, and he's sort of helping regulus do the same. it was nice to see them bickering again. lmaooooo james calling regulus a little nerd 😭😭😭 him and his "sad boy poetry" that's so mean, james STOP. he doesn't mean anything by it, he thinks it's adorable, but poor regulus wanted to sink into the ground and never resurface.

also "that's what you do when you're getting over your first—" no, no, finish what you were going to say, regulus. go on, we're listening 🎤🎤🎤 SPEAK YOUR TRUTH, BABE!!!

also² "you made me feel" and james being like 😳 OKAY BUT FEEL WHAT? FEEL WHAT REGULUS TELL ME??? GIVE ME THE CHEATSHEET I WANNA DO IT AGAIN!!! FEEL WHAAAAT??? 😩😩😩 this himbo, i love him so much. like, he's aware that it's pointless, and he's still like: please for the love of god just let me sweep you off your feet i am trying SO HARD.

oh, and james just being like HI PETE 😃 wait why are you freaking out rn? because regulus is pinning you to the ground with his dagger to your throat??? stop complaining, how does it feel to live my dream? LIKE HIS CONFUSION PLS 😭😭😭 he really did not even see the issue at first. he was like: consider yourself lucky, what i would not GIVE to be you rn but yes, jegulus has located the allies!!! we see more of them next chapter <3 not regulus threatening to kill them all if they so much as breathe near james wrong. he's such a good boyfriend. james was batting his eyelashes and twirling his hair, as he should. can't even blame him, i would do the same thing.

side note: all the mentions of evan is just. devastating. like, yeah, he's dead (rip, and sorry to all of those who are in denial, it's okay babes, you stay in denial, he's just sleeping) but his presence in the fic will remain, so it's like...double the damage 😭😭😭

anyway, let me do numbers:

tributes remaining: 11
tributes who have died thus far:
dylan
avery
quinn
evan mulciber
eight unnamed/unknown others

The Bridge

Chapter Notes

hello, hello!!!

warnings for this chapter:

-references to animal death (nothing explicit and for the whole arena thing)
-brief mention of preparing/cooking animals (very vague and not explicit at all, but still)
-references to implied child death (because of the whole arena thing) that's all, enjoy!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Regulus can see why the others have survived in this cave. It's very hard to find, and even with how observant he is, he doesn't spot it until James actually points it out. There's some foliage put in front of the entrance to disguise it further, which James informs him is new.

As soon as they enter, Vanity is scrambling to her feet and shrieking, "James! You're here, you're back!"

Regulus watches her launch herself forward to hug him, which he takes with a laugh as he hugs her back. They actually look like they're squeezing each other tight enough to hurt, but neither of them seem to mind. Vanity is comically shorter and smaller than James, but he pretends like she's about to knock him over, teasing her about being so strong. From the side, where he's boiling water, Peter watches with a soft smile.

Irene and Mathias also share fond chuckles, but they're handling food at the moment—or what will be food—so he doesn't look at them very much. He's seen enough blood and death to last him a lifetime, at this point.

"What's this? This is new," James says, reaching up to gently run his hand over the artfully twisted hair on top of Vanity's head.

"Mathias did it for me." Vanity beams up at him. "They did a really good job, didn't they? It looks nice like this."

"Yes, very pretty," James tells her with what Regulus knows is genuine sincerity.

"I was really worried about you," Vanity declares, then hits him on the arm. "I thought you weren't coming back."

James rubs his arm with a wince. "No, I was. I promise I was. I just had to, er…" He glances over at Regulus, then clears his throat and gives Vanity a lopsided smile. "Well, I had to find him and bring him back with me. Got a little sidetracked."

"Oh, right, Regulus," Vanity sing-songs, giving James a teasing look that makes him snort. She pokes him in the stomach, her eyes bright with laughter, and something about it—her youth and how sweet she is—makes Regulus ease up and calm down a bit, leaving him just slightly less on edge. "You had to go get your boyfriend."

Lovely. Even here, Regulus can't escape that assumption. At least no one is calling him lover boy. Though, at the thought, he feels his heart sink. Only one person ever called him that. He would walk around with that moniker printed on his forehead if it meant Evan was still alive to say it.

"Hey, Regulus?" Mathias calls eagerly, hopping to their feet to amble over with hope in their eyes. "Can I steal a dagger? Wait, that came out wrong. I mean, um. I just—I'm skinning the squirrel, and that's really difficult to do without anything sharp. I have—well, I have chipped stones, but a dagger would make it so much easier, and it'd be less messy, so if—if I could borrow a dagger—that's what I meant, borrow, not steal, obviously, because I will absolutely give it ba—"

"No," Regulus says, and Mathias snaps their mouth shut, their eyes wide. An uncomfortable silence settles in the cave, and Regulus sighs. "I'll just…help."

Mathias brightens instantly. "Brilliant. Come on, then. Irene is so good at it, but I absolutely hate this part. Actually puts me off eating, really, but…also I don't want to starve, so…"

Reluctantly, Regulus trails over to the side of the cave where Mathias leads him and Irene is already hard at work. He shoots James a narrow-eyed glare as he goes past, but James just grins at him. He mouths be nice, and Regulus flips him off, which makes James stifle a laugh before he focuses back on Vanity, eventually moving over to chat with Peter as well.

"Brought reinforcements, have you?" Irene asks with a grunt as Mathias and Regulus crouch down next to her.

"He has a dagger he's willing to use to help," Mathias says cheerfully.

Irene snorts. "Least he could do if he's showing up to eat with us." She raises her eyebrows when he scowls at her. "Don't look like that. You want food? Earn it. Looks to me like you have two daggers." She holds out her hand and holds his gaze without wavering. "No use in not letting someone else use the other one. The sooner we get this done, the sooner we eat."

"I'd rather starve," Regulus says stiffly.

"Prick," Irene declares bluntly.

Mathias coughs. "Okay! Let's just…get this done, yeah? You don't have to give up one of your weapons, Regulus, that's fine. We get it. I don't think I'd be eager to do that either. Thanks for helping, though. We appreciate it, don't we, Irene?"

Irene remains silent. Clearly, she doesn't appreciate it. They all dip into silence for a bit, though Regulus does help with his own dagger, because he's willing to do that, at the very least. Eventually, the silence is broken.

"Can I ask how you actually got them, though?" Mathias asks, glancing at him curiously. "The daggers, I mean. We know the river ices over at night, but the death eaters are always there, and you had them by the second day. If there's a way over—"

"There's not," Regulus murmurs, focusing on his hands and what they're doing. "Well, not a way that works, not really. I climbed over with—" He halts, his voice catching, and then he forces himself to keep going because Irene and Mathias both stop to stare at him, obviously picking up on the emotion in his voice. He clears it away by clearing his throat. "Rosier and I climbed a tree and used one of the limbs over the river to swing across. It was risky, but we managed it, except it didn't work so well on swinging our way back across. The branch broke and I got stuck on the other side. Don't recommend it."

"Noted," Mathias mumbles.

"And the, um—the spider?" Irene says, a shudder rippling through her body. Not a fan of spiders, clearly, and Regulus can safely say he's not either, after that. "How the fuck did you manage to survive that thing?"

Regulus sighs. "I let it chase me to the river, then tricked it into falling in."

"Oh, that's brilliant," Mathias says, gaping at him in disbelief, eyes wide with pure wonder. "That thing was terrifying."

"I've had nightmares about it literally every night," Irene grumbles, her face twisting, and she squirms a little bit before making a frustrated noise and dropping what's in her hands to frantically pat up and down her own arms.

Mathias leans over and whispers, "She's terrified of spiders."

"Yeah, I got that," Regulus replies.

"Shut up, Mathias. You're scared of the dark," Irene snaps, and Mathias begins sputtering immediately.

Regulus falls silent, listening to them bicker, strangely soothed by the sound. It reminds him of… Well, Sirius and himself, honestly, back when they were younger and they'd get into arguments over the smallest things. They used to fight like cats and dogs, and Regulus finds himself missing it, oddly enough. Clearly, Irene and Mathias have that same sort of dynamic, and Mathias effortlessly falls into the younger sibling role, because they are younger, while Irene fits right into the older sibling role with ease.

Over in the corner, James is still with Peter and Vanity, which Regulus accidentally keeps an eye on. He doesn't mean to, if he's honest, but his eyes keep flicking over to them, watching James laugh and look more relaxed than he has in days. He's always shined in social situations, always the type of person to feed off the energy around him, rather than be drained by it. Regulus is on the completely opposite end of the spectrum in that regard, and he always has been. There's genuinely nothing more exhausting than a group of people, in his opinion.

"Hey, can you help me strip this, since you won't give up your dagger?" Irene asks, drawing his attention again.

"Fine," Regulus murmurs with no heat to his tone, because there wasn't any in hers. He may not like her, but he has no interest in provoking her. He helps her without a word.

James comes over at one point to crouch down behind him and start digging around in the bag, saying, "I'm taking the water canister to fill up, that way we can all share instead of repeatedly boiling water over and over. Clears up the fire to use for the food, too."

Regulus doesn't respond, but he doesn't protest, and when James leaves, Irene mutters, "Oh, so he's welcome to borrow your things." He glares at her, and she flashes him a broad smile. "Can't say I blame you, Regulus. I'd let him take whatever he wanted from me, too."

"Irene," Mathias says with a sigh.

"What?" Irene asks, laughing. "I would."

Mathias rolls their eyes, then gives Regulus a playful smile as they shake their head. "Please don't kill her in her sleep. I know she doesn't make it obvious, but she's actually a good person." They bust out laughing when Irene immediately swats them over the head. "Oi, watch the hair! If you get blood in my hair, Irene, I swear I'll—"

"What? You'll what, Mathias? Hm?" Irene cackles and proceeds to dive forward with both hands outstretched, trying to press her fingers into Mathias' hair while they yelp and scramble backwards, laughing along with her.

It sort of feels like stepping into an entirely different world, one he wouldn't haven't felt out of place in only a few days ago, at least not the way he does now. Where the sight of blood doesn't make him picture Avery's gushing throat, or Evan's bloodstained fingers, or Mulciber's chest split open. Where loud shrieks don't make him tense up instinctively, thinking of the scream James released when he was caught in a bear trap, or the sound of Mulciber screeching when Regulus chopped his hand off. Where a joke about murder is just a joke, and not a very real possibility that Regulus has to just—live with.

Irene and Mathias do eventually stop playing around, and they finish up with Regulus' help, so the food is ready to cook. The three of them go over to join the other three. Vanity is telling James how she managed to keep from freezing to death every night as the smallest person in the cave.

Not just the help from the fire, or even the body heat from Irene and Mathias crowding her, but she apparently found a colony of fiendfyre ants. They're Hallow-made and quite deadly if you get bit by too many of them, apparently. But she discovered some in the forest and managed to capture them, which she crushed up and boiled into water, then took sips of through the night in very small, concentrated amounts to raise her core temperature. It has made her vomit and given her a rash (which she excitedly shows James by rolling up her sleeves), but it's what keeps her alive.

She's absolutely fascinated by the ants, of course, and James tries to hide his horror for what she's resorted to, but Regulus can see it anyway. Even Peter, Irene, and Mathias—who are all aware of this already—seem uncomfortable about the whole ordeal. Regulus thinks that it's smart, on an intellectual level, but on a human level, it's fucking awful. She's fifteen. She should not have to risk drinking lethal ant juice just so she won't freeze to death.

"We have a blanket," Regulus announces rather abruptly, completely interrupting Vanity mid-conversation. Everyone goes silent and stares at him. "You can use it."

Vanity blinks at him. "But I have my ant juice."

"You're using the blanket," Peter declares firmly, pointing at her and raising his eyebrows. "No more ant juice."

"But—"

"No."

"Peter," Vanity mumbles, "it's so cool, though. The way the venom affects the—"

Peter waves his hand through the air, looking exasperated. "No, no more ant juice. No more talking about ant juice. Regulus is kind enough to let you use the blanket, so you're going to use the blanket. James, tell her."

"It's a very nice blanket," James confirms, his voice soft. When Regulus glances at him, James is looking right at him, a tender smile on his face that Regulus quickly looks away from, feeling awkward and undeserving as always. "It'll keep you warm enough to make it through the night."

Vanity huffs. "But my ant juice was—"

"No more ant juice," Peter, Irene, and Mathias all announce at the same time, which makes Vanity scowl. Peter huffs out a weak laugh and shakes his head. "It's the blanket from here on out, alright? Say thank you to Regulus."

"I'm not five," Vanity snaps. "Fuck off. I'll drink my ant juice if I want to drink my ant juice."

"At least until too much erodes your internal organs to the point that they begin to shut down one-by-one in a slow, agonizing death," Regulus says, and Vanity blinks at him again, her lips tipping down. "But sure, drink your ant juice if you want to. I'll keep my blanket."

There's a long beat of silence.

"No, I'll—I'll use the blanket," Vanity mumbles. "Thanks."

Regulus just hums in vague affirmative and goes back to lazily flipping his dagger through his hands, entertaining himself with that rather than joining the conversations, save for that one moment. It takes a while for the talking to start back up again, but eventually, it does.

It's about mid-day, so they have quite a few more hours left in the day before it starts to get cold. The inside of the cave is obviously a sanctuary, and the others have made it as safe and comfortable as possible. They've put down padding from leaves and vines to sleep on, and they've stuck up leaves and mud to close any crack where wind can get in, also insulating the walls much the same way. Not the back portion of the wall where water trickles down, though.

Regulus can begrudgingly admit that it's a good show of survival on their parts. They're safe, secluded, and as warm as they can get.

The food from the traps today is apparently the most they've had so far. James has a bundle of berries in the bowl they got from Evan's bag, which he passes out and shares between everyone without hesitation. Regulus shakes his head when James offers him some, settling for his portion of the cooked meat, since it's more than enough.

It strikes him then that he didn't stop to think of getting Evan's supplies off his body, or even picking up Quinn's spear. From a survival standpoint, it's a huge oversight and moment of stupidity; but, again, from a human standpoint, the thought of actually doing that makes him uncomfortable. It's sort of nice to realize it, that their humanity hasn't escaped into the void the games seem so desperate to open up in all of them.

"So," Peter declares in the middle of the meal, "I was thinking we head out after we're all finished up. Regulus, you've been across the river, Irene and Mathias said; do they have food over there at all?"

"In the supplies, no doubt," Regulus says. "Mine came with dried meat and a granola bar. I haven't been back to take a proper look, but I'll bet the death eaters have all the food in one place for easy access. They also probably have what food their sponsors sent them."

"I would love something sweet right now," Mathias tells them with a wistful sigh. "Like, I dunno, cake."

"Yes!" James bursts out, utterly delighted. "You read my mind, Mathias. I've been thinking about cake since last night."

"Sweet, sweet icing," Mathias says dreamily.

"Soft, fluffy cake," James agrees.

"It would be in layers, of course," Mathias continues. "Like, at least four layers, and each layer—"

"—is a different flavor," James finishes for them, then proceeds to let out a truly indecent moan. "Oh, that sounds so good. I'm going to fucking cry."

"Please stop talking about cake," Vanity says mournfully, frowning at her meat. "It's making me sad."

"Right, no more cake talk. I don't even like cake, and I want cake right now," Peter mumbles with a sigh. "So, I vote we get weapons, then rob the death eaters of all their food."

"Everyone in favor," Irene declares, then puts her hand up. Mathias and Peter immediately join her, which prompts Vanity and James to do the same.

They all look at Regulus, and he sighs. "Sure, but how do you plan to do that, exactly?"

"The bridge," Mathias informs him. Regulus just stares at them. "We've been building a bridge to get across the river."

"As soon as it touches the water, whatever is in that river is going to pull it under," Regulus says.

Peter bobs his head. "Yeah, we thought of that, so that's why we made a raised bridge. The ends of it go up like ramps. It's quite big, so it's outside, but three people can carry it."

"We can't go across at night because the death eaters are there, but we're barely surviving without supplies and weapons," Irene adds. "They're away during the day, so it's our best option."

"And if they come across us on our way there?" Regulus asks.

"Well, that's where you and James come in," Vanity says, and she smiles sweetly when Regulus arches an eyebrow at her. James pauses mid-bite, staring at her with wide eyes. "You two have weapons, so obviously you two are the muscle."

"Such good muscle, too," Irene muses, grinning at James, who inhales his bite and proceeds to choke on it. Regulus rolls his eyes so hard that he nearly catches a glimpse of his own brain.

"We're joking," Vanity tells them with a giggle. "Obviously we've thought of this. Actually, Peter thought of this."

"That I did," Peter confirms, reaching over to pound on James' back and offer him water. James takes it with a weak thumbs-up. "So, the plan is to set a sequence of large fires to draw them away and keep them from the cave for long enough that everyone else can get in and out before they even knew we were there. Well, they'll find out, but we'll be long gone by then."

Regulus narrows his eyes. "Who's setting the fires?"

"That would be me," Peter says, taking a deep breath. He grimaces slightly. "It was my plan, so I should…do it, I suppose. I've gone out with Irene to set them all up already, so all I have to do is light them and run."

James looks at Regulus expectantly, and it's very fucking annoying that Regulus immediately knows what he wants. With a sigh, Regulus mutters, "I have matches you can use. Only six left, so don't waste any."

James beams at him.

"Oh, that would be helpful, thank you," Peter tells him with a broad grin. "It'll give me more time to run, that's for sure."

"You know, Pete," James starts, "if you don't want to—"

"Shut up, James," Regulus cuts in, glaring at him, and James shuts up. He clearly isn't happy about it, but he does.

Peter looks a bit disappointed that he's not getting out of this, but he still says, "No, it'll be fine. I'm sure it'll be fine."

"Yeah, it'll be fine," James agrees, like he can make it so if he simply believes it enough.

He should know that doesn't work by now.

~•~

James has to admit, the bridge is a bit of engineering genius. It's long, thin branches weaved together and stacked on top of each other with two ramps off the ends that will keep the wood raised above the water. Mathias did most of the work with help from the others, and it took them two days.

The agreement they all came to whilst carting the bridge through the woods was that Regulus and James would rotate out on carrying the bridge with the others so that one of them is ready with a weapon at all times, and the other three would rotate out whenever they got tired. James takes the first shift with Vanity and Irene, while Regulus and Mathias walk behind them, talking. Well, Mathias is doing most of the talking, but Regulus doesn't mind because he hasn't told them to shut up yet, and James knows he would if he did mind.

Peter has already gone off to reach the first fire point, and James would be lying if he said he wasn't worried about him. His stomach is cramping with anxiety. He really had wanted to offer to go in his place, but Regulus was quite clear about not allowing that, and James…gets why. He could practically hear Sirius screeching in his head, don't you fucking dare, James; take that hero-complex I gave you and shove it.

So, James didn't push the matter, for once. One of the main reasons other than the fact that he feels compelled to listen to the Sirius living in his head and also the Regulus right in front of him is that he doesn't fancy letting Regulus out of his sight.

"Come on, Vanity, take a break," Mathias calls softly, keeping their voice low.

"It's really not that heavy," Vanity mumbles, but she dutifully lets go when Mathias comes up to take over.

"Speak for yourself," Irene complains.

Regulus practically appears at James' shoulder. He doesn't even say anything; he just slides his daggers away and pokes at James' hand to indicate that he should let go. James' lips twitch against his will, and he's so helplessly fond. They swap places without a word, and James falls back with Vanity.

"I'm really upset about my ant juice," Vanity tells him. James is also really upset about her ant juice, but for an entirely different reason than her, so he keeps this to himself. "Not that I'm not grateful for your boyfriend offering your little love blanket; I am, I'm grateful, but—"

"Our little love blanket," James repeats, blinking rapidly.

Vanity holds her hands up in surrender. "Look, I'm not judging, alright? Just don't tell me the details so I don't have to think about it when I use it. Desperate times and all that."

"I—" James stares at her in bewilderment. "Vanity, there are no details. We used it to stay warm."

"Sure, James," Vanity says, her eyes bright with humor.

Chuckling, James shakes his head. "You're a menace."

"I think it's cute, really," Vanity muses thoughtfully, her lips curled up. "You and Regulus, I mean. In a very 'opposites attract, borderline doesn't make sense, but somehow makes so much sense' sort of way. Oh, and the 'best friend's brother, secret history, forbidden love' way also."

"Thank…you?" James says.

Vanity hums. "I read a lot of romance novels. I'm still waiting for my prince to come save me, you know."

"Oh, is that so?" James teases. "Have anyone in mind?"

"No," Vanity mumbles, but he can tell she's lying instantly because she ducks her head and kicks at the ground.

James snorts. "Yeah, you do. Go on, I won't tell anyone."

"Promise?"

"I'll take it to my grave."

"He doesn't know," Vanity whispers, reaching up under her sleeve to scratch at her rash distractedly, chewing on her lip nervously. "I, um. Well, you know Hodge…?"

"Hodge?" James asks weakly, his heart sinking. "The one who was reaped with you? That Hodge?"

Please don't let it be that Hodge, James thinks, but of course Vanity sighs and says, "Yeah, that Hodge. We're friends. Sort of. I mean, we're in some of the same classes because we're only a few months apart. He—he actually turns fifteen tomorrow. Maybe Marlene can convince one of the sponsors to send him something, like a treat, at least."

"Maybe," James says softly, his heart clenching. He doesn't know what else to say.

"But anyway, I get it," Vanity murmurs, gesturing between James and Regulus. "Well, sort of. I mean, only a bit. We didn't grow up together or anything, but he was always nice to me in school when we did talk. I didn't really have a crush on him until we got here, though. He's just been really, really kind to me. He found me crying once and sat down to talk to me, and I just—I know it's stupid, but I was thinking about how I've never even had my first kiss, and I probably never will. Then I thought it would have been nice if he was my first kiss, but that's never going to happen either."

James swallows thickly, stricken by how utterly devastating that is. She's never even had her first kiss. Fuck. "I'm sorry, Vanity. That's—that's really awful. I'm so sorry."

"You've kissed people, right?" Vanity asks.

"Er, yes," James admits.

Vanity frowns at him. "Am I missing anything?"

"Absolutely nothing," James replies immediately, sending a mental apology to everyone he's ever kissed, especially Ravi. They were a brilliant kisser. If they're watching, James hopes they understand why he's saying this. "It's mostly just—wet."

"Wet," Vanity repeats in disgust, her face scrunching.

James bobs his head. "Pretty much. Trust me, you're not missing out on anything."

"What about love?" Vanity says, blinking at him.

"Um," James replies awkwardly. He briefly wonders how he ended up in this situation and imagines that Sirius must be in stitches right about now. Clearing his throat, he proceeds to lie like his life depends on it. "You know, you're not really missing anything there either."

Vanity arches an eyebrow. "That's bullshit."

"No, really, it's—it's not even that…great." James struggles not to cringe. This goes against everything he is as a person, but to comfort her, he will do what needs to be done. "It's not like the books, you know? Most of the time, it's just…pain."

"Pain," Vanity repeats, frowning.

"Yeah," James murmurs, his gaze trailing helplessly towards Regulus. A lump forms in his throat. "Most of the time, it just hurts. When you think it can't hurt anymore than it already does, it'll find new ways to hurt worse."

"So…why?" Vanity mutters, sounding baffled, and she doesn't elaborate, but she doesn't have to. Why is everyone so obsessed with love? Why does everyone crave love? If it hurts so fucking much, why love at all?

James stares like a lovesick idiot at Regulus ahead of him as he sighs and softly says, "Well, that's the thing, Vanity. It's not exactly something you can escape. Once it's there, it takes a lot for it to leave, and sometimes it never does. Love's a lot like a disease that way."

"And sex?" Vanity asks.

"I—what?" James whips his head over to her, immediately startled out of his woes.

Vanity raises her eyebrows. "What about sex?"

"And you're done," James declares, reaching out to bonk her gently on the top of her head with the flat part of his hatchet. "No more questions out of you."

"Again, I am fifteen, not five," Vanity grumbles, swatting at his hand. "I'm just saying—"

"And I'm just saying no," James cuts in. "Here, hold my hatchet. Feel cool. Ooh, look, something shiny."

"That's not—" Vanity halts suddenly, distracted by something off to the side, for which James is grateful for at first, but then she turns and wanders away.

"Vanity? Vanity," James hisses, tossing up his free hand before huffing and following after her. She's not going far, at least, just up to a tree a few feet away. When he catches up, she's crouching down in front of it. "Hey, don't just wander off like that, yeah? We need to stay behind the others. Let's—"

"Shut up, look at this," Vanity says excitedly, sounding thrilled in the only way she does about bugs. She lifts her hand to wave him over insistently. "James, look."

James clicks his tongue, but he moves over to crouch down beside her, blinking at the bug that's crawling slowly along the bark of the tree. It looks like some sort of bee, but really big; there's a bright bulb on the end of its body that shimmers in the pouch, like it would spill out in a neon pool of green glitter if it was busted. Hallow-made, he's guessing.

James tilts his head. "What's that?"

"Horcrux Hornet," Vanity breathes out, giddy. She reaches out and clamps down on James' arm. "Hallow-made. They're so cool, James. They're basically indestructible, and their venom replenishes at an unnaturally rapid rate. I have to get it."

"I feel like you do not have to do that," James says. "An immortal bug sounds like bad news, Vanity."

"Oh, yeah, it's lethal," Vanity agrees. "One sting causes excruciating pain, but death comes quickly. Less than a minute."

"Right. We're going," James announces, reaching for her arm.

"No, no, it's okay," Vanity protests eagerly. "I promise it's okay, James. Horcrux Hornets only respond to fear. They won't attack unless you're scared. So, you know, don't be scared, alright? They're harmless as long as you're not afraid, really."

"I just found out one sting will kill me, so you could say I'm a bit scared," James mutters.

Vanity huffs. "Then back up. I've got this." She shakes her head and reaches out carefully, cupping her hand in front of the Horcrux Hornet without hesitation. "Imagine being a grown man afraid of bugs. You're embarrassing."

"I—you know what?" James sputters, offended. "First of all, being afraid of bugs that can kill you is perfectly valid. Second, why do you even want the damn thing?"

"Because we can use its venom, obviously," Vanity murmurs, gently reaching out to nudge the bottom of the Horcrux Hornet, encouraging it to crawl into her palm. "They're really lazy creatures. Don't like flying much, because their wings are so sensitive that it hurts them every time they do it, but they will if they're trying to sting you. Fiendfyre ants are their only predator; that's the one thing that can kill them, because they essentially burn up from the inside out if they're bitten by them. But anything else? Doesn't work. Cut them in half, and they'll just grow back. Squash them, and they'll just reform. It's fascinating, don't you think?"

James grimaces. "Sure. Fascinating."

"Are you afraid? I'll stay back if you're afraid," Vanity says as she slowly stands up, holding the Horcrux Hornet to her chest like it's precious.

"I'm not not afraid," James says. She arches an eyebrow at him, and he cracks a weak smile. "I'm wary, mostly."

"Better to be safe than sorry," Vanity murmurs, holding her palm up. "Oh, she looks tired. She must have flown recently."

"She?" James asks.

Vanity hums. "Yeah, you can tell because her pouch is bigger. The males have smaller ones. What should I name her?"

"Um, Vanity, maybe you shouldn't—"

"What about Vespa? A little on the nose, but…"

"Vespa?" James asks.

"Because she's a hornet," Vanity says, looking up at him. When he continues to look confused, she rolls her eyes. "I am so disappointed right now. Vespa, James. It's the scientific name for hornets. How can you not know this?"

James opens his mouth, closes it, then shrugs helplessly and mumbles, "Sorry? Vespa is a great name. Really…suits her."

"It does, doesn't it?" Vanity agrees, giggling. She proceeds to lift her hand and gently dump the—Vespa on her shoulder, looking pleased. "There you go, darling. You ride right there, Vespa, take a little nap. Alright, James, let's go."

"Right," James mutters, shaking his head in a mixture of disbelief and wonder. Mere moments later, they're back on the path, catching up with the others.

"I want to tell Regulus about this," Vanity says, looking fucking ecstatic. "I bet he'll be willing to dip his daggers in Vespa's venom. If it's ingested or it hits the bloodstream, it's over. I know he won't be scared."

"I'm never living that down, am I?"

"Never."

James shakes his head with a small, fond smile as Vanity grins at him before rushing over to essentially shove Irene away from where she's holding onto the bridge so she can start chattering excitedly to Regulus, who blinks in surprise but nonetheless pays attention. Irene falls back with James.

"You let her get a bug?" Irene asks flatly. "A lethal bug?"

"I did try to stop her," James admits wearily. "You know how she gets about bugs, Irene. It should be fine, I suppose, as long as we don't get scared."

Irene snorts. "Oh, right, because we're not in an arena specifically driven to put us in terrifying situations or anything, not at all."

James winces. "You may have a point."

"How do we get it away from her?"

"Don't be afraid of it."

"Failed step one," Irene mutters. "Can we kill it?"

"It's basically indestructible," James says.

"Lovely." Irene heaves a sigh and crosses her arms, shaking her head slowly. "Yeah, alright. Let's just…hope for the best. Maybe you can convince Regulus to get it away from her later. He doesn't look afraid of it, and I do not want that thing in the cave with us tonight. It'll break her heart, but…"

"An unfortunate, but necessary evil," James can't help but agree. One nightmare, and Vespa will be on the attack. "I'll talk to Regulus, but I can't guarantee anything. He only does what he's willing to do."

Irene hums, leaning over to bump their shoulders together with a playful smile. "I don't know. I think if anyone has a chance of convincing him, it's you."

"You are severely misinformed," James says with a snort, and then he clears his throat. "Um, Irene?"

"Yeah?"

"I just—I wanted to apologize if I hurt your feelings. In my interview, I mean. I—I didn't mean anything by it, you know. You're a lovely woman, but I—"

"Oh, that?" Irene blinks at him, then chuckles, waving her hand like she's swatting a fly. "No, you're fine. Don't think anything of it. I just wanted to fuck, really."

James blinks. "Oh."

"Well, you know, possible death and all…" Irene shrugs. "I wanted to feel good before all of this, and you are a very, very beautiful man. I assumed we'd have fun together."

"I'm sure we would have," James teases, unable to help it, and Irene grins at him. "Sorry you didn't get to have your fun."

"Are you joking? I absolutely had my fun," Irene informs him with a snort. She waggles her eyebrows at him. "Let me tell you, Dylan and Peter are very thorough lovers."

"What?" James gasps, eyes bulging. "You and—wait. Wait, at the—did you—all of you at the —"

Irene's grin is downright filthy. "Yeah, we did. All three at the same time. That's how I spent my last night, and I have no regrets. Shame about Dylan, you know. He was… Well, the fact that he was good in bed isn't as important as the fact that he was a good person, but he was good in bed."

"I have so many questions," James admits. "I mean, how did the three of you even…?"

"Well, there are a lot of different positions if you—"

"No! No, I mean, how did you three meet up?"

"Oh, I snuck them into my suite," Irene says, waving her hand carelessly again. "Mathias helped, because they're brilliant. They distracted Frank, our mentor. Suppose he's finding out now." She glances around with a grin. "Sorry, Frank."

"Right, but you just—decided to have sex?" James asks, his eyebrows furrowed. "Like, um, did it—did it mean anything?"

"No, of course not," Irene says. "I mean, it was lovely, don't get me wrong, but it was more… Well, it's just that we all knew we might die, so we might as well enjoy ourselves before, yeah? Sex doesn't have to mean anything, James. Not for everyone."

James feels his shoulders slump. "Right."

"Oh. Oh," Irene breathes out, and her eyes are wide when he glances over at her. "James, did you and Regulus have sex on your last night?"

"What? No," James blurts out quickly, immediately getting anxious, because it's not technically a lie (the parting gift took place the morning after), but it's close enough to one that he's absolutely freaking out already. "No, of course not."

Irene squints at him, looking bizarrely like she can see the inside of his brain. "But you were with him the last night, yes?"

"I—" James scrambles for a way to not respond to this, trying to think up a proper lie, genuinely sweating at this point. It's too late, though. Irene's face clears, and she knows, so of course James immediately caves. "It wasn't like that, alright? We just sort of…slept together. Not sexually, obviously. We, um. We…"

"Snuggled?" Irene teases.

"I mean, a bit," James mumbles, ruffling his hair and feeling ridiculously flustered just from the memory. It's so different from holding Regulus every night here, because he knows that comes from a place of necessity. But that night? Regulus did that on his own, because he wanted to.

"Wow." Irene shakes her head. "I genuinely can't even picture Regulus snuggling someone. James, you have to tell me and all the people at home. This is crucial information. Was he the big spoon or the little spoon?"

James tucks his lips in and mimes zipping them.

Irene groans and nudges him playfully, and they both laugh as they sway back and forth. "You're no fun."

"Stop fishing for details," James says. "He'd hate me if I said anything. Well, he already hates me, but he'd hate me more."

"I don't think he hates you at all," Irene replies.

James sighs. "No, he does. It's—I mean, I suppose it's not a secret now, really, but he definitely does."

"Mm, no," Irene says simply. "I think he likes you, actually. In fact, I'm quite sure he fancies you as much as you fancy him. Trust me, this isn't an unrequited love situation."

"No, but it is, though," James mumbles mournfully.

Irene smiles at him. "Really? Because he's looked back at us at least five times, and the poor thing is so jealous he can barely walk straight. I just know he's imagining slipping his dagger between my ribs right now. It's sort of funny, if I'm honest."

"What, really?" James blurts out, his head snapping up to look at Regulus, who isn't looking back at all. He's in the middle of talking to Mathias. "Irene, you lied. That's mean."

"Look at his hands," Irene whispers, moving closer and slipping her arm through James'. "He's gripping the bridge so tight it's like he's trying to break it. Wait for him to look back again and watch how pissed he gets that I'm touching you."

James can see that she's not lying about Regulus' hands. He's holding onto the bridge so hard that his knuckles are white, entirely bloodless. Still, "I really don't think he cares."

"Fancy a wager?" Irene asks.

"Terms?"

"I bet Regulus will turn and see us like this, then call you to carry the bridge to keep you away from me. If he doesn't, I'll be the one to tell Vanity she has to get rid of Vespa. If he does, it's on you to break her heart."

"Oh, he's definitely not going to do that," James tells her with a snort. "You're on."

Irene chuckles and sort of snuggles closer to him, leaning her head over on his shoulder. "We shall see. In the meantime, do you want to hear about how talented Peter's mouth is?"

"You know, actually, I really do," James murmurs. "It would keep me from worrying about him."

"Hey," Irene says softly, squeezing his arm, "I'm worried, too, but Peter is smart. He has a thirst to survive. He'll be fine."

"Yeah, but surviving is hard out here," James whispers.

"I know," Irene whispers back. They fall into heavy silence, strolling along together, and it's actually really nice to have her leaning against his side like this. Just a point of contact shared between friends, but that doesn't make it less comforting. James is much less touch-starved now. "Okay, here it comes. Regulus is about to look."

"How can you tell?" James asks, baffled.

"He's flexing his fingers, and it's been about forty-five seconds since he looked the last time," Irene explains.

James snorts. "You timed him?"

"What can I say? It's fun pissing him off. If he didn't dislike me so much, I would have tried to fuck him, too. You and him both. Oh, that would have been fun," Irene announces with a wistful sigh.

"Yeah, no, that would have never worked."

"Because he's jealous?"

"Because I am," James corrects.

Irene makes a quiet huh sound, like she's mildly surprised, but also not at the same time. "You know, I can see that for you. Well, at least you're both well-suited for one another." She hums and presses closer. "Here it comes."

Sure enough, Regulus glances back, just like Irene said he would. He's glaring, but he's always glaring, generally. James can't tell if he's jealous or not. Frankly, Regulus would have absolutely no reason to be jealous, because James genuinely forgets other people exist when he's around, and honestly? James has spent the last ten years rather stuck on him, so that's certainly not going to change now, and Regulus knows that, so there's no way he's—

"James," Regulus calls, coming to a screeching halt so sharply that he actually yanks on the bridge and makes Mathias and Vanity stumble a bit. "Stop fucking around. Swap. Now."

"Told you," Irene mutters under her breath.

"I'll be damned," James breathes out, astonished.

"Didn't I say?"

"You did. You absolutely did say."

"Never doubt me again."

"Right, but—I mean, maybe he's not jealous. Maybe—"

"James," Regulus snaps.

Irene stifles a laugh. "Oh, he's seething with it, just look at him. I almost feel bad for him. Almost. I bet if I kissed you on the cheek right now, his head would explode."

"I'm not taking that bet," James says.

"Because I'm right about him being jealous?"

"Because I'm not risking his head exploding. I'm rather fond of his head being firmly attached to his body."

"If that's the case, you might want to go swap with him. I can practically see the steam coming out of his ears," Irene tells him, sounding thoroughly entertained.

James clears his throat. "Right, yeah, I'll just—"

"Remember, you have to tell Vanity," Irene reminds him as he pulls away. "That was the deal."

"Lovely," James mutters with a grimace, but he dutifully nods before he starts over to the bridge.

Regulus doesn't even speak to him. He just continues to glare at him before snatching out his daggers and moving over to walk with Irene. James joins Vanity and Mathias in carrying the bridge. Every time he glances back, Regulus is flexing his fingers around the handles of his daggers like he wants to use them, and Irene is grinning like she knows it.

James huffs out an amazed laugh and keeps walking.

~•~

Regulus isn't entirely sure if the bridge is going to work. Not that it isn't well-crafted, because it is. It's sturdy, despite the fact that it's not very wide, just enough for a single file line of people to walk across and that's it. That's not the problem.

The problem, Regulus fears, is that it might not be long enough. The river isn't too wide, just about the length of three grown men lying down, stacked head to feet. That alone is going to make the bridge difficult to get over the water, but if it falls short, then all of this is for nothing and Peter is out there risking his life for no reason.

When they get to the field they all started in five days ago, Regulus knows they're a little behind schedule. Peter's already lit the first fire, the smoke from it visible in the sky. The second isn't going yet, so they're not too far behind, but it definitely makes them pick up the pace.

"Alright, we have to do this carefully," Mathias says when they reach the edge of the river. They've stood up the bridge with James on the other side, holding it in place. It's quite tall, which is promising. "James, we're going to lower it slowly, as far as we can get. Don't drop it, or the ramp on the other side might break. Ready?"

"Ready," James assures them, nodding.

"Steady now," Mathias murmurs, grunting as they begin to let it slowly sink through the air.

It's a bit of an awkward process, like tipping over something very tall and trying to ensure it falls in slow motion. It involves a lot of balance and strength, but it's a two-person job, so no one can help them. Regulus can only stand back and stare at the veins on James' forearms, lightly covered in dark hair, and the bulging muscles from where he's straining. Why did he roll his sleeves up? Roll them down, for fuck's sake, Regulus thinks almost desperately, unable to rip his gaze away.

There's one moment where it seems like the bridge isn't going to make it all the way across, but then Mathias and James lift and push, and the bridge hits with a quiet thud. It rattles a bit, but it's there, just like that. Raised up above the water, a clear platform for them to walk across. No hands lift from the crimson river, but they all seem to be waiting for it.

Nothing happens.

"Brilliant," James declares cheerfully.

"We still have to get across," Mathias points out. They take a deep breath and set their shoulders. "Right, well, this was my idea, so I'll—I'll go first."

"Mathias," Irene says warily, stepping forward. "Why don't I go first, yeah? Just—just let me."

Mathias gives her a tiny smile, then shakes their head. "It's fine, Irene. I believe in my bridge. Wait for me to get all the way across before you follow, and come one at a time. No need to test weight restrictions. Vanity after me, if this works."

With that, Mathias turns and proceeds to start up the bridge, one careful step after the other. They're brave, that much is obvious, because they don't falter even on the way over the water. Everyone seems to hold their breath, but no pale hands raise up, and Mathias makes it safely across.

Regulus is inordinately relieved that it worked.

"Alright, Vanity," Irene murmurs, waving her over. "Careful now. Don't look down and don't stop."

Vanity reaches up to gently cradle Vespa, then starts her way across as well. She's brave, too, and she must not feel an ounce of fear, because Vespa doesn't sting her. She makes it across and whips around to grin at them, clearly pleased. She high-fives Mathias, who is also visibly pleased.

"Come on, Irene," Mathias calls.

"Time to see how the other side lives," Irene teases, then salutes James and Regulus with a wink before making her way over without so much as a stutter.

"Your turn," James says.

Regulus shoots him a look, but James just smiles at him. It's a sweet, boyish smile that makes Regulus want to put his hand to James' cheek and turn his face firmly away. With a huff, Regulus whips around and makes his way over the bridge next. It's structurally sound, at least, and it only rattles a little. He makes it over safely.

Scowling, Regulus turns and waits impatiently for James to follow. As always, he does. The moment he's safely on the ground, Regulus turns around and starts for the cave.

The death eaters have definitely changed things. As Regulus predicted, they do have all the supplies and food set up in a corner for easy access, kept out in the open rather arrogantly. In fairness, it's not as if anyone could get to it during the day, and they're always guarding it at night, so no one could really come and take it, or so they thought. Their mistake is why they're being pillaged. Fucking idiots.

The weapons are mostly in the same place, though. It's clear that the death eaters picked over them, because most of them are strewn all over the place or left on tables.

Mathias immediately goes for the crossbow, and Irene has a sword in hand in seconds. Vanity bypasses all of that to go to the supplies, sorting through it until she lets out a sound of delight as she holds up what appears to be a pair of tweezers and a small, empty glass vial.

James goes over to join her, grabbing a bag to start filling with various things. Regulus does the same, uncomfortably aware of the fact that Irene and Mathias are still sifting through the weapons. He keeps a dagger in hand, just in case.

"What weapon do you think Peter will want?" Irene asks thoughtfully. "We've got a spear, a mace, and another sword."

"Spear," James replies. "It gives him a bit of long-range, but he can still use it close-range, and if he needs to, he can throw it."

Regulus squeezes his eyes shut, but that doesn't drown out the sight of Quinn's spear in Evan's stomach behind his eyelids. He takes a quiet, shaky breath and swallows down the lump in his throat, blinking hard and fast.

"Hey, Regulus," Vanity whispers, moving closer to him with a hopeful look in her eyes. "Can you help me?"

"With what?" Regulus murmurs.

Vanity proceeds to hold up Vespa where she has her clamped in between the pair of tweezers. "I need you to cut her."

Regulus blinks. "Cut…Vespa?"

"Yes, please," Vanity says. "It's okay, it won't hurt her. You see her pouch here, with the green stuff in it? That's her venom. She has no nerves in her pouch, so she won't feel a thing."

"Won't she…get upset?"

"No. She won't care as long as we're not scared."

"I mean, sure?" Regulus says slowly, eyebrows furrowed. Vanity beams at him, pleased, so he just goes with it. He knows she would never do anything to unnecessarily harm any bug, let alone the Horcrux Hornet she's clearly made her pet.

"Right. It doesn't need to be a big cut. Just a little one. Right on her pouch, go on," Vanity instructs, holding Vespa up.

Regulus frowns, but he moves forward and carefully pushes the tip of his dagger into the glowing, green pouch until it punctures through. He waits for something to happen, but Vespa shows no signs of agitation. Vanity releases a quiet squeal of delight and hovers Vespa over the vial. Gently, she squeezes the tweezers, and the venom slowly seeps out of the small cut and drips into the vial. Regulus peeks at his dagger, curious, but none of the venom gets on it like this.

"It's not a lot," Regulus comments, helplessly curious and a bit fascinated by the whole thing himself, honestly. The venom only fills the vial a quarter of the way.

"Yeah, I know, but watch," Vanity breathes out, so Regulus does watch. Vespa's pouch proceeds to knit back together, and more venom fills it in seconds. Again, Vanity squeals and bounces in place, grinning at him. "How cool is that?"

"Very," Regulus says, and he's not even lying.

"Do it again," Vanity encourages. "I want to fill the vial."

Regulus pauses, then shrugs. He does it again, faintly amused by how excited Vanity gets about it every time. It reminds him of himself the first time Sirius made him a dagger. When they were alone, Regulus didn't mind sharing how excited he was about anything, not at that age. He hasn't had such childish excitement since he was Vanity's age. It makes something tender flare in his chest for her.

They repeat the process two more times before the vial is nearly full. Vespa remains completely unbothered throughout the whole ordeal, and Vanity occasionally informs her that she's doing so well. Regulus' lips curl up against his will.

"Oh, what the fuck?" James blurts out when he wanders over to see what they're up to. He sounds appalled. "Why are we stabbing Vespa? Can we stop stabbing Vespa?"

"If you're going to be a big baby about it, you can go," Vanity declares with no small amount of sass.

Regulus hums, glancing up at James with a smile. "Yeah, if you're going to be a big baby about it, James, you can go."

"I—" James purses his lips, putting his hands on his hips as he squints between them. "See, no, I don't like that at all. A few conversations with Regulus, and you're getting mean, Vanity. He's a bad influence. Don't listen to him. Stay sweet."

"I'm only sweet when it suits me," Vanity says dismissively.

"Smart girl," Regulus praises, and Vanity flashes him a grin.

James bites his lip, clearly struggling not to smile, and his eyes are so, so soft. He clears his throat. "No, really, can someone explain why Vespa is being stabbed and why she's just…fine with that? She's not even twitching."

"She doesn't know it's happening," Vanity explains with a long-suffering sigh, like she's so exhausted being surrounded by people who don't know about bugs the way she does. "All we're doing is taking her venom. It doesn't hurt her."

"So, you are dipping your dagger in the venom?" James asks, glancing at Regulus with a small frown.

Snorting, Vanity shakes her head before Regulus can even respond. "No, not at all. Vespa's pouch is too thick for that to work like this, and he's not pushing in far enough. It's fine, we'll do that later when we have more time."

"Vanity, what weapon do you want?" Mathias calls out.

"I have my weapon right here," Vanity calls back. "Vespa is my weapon, and she's all I need."

"James," Irene says firmly.

Blowing out a deep breath, James focuses on Vanity, who looks up at him with a frown. "Vanity, I'm sorry, I really am, but you can't keep Vespa. You need to get rid of her."

"I won't," Vanity protests, her eyes narrowing. She gently places Vespa in her palm and sits the tweezers down so she can close the vial, keeping it in her hand.

"You have to," James tells her apologetically. "She's far too dangerous to keep around, and we can't bring her back to the cave with us. There's too much fear in this arena, and any one of us could get hurt."

Vanity looks ready for mutiny. "We need her venom, though."

"We really don't," James says softly. "No one deserves to die in excruciating pain, no matter how quick it is."

At that, Vanity deflates a little bit. She looks at Vespa with very sad eyes, like she might start crying. Regulus frowns, then frowns right at James, genuinely unhappy with him at the moment. He softens, though, because James looks like he might cry right along with Vanity. She's utterly crushed, because he's right, and he's crushed right along with her.

"You can keep the venom you collected," James offers weakly, his eyebrows furrowed. "That way you can always have a bit of Vespa with you. I know it's not the same, but…"

"Can't I just keep her for a bit longer?" Vanity asks, looking up at him with wide, watery eyes. "No one is afraid of her now. I'll just leave her behind when we go. Maybe she'll handle the death eaters, you never know."

James immediately gives in, because his spine is the consistency of a roasted marshmallow. "Yeah, that's fine. Keep her for now, but when we go, she stays behind. Deal?"

"Fine," Vanity mumbles, heaving a sigh as she gently puts Vespa on her shoulder. With that, she turns and marches off, clearly not pleased at the moment.

"Oh, she hates me," James says sadly.

"She's not the only one," Regulus replies, and he immediately regrets it when James looks even closer to tears than he did before. "Stop it. She doesn't hate you. She may hate that you were right, but you were right. You did the right thing."

"Yeah, but she's mad at me," James mumbles.

Regulus rolls his eyes. "She's fifteen. She'll get over it."

"You didn't," James says.

"That was different."

"How?"

"You weren't her first crush," Regulus tells him, hating the way the word fits in his mouth. Crush. So inadequate for what it really was, even so young. He knows what it really was, but he hates the truth even more. "That complicates things a bit."

James looks him up and down. Slowly. Then he says, "Yeah, clearly. I'm back to thinking you have unresolved feelings."

"Ah, more delusion," Regulus says flatly.

"You're obsessed with being mean to me," James declares, like this is a major selling point in his favor.

"Reparations." Regulus flicks his fingers. "Nothing more."

"Reparations?" James chokes out, laughing. "For what, Reg? Because I teased you a little when we were kids?"

Because you stole my brother from me, Regulus thinks, but he doesn't say it. Because you made my heart flutter, and you're doing it again, and I hate you, I hate you, I hate you, he thinks, but he doesn't say that either. Because it's easier; you're going to die, and this is easier, he thinks, and he'll never say that to anyone. He barely lets himself think it, slamming the thought down under lock and key and ignoring the rattle that begs him to open it and explore it further. No. There's no point.

"Reparations for having to be around you," Regulus says instead, which sums all of that up. Sort of.

"Ah, you'd miss me if I wasn't around," James teases, and then his smile falters. Just for a moment. Just a flicker in his expression. Regulus can't fathom the change, or why it's there, but James smiles again anyway. Like it never even happened at all. "Well, the joke's on you, love. Negging is wrong and bad and shouldn't work, but when you do it…"

James makes a silly mm mm mm sound like he's tasting something exquisite, and he kisses his fingers, which makes Regulus roll his eyes as he mutters, "You're pathetic."

"See? Like that. Fuck, it gets me every time," James says with a theatrical shiver. "Oh, yes, please insult me more. You have me absolutely hooked."

"I wish that was sarcasm," Regulus tells him. "Like, genuinely. But you're not joking. Where is your self-respect?"

"Wherever you want it to be," James replies. "I am but a man lost to the charm of Regulus Black."

Regulus snorts. "You do not find me charming. I'm the least charming person on the planet."

"Mm, we're going to have to agree to disagree on that," James informs him, stepping closer and leaning his hand on the table of supplies so he can sway closer, smiling that smile of his. The one that's hard to look at. "I do wonder sometimes what it would be like for you to be nice. Sincerely nice, I mean. What if I didn't like it? Would that mean I have issues?"

"You have issues regardless," Regulus says.

James grins. "Yeah, that never gets old. You don't even know how to be nice to me, do you?"

"You're so funny, James. Funny and kind and handsome and just the absolute best all the time! You brighten every room you walk into, but that makes sense because you're the sun," Regulus declares in an overly peppy voice, folding his hands together and tucking them under his chin as he smiles sweetly and bats his eyelashes.

"Fuck you, that was awful," James wheezes, shaking with laughter as he shuffles forward, clearly entertained. "You're not even trying, Reg."

Regulus lets his expression drop and his hands fall as he rolls his eyes. "That's what you get for fishing for compliments. If you think I'm going to stroke your ego, you're a fool."

"Well, if you won't stroke my ego," James teases, "you could always try stroking my—"

"I will give you the Vespa treatment, James," Regulus cuts in, reaching forward to press the very tip of his dagger to the soft give of James' stomach.

"How's that saying go? No pain, no gain?" James raises his eyebrows and steps forward into the blade, forcing Regulus to draw back a bit so he won't actually stab him. The fact that James just trusts him to do that is infuriating, only more so because Regulus instinctively does it. "You're always so much sweeter when I've been hurt."

"Well, I'm not a monster," Regulus mutters under his breath, abruptly turning away to grab the bag and busy his hands. James is so close, and Regulus suddenly feels like he's fourteen again, which is not a sensation he's pleased with. Yeah, moving on. "Don't stand around doing nothing. We are on a bit of a time limit here, remember?"

"Hey, the second fire is burning," Vanity calls from the mouth of the cave, drawing their attention.

"Chop chop, people," Irene announces. "We're leaving as soon as the smoke from the third hits the sky."

Regulus gives James a pointed look. "You heard her. Get to it. Wouldn't want to disappoint Irene, now would you?"

James breaks out into a grin, which instantly gets under Regulus' skin, but he doesn't say anything. James just releases a huff of laughter, soft and exhilarated, and he grabs his own bag to start gathering supplies. He leans over to press their shoulders together, and Regulus wishes with everything in him that he had the power to pull away.

He doesn't.

Chapter End Notes

JEALOUS REGULUS JEALOUS REGULUS JEALOUS REGULUS!!! i am LIVING for regulus just quietly seething about the fact that james is all smiles and easy touches with someone else, until he finally just reaches the end of his rope and is like: ok they need to be separated Right Now 😭😭😭 he was so upset PLS. like, babe, what's the matter? any particular reason you're annoyed? no?

meanwhile, james is completely oblivious to it until irene points it out lmaoooo. she's a real one for that! irene my beloved <3 actually, i love this whole group so much. i know they're basically acting as if they're not all technically in a death arena, but it's kinda one of those Heavy Subjects that you just don't really talk about until it becomes a more primary issue. they're ALL avoiding reality, and i can't blame them. james legitimately just found the people who don't actually want to kill anyone and went: ah, yes, These People Are My Allies, which if you think about it, that was kinda smart of him. also stupid, but still.

regulus so obviously is not a group person, which i totally get. i, too, sort of fade in the background and go quiet around people i don't know very well. it was sweet of him to offer the blanket and give peter his matches, though. like, he's not TRYING to be a prick on purpose. he's just a grumpy little shit. i love him <3 and vanityyyyy!!! she's lovely. i adore her so much. her and james crack me up, because it's very much an older brother/younger sister dynamic, which i find absolutely hilarious. also, the fiendfyre ants and the horcrux hornet was so exciting to introduce because they play a pretty big role in the fic overall. but the fiendfyre ants were how vanity survived the cold nights, for those of you wondering how that worked!!!

so basically, this chapter was overall not so bad. had some humor, some flirting, some jealousy, a bit of angst as well. i am forewarning you now that the next chapter is rough. it was the one that was hardest for me to write, so keep that in mind. there's a two day break before it gets here, though. idk if that's better or worse, but it is what it is.

anyway, let me do numbers:

tributes remaining: 11
tributes who have died thus far:
dylan
avery
quinn
evan mulciber
eight unnamed/unknown others

Massacre

Chapter Notes

hello, everyone.

warnings for this chapter:

-depictions of violence
-depictions of injury
-depictions of murder/death
-depictions of children/minors dying (mostly brief, but not as background as it has been up to this point)
-depiction of a mercy-killing
-mentions/descriptions of blood
-depiction/description of a panic attack (mostly brief)

this chapter is, quite frankly, very rough. it's very fast-paced, and a lot happens very quickly, with basically no break once it starts. i highly recommend reading this while alone and where you can squeeze something soft and cry in peace. i also implore all of you to please, PLEASE be mindful of the warnings and don't hesitate to check the more in-depth warnings in the end notes of the chapter, and also just—don't read if it's best for you not to. that's perfectly valid.

take care of yourselves first, always.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Sirius has known from a very young age that a good plan is dependent on three factors. Preparation, execution, and each individual variable in aforementioned plan. A good plan has no such thing as unforeseen circumstances, but all variables in a good plan are prepared for unforeseen circumstances anyway, and they execute the plan in spite of them.

This? This is a bad plan.

The preparation is good, no doubt. They set up the fires perfectly. The bridge is well-built. They all have their roles, as well as their rendezvous points.

The execution is even going well. James, Regulus, Vanity, Irene, and Mathias do make it to the cave and do as the plan dictates by absolutely cleaning the death eaters out. Even Peter is sticking to the plan, though in his nerves he has sped up the process a bit, lighting fires too soon and running too hard to get to the next one, which doesn't give the others much time. Sirius can't blame him for that, really. He's undoubtedly afraid out there on his own, wanting to get everything over and done with as soon as possible.

The problem is all the variables. They didn't properly consider them all, even from the beginning. The plan could have been ruined before it ever got started if the group on the way to the cave just so happened to cross paths with the death eaters, and it was pure luck that kept that from happening, at least until Peter lit the first fire to get the death eaters' attention.

The death eaters are a very important variable, and Sirius is worried because no one really gave much thought to them in the unforeseen circumstances that they showed up. They're all counting on the death eaters to be stupid and bloodthirsty enough to follow the fires, and fortunately for them, that does seem to be the case. Somehow, the plan is working, despite the fact that it's not a very good one by his standards.

"Sirius, m'boy," Slughorn says, coming to a stop next to him with a broad smile. "Enjoying the games this year, are we?"

Obviously not, you fucking idiot, Sirius thinks, but he rips his gaze away from watching the screen to smile at Slughorn as diplomatically as possible. Slughorn has hardly left the gamemaker room, so Sirius has barely seen him at the watch parties, but with the dwindling numbers in the arena, he has a bit less work to do. Less lives to fuck with. Less chaos to cause. Besides, the ones in the arena are clearly capable of getting into trouble on their own today.

"They're certainly more intense this year than the one prior," Sirius replies, dipping his head and raising his glass in an unspoken toast to Slughorn, because he's not above buttering him up a bit, if that would help James and Regulus.

Slughorn chuckles and glances at the screen, clearly pleased with the praise and proud of his work. "I have to say, I owe a portion of the good reviews to your tributes, Sirius. The people are quite invested in their blossoming romance. May I ask how you feel about it?"

"Ah," Sirius says softly, raising his glass to take a careful sip and buy himself more time. He has to tread carefully here, as difficult as it is to do with such personal matters. He can't just say that he hates it, purely because it's not everyone else's business; at the very least, James and Regulus deserve their privacy, regardless of Sirius' feelings on the subject. He doesn't really have feelings on the subject, though, quite frankly. He cares more about Regulus and James' survival than their love lives. Still, he can't say that, so… "Well, a best friend only wants their best friend to be happy; a sibling only wants their sibling to be happy. I can't deny that I appreciate that they take such comfort from one another."

"Well said, m'boy," Slughorn muses thoughtfully, watching the screen with mild delight. It takes him a second, but then he looks at Sirius. "You know your brother well, Sirius. I must ask, what holds him back? He's very resistant to James. I've worked out that some of it is just his personality, but he never really breaks past whatever blocks he has up. Sometimes it seems he has feelings for James, yet at other times it seems as if he would kill James just to get away from him. It's very confusing for the viewers, you know."

Sirius clears his throat. Again, he has to be careful. "Yes, a lot of that is just Regulus' personality, as you said. Isn't it more gratifying that way, though? That will-they, won't-they everyone is so keen on. Keeps them…hooked."

"Mm, yes, but with no pay off, there's just disappointment, Sirius," Slughorn says in audible disapproval. "I do not intend to leave any viewer disappointed, so what is it, I wonder? What will it take to break through to Regulus? What push does he need, and how can we facilitate it?"

Sirius briefly pictures shoving his wine glass down Slughorn's throat, stem-first, slowly and painfully. He indulges in the violent fantasy for a moment, fingers twitching around his glass, and then he forces himself to exhale as he banishes the images. It's just sickening how casually Slughorn is talking about controlling lives, outright asking Sirius to give him advice on how to better control his brother to get the results he wants. And Sirius can't just beat the shit out of Slughorn for daring to think he's entitled to anything involving Regulus, or even James, for that matter.

All he can do is play this smart and try his best to make this easier for Regulus—and James—because Horace Slughorn is missing some very vital information, and it's that Regulus only does what he's willing to do. If there's one thing Sirius knows for sure about his brother, it's that. As far as he can tell, there's very little that would push Regulus to be willing to do what the Hallows want from him, and frankly, the last thing Sirius wants is for it to reach that point.

So, Sirius clears his throat and says, "Well, what Regulus really needs is—"

"Sirius," Marlene hisses, abruptly rushing up to stand next to him and clamp down on his arm. Immediately, Sirius and Slughorn both simultaneously focus back on the screens, abandoning the conversation in favor of watching.

It becomes apparent what she's worried about instantly. The miniature map in the corner displaying every remaining tribute's position makes it very fucking clear that something is about to go terribly, terribly wrong. The death eaters may be bloodthirsty, but they're not as stupid as they need to be for this plan to be foolproof. Peter is just now reaching the third fire point, but the death eaters are right behind him, following his trail and only seconds away from reaching him.

Sure, they fell for the trap, but not for long enough that they didn't realize they were being baited. The thing about being bait is that it's too fucking easy to get bitten.

Sirius feels his heart drop, darting his gaze back to where the screen shows James and Regulus still helping gather food and supplies with Irene and Mathias. Vanity, in a fit of teenage angst and fury, has boycotted helping with all the pillaging in favor of sitting outside with her pet bug, clearly upset that she's going to have to leave it behind. The five of them are safe for now, but the third fire point isn't that far from the cave, so if Peter doesn't light it, they won't know to leave, and the death eaters might make it back before they're gone.

It'll be a massacre.

"Come on, come on, come on," Sirius chants under his breath, watching desperately as Peter fumbles for one of the matches, breathing hard. His hands are shaking.

"Shit," Marlene whispers, "he's not going to make it."

"No, indeed he's not," Slughorn agrees, sounding thrilled.

It's true. Peter is not going to make it, which becomes obvious the moment the death eaters come barreling through the trees, essentially startling him so much that he trips backwards and drops the matches before he ever gets one lit.

Sirius holds his breath, waiting for Peter to at least attempt to dive for the matches, because if he's going to die, he could still help his friends. If it was Sirius in that situation, that's what he would do. James, too. Regulus…? No, he'd probably run, and really, Sirius can't exactly think of him as a bad person for that. It's about survival, right?

It turns out that Peter is more like Regulus in this scenario, because he turns and runs without a split second of hesitation. Sirius reaches over and grabs Marlene's hand, the both of them squeezing tight as they watch in tense silence. Maybe it's ridiculous, but Sirius finds himself thinking go, Peter, run. He hopes he gets away, because if he doesn't, he's going to suffer a really painful death at the hands of those chasing him.

Peter does not get away. Willa shoots him with an arrow that lands in the back of his leg, sending him tumbling to the ground with a shout. He scrambles to rip it out, trying to get back to his feet, but the death eaters reach him first.

Bernice is on him in seconds, launching herself forward to punch him in the face so hard that he hits the ground again. Peter scrambles around on his hands and knees, then grunts when Axus kicks him in the side. Willa joins them, as well as Bernice, and they all start beating Peter right into the ground while Hodge hovers on the edges, knife in hand.

Sirius can see Marlene's face screwing up at the violence, but he keeps his own neutral, especially with Slughorn so close. It's grotesque to watch, as always. Peter is getting the same treatment that Dylan got at the very start. Simply beaten to death. Even with weapons, the death eaters see an easy target and decide to make it hurt first. They know how to put on a good show; they know what the viewers want to see.

Peter is curled up on his side, groaning and crying, when Bernice abruptly announces, "Alright, alright, that's enough. I'll kill him. He's from my district, after all."

"Bernice, please," Peter chokes out, face swollen and bloody as he holds up one shaking hand and feebly tries to crawl away from her. "Please don't. Wait. Just—just wait. Please, you know me. You—you—"

"No hard feelings, Peter," Bernice says, swiveling her sword in her hand as she moves forward. "You chose your side, and you'll die for it. You have nothing to offer me."

"No, no, please," Peter begs, gasping for air. "I'm sorry. Bern, I'm sorry. What do you want? I'll give you anything. Please."

Bernice snorts and raises her sword. "The only thing I want is Regulus Black and James Potter dead, and you're certainly not going to be able to give me that."

"Wait!" Peter blurts out frantically. "Wait, I—I can give you that! I know where they are."

"What?" Bernice asks, pausing to stare at him.

Sirius' heart stops in his chest. No. No, not this. Peter, no, don't you fucking dare, he thinks, panic immediately flooding his nervous system until he's suddenly shaking.

Peter is silent for a long moment, then he swallows harshly and rasps, "I know where James and Regulus are. I can take you to them. Just—just please don't kill me."

Slowly, Bernice lowers her sword. "On your feet, Pettigrew." Sirius watches as Peter slowly, shakily pushes to his feet, barely able to stand up straight and limping on his bad leg. Bernice points her sword at him. "Start walking."

Sirius struggles to breathe, because without hesitation, Peter does exactly that. He starts walking. Slow, but steady. Leading them right to James and Regulus.

"Well," Slughorn announces, "this is about to get interesting."

~•~

"Still no smoke?" James asks as Irene comes back over from the mouth of the cave.

"Not yet," Irene says. "Maybe he's trying to give us more time?"

James glances over at Regulus, who has his lips pressed into a thin line. He looks uneasy, and James can't help but feel the same way. They've all lost track of time, between worrying about Vanity and going through everything in the cave, as well as packing supplies and food. They were relying on Peter's fires to signal them, and now it's starting to feel like they've run over on their time a little too much.

"And Vanity?" James mutters.

Irene sighs. "Still sitting outside with Vespa. She's fine, just a little upset. She'll be ready to go when we bring out the bags to her, I'm sure."

"We're not going to be able to carry all of this," Mathias announces with a frown as they stare at all the bags they've stuffed full of supplies and food.

James grimaces, because they're right. Between the five of them, they can carry maybe two bags a piece while still carting their weapons with them, and Regulus already has a bag of his own. There are fifteen bags in all, including Regulus', which means they'll have to leave five bags behind. That's enough for the death eaters to survive on, which is counterproductive to what they're going for here.

"We'll drop the extra in the crimson river," Regulus declares, glancing around at everyone expectantly.

Mathias bites their lip. "That's such a waste, though."

"Yes, but it's better than leaving them behind for the death eaters to use," Regulus points out.

"I can't believe I'm saying this," Irene says wryly, "but I'm with Regulus on this one."

"What if we made two trips?" Mathias asks.

James shakes his head. "Too risky. We're already pushing it now. I think—I'm worried we're running over the time limit. I really think we need to go. Now."

"What about Peter?" Irene demands. "He hasn't lit the last fire, James. Why wouldn't he—"

"There was no cannon, so he's still alive," Regulus cuts in, and James is thankful for how rational he's being right now, because James himself is so anxious and worried that he feels like he might vomit. "Something could have happened that kept him from making it to the last fire, but there's a chance that he's fine. Maybe he went back the cave to hide, which means it falls on us to get the fuck out of here."

"Regulus is right," James agrees. "We need to leave. Grab the bags we're tossing and—"

"James!"

The scream from Vanity outside makes them all freeze in despair, because she sounds downright terrified, and then they're all running for the cave entrance at the same time, weapons in hand and bags forgotten.

James is immediately horrified by the scene that greets him outside. Willa is dragging Vanity by the hair across the bridge while she struggles, and on the other side are the rest of the death eaters, as well as a beaten Peter. He's on the ground, flat on his back with Bernice holding him down with her boot to his chest. He isn't moving.

"Stop struggling!" Willa screeches. "Fuck! If—if you knock us off this damn bridge, I'll—"

"Let me go!" Vanity snarls.

They're all running. Of course they are. Desperate to reach Vanity before Willa yanks her to the other side of the bridge. They don't manage to make it in time. James watches it as if it happens in slow motion; Willa drags Vanity all the way across and stumbles from the weight as Vanity fights with all her might to get away, and Willa lets out a quiet yelp from how close to the river she is. She sounds scared. Vespa must think so, too, because she abruptly flies up from Vanity's shoulder, where she was peacefully resting, almost docile despite the fact that Vanity must be so scared right now.

And yet, Vanity isn't the one Vespa stings. Instead, Vespa flies right over to Willa and stings her, which causes her to release a scream so shrill and so full of pain that there's no doubt in James' mind that Vanity wasn't lying about the agony of a Horcrux Hornet's venom. Willa reflexively tries to squash Vespa where she stung her in the arm, even while tripping backwards. She goes down, still screaming when she hits the river with a splash, and hands immediately raise up to drag her and Vespa under, abruptly cutting off her shriek.

"Vespa!" Vanity shouts, scrambling forward, only to cry out when Bernice surges forward from Peter to grab her by the hair and continue dragging her back.

The cannon goes off.

"Yeah, that's right, Black. Come and get her," Bernice calls, fully just tossing Vanity to the side as Regulus sprints right across the bridge. He's the fastest. Of course he makes it first. Irene is right behind him, and James is right behind her, with Mathias bringing up the rear.

Regulus doesn't even hesitate when he makes it over. He slams into Bernice so hard that they both go to the ground in seconds. He fucking flattens her, but Bernice fights back, and she fights dirty. She yanks on his hair, punches and kicks and bites, and Regulus fights back just as hard.

Irene makes it over next, and she goes right for Axus, who is rushing over to help Bernice. She doesn't hesitate either, slashing out with her sword across their leg, which makes them shout and stumble to the side. Axus whips around, their hook in hand, and they swing out expertly to catch the blade in the curve of their hook, twisting and yanking to snatch the sword right from Irene's hands. Irene takes it in stride and fully just throws herself at them until they're both just rolling around on the ground with yelps and curses.

The thing is, the death eaters are outnumbered now. It's just Bernice and Axus, because Hodge clearly isn't going to do anything. Or that's what James assumes as he pounds over the bridge, his heart in his throat. Because Hodge has never done anything before, so James doesn't even think—

"No, no, Hodge, please," Vanity chokes out, trying to crawl backwards as Hodge stoops down over her. Even from here, James can see that his eyes are wide with fear.

"Kill her! Fucking kill her! She killed Willa, and she'll kill you next, Hodge!" Bernice bellows, grunting as she slams Regulus' head back against the ground.

"No! Hodge, don't!" James shouts, running as hard as he can, making it to the other side in just enough time to watch Hodge slit Vanity's throat.

Vanity collapses back, making a horrible gurgling noise, and Hodge gasps as he stumbles to the side, dropping his knife. James goes barreling over, finally reaching them. He doesn't mean to do it. That's the thing. He just shoves Hodge further away, not even aware of his own strength in his state of panic, and—and Hodge is so small, he's only fourteen—

James doesn't know what he's done until there's a splash. His head whips around as he hits his knees by Vanity, and he only gets one glimpse of Hodge in the water before the hands are dragging him down, just like Willa. James sucks in a sharp breath, left reeling from the sight and the realization that he just mindlessly pushed Hodge into the river.

He would have turned fifteen tomorrow.

It takes a minute, even longer than Willa—likely due to the fast-acting venom from Vespa—but then the cannon sounds, leaving Hodge eternally fourteen.

Another choked noise snatches James' attention back to Vanity. She's staring up at him in pure fear, throat coated with blood, some bubbling up from her mouth. James makes a weak noise and shakily cups her throat with his hand, his eyes blurring with tears as he lifts her up a little to cradle her head against his legs. She tries to speak, but no words come out.

"Shh, it's okay. You're okay," James whispers, his voice cracking. A wet breath escapes him, his chest feeling like it's caving in. "You're—you're going to be—"

Vanity's eyes glaze over, and the cannon sounds. She's limp against him, no pulse in her throat, no breath causing her chest to rise and fall.

"No, no, I'm—I'm sorry. I'm so sorry. Vanity, I'm—" James chokes off because he can't speak through his own tears. He ducks his head forward, sobbing over her helplessly.

Sobbing.

Sobbing.

Sobbing.

She never got her first kiss.

She never got to fall in love.

She never got to go home.

Her prince never saved her.

Her prince killed her.

Her prince is dead.

James feels something within him shrivel and die right along with her, like something inside him has broken with a harsh snap, and it'll never heal the right way again. He clutches her closer to him and weeps through gasping breaths, the world around him seeming to have no meaning at all.

Vanity is still holding the vial of venom, the last piece of Vespa she got to have. It's lying in her gently-curled palm, bright and shimmering green. With trembling fingers, James reaches out to take it from her, because that's all he'll get to have of Vanity. He clings to it with fingers slick with blood, burying his face in her hair, rocking her back and forth.

Sobbing.

Sobbing.

Sobbing.

~•~

Regulus spits out a mouthful of blood and swings his elbow at Bernice's head, but she manages to catch it and slam his arm down on the ground. Her other forearm presses into his throat, leaving him gasping hoarsely as he fumbles for his dagger and tries to throw her off at the same time.

It doesn't work.

Bernice presses harder, and the more Regulus struggles, the weaker he feels. It gets difficult to breathe, and his vision starts to go in and out, black spots dancing in front of his eyes as the world warps out of focus. He tips his head back, mouth opening and closing, in desperate need of oxygen that he's just not getting. His head is pounding, throbbing, and he can't really feel all his limbs properly. Is this dying? Is he—

Without warning, Bernice is snatched right off him, and Regulus immediately sucks in a deep breath. He chokes on it, coughing and curling up on his side as he reaches up to cradle his throat. In front of him, he can see his savior.

Peter.

Honestly, Peter can't really do much with how hurt he is, but he puts up a valiant fight. He punches Bernice in the face and manages to dodge one of her hits, but it doesn't take her very long to lash out at what looks like an injury on his leg. He goes down to his knee with a grunt, which gives her time to dive for her sword that Regulus had previously wrestled from her.

Peter can clearly tell what she's planning to do, because he hurries to get back on his feet and starts off in a limping run. Frankly, Regulus is just grateful for the time that Peter gave him. It allows him to catch his breath and slowly crawl to his feet, finally fumbling for his daggers. Peter is steadily going right for the forest, and Bernice appears agitated enough by him that she can't seem to decide if it's more tempting to follow him, or stay here and keep fighting.

Bernice whips her head back around to look towards Regulus, her chest heaving and her sword gripped tight. He can practically see the cogs working in her brain; they're severely outnumbered right now. It's just her and Regulus, because Mathias and Irene are keeping Axus busy. At the moment, Regulus doesn't know where James is, can't see him from this angle, but he'd heard the cannons and James shouting Vanity's name. He can take a guess. He doesn't let himself think about it, not yet, not now—but he knows.

If he listens hard enough, he can hear James weeping, and the sound makes him flinch, so he doesn't listen.

"Axus, retreat, you idiot!" Bernice shouts, and then she whirls around and starts sprinting for the forest in the same direction that Peter went in, except Peter is already gone.

Regulus goes still, eyes narrowing as he raises his dagger, tracking her as she runs in a zigzag pattern. But it is nonetheless a pattern he can follow, and he tugs his hand back, ready to let his dagger fly. He's going to hit her. He knows he's going to hit her, which is why it's genuinely infuriating when he's distracted by the sound of Mathias' horrified shout.

Grinding his teeth, Regulus lets Bernice go, choosing instead to whip around and see what's wrong. Axus and Irene are going at it, and it's fucking brutal. Axus' hook is buried in Irene's side, but she's not letting that stop her in the least. She just tugs it out, carelessly tossing it aside as she launches herself forward again; the wound isn't deep, or fatal, so she should be fine. Behind Axus, Mathias raises their crossbow.

The following sequence of events is just a tragedy everyone is too late to stop. Axus grabs Irene and whips around with her in front of them at the same time that Mathias shoots.

Mathias doesn't miss.

The bolt lands right where they aimed, except it wasn't Irene they were aiming for when they took the shot. It's Irene that releases a choked, wheezing noise as the bolt buries itself in her chest. Mathias' eyes widen, and they drop their crossbow.

"No. No, wait," Mathias breathes out. "Irene? I—I—"

Cursing, Regulus flings his dagger right at Axus, and it lands in the side of their arm, making them yelp and flail backwards. Irene stumbles forward into Mathias' arms, and Axus whirls around to see Regulus. Much like Bernice, they seem to realize what shit they've landed themselves in, and they start backing up slowly, eyeing Regulus warily. They leave the dagger in their arm and start backing up faster when Regulus draws out his last one and holds it at the ready.

"Help. Regulus, help me," Mathias pleads, trying to hold Irene up, tears in their eyes. "Please. I—I need help."

"Get her across the bridge, now," Regulus orders, moving over to reach down and scoop her legs up. Axus is still backing up, watching, clearly wary about being left alone.

Regulus will kill them if he has to, but everything is moving so fast, and Irene is the current priority. The bolt is sticking out of her chest, and she grips it through clenched teeth, but she wisely doesn't remove it as they carry her quickly over the bridge. Regulus still has his dagger in hand, and he keeps a check behind him; Axus is closer to the woods, a bit of a distance away, but they've stopped backing up. They're looking up at the sky where a Hallow heli-carrier is flying over them, making trees sway and sending a gale across them.

Irene is placed gently on the ground, leaning back against one of the poles as she takes short, labored breaths and cradles the bolt impaling her. Again, Regulus glances back to see where the heli-carrier is going, his heart dropping when he spots James on the ground with Vanity sprawled across his legs limply, cradled in his arms.

"I'm—I'm so sorry," Mathias gasps out, drawing Regulus' attention back to the matter at hand. "Irene, I didn't—I'm sorry, I—I never meant to—"

"S'okay. It's—" Irene clenches her teeth and shakes her head, reaching out with a shaking hand to thread her hand into Mathias' hair, tugging their head forward until she can press both of their foreheads together.

They both linger there for a moment, and then Mathias pulls back. A look passes between them and Irene that somehow, despite everything, makes Irene give them a watery smile.

"No," Mathias whispers. "Please. Irene, please."

Irene coughs. "I'm not—you know I'm not going to make it, Mathias. Even with the supplies here, it's not—" She lets out a wheezing breath, grimacing. "It won't be enough."

"I didn't mean to," Mathias chokes out, tears spilling out of their eyes, raising one hand to press the back of their hand against their mouth as they break down crying.

"I know. I know," Irene wheezes, reaching out to gently pass her hand over their hair. "It's okay. You're going to be okay, Mathias. Can you—will you do me a favor?"

Mathias nods through their tears.

"Don't watch this part," Irene whispers. "I'm going to stay here with Regulus, yeah? Go into the cave until—until the cannon sounds. Go on."

"Irene," Mathias whispers, "I—"

"Go, Mathias," Irene orders firmly, shakily pushing at their shoulder.

"I'm sorry," Mathias says, and they keep saying it, chanting it over and over as they weep and get to their feet, frantically stumbling towards the cave.

"Hey!" Irene calls after them, the word rattling in her chest and making her gasp as she reaches out to clamp down on Regulus' thigh. She smooths out her face when Mathias whips back around, even manages a smile. "I love you, kid."

Mathias' whole face crumbles, but they dutifully reply with a hoarse, "I love you, too," and then they're gone.

Irene collapses back against the pole with a gasp, her fingers flexing into Regulus' leg. Regulus may not like her, but he doesn't pull away when her hand fumbles for his, holding on so hard that it actually hurts. The heli-carrier is close now, and Regulus follows Irene's gaze to see the coffin-like cage-claw slowly descending through the air.

"Think it'll wait for me?" Irene rasps.

"Probably," Regulus admits quietly. He doesn't know if she hears him over the rush of wind or not.

"So, um." Irene licks her lips and squeezes her eyes shut, face twisting with pain. "This—this is going to take a while, and I'd really like to get it over and done with." She reaches out with her other hand, fingers trembling as they slide over his hand where he's holding his last dagger. Her eyes flutter open so she can look at him. "Show a girl a little mercy, huh?"

It takes Regulus a second to get what she means. A lump forms in his throat immediately. "You want me to—"

"Finish me off? Yeah," Irene confirms. "Surprise, surprise, but this hurts really fucking bad, and I don't want to have to suffer through pulling it out to speed up the process. So, if you would be so kind…"

"Irene," Regulus says softly, eyebrows furrowed.

"The sooner you do it, the sooner you can get to James. He needs you." Irene swallows when he doesn't move, and she squeezes his hand around his dagger. "Please, Regulus. It hurts. Just —please."

"Okay," Regulus whispers, and he squeezes her other hand as he nods and takes a deep breath. He holds her gaze, because she deserves that, at least. "I'm sorry."

"Don't be," Irene whispers back. "You're helping me, and I have to admit, I did not see that coming. Don't—don't feel bad about this, yeah? I'm—I'm really grateful. Thank you."

Regulus swallows harshly, because he suddenly can't figure out why he didn't like her before, and all he feels for her now is a mixture of sorrow and respect. He lifts his dagger, and he doesn't look away as he does as she's asked him to. It's quick, though not entirely painless when she's already in pain to start with, he's sure, but he tries. Her eyes never leave his, and she holds his hand until her own falls slack and the cannon sounds. Regulus' eyes sink shut as he dips his head forward.

"Axus!"

At Mathias' shout, Regulus' head snaps up in just enough time to see them come sprinting past with a knife and a spear in one hand each, respectively. Cursing, Regulus launches to his feet and whirls around.

"Mathias! Mathias, no!" Regulus shouts, chasing after them.

Regulus' heart drops when he sees that Axus has taken notice of James, who is still holding onto Vanity and doesn't even seem aware that the heli-carrier is hovering above him, clearly waiting to scoop Vanity's body the moment James lets it go. It's obvious that Axus plans to take advantage of his grief, but Mathias is out for blood, due to their own.

The problem is, Axus is close to the bridge again, and Mathias is just barreling for them at full speed. This wouldn't be a problem if Axus wasn't aware of that or within hook-tossing range of the bridge. It happens fast; with just three easy lasso swings above their head, Axus tosses his hook to catch the edge of the bride while Mathias is making their way across, and then they give a harsh yank.

The end of the bridge on the bank in front of Regulus goes sailing forward, dipping into the water, making Mathias stumble backwards. Hands instantly come up out of the water, dragging the bridge under and taking Mathias with it, leaving Regulus deserted once again on the other side.

"Fuck. Fuck!" Regulus shouts, pacing back and forth as he shoves his hands through his hair. Axus reels their hook in and waves at him with a playful smile before turning to head right for James, swinging their hook. "No. No, no, no. James! James!"

Regulus screaming his name does manage to capture James' attention. He appears to suddenly become aware of what's happening, at least with the heli-carrier, which causes him to gently deposit Vanity on the ground and step away. It's clear that he's trying to watch her get lifted out, but sadly, he doesn't have the time to do that.

The cannon sounds for Mathias, drowning out Regulus shouting James' name in pure desperation. Axus is so close.

"James!" Regulus yells again, his heart sinking because—

As soon as James turns around, Axus throws their hook, and it embeds itself into James' thigh so deep that it goes clear across to the other side. Regulus' breath punches out of him as he surges forward as far as he can before he hits the river. With one harsh tug, Axus pulls James right off his feet.

James lands flat on his back, grunting and crying out in pain, but Axus doesn't even hesitate. They wind the rope around their arms, then drag a flailing, shouting James across the field and into the forest. Regulus can only stand there and watch, trapped on the other side of the river.

"Fuck, fuck, fuck!" Regulus snarls. He paces back and forth again, like an animal in a cage, his mind in an uproar.

James. They've got James.

It's all—everything just happened so fast, and practically everyone is fucking dead, and—and —

Regulus didn't even see everyone die. Mathias, Irene, and Willa, yes. But Vanity and Hodge? He has no fucking idea what happened to them. Five people dead, just like that, just that quickly. Irene's body is still behind him, his dagger still buried between her ribs and in her heart. As close to an instant death as he could get. Forty-five seconds at most.

Vanity has been lifted out, and the heli-carrier is indeed flying over to get Irene. He moves over quickly to get his dagger, his heart racing. He's gentle when pulling it out, and he takes the bolt, too, trying to wipe away some of the violence that happened to her here. She shouldn't be taken home with proof of how she died. He doesn't think she would want that.

"I'm sorry," Regulus rasps one last time, then steps back to watch her get lifted out. Maybe it's stupid, but in his daze, he finds something mildly comforting about the fact that Vanity and Irene will be taken from here together.

It's not much of a comfort, but it's something.

Five people are dead. Six people remain. Bernice, Peter, Axus, Juniper, James, and Regulus himself. Regulus finds his bag and cleans his dagger as his mind races, eyes darting along the treeline, waiting for James to come back. He always—

Swallowing, Regulus takes a deep breath and slowly releases it. James is still alive. Wherever Axus is taking him, James is still alive. If he has his hatchet—wait, does he have—

Regulus scrambles forward to go right up to the river again, desperately searching the ground on the other side with his gaze. It takes him a second, and for a moment, he thinks that James did have his hatchet, which means he would have a weapon to fight with. But no, it's there on the ground, and the sight of it nearly takes Regulus out at the knees.

Okay, Regulus thinks, pacing again as he flexes his fingers around his last dagger. Okay. This is—it's okay, because James is still alive. There was no cannon, and it's been a few minutes now, so maybe James managed to get away. Maybe he snatched the hook out and somehow managed to hide, and that's the only reason he hasn't come back. Maybe Axus stopped to kill him—because of course they would—and James figured out a way to knock them out and get away.

There are a lot of scenarios that pass through Regulus' mind, and none of them matter, because no cannon has sounded, which means James is still alive. He just has to stay alive until this fucking river ices over, and then Regulus will find him.

Regulus is still very set on winning the games, but he can't deny that somewhere not as deep as it should be, he doesn't want James to die. It's not some big revelation, really. Regulus sort of already knew that, considering the lengths he's gone to help keep James alive. He knows—he does know that James is going to die. He has to die at some point. Just—just not now. Not yet. Not like this. Not when Regulus can stop it.

He doesn't know if that's his own stupidity, due to the heart flutters and the fact that he's known James practically his whole life, or if it's about Sirius in some way. Because he knows that Sirius will be absolutely fucking wrecked when James dies, and if all Regulus can do is put that off a bit more, just a bit longer, then he can't help but want to.

And—well, honestly, Regulus isn't ready to do this alone. He's not ready for James to leave him yet. He's not—he can't—

Boom!

At the sound of the cannon going off, Regulus goes very still. It's like the whole world stops for a second, and his ears start to ring as pressure builds and builds in his chest. He can't breathe suddenly. He's trying, but he can't, which causes him to put his hand to his chest to see if it actually caved in the way it just felt like it did. It's rising and falling at a rapid rate, but that doesn't make sense, because he's not getting enough oxygen. Briefly, he wonders if he somehow got wounded without knowing it, but no, no, he's fine. It's just superficial injuries from the fight with Bernice, so what's—what's wrong?

Something is wrong. He can't—he feels—

James, he thinks.

"No," Regulus says out loud. It's cold, hard denial. It doesn't matter if that's the only thing that makes sense, because Axus and James were the only two together, and James is injured, no weapon at all, and—and—

Regulus shakes his head, heaving out a harsh breath, choking on it. "Sirius," he rasps. "That—that wasn't him, right? Sirius, that wasn't James. It—it wasn't—Sirius? Sirius, was that—"

Of course, Sirius can't answer him. Sirius likely wouldn't be able to answer him even if he could, if it was James, because he would—he would be—

Helplessly, Regulus sinks down to the ground, trying so hard to fucking breathe, but he can't. He doesn't know how. Panic attack, his mind points out from a vague distance, which isn't really helpful information when he can't stop panicking.

James, Regulus thinks again. He buries his hands in his hair, rocking back and forth as struggles to breathe, muffling the broken sounds that fall out of his mouth against his bent knees. Again and again, he thinks James, James, James.

James.

James.

James.

~•~

"I have to find a way to tell him," Sirius hisses, starting to back up, but Marlene catches his arm.

"Sirius, there isn't a way you can tell him," Marlene whispers, her voice thick as she tugs him to a harsh halt. "Where are you going? What are you going to do?"

Sirius takes a deep breath, trying to keep his head about him. There are tears in Marlene's eyes, and her face is puffy. She'd been a wreck from the moment Vanity and Hodge died, and Sirius can't deny that it was fucking heartbreaking. Knowing the girl had a crush on the boy, and he killed her…

James didn't mean to push him in, Sirius knows that, but it's still hard to look Marlene directly in her eyes and see her grief right now. At the same time, James had held onto Vanity like he was losing a part of himself while losing her, and that makes it hard to look at Marlene, too. There's so much pain and loss between them, between everyone.

Frank and Emmeline are getting started on getting fucking drunk. Irene and Mathias' deaths were rough. At the time, Frank had admitted that he appreciated what Regulus did for Irene—a mercy killing, one necessary as it was, because Frank wouldn't have had the sponsors to help her anyway. Emmeline lost her last remaining tribute, too.

The cannon was for Juniper, not James.

It could have been James if not for Juniper. Axus had indeed been dragging James through the forest, only to fall in a hole, unbelievably enough. One Juniper had been digging in preparation for the approaching night. It had given James the time to get the hook out of his leg and run, but Axus killed Juniper, though not without her absolutely beating the fuck out of them first. Unfortunately, Axus had a weapon, so Juniper didn't make it.

James got away, though. He's hiding now, because his leg is quite bad, but Axus doesn't know where he went. They may be looking for him, but they're going in the wrong direction, and it won't be long before they'll need to settle down to get ready for the drop in temperature. James is alone in a cave no one's been in before, in a lot of pain, but he's alive.

The problem is, Regulus is freaking the fuck out.

Genuinely, he's spiraling. Sirius doesn't think he's ever seen Regulus like this, not once in his life. It's that bad. Maybe it's not obvious to most, but Sirius knows his brother, and Regulus is failing to keep it together. Until he knows James is alive, he's going to continue to lose his collective shit.

Sirius has to tell him somehow. He has to calm Regulus down, because Regulus needs to go find James as soon as fucking possible. He's the key to healing James, because no sponsor wants to send medication until Regulus and James are reunited, wanting more romance between them, because that's more important to them than James' pain.

It makes Sirius want to rip the world apart, makes him want to shake these people, scream in their faces, just fucking lose it on them. These people are enjoying the fact that Regulus seems so upset about thinking James is dead. They're all sick fucks.

Sirius has been trying as hard as he can, but no one will do anything so soon, not until they see what Regulus is going to do. So, to help James and to calm Regulus down, Sirius needs to find some way to tell him what's going on.

He can't do that through a sponsor. They'll never allow it.

It's going to have to be in the arena.

"Sirius," Marlene says sharply when he pulls away.

"I need to go," Sirius declares. "I'm—I'm really sorry about Vanity and Hodge, Marlene. I truly am. Just—I have to go, alright? I have to try."

Marlene swallows. "Be careful. Don't do anything stupid."

Sirius doesn't reply, because if it takes something stupid to save his best friend's life and pick up the pieces of his brother, then he'll do it without hesitation.

Here's to hoping he doesn't have to.

Chapter End Notes

for those of you who do not want to read AT ALL, and just want a quick summary so you can skip the chapter entirely (which is valid), then ill do that first. SPOILERS AHEAD: ill water it down as much as i possibly can. so, basically, peter doesn't get to light the third fire before the death eaters catch up with him. they beat him up pretty badly, and they're about to kill him when bernice makes the comment that she wants james and regulus dead. peter tells her that he knows where they are and can take the death eaters to them, and so they go. a fight breaks out that ends with willa, hodge, vanity, irene, and mathias all dying—in that order. following that, regulus gets stuck on the other side of the river again, while axus throws their hook into james' leg and drags him off into the woods. a cannon sounds, and regulus has a panic attack because he thinks it's james, but it's juniper. seeing regulus so upset and knowing that to help james get medicine, then regulus will have to reunite with james, sirius sets out to find some way to let regulus know that james is alive.

for those of you who want/need more in-depth warnings to read:

-the depictions of violence: when the death eaters locate peter, they beat him very badly, and he gets shot in the leg with an arrow. he is described as begging for his life and crying, as well as apologizing repeatedly out of fear/desperation.

bernice and regulus get into a fight, and she nearly chokes him out, but peter saves him before she does.

axus and irene—and mathias—get into a fight as well. irene slashes at axus' leg with her sword, and axus buries their hook in irene's side, but she pulls it out and keeps fighting. mathias shoots their crossbow, but axus turns irene so that she takes the shot to the chest. regulus throws one of his daggers and hits axus in the arm with it.

-the depictions of injury: there's a description where james takes axus' hook to his thigh, and it's brief, but it is described as breaking through one side to the other.

-the depictions of murder/death (not the children/minors): mathias ends up in the river while attempting to run across the bridge, but axus uses their hook to yank it enough that the bridge gets dragged under, mathias along with it.

the depictions of children/minors dying: it's fairly brief, but willa is stung by vespa (the horcrux hornet) and falls into the river, taking vespa with her when she goes. following that, hodge uses his knife on vanity to cut her throat after bernice screams at him to kill her. james, while trying to reach her, shoves hodge aside, pushing harder than he means to in his panic, and hodge goes into the river as well. there's a brief scene describing the blood on vanity's throat and on her lips, but her death is fairly quick, just very fucking sad. juniper also dies—killed by axus, who fell in the hole she was digging—but it's not described and it's only mentioned, and it's said that she beat the shit out of axus before she died.

the depiction of a mercy-killing: after irene takes a crossbow bolt to the chest, she's carried over the bridge by mathias and regulus. she sends mathias away, and because she's in a lot of pain, she asks that regulus will kill her to make it quicker, so he does at her request. it's not described in too much detail, but it's explicitly stated that he stabs her in the heart, between her ribs, to make it as fast as possible.

for everyone else who has finished...

now you see why this one was so hard for me to write. like, i KNOW they're not real, and yet i still felt so bad. it's a lot all at once as well, which makes it even more difficult to digest.

i think it hits even harder when you realize that vanity and hodge are narrative foils to james and regulus, and also that hodge is a direct narrative parallel to regulus, if he had ended up in the arena when his name was called the first time. also, the fact that regulus stabbing irene was foreshadowed, and mathias used to miss most shots with their crossbow in the training room, but didn't miss this one...

also, regulus frantically begging sirius to tell him that the person who died wasn't james... and james being so upset about vanity, then getting injured again... im going to walk directly into traffic. goodbye, cruel world.

i say all of this as if i did not write it. just know that i, too, hate that ive written this. please don't be too harsh with me. im as devasted, i assure you.

let me do numbers, i guess :/

tributes remaining: 5
tributes who have died as of this chapter:
dylan
avery
quinn
evan mulciber
willa hodge vanity irene mathias juniper
eight unnamed/unknown others

Hope

Chapter Notes

hello!

warnings for this chapter:

-references to past death
-referenced to past child death
-references to past injuries
-references to past torture (sort of??? it's vaguely hinted at, but just in case)
-references to being sexualized as a minor (because of the whole Hallow thinking of sirius as a sex symbol, and it's not expressed in detail, but it's explicitly stated)
-discussions of issues surrounding sex and desire you may not believe me, considering the previous chapter, but this one is really not as bad as the one before it—though, considering the previous one, that's not really saying much. the bar is on the floor, i am aware, but i really do think this will be soothing in some parts, at least.

enjoy <3

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Horace Slughorn looks mildly surprised to find Sirius requesting to speak to him, but he dutifully steps out of the gamemaker room, shutting the door behind him. Sirius plasters on his brightest smile, like his best friend isn't injured and his little brother isn't losing his mind.

"Sirius, m'boy, how can I help you?" Slughorn asks. "I'll have to ask you to make it quick, whatever it is, because we're hard at work, you understand."

Hard at work destroying lives, Sirius thinks, but he only chuckles and says, "Oh, yes, I don't doubt it. A good turnout, isn't it? Six dead all so close together. We haven't seen such action like that in…years, honestly. Positive reviews so far?"

"Overwhelmingly positive," Slughorn confirms, giving Sirius further reason to lose all faith in humanity. "Again, I have to thank you. I did not expect James and Regulus to be such a focal point this year, if I'm honest, but they're all anyone can talk about. James' moment with Vanity was especially moving, and now your brother is a mess at the thought that James is dead. The reunion will be magical, surely."

"Oh, if only," Sirius says, adopting an apologetic frown, and Slughorn's eyebrows furrow. "It's just—well, I'll admit that Regulus will likely be relieved when he finds James again, but I'm sorry to say that he'll still be quite withdrawn. I fear the viewers might end up being disappointed, after all."

Slughorn looks startled. "Surely this is enough to bring the boy's feelings to the surface. It warrants a kiss, at the very least. Perhaps a love confession?"

"Regulus won't see it that way," Sirius murmurs, feeling sick that he's standing here, talking about his little brother's love life, plotting how to use it to their advantage while pretending to let Slughorn use it to his advantage. "See, you asked before what it would take to, ah, break through to Regulus, what push he needs, and I'm here to tell you."

"Yes?" Slughorn prompts, watching him eagerly, focused.

Sirius reaches out and gently squeezes Slughorn's shoulder, lowering his voice like he's trading secrets. "Hope. Regulus needs hope."

"Hope," Slughorn replies, leaning back a little to blink at him.

"Mhm." Sirius nods his head and gently squeezes his shoulder again. "Regulus isn't the type of person who believes in the saying: it's better to have loved and lost than never love at all. In fact, he will go out of his way to avoid love if he knows he's going to end up losing, you see, but if he had hope…"

"Well, unfortunately he'll end up losing regardless, so I'm not sure what you mean," Slughorn says.

"The thing is, Regulus wouldn't keep holding himself back if he knew he had a future to look forward to with James. A future to fight for," Sirius tells him, his heart racing as he works to keep himself outwardly calm. If this works… Fuck, if he manages to pull this off… The mere thought makes his hands shake, but he covers it well, and Slughorn doesn't notice. "He'd put up a fight like no other if he had that hope."

Slughorn is silent for a long moment, and Sirius can see the idea taking shape in his eyes; Sirius knows what it is, because he's leading Slughorn right to it. He just has to say it, like it's his idea, and Sirius will play him like a fiddle. Come on, come on, you're almost there, Sirius thinks.

"A future," Slughorn muses thoughtfully, and again, Sirius gently squeezes his shoulder—reinforcing good behavior and approval through body language. Sirius has this down to a science after years of being a mentor. "If I could give Regulus hope, you say? Hope for a future? One in which he could be with James, even…past the games?"

"That would do it, yes," Sirius assures him.

Slughorn hums. "That would facilitate all the proper romantic peaks everyone is looking for between them?"

"Without a doubt," Sirius confirms.

"So…the promise of two Victors," Slughorn says softly. "Two tributes from the same district could be Victors."

"Oh, brilliant," Sirius breathes out, beaming at him and squeezing his shoulder again. "You're brilliant. The best head gamemaker the hunger games has ever seen, no doubt. It's never been done before, you know. You'd be the first. You'd go down in history for it, and the audience—oh, the viewers would go ballistic. You'd be their hero!"

"They would like that, wouldn't they?" Slughorn agrees with a chortle, looking pleased, and of course he likes the praise. Of course he likes the idea that it was his idea. That's the whole point, really, because Sirius knows exactly what he's doing.

Sirius leans in conspiratorially. "They'd raise statues in your honor, and not only would you be facilitating romance, but you'd also have drama. Peter and Bernice remain as well, so that will keep the viewers on the edge of their seat if they decide to team up. Your idea—it's literally perfect. My word, I hope it isn't a bother for me to say, but your mind is at a level of which I could only dream of one day reaching."

"Oh, that's…" Slughorn turns vaguely puce, waving his hand as if to lightly brush off Sirius' words, but it's clearly pleased him. He's an older man with no children, and in his age, it seems that he wants to be influential to those younger to him; revered by them; praised by them. "Sirius, dear boy, you flatter me. I'm sure you'll be wise by the time you reach my age."

"Never as wise as you," Sirius says with a rich laugh, once again squeezing Slughorn's shoulder. "My apologies for taking your time. I'll let you get back to work, shall I?"

Slughorn smiles. "For the best. I have a lot of work to do."

~•~

Dorcas doesn't think she's ever rushed like this before in her life. She also hasn't looked like this where anyone could see her since… Well, frankly she can't remember a time that she's ever let herself look like this in public. She's wearing a holey t-shirt, thin pajama pants with blue cats all over them, a pair of green slippers, no accessories or makeup, and a bonnet.

Dorcas hasn't so much as left her place without being fully dressed, her hair and makeup done, wearing jewelry, and in a nice pair of shoes in years.

None of that matters, though, not really.

Not now.

Not when Vanity and Hodge are dead. Dorcas watched it happen, stricken enough that she broke down crying, and as soon as she got her wits enough to calm down, she started running. She barely even stopped to get her shoes.

Dorcas' chest is heaving when she finally comes to a stop in front of the door she's been running to like a maniac, not even bothering to try to get a ride. Her place was close enough that waiting for a ride wasn't something she was willing to do. So, instead, she ran. She never once stopped.

And now, here she is, gasping for air and genuinely exhausted as she raises her hand and knocks on the door. She tries to catch her breath, but it doesn't really work. Her whole body is screaming in protest for her ridiculous antics, but—

But Marlene opens the door, and it's worth it.

"I—I came as fast—as fast as I could," Dorcas pants out, holding her side where it aches from running.

Instantly, Marlene's face crumbles, and she practically spills out of the doorway and right into Dorcas' arms. Dorcas reaches up to wrap her arms around her tight, cupping the back of her head as she muffles a gut-wrenching sob right into Dorcas' shoulder. She's clinging, digging her fingers into Dorcas' back like claws, shuddering against her like she's falling apart. Dorcas swallows harshly and keeps an arm around her as she navigates them into the suite.

Marlene lets herself be led inside, trusting Dorcas to move her around while she's still attached, not caring if she stumbles. Dorcas doesn't care either; she closes the door and locks it, then carefully leads Marlene over to the lounge chair, pulling Marlene down on it with her. Marlene practically collapses against her and cries into her throat, and all Dorcas can do is turn her face into Marlene's hair and silently cry with her.

"They were—they were so young," Marlene chokes out.

"I know," Dorcas whispers. "I know, Marlene. I'm so sorry."

It's a long time before Marlene calms down enough to stop crying, and even then, her breath hiccups out of her and she keeps sniffling. She doesn't raise her head from Dorcas' chest, and she breathes soft and slow, her fingers limp where they're draped over Dorcas' arm. Dorcas cards her fingers gently though Marlene's hair, careful not to pull on it.

"They made it so far," Marlene rasps, eventually. "Was it stupid of me to hope one of them could make it home?"

"No," Dorcas murmurs. "No, that wasn't stupid. You believed in them. You cared about them. That's never stupid."

Marlene takes in a soft, hitched breath. "I tried so hard, Dorcas, and the whole time—even from the start—I knew they wouldn't make it. I just… I really wanted to be wrong."

"I'm sorry," Dorcas tells her, a lump in her throat, because she is. It's not her fault, but that doesn't stop her from wishing it never happened, wishing she could fix it. She's so fucking sorry that they're gone, that Marlene is in pain, because it's not fair. None of this is fair.

"Why would he do that?" Marlene whispers, lifting her head to look at Dorcas through puffy eyes. "Hodge just—he killed her. Why would he—how could he—"

"He was scared, I think." Dorcas takes a deep breath and pulls her hand forward to cup Marlene's cheek, swiping her thumb through teartracks. "I don't know. I—I really can't say, but he was being yelled at by Bernice; his other friend has just died, Willa; everyone was fighting, and James was running right for him. Up until that point, he never really hurt anyone. I think it just came down to fear."

"It's just fucked," Marlene says. "She had a crush on him, and she spent her last moments knowing that he killed her. And worrying about Vespa, who she just saw get taken into the river, except Vespa is basically immortal, so she's just perpetually suffering, I guess." Marlene shakes her head. "I know that's exactly what Vanity was probably thinking about while she was dying. Oh, and James. At least she had James."

"I, um. Well, I didn't get to see everything that happened after," Dorcas admits. "I pretty much immediately left, so I have no idea what happened to the others."

"Did you—did you run here?" Marlene croaks, staring at her with wide, watery eyes.

Dorcas nods. "About four miles, yeah."

Marlene stares at her for a long moment, then shifts up and grips the cushion by Dorcas' head to lean in and kiss her. It's not a deep kiss, not harsh or biting or heated. It's soft. So soft and so gentle, just a brush of mouths, warm and sweet. For someone who doesn't remember how to be gentle, Marlene takes to it startlingly well, treating Dorcas like she's precious.

"Thank you," Marlene whispers when she pulls away.

"Of course. I—I told you, I care about them, too," Dorcas says with a weak smile. "And I care about you, if that wasn't obvious. I don't leave the house like this for just anyone, McKinnon. I look—"

"Beautiful," Marlene cuts in, full-stop, like it's not even up for debate. "You're beautiful, Dorcas, always."

Dorcas knows beauty isn't the most important thing in this world—there are far more pressing matters than what one looks like, which not enough Hallows know—but that doesn't mean she doesn't appreciate the compliment. She wouldn't say she's vain, or insecure, but she's grown up in a setting where beauty is almost a currency. Marlene makes her feel rich, and she's never really been poor in that regard anyway.

Marlene lays her head back on Dorcas' chest, and Dorcas strokes her hair in silence again. Neither of them speak for a long time, and Dorcas knows they're both thinking of Vanity and Hodge. They're not the only ones who cared about them, because they no doubt had family, and Dorcas watched enough of the games to see that James, Peter, Irene, Mathias, and even Regulus cared about Vanity. Hodge's closest friend was Willa, due to the similarities in their age, but even that was a bit of a stretch. Still, that's not enough. The whole world should have cared, but so few actually did.

So few actually do care about any of these people. It's like as soon as they enter the arena, the tributes are nothing more than characters in a show to them, except these are real people's lives. For some, the stakes are what draw them in. For others, they're willfully ignorant to the reality staring them right in the face. They don't want to see it, because looking at it means seeing their part in it.

One day, these people are going to find themselves caught in the midst of a war—one that's building—and they're not even going to understand why, or what's happening. Some people will see it for what it is, and there will even be some that are going to do the right thing.

Like Gideon and Fabian. They were never ignorant, and Dorcas knew instantly that they would be willing to fight. She didn't expect them to die for the cause before the war ever reached them. And now there's Molly, who is on a train right now to go see her brothers' bodies at the Phoenix, because the Order retrieved them after an informant told them where they were dumped. They'll have funerals, and Molly will get to attend, but Molly will never again get to come home. When she left, she left everything behind to fight in her brothers' name in a war that's barely even started yet.

One of Dorcas' biggest regrets is recruiting Fabian and Gideon Prewett in the Order of the Phoenix. She knows she's supposed to. That's literally her job, but they're dead, and she can't help but feel partially at fault. She has a lot of responsibilities in the Order from her place in the Hallow, and she knows the risks just like everyone, but it never sits right with her when she sees another person brought into this and has to come to terms with the fact that they might die.

"I want to burn the Hallow for this," Marlene rasps, and Dorcas feels her heart jump. "Sorry if that's offensive, but—"

"No," Dorcas says quickly. "That's—no, it's fine. I do, too."

"If I could, I would bring the Hallow to its knees," Marlene informs her, sounding downright dangerous. Dorcas swallows thickly, staring up at the ceiling as she continues to pass her fingers through Marlene's hair. "If there was some way to do it, I'd give anything to take Riddle down and end these games so what happened to Vanity and Hodge never happens again."

Dorcas holds her breath for a long moment. It's like she can feel Dumbledore's piercing gaze on the side of her head from here, which is ridiculous. He's like a shadow in the room, waiting in the corner, looming with his withered hands folded ever so gently together. She knows what he wants; she knows what she's supposed to do in this situation.

Exhaling slowly, Dorcas tips her head down to look at Marlene where she's still resting her head on her chest. Carefully, with a tenderness that makes her chest ache, Dorcas sweeps her hair back from her face, and she can't. Dorcas can't do it. She knows that she should, that it would make up for the loss of Gideon and Fabian, in Dumbledore's eyes, and it's not as if Marlene wouldn't be a brilliant asset.

But Dorcas can't do it. Whether Marlene would be willing to take the risks or not, Dorcas isn't willing to risk her. Not her. Not Marlene, who cares about children despite the fact that she knew she couldn't save them. Not Marlene, who has a rough grip and kindness in her heart. Not Marlene, who wants to fight, but deserves to rest. She deserves to be safe.

So, all Dorcas says is, "Yeah, Marlene, me too."

"A part of me is—" Marlene's voice catches, but she breathes, and it evens out again. "I know this is awful, but a part of me is relieved. Just relieved that it's over, and they're not suffering anymore. And neither am I. Maybe that's selfish—"

"I don't think so," Dorcas murmurs, sliding her hand down to cup Marlene's jaw and tilt her face up. "I think you're allowed to feel however you feel about it. This isn't… Well, you already know that this situation is fucked up as it is. We're hardly going to respond to it conventionally, are we?"

"No, I suppose not," Marlene replies quietly.

"I'm here, alright? I'm here," Dorcas tells her, then dips in and presses a short, warm kiss to her mouth, mostly in the need for comfort and the desire to give it.

As Dorcas pulls back, Marlene mumbles, "You're a really good—"

"Hook-up?" Dorcas fills in when Marlene seemingly gets stuck. Her mouth twitches up slightly when Marlene clears her throat and purses her lips.

"Well, you're a little bit more than a hook-up, at this point, I would say," Marlene tells her, gesturing to her current state pointedly, making it clear that just some random hook-up wouldn't get to see her like this—and Dorcas gets that, really. It's not exactly something you share with just anyone. Things like this can be even more intimate than sex. "No, I think you're a good…friend, Dorcas Meadowes."

"A good friend," Dorcas repeats softly, her lips curling up helplessly as Marlene avoids her gaze. The thing is, Dorcas can't really offer her anything else, as much as she would like to. Of course a part of her wants to say fuck friends, let's be more, but it's not that simple. She has responsibilities, and her permanence in this world—in this brewing war—is not guaranteed. Frankly, the more Marlene gets involved with her, the more danger she's in, and the more she has to lose. While Dumbledore would be willing to ask her to take such risks, Dorcas is not, so she says, "Well, I'm honored to be your good friend, Marlene McKinnon."

Marlene meets her gaze, and she looks slightly disappointed, but she has a lot of things to be disappointed right now, so Dorcas is sure she hardly qualifies. Marlene doesn't fight it, in any case. She just quirks a tiny smile and murmurs, "Yeah."

"Come here," Dorcas whispers, pulling her in again.

"Will you stay tonight?" Marlene whispers back, settling in against her once more.

"Of course," Dorcas answers, and she does.

What are friends for, right?

~•~

Remus watches with Pandora's hand holding his tight as Regulus goes through the first stage of grief—denial—then hits anger and gets stuck, or maybe he just goes mental.

Whatever it is, it's awful to watch.

Regulus moves like a man on a mission, stomping from the cave to the river over and over to drop each weapon and every bag of supplies—excluding his own—into the water to be taken under by pale, clawed, skeletal hands. He tosses away practically everything; every tool, every bit of food and water, and every single weapon not already gone or taken. He keeps his dagger and his bag of supplies, and that's it.

Remus is quite sure that Regulus' plan is to murder everyone. He's making it very clear that the only way to properly survive this will be to fight, and based on his visible pent-up agitation, he's just itching for a fight. From what Remus has gathered, Regulus is about to go from the hunted to the hunter.

It's getting late, the temperature clearly dropping, but the river still hasn't iced over yet. Remus wonders if that's on purpose, if the gamemakers are deliberately keeping Regulus in a cage. He's pacing like a wild animal, unable to be still, blatantly waiting for the chance to go. No one's ever stayed awake to chase people down before, simply because it's too cold, Remus thinks, but he's pretty sure Regulus is about to be the first. He's so vengeful that Remus genuinely believes he will find each and every remaining person to kill them.

Unbeknownst to him, however, James is very alive. He's sequestered away in a small cave, clearly in a lot of pain. Thankfully, he's wrapped his leg, but it obviously hurts him. What hurts him more, Remus thinks, is the loss of all his friends in one fell swoop. James is grieving, there's no denying that; he's just sitting there, weeping as he stares down at the vial of Horcrux Hornet venom Vanity died holding onto.

James is slumped inside his cave, and his escape has clearly taken a lot out of him, because he's starting to nod off, despite his grief. His eyes are visibly drooping, and it doesn't take long at all before he's passed out. Remus doesn't know if it's from the blood loss or the pain, but it's worrying anyway.

Remus is on edge for many different reasons. Regulus and James are in the final five, and they're both hurting. Bernice and Axus are still out there. They haven't found each other yet, both settling down on their own for the night, but Remus knows it's only a matter of time—if Regulus doesn't get to them first. Peter also remains, but his stance as an ally is undetermined, as far as Remus is concerned. Yes, he helped keep Bernice from killing Regulus, but he also sold out James and Regulus to Bernice in the first place; in a way, he's partly responsible for the deaths of so many of his allies, people that he spent time with and ended up caring for. It came from fear and the desperate need to survive, Remus knows that, but it still infuriates him, because all of that carnage could have been avoided if Peter didn't do what he did.

"Attention, all tributes," Slughorn's voice rings through the arena, loud and clear, and four of the tributes look up at the same time, because James is knocked out. Remus tenses as Pandora grips his hand tighter and holds her breath. "The current rule allowing only one Victor is now officially changed to allow two tributes from the same district to be Victors. That is all. May the odds be ever in your favor…"

As Slughorn's voice fades out, Remus feels a shock run down his spine as soon as it hits him what that means. He sucks in a sharp breath, his heart surging forward in his chest, because that means—that means James and Regulus can win.

Both of them.

On the screen, Regulus seems to be realizing this, too, and it apparently smacks him right out of his anger as he tilts his head up to the sky with a furrow in his eyebrows. His lips part, something shifting in his eyes, and then he slowly swivels his head as if in deep thought. It takes him a second, another, then one more, and then his eyes absolutely light the fuck up.

"James," Regulus breathes out, then starts running.

"No, no, no," Remus blurts out, jolting forward as panic seizes him. "Not the—oh, Regulus, the river—"

It's close. Too close. Regulus seems to remember at the very last moment that he can't simply walk on water, and he skids along the ground with a curse, trying to skitter back as his momentum sends him forward. His boot grazes the water, and he yelps as he frantically shoves himself away, a pale hand darting up out of the surface to reach for him. Regulus kicks it hard and drags himself back, panting as he makes it a safe distance away. Remus finally exhales.

As for James, he remains passed out. He has clearly missed the announcement entirely. Remus doesn't doubt that Regulus will tell him as soon as he finds him, though.

"They can come home. Remus, they both can make it home," Pandora rasps, turning in her seat to stare at him with wide eyes full of tears, a beaming smile on her face.

"I know," Remus agrees, breathless, and then they're both laughing and snatching each other into celebratory hugs, squeezing one another tight and swaying in place.

Perhaps ridiculously, Remus feels his heart swell, because as sad as it is that so many people are dead, there's still hope to be found. The people he cares about, truly cares about for the first time in five years—they're alive, and they can come home.

And Sirius. Oh, he must be—fuck, Remus can just imagine. Hope is an invigorating thing, and it doesn't matter if James and Regulus still have three people to beat, because the odds… For once, the odds are actually in their favor. They're so close, and Sirius is surely going to be fucking ecstatic.

If Regulus was desperate to get across the river before, that's nothing compared to him now. He seems less murderous, at least, but more frustrated than ever. The gamemakers keep him there, though, the light slowly fading and temperature clearly dropping, if the visible puffs of air leaving Regulus' mouth are anything to go by. Still, the river doesn't ice over.

First, there's the banners that play in the sky to signal all those that died, which takes place again tonight. Just like every other night, it goes in order.

To start with, there's Willa. Bernice and Axus watch from their positions, and Remus sees the grim expressions on their faces. In a way, Willa was the death eaters' Vanity; it was never Hodge, because he annoyed them all with his lack of abilities or willingness to kill. Maybe that's why he killed Vanity, finally cracking under the pressure, just trying to make someone proud. He was so young. Willa was, too.

Next is Hodge, which doesn't get the response it likely would if James were still awake. Regulus averts his eyes, and Peter visibly grimaces, but no one else seems to care. Bernice even scoffs and rolls her eyes. It's fucking depressing.

Following Hodge is Vanity. Regulus' eyes sink shut, and he ducks his head. Peter weeps. Remus grimaces, his own heart clenching, because that one was rough—and of course James (even though he's asleep) and Peter are hurt; they were the ones with Vanity from the very first day, and Peter had even more time with her than James did. To know that they both tried so hard to protect her, and they couldn't… Yeah, Remus would weep, too.

Irene is next, and that one visibly hits Regulus hard. It seems Regulus blames himself in some way. Maybe because it was his dagger that put her out of her misery. Eased her pain. It was a mercy killing, one she'd requested, but that doesn't keep Regulus from feeling responsible for it, clearly, even though she was going to die anyway.

Mathias next, and again, that one gets to them, too. Peter's friend. James' friend. Remus doesn't know if Regulus saw them as a friend or not, but he obviously feels sorrow about the whole thing. Mathias died in a blind rage, desperate to avenge Irene's death, and there was some sort of cruel irony to the fact that they died on the bridge they built.

And, finally, there's Juniper.

This one gets mixed reactions. Bernice doesn't seem to care. Peter frowns and looks confused, his face scrunching like he doesn't even remember who she was. Axus scowls and lifts their hand to touch all their bruises that Juniper gave them, because she absolutely beat the fuck out of them before they killed her, like a feral little girl, frankly.

Regulus, though? He makes a choked noise, and then he releases a wheezing laugh and presses his face to his knees, sucking in deep breaths. It's relief. Undeniable relief. There's nothing else it could be, because that's so obviously what it is, and Remus knows exactly why. He's not relieved that Juniper is dead; he's relieved that James isn't.

There's confirmation. The announcement seemed to convince Regulus, but the proof brings him obvious solace.

Still, a bit later, Regulus remains trapped, and Pandora groans before saying, "Oh, they're just torturing him at this point. Let him go, for goodness sake."

"I think the river ices over at the same time every night," Remus admits with a sigh. "Not too long now."

"Look at him," Pandora whispers, watching Regulus once again pacing restlessly on the screen. "I don't think it matters how he actually feels about James. He wants so badly to get them both home. And James is…"

"Stuck," Remus murmurs with a wince, because James is, in fact, quite stuck.

Again, Remus feels concern shoot through him. Sirius still isn't back, and there's been nothing sent to James. If that wound is as bad as it looks, it's at a higher risk of infection; if sepsis sets in, he'll die. It could take as little as three days, and that's if no one comes to kill him first. Sirius knows this, so there's no doubt in Remus' mind that he's working hard to—

"Remus! Remus, it's starting to ice over," Pandora declares in visible excitement, bouncing in place. She reaches out to grab his thigh. "Almost… Almost... Alm—"

Regulus shoots off like a rocket before the river is even fully iced over all the way, following along the ice as it crawls across in front of him. Every step makes the ice fracture under his feet, but he doesn't seem to care. He doesn't even wait for the last little bit to ice over; he just launches himself forward and hits the ground running. On his way to the forest, he snatches up James' hatchet, and even that doesn't slow him down.

"Yes!" Pandora crows, tossing her hands up in delight.

At that exact moment, the door to the suite bangs open.

It's Sirius. He comes bursting in, eyes bright as the door shuts and locks behind him. His chest is heaving as if he's been running, and he looks flushed, something absolutely wondrous about his expression right now. Remus doesn't realize he's standing up until he finds himself moving along the edge of furniture to see Sirius better.

He's shaking from head-to-toe, rattling like he's about to fly apart with all the energy set loose within him. He's quite literally vibrating, and he looks like he wants to bounce around the room, bounce off the walls, run laps and shriek with joy at the top of his lungs. It reminds Remus vaguely of dogs getting the zoomies, finally unclipped from their leashes and desperate to just fucking run.

This turns out to be quite similar to what Sirius does, actually. Before Remus can even open his mouth to speak, Sirius sprints right for him, rushing across the room to launch himself directly into Remus' arms. Remus catches him with a grunt, stumbling back a step or two, but he mostly remains steady. Sirius has thrown his arms around Remus' shoulders while Remus catches him around his waist, and he can feel Sirius' frantic heartbeat against his own. Sirius is breathing hard, as if he's been running already.

"I take it you heard the announcement?" Remus whispers, laughing softly when Sirius squeezes him.

Sirius' hands fly up to frame Remus' face, and his voice is legitimately shaking when he croaks, "I—I did it. Remus, it was me. I convinced Slughorn to do that. I'm—"

"Brilliant," Remus says, breathless. "You're fucking brilliant."

"I saved them. I'm going to save them. Both of them," Sirius chants, and he's shining like a fucking star right now.

"You did. You—" Remus is cut off by Sirius kissing him, a harsh yet happy press of their mouths. It breaks quickly, and Remus thinks his heart might burst. "Yeah, you are. You're going to get them back. Both of them."

"They're going to come home," Sirius chokes out, and he's suddenly crying, even while he laughs. He's trembling still, but Remus holds onto him. "Both of them."

Sirius is clearly delirious with relief and excitement, which apparently leads him to press short—but fierce—kisses to Remus' mouth over and over in between choked laughter and a stream of tears. Remus lets him, meeting him halfway each time, feeling the moment swell around them until he almost can't breathe from it; the relief, the hope, the pure respite from all that's been wrong this entire time. It's like a break between dark clouds, the storm finally easing up.

Remus isn't surprised that Sirius ends up overwhelmed by it. The kisses taper off until Sirius is just hugging him, burying his face into the bend of his throat, and that's where he stays for long enough that Remus thinks he's probably not going to let go first. That's fine. He can do whatever he wants.

Carefully, Remus turns his head to glance over at Pandora. She's giving them privacy, watching Regulus on the screen instead, who has started his search.

"Sirius," Remus says gently, and Sirius raises his head slowly, seemingly calmer now. "Regulus is looking for James. Is—I mean, was no one willing to sponsor him?"

At this, some of Sirius' palpable joy wanes, but only a bit. He shakes his head. "No, people were definitely willing to sponsor James, but they want… Well, they want Reggie and James to earn it, basically. They want a show, of course."

"Don't they always?" Pandora asks bitterly. "Animals, the lot of them. They don't care about James; they only care about how he can entertain them. Oh, I could just—"

"Yeah, me too," Sirius says with a soft smile as he watches her mime strangling someone with her hands. He leans his head over on Remus' shoulder, not bothering to pull away from him as he talks to her. "It's okay, though, because Regulus will find James, and then I'll make sure James gets healed, and then it's just three. Only three, and then they're home. Pandora —"

"I know," Pandora breathes out, turning to reach over the back of her seat, holding her hand out to him. Sirius breaks away from Remus for this, grabbing onto hers, and he looks mildly startled when she dips her head over his hand and kisses it. He blinks, then seems to realize she's essentially telling him that she admires him, and he—blushes.

"Oh, don't do that," Sirius mumbles, flustered. "Stop that, Pandora, I'm your friend."

Pandora looks up with a smile. "Yes, you are, and you're one of the smartest men I've ever known. That deserves admiration. You're going to bring them home, Sirius."

"Well, they're going to bring themselves home," Sirius says sheepishly, "but I did make that possible, yes."

"Incredible," Pandora murmurs, then smacks a more playful kiss to the back of Sirius' hand, chuckling when he ruffles her hair as soon as she pulls away.

"There's still Peter, Bernice, and Axus to worry about, but I think—" Sirius takes a deep breath and focuses on the screen, crossing his arms. "I really do think James and Regulus stand a good chance, especially once James is healed up."

"All Regulus needs to do is find James," Pandora says.

Sirius heaves a sigh. "Which he won't be able to do tonight. He went in the wrong direction, unfortunately. The good news is that there's a trail, so he will find James, just not when it's cold and dark. He'll eventually settle in for sleep before he passes out, then start again tomorrow. James should be fine where he is until Regulus reaches him, so long as no one else does first."

"You don't sound too worried," Remus comments, admittedly surprised by this, because Sirius would usually be a lot more stressed right now.

"I'm not." Sirius cringes a little. "Slughorn and practically all the viewers are desperate for Regulus and James to reunite and show them romance, so I don't doubt that Slughorn is going to do everything to make that happen. People would be very disappointed otherwise, and he won't let that happen. Is it awful? Yes, but it's to our advantage, so I'll take it."

"We can work with that," Pandora agrees. She taps the seat beside her. "Come on. Come watch."

Sirius reaches back to grab Remus' hand, tugging him along, and that's what they all do. Just like every other night, they all watch, but there's something different this time.

They watch with hope.

~•~

As predicted, Regulus eventually does settle in for the night. Sirius knows he's exhausted, barely having slept at all the night before, suffering from being emotionally and physically drained after the day he's had. James remains passed out in his cave, cold and alone.

Still, despite the less-than-best (not even acceptable, really) circumstances in which they'll spend their night, Sirius doesn't feel that bad. Actually, he doesn't feel bad at all. He feels fucking fantastic, because Regulus will be back with James very soon, and as long as Regulus can figure out what it will take to heal James, everything will be fine. Regulus is smart; he'll work it out, surely. And then all that's left to do is make it through three people. Only three, and then they're lifted out of there and on their way home.

Sirius is feeling really, really fucking good about it. He's aware, of course, that it's not a good idea to celebrate too soon. Things could still go wrong. He also knows it's a bit fucked up for him to be so excited when all of his mentor friends just lost their tributes. On top of that, there's still all the problems that will arise when James and Regulus do make it home; every single thing they'll have to deal with, all the grief and pain and fear and trauma, as well as how they'll cope with it.

Yes, Sirius isn't ignorant to all of that, but for one second, just one day, he wants to be fucking happy about something. He wants to drown himself in his hope and let himself feel every inch of what could be. He'd clung to this so hard before, that James and Regulus would both survive somehow, because he couldn't fathom anything else, and he fucking made it happen. He's going to get them back. He's going to be able to wrap his arms around them both and know he did it; he did everything he could to save them both, and it fucking worked.

So, Sirius is in a good mood, despite all the negatives, and he refuses to feel guilty about it. Whatever may come, all the ways it could go wrong—Sirius doesn't want to exist there yet. He wants to exist here, where, for now, he has something to look forward to, something to actually hope for.

"I'm going to suffer through Rita to see what the response to the rule change is," Pandora informs them when the cameras fade out and the woman in question shows up on the screen.

Sirius nods gratefully, knowing she'll tell him anything he needs to know in the morning. He stands up and tugs on Remus' hand to encourage him to do the same, even as he looks at Pandora and says, "I'm going to change and head for bed, I think. It's been a long fucking day."

"Yeah, alright," Pandora murmurs. "If I'm in bed before you make your way out, Remus, goodnight."

"Same to you," Remus replies, letting Sirius tug him along.

It has indeed been a very long day, making this morning when he told Remus about his memory issues and kissed him for the second time seem like a lifetime ago. So much happens in such a short amount of time, and Sirius just wants it all to stop. He wants to push everything to the side and just…forget it all, for a bit. As a mentor, especially working so hard to keep James and Regulus alive, he doesn't really have that option, but with this rule change, it's as close as he's going to get.

"Sirius?"

Blinking, Sirius looks back as he pushes his door open and lets Remus sweep in before shutting it. "What?"

"Any particular reason you've brought me with you?" Remus asks, looking faintly amused. "You said you were going to bed, and as much as I'd like to join you…I will have to leave soon."

"Oh. Right." Again, Sirius blinks rapidly, reaching up to scratch the side of his head. Frankly, he doesn't know why he dragged Remus along; he just wasn't ready to let him go yet. Though, really, he never is. "Sorry, I suppose I just got a bit caught up in holding your hand. You didn't—obviously you didn't have to follow. Um, when do you need to go?"

Remus glances past him to look at the clock. "Mm, I don't have to go for another two hours. I can stay until then."

"Do you want to?" Sirius checks. "In here, I mean. With me."

"No, it's torture," Remus teases, and he shakes his head when Sirius huffs out a weak laugh and looks away. "Yes, Sirius, I'd like to stay with you until I have to go."

"Brilliant," Sirius declares, feeling a jolt of delight slam through him, and with all the good news, he can finally appreciate the feeling in its entirety. "No, yeah, brilliant. I have just the most energy right now, so do you mind—I mean, is it alright if I just talk your ear off as I change? Because, honestly, I feel like I'm going to explode. You don't have to listen; you can just tune me out and nod along, and that will be enough to keep me entertained."

"I'm happy to listen," Remus tells him, amused.

Sirius snorts and moves over to grab Remus by his shoulders, walking him over to the bed and gently pressing down so he'll sit on it, facing the closet. "If you last five minutes without tuning me out, I'll be shocked. No one can do that once I get going, except for maybe James, but he's usually going right along with me, so that's different."

"I like hearing you talk," Remus murmurs, tilting his head to look up at him, his long throat on display.

"Well, you're in luck," Sirius replies with a smile, then swivels on the spot to throw open the closet and step inside.

The next twenty minutes pass with Sirius chattering away at a rapid pace in between looking for something to sleep in; he wants something nice, something really nice that makes him feel good, sort of like a reward for actually accomplishing what he has today. Randomly, he pokes his head around the closet door to see if Remus is paying attention, and he always is.

Every time Sirius peeks out of the closet, Remus is sitting patiently in place, a mild smile curling his lips. His gaze is always warm with affection and fondness, and Sirius feels his heart beat faster with each stolen glance. He keeps retreating quickly, his face hot and his body…also hot.

Sirius does indeed spend plenty of time talking about the fact that Regulus and James both could be home, and how the first thing he's going to do as soon as he has the chance is hug them and maybe, possibly never let them go again. He also goes on a long tangent about clothes when he gets distracted by them, because he has options in the Hallow.

"I don't often feel good enough to actually wear a dress in the Hallow, but you should know, Remus, that I look fucking marvelous in a dress," Sirius feels the need to point out.

There's a beat, and then Remus says, "I won't believe that until I see the proof with my own eyes."

"You just want to see me in a dress."

"Yes, absolutely I do."

Sirius grins and pokes his head around the closet door to raise his eyebrows at Remus. "You should see me when I get my hair and makeup done. Oh, and put me in some heels? It's been ages, but I break necks when I walk by."

"I don't doubt it," Remus tells him, clearing his throat. Sirius leans further out until he's resting one arm against the wall, his torso on display in the closet doorway. To his credit, Remus is fighting valiantly to be a gentleman about this, not dropping Sirius' gaze to ogle him with his shirt off. Sirius can tell he's tempted, though; it's not off-putting when it's him.

"Do you really want to see me in a dress?" Sirius asks.

Remus blinks. "Sure, if you'd like."

"Come pick one, then," Sirius says lightly, then slips back into the closet, tucking his lips in to hide a grin.

"In the closet?" Remus calls.

"Where else?"

"Just—I mean, are you naked in there?"

Sirius stifles a laugh. "Only one way to find out, but the question is do you dare, Remus Lupin?"

Again, more silence. Sirius turns and waits, because he already knows what Remus will do. It might take him a second, but he's a rebellious bastard, always enticed by trouble and mischief, so much more daring than he lets on, so of course he will be in here with Sirius momentarily.

Sure enough, only a few moments later, Remus ducks inside the closet, which isn't too small, but not big enough for two grown men to have more than a two steps between them.

"Oh, hello, hi," Sirius teases.

"Hi," Remus replies, then tilts his head. "You're not naked."

"Yes, I'm still in my pants. Disappointing, isn't it?" Sirius says with a mock-sigh.

"Absolutely crushing," Remus murmurs, but he's distracted reaching out to trail the very tips of his fingers over the scar down by Sirius' left hip, on his stomach.

"Nearly killed me," Sirius comments, glancing down at it. Ten years later, and it's faded only a bit. "It would have if it wasn't the last wound I got before I won. They pulled me out and patched me up before I bled out, but not all wounds can be healed without scar tissue remaining behind."

"Yeah, I know," Remus says softly. He traces it again gently, and Sirius feels a shiver go up his spine at his touch. "You have more, don't you? You said that before."

"I have one on the back of my calf from where I was shot with an arrow," Sirius tells him, then turns around. "This one across my back where I was slashed with a sword."

Remus hums and reaches up to trace that one, too. It spans from Sirius' left shoulder all the way down to the small of his back. "It aches when it gets cold, doesn't it?"

"Yeah, it does," Sirius murmurs, eyebrows furrowed. Remus speaks like he knows, like he understands, but he did say he had scars as well, didn't he? "I also have a burn scar on my right knee. That one is rough. It's not too big, but it healed inside the arena, so there was nothing they could do about it."

"It should've never happened," Remus whispers.

Sirius turns back around slowly. "Too late for that now. But, you know, on the bright side, scars are sexy."

"I—" Remus blinks, then chuckles, his eyes softening as he breaks out into a grin. "Is that so?"

"Well, you can't deny that I'm only more attractive for it, can you?" Sirius asks, waggling his eyebrows and actively fishing for compliments at this point. He wants them. He wants Remus to look at him and like what he sees.

"No, I can't," Remus agrees, and Sirius resists the urge to do a little wriggle of triumph. "Really, your body is a galaxy, and your scars are your stars."

Sirius is once again caught off-guard, and it flusters him in seconds. He knows he's blushing, not only because he can feel the heat in his face, but also because Remus gets that fond, pleased look in his eyes. Sirius feels winded, like Remus just stole his breath, and so his voice is a soft rasp when he whispers, "Fancy a trip to space?"

"There is nothing I would like more," Remus says.

That's all Sirius really needs to close the distance between them, and then Remus is swooping in to kiss him before he can make it there first. Sirius is immediately swept up into it, pressing as close as he can get and winding his hands into Remus' hair. He shudders as Remus' hands land on his bare skin, roaming along his sides and his back.

They're both breathing a little shakily, heavy and panting as their mouths break apart and come right back together over and over. Remus' hand on Sirius' lower back slides up, and the other drops down to grip his hip, holding on firmly as he starts walking Sirius back.

Sirius goes wherever Remus wants him to, willing to do anything or go anywhere, whatever Remus wants. This ends up with him bumping into the closet door, making it clatter since it's in the way, but Remus mindlessly yanks it aside without ever breaking the kiss. He shoves it away so hard that it rattles as it flings open, and Sirius' breath hitches at the sound. It fills the space around them with a sense of urgency, and Remus is so single-mindedly focused on him right now that Sirius feels like his knees are about to buckle.

Remus pushes him back, keeping him from tripping, and Sirius doesn't even care about his balance at the moment. All he cares about is the world-altering heat of Remus' mouth, and the way one of Remus' hands sink into his hair.

Remus does something downright sinful with his tongue that drags a low groan out of Sirius' throat. He's never heard himself make that noise before, not for anything, and he's not sure how he feels about it, because it sounded needy and desperate. Whether he likes it or not, Remus sure seems to. His fingers tighten in Sirius' hair—not enough to hurt, but enough to encourage Sirius to tip his head back, which he does—and he pulls away from the kiss to bring his mouth to Sirius' throat instead. Sirius doesn't even mean to, but he arches into it, his hand tightening in Remus' hair, which is soft between his fingers and winding around his knuckles.

The attention that Remus gives his neck makes Sirius' head all foggy, like he's in a fugue state, his consciousness dancing somewhere out of reach. He feels weak all over, and terribly shaky, but in a good way? A really, really good way. He actually feels like he's about to just —fall over, like he'll tip back on the floor and take a moment that he may or may not need. He doesn't want it, not in the least, but he's so overwhelmed that he kind of feels like he should lay down.

Remus does not seem to pick up on this, but Sirius can't really blame him; he's really focused on what he's doing, and Sirius sure as hell isn't about to be the one to stop him. There's the catch of teeth against his throat, an exploratory nip more than anything, and Sirius hears himself make that sound again. High and thin in his throat, he moans a bit too loud, probably, but again—he can't help it. At least Remus seems to like it, which he makes obvious by pressing closer to Sirius.

"Remus, your—the—can I—I want—" Sirius can't form complete sentences at the moment, but Remus seems to pick up on what he's asking for anyway.

Without hesitation, Remus pulls back and snatches his shirt off, tossing it off over his head carelessly. It's the same one he always wears, the one all servants wear—a boxy, grey shirt with long-sleeves. Very unassuming. Nothing noticeable or eye-catching about it. Also a damn crime, because what it's been hiding underneath…

And look, Sirius has had the privilege of running his hands all over Remus' chest and shoulders, so he knows just how firm Remus is, but seeing it is something else entirely. Sirius can only make a hoarse noise and reach out to touch, genuinely feeling a bit weak in the knees. Remus is fucking fit.

"When I get bored in my cell, I exercise," Remus explains.

"I can see that," Sirius croaks, sounding like he might start crying at any moment. He feels like he is. Have you ever seen someone so beautiful that you want to cry? Well, Sirius officially has. "Remus, you're—fucking hell, you're—"

"Oh, I'm not this flawless all over," Remus mutters. "Have a look at my scars. It's only fair, I suppose."

Sirius blinks as Remus turns around, and then he sucks in a sharp breath, because fucking shit. Oh. Well, Remus has far more scars that Sirius does, that's for sure. The violence behind them is undeniable, and Sirius' stomach drops out from beneath him just imagining how Remus got them.

Remus' back is absolutely covered in thin, overlayed scars from what Sirius can only imagine was a whip. They span from the backs of his shoulders all the way down to the very bottom of his back. A few overlap to his sides, but not very much. It's all central to here, and Sirius knows what this is. It can only be one thing. Remus has been whipped a lot. This isn't just scars from one time; some of them are older than the others, more faded, while some criss-cross across his skin.

"The Hallows did this to you?" Sirius breathes out.

"Actually, no," Remus says quietly. "I got these long before I ever came to the Hallow. They still whipped people as a punishment in my district."

"Shit, Remus," Sirius mumbles, his tone heavy. He shakes his head and leans forward to press a kiss over one of the scars. Remus releases a soft sigh, so Sirius does it again and again, as much as he can reach while standing up behind him. When he pulls away, he says, "Well, you have more stars than me."

"I wouldn't say these are stars," Remus murmurs as he turns back around. "The way they're torn into my skin. It's—I don't know, sort of like craters."

"If we're sticking to a space theme here, then I'd remind you that the moon has craters. That makes you the moon. My moon," Sirius says lightly, leaning in to kiss his jaw.

Remus huffs a weak laugh. "Your moon? Is that right?"

"Well, you know, Sirius is one of the brightest stars in the sky. I'll be your star if you'll be my moon," Sirius muses, speaking softly in between mouthing at Remus' jaw, heading for the side of his throat. "We're already something, so we may as well give it a name. Can't steal the moon, can't keep the stars, but we're fortunate enough to know them anyway. Isn't that us?"

"Yeah," Remus whispers. "Yeah, that's us."

In the next second, Remus is tilting Sirius' face up to kiss him hard, and Sirius muffles a moan into his mouth. Yet again, Remus begins walking him backwards, and this time he doesn't stop. He keeps right on going until they're falling, until they hit the bed.

They land with a little bounce, and Sirius' head spins as Remus turns them, scooting down a bit to break the kiss and go for his throat. Sirius can't stop himself from making that needy noise yet again, because Remus is no doubt leaving marks, just like this morning. And people noticed. People looked. People assumed, and Sirius could only find secret pleasure in the fact that it was Remus who had left them there. He's doing that again, all while turning them so they're on their sides, drawing their bodies closer together, all heat and desperation.

In doing so, in getting closer, Remus' leg slots between Sirius', which is—okay, that sure is something. For one thing, it's mildly concerning, because Sirius is not dressed appropriately for this occasion. His pants are loose and soft and have enough room to make it embarrassingly easy to rock his hips so he gets a lot from that simple motion. Sirius' mouth falls slack, his chest heaving as Remus just—carries on.

"Okay, okay, that's—Remus," Sirius chokes out, his free hand falling to the bed, fingers twisting in the sheets. Again, his hips rock of their own accord, his body very clear on what it wants, even if his mind is in an uproar at the moment. Another high noise leaves his mouth, a soft whimper. This feels good. Very good. Too good. "Remus, I—I, um, can't—I'm not going to—this is really—"

Remus presses kisses up his throat, making a quiet noise like he's listening, but Sirius isn't entirely sure he is. Not in a malicious way, just more like he's very, very distracted at the moment. That becomes increasingly obvious when he finds a new spot on Sirius' throat to latch onto, a searing pressure of heat as he sucks, and Sirius' hips jerk again, sending yet another spike of pleasure through his every nerve-ending. Sirius doesn't mean to, but he releases a low curse and bangs his hand down on the bed. That makes Remus jolt, his mouth detaching as he pulls back and looks at him.

"Are you alright?" Remus asks, blinking rapidly like he's coming out of a daze.

"Yes. No. I mean—" Sirius tries to take a steadying breath, but it's hard when his hips are still just doing whatever they like. He attempts to stop them, but they've really got it all figured out by now, knowing what feels good and how precisely to get to it. Another roll of his hips, and Sirius whimpers again, his hand coming down from Remus' hair to brace against his shoulder, clinging for dear life.

"Sirius?" Remus murmurs, his hand carding through Sirius' hair like he's trying to soothe him, as if he's finally picking up on the fact that Sirius is struggling right now. Sirius is so glad that he's done that, and also struggling all that much more for it, because Remus' hand in his hair feels good, too.

"I'm—this feels really good," Sirius blurts out like an idiot, as if that's not been made painfully obvious by now. His other hand drops from Remus' hair, back to the bed, and he holds on tight as he yanks a little frantically at the sheets.

Remus hums. "Well, yes, it's meant to. That's—that's a good thing, isn't it?"

"Remus, Remus," Sirius says, the name punching out of his mouth, and he's just legitimately squirming against Remus at this point. He can hear how distressed he sounds, mingled with the contradicting approval, because it's good, but—

"Sirius," Remus declares firmly, one hand falling down to clamp on Sirius' hip, stopping him. Sirius gasps for air like he's desperate for it, flexing his fingers into Remus' shoulder and curling his nails against the bed. Somehow, stopping is almost worse than doing it, but also a relief at the same time.

Sirius tries to calm down, but it's not really working, if he's honest. He stares at Remus like he's a god, and also possibly a terrifying eldritch horror come to ruin his life. His face burns as he admits, "I have a problem. I think—I mean, I'm fairly sure I was about to get off with you."

Remus hesitates, then calmly asks, "Why is that a problem?"

"Because I—" Sirius struggles, trying to put it into words, still pent up and desperate to just continue. He's a mess of contradictions at the moment, at war with himself, and he sort of hates it. "I've never wanted to, alright? I've never—I didn't know it would feel—I mean—"

"Sirius," Remus says gently, "breathe."

"I'm trying," Sirius hisses, and Remus looks shockingly fond, his face softening. "It's a problem, because it's like I'm what they think I am. Being made into a sex symbol doesn't matter as much when I'm not getting off, and liking it. Look at me. I'm fucking gagging for it, and it's—it's—"

"Alright, hey, just…" Remus lifts one hand and does something that Sirius isn't expecting to be so comforting. He brushes his palm over Sirius' forehead, pushing his hair back. "It's okay. I think I understand now. Your relationship to desire is complicated, and that's not your fault. You're—are you ashamed? Is that it?"

Sirius swallows harshly. "Yes."

"You don't need to be," Remus tells him quietly. "Sirius, really, there's nothing wrong with feeling good. You're allowed to feel good and do what you want. And if you don't want to, then there's nothing wrong with that either. There's nothing to be ashamed of. Your desire is your own, not anyone else's."

"I was really loud," Sirius mumbles, which is probably stupid, but he's genuinely embarrassed about it.

Remus opens his mouth, then closes it, then clears his throat and nods. "Yes, you were." Sirius groans, squeezing his eyes shut, but Remus waits for Sirius to look at him, then smiles. "There's nothing wrong with that. I—well, if it helps, I liked that you were. You don't need to be quiet, Sirius."

"It's like I'm proving them right," Sirius whispers, twisting his fingers in the sheets. "I don't want to prove them right, Remus, but it—it felt so good."

"This isn't about them," Remus says softly. "Sirius, this has nothing to do with anyone but me and you. It's between us, just us, and you can like it. In fact, I'm really grateful that you like it, because it would be upsetting that I just did all of that if you hadn't. But we also don't have to do anything."

"But I want to," Sirius tells him, frustrated. "I really want to. Do you—I mean, do you want to?"

"I—well, yes, but it's fine if you can't, or you're not ready and want to wait," Remus murmurs.

"Wait," Sirius repeats. "We can—we can wait."

"We can," Remus confirms. "Until you're ready, Sirius, if you ever are. And if you're not, that's okay."

Sirius licks his lips, nodding slowly. "Alright, we'll wait. I just think I need to get used to feeling like this. I never have before, you know, and that was sort of...something that helped make my position in the Hallow easier. They all think I'm a whore, but I've never even gotten off before."

"You—wait," Remus says, rearing back a little. "You mean you haven't even...when you were alone? Never?"

"Like I said, being a sex symbol for these bastards sort of put me off the whole thing," Sirius admits with a bitter smile. He shakes his head. "I was sixteen when I went into the games, Remus. For years, I never even got aroused after that. I didn't even think I could. The first time that I did, I was—I don't know, sort of disgusted? I didn't do anything about it. I never do anything about it. They've made me feel like…I can't, or else I'll just be what they believe I am."

Remus looks stricken, then—angry? His jaw firms, and he slides his hand down to cup Sirius' chin firmly between his fingers, holding him in place as he stares at him with startling intensity. "They took your acceptance of pleasure away from you."

At those words, Sirius feels his heart clench. Hoarsely, he confesses, "Yeah, they did."

"Do you want it back?" Remus asks.

"Yes," Sirius whispers.

"You can have it. You can take it. That's yours, Sirius, and no one gets to decide how you feel about it," Remus declares. "We don't have to do anything, ever, but if you want to, when you're ready, you're allowed to let yourself feel good."

"Okay," Sirius breathes out, his mouth dry. He drops his gaze back to Remus' mouth. "We can —I mean, can we still kiss? I liked the kissing. Very much."

Remus chuckles, his gaze warm. "Yes, you made that abundantly clear. I just so happen to like it, too. Very much. So, that's what we'll do. That's all we'll do."

That's what they do, just that, and Sirius clenches the sheets between his hands and lets Remus slowly, oh so slowly, coax him away from his shame, leaving him in shambles from kiss after kiss after kiss—and all he can think about is the moon and the stars, how they can't steal them or keep them, but it's worth it to love them anyway.

That's this, he thinks.

That's this.

That's us.

Chapter End Notes

see, wasn't that...nicer, for the most part?

i saw a lot of comments coming for sirius thinking he was gonna do something majorly stupid, but yall gotta give my love more credit than that. to be fair, he did make it clear he WOULD do something stupid, and in the long-run, the rule change is...technically stupid, as far as the trouble it will cause. but it's a win for the good guys, for now. everyone say thank you, sirius <3 anyway, sirius playing slughorn like a fiddle!!! an icon!!! he's so smart, i love him. ten years he's spent learning how to perfectly manipulate people—Hallows, specifically—and he instantly did what he had to do. can't blame him there. of course, it will have consequences, but we see those later.

dorcas and marlene... the fact that dorcas ran FOUR MILES to go to marlene as soon as her tributes died. like, she cares so, so much—all the lies and secrecy comes from a place of her trying to protect people and do the right thing, while still trying to balance her responsibilities in a brewing war. and after all of that, just for them to mutually friendzone each other... it's a rough day for the dorlene girlies 😔 REST ASSURED, this is not the end of them, i promise! just friends, my ass. not on MY watch.

the grief and banners playing in the night sky was depressing, admittedly. even worse because james was passed out, so he didn't even get to see vanity one last time :/ oh, and he also missed the rule change, so he doesn't even get to be excited about that, at least. poor babe. i do love him, really.

next: one of my favorite moments in the books is when the rule change happens and katniss, in the middle of a death arena with danger surrounding her at all sides, just literally starts shouting peeta's name at the top of her lungs 😭😭😭 like, don't get me wrong, i love her to pieces, but that was so STUPID lmaooo. i only adored her more for it, though, and i couldn't blame her for it either.

i was so, so excited to give regulus his own version of that Endearing Idiot Moment. this man really thought he could walk on water for five seconds 💀 he can't even SWIM and he was just like: james! and then he immediately started running. look at that little idiot in love go. im so incredibly fond of him.

then sirius returning to the suite and being fucking ECSTATIC. i don't wanna see one soul shaming him for daring to be happy while regulus and james are still having it rough. leave him alone, he's earned the reprieve, dammit 😭😭😭 this man has been SUFFERING nonstop, let him be happy for once, i say, as if did not write the suffering.

i love wolfstar being flirty, sue me. they're so cute, i wanna put them in my pocket. the whole talk about the scars was very revealing—for one, we got more hints to remus' past (being punished A LOT in his district before he was ever even captured, but the question remains: why?) and we also got sirius calling remus his moon, which im admittedly weak for, ngl. i knew id find some way to slip that in there eventually.

sirius' relationship to sex/desire is complex due to a mixture of the issues the Hallow gave him and his sexuality—he's demisexual in this, which gets expanded on more later—so this was a Very Important discussion for remus and sirius to have. im not gonna praise remus for not pushing and reassuring sirius, because that's quite literally the bare minimum and what EVERYONE should do, but it does further implement trust in between them—specifically sirius, in this case. idk, i just love how healthy they are.

really, objectively, sirius and remus are the healthiest relationship in this so far, and they're not even technically together. can't steal the moon, can't keep the stars—it's fucking tragic, isn't it?

nonetheless, they got to make out and flirt and be happy and it's WHAT THEY DESERVE!!!

right, let me do numbers. since they're so low now (😬), ill just do the remaining tributes (aka i don't wanna write them all out and seeing vanity's name in the list makes me feel immense guilt):

tributes remaining: 5
james regulus bernice peter
axus

(side note: i just want to think everyone again for the comments/feedback/support. i haven't replied to all, especially on the rougher chapters, because i usually hide from massive amounts of anxiety, BUT i do read them all, and i can't thank everyone enough for how kind and lovely you've all been <3)

The Search

Chapter Notes

hello, hello!

warnings for this chapter:

-references to past death
-references to past child death
-references to past graphic depictions of violence
-suicidal thoughts/idolization (not outright stated, but very heavily themed/implied, just from a place of grief, and it's not acted on at all)
-unspecified drugs/someone being high (it's medicinal)
-depictions of injury/pain
EDIT: mentions descriptions of needles shown/being used

See the end of the chapter for more notes

James wakes up.

For the first time in his life, he experiences what it's like to wish he hadn't.

There was a time when James understood that feeling from an outsider's perspective only, and it had made him ache then, seeing Sirius wake up and face instant regret that he had to. Sometimes, Sirius would cry himself awake, and just cry, and keep crying, and there was nothing James could do but sit with him and wait for the tears to pass. Hold him. Rub his back. Murmur soft words of encouragement and reassurance that James is quite sure Sirius never actually heard anyway. But he still said them. He always said them.

Maybe it's selfish and irrational, but James is angry, because Sirius isn't here to do that for him. Right now, at this moment, the only person James wants is his best friend, no one else.

It's infuriating that Sirius isn't close by when James needs him, because James is always, always there when Sirius needs him. He knows, logically, that this isn't Sirius' fault, and yet he's still upset with him anyway. James wants to yell at him, and shove him, and yank on him until they collapse together so that James can curl up against him and weep. James misses him so much that it feels like being ripped in half.

James has never known waking up to be a painful process, and now he doesn't think he'll ever forget. He can't even imagine a time when it won't hurt anymore. If one suffers consistently enough, that's all they know.

Happiness only leaves behind memories, and those can fade away; pain leaves behind scars, and those never really do.

It doesn't help that he's waking up in physical pain as well. His leg fucking hurts. It's the first physical thing he becomes aware of, the fire and ache throbbing in his thigh. Looking down at where he's wrapped it with a torn-off portion of his shirt, he can see it brown, black, and red with dirt and blood.

James averts his gaze, because he doesn't even want to look at it. He knows it's bad. Really fucking bad, in fact. He also knows it's a bigger problem than he's equipped to deal with.

People know their bodies, and they know when something is wrong. James? Well, he can tell that this injury is bad. Not only does it hurt, but it's affecting him in other ways besides the site of the wound. He's running hot, and he feels tired, and his head is fucking pounding something awful. The cold night alone with no fire or blanket surely didn't help, and now he's still trembling and sweating at the same time, which is a very bad sign. He knows that. He knows something is wrong.

The thing is, he doesn't really…care.

That's the thing about waking up and wishing you hadn't; you don't really care about the possibility that you might fall asleep and never wake up again. James almost welcomes the thought, and when it was Sirius dealing with that, nothing terrified him more. When it's him, it hardly seems to matter.

Waking up comes with remembrance. Despite the nightmares that plagued him through the night, giving him no reprieve even in sleep, being awake is somehow worse. All of the events from the previous day seem more real when he's awake.

Hodge.

Vanity.

Irene.

Mathias.

The weight of loss is nearly unbearable. It hurts more than his leg. It hurts more than the loneliness. It hurts more than anything he's ever felt in his life.

There's so much guilt, so much anger, and he doesn't know what to do with it all. He can't rewind time and go back to stop it all from happening; he can't save them, any of them. What was the point of it all? They went to that cave, and for what? James made Vanity upset with him, and why? Regulus promised Vanity a blanket to survive the night, and she didn't even live to use it. So, what was the point?

If the arena has taught James anything, it's the reality of one pointless death right after the next. That's all it is here, really. Plans that don't work. Choices that lead to loss. Every move they make is senseless, because they were always going in one direction anyway, even from the start.

James is furious with himself, because what did he think was going to happen? The goal was to get Regulus home, wasn't it? He always knew everyone else was going to die, so what right does he have to be upset about it now? He avoided looking at it directly, unable to face it fully, and it ended with him here.

It's the sixth day, there are five people remaining, and James does not care. He's awake, and he wishes he wasn't. He has the vial of Vespa's venom in hand, and he refuses to let it go. He's in pain, and he can't remember what it was like not to be.

"Happy birthday, Hodge," James whispers, and he closes his eyes, letting himself drift off back to feverish, fitful sleep.

~•~

Regulus jerks awake at the sound of a bush rustling in the distance. His eyes snap open as he grips his dagger tight and flings himself up, heart racing, on edge in seconds.

It's just a fox dashing out of the undergrowth.

Exhaling, Regulus slowly lowers his dagger and waits for his heart to calm. He reaches out to shake James awake, unsure how he even managed to sleep through Regulus waking in a panic, and then his hand hits the earth—because James isn't there. Regulus swivels his head and stares at the empty ground beside him, where James isn't.

Oh.

Right.

In seconds, Regulus is on his feet, rolling up his blanket to put back in his bag. He wastes no time in getting a move on, more clear-headed today than he was the one prior. He curses himself internally for being so rash in trying to find James last night, because now he has to backtrack.

The rule change flickers through his mind, and the mere memory makes his heart jump, just like he did when he heard it. At that moment, a part of him dared to believe that James was alive, because that rule—well, he has no doubts that the people watching would love nothing more than to see James and Regulus make it home. Most people prefer happy endings to their love stories. Personally, Regulus doesn't believe in such things, but he's more than willing to use everyone else's naivety to his advantage.

As for the others, Regulus isn't allowing himself to think about it. He wasn't as close to Vanity, Irene, and Mathias as James was, but that doesn't mean he's entirely unaffected by their deaths. But, if losing Evan has taught him one thing, it's that giving into your grief inside this arena will either kill you, or make you wish you were dead—both of which are recipes for disaster in a place where death is a real possibility.

He'll deal with everything when they've won. When they've made it. When the arena is nothing but a memory. He can't do it now, can't sit down and let the weight of it all settle on him, because he fears that it might crush him and make it nearly impossible to get back up. But here? They can't do that, not if they want to survive, and Regulus is determined to survive.

He always has been from the very beginning, but now that feeling is much more potent. Maybe that's because he's going to be fighting for more than just himself.

First, he has to fucking find James.

Regulus is tired. He's running on very little sleep, and he's also dealing with his bruises and soreness from the fight with Bernice yesterday, but he doesn't let that stop him. He keeps going, heading back in the direction he knows Axus dragged James into the forest.

When it was dark, Regulus really just picked a direction and went on blind hope that he would simply come across James, but of course it wouldn't be so simple. Now, in the daylight, when he reaches the part of the woods Axus was pulling James through, he can see he went the wrong way.

See, when pulling a grown man through the forest, that tends to leave a trail. An obvious one.

Taking a deep breath, Regulus begins to follow it.

~•~

The next time James wakes up, he's thirsty. He can't remember the last time he had something to drink. Yesterday? When they all shared a meal together, right?

James wishes they all stayed in that cave. Maybe they could have done something else. Maybe they could have built traps instead of a bridge, and when the death eaters got too close, they would have been dealt with. They could have gone back to get the bear trap, if it was still there. They could have built nets and just released Vespa to deal with whoever was caught. They could have—well, they could have done so many other things than what they actually did.

What is it they say about hindsight?

And then what? Regulus asks in his head.

Right, that. That little niggling problem. No more death eaters, so what would come next in this dreadful scenario? Like Regulus said, they couldn't all play pacifists forever. Couldn't just settle in the cave and live out the rest of their days in perfect harmony. The gamemakers wouldn't have stood for it. They would have found a way to encourage violence and more death. Again, Regulus asks and then what?

"I don't know," James rasps. "I didn't know then and I still don't know now. I don't have the answers. I'm sorry, but I never had the answers. All I was sure about was you."

And now? Regulus asks. What now, James?

Closing his eyes again, James whispers, "I don't know that either. I don't know anything."

~•~

Regulus comes across a caved-in hole in the ground, like a tunnel. There's a dried puddle of blood around it and mounds of dirt with claw marks like someone was trying desperately to climb out of the hole. There are patches of hair as well, and when Regulus picks it up, he realizes it's Axus'.

He blinks. Who the fuck tore out some of Axus' hair? All he can think is that Axus fell in this hole and got into a fight—a brutal one, by the looks of things. Was it James? That doesn't make much sense, honestly, because he's not entirely sure James would have been able to fight and get back out of the hole, especially if Axus survived. Then again, people do nearly impossible things when they're trying to survive, so…maybe?

After further investigation, Regulus can make out the signs of a fight as well as a trail leading away. He thinks there's three sets of footprints, which means someone else was here.

It comes to him suddenly, the memory of Juniper absolutely wrecking a fucking dummy in the training room every day. His eyebrows shoot up as he looks around slowly, and he can't help but be impressed and mildly disturbed. From the looks of things, Juniper absolutely beat the fuck out of Axus.

She still lost, though. Axus had a weapon as soon as James freed himself and got away, so they had the advantage in the end. Juniper was only sixteen and quite a small girl, while Axus had at least five years on her and was more developed. Even with their small frame and stature, they managed to drag James this far into the forest with seemingly no issue.

"Went out fighting, didn't you?" Regulus murmurs, swiveling his dagger through his fingers with a muted sigh. He looks at the dried spot of blood and grimaces. "Axus has a lot to answer for. They'll answer, I promise you that."

That's really the only solace Regulus can offer, at this point. To all those that are gone, to all the families suffering loss, that's the only thing left they have to hope for. Vengeance.

Regulus doesn't think he killed Quinn to avenge Evan. It was just—instinct. An immediate reaction. She attacked him, so he responded, and he killed her. He wonders if her family would like to see him dead for killing her. What about Avery's? What about Irene's? Do they blame him? He can't shake the guilt of Irene's death, even though she asked for it.

Swallowing, Regulus forces the thoughts aside. No thinking about Irene, or Quinn, or Avery. No thinking about Evan, because that hurts the worst, even now. The most important thing is getting to James, so he stands up.

There's a clear path off to the side that Regulus is quite sure was James. For one thing, the trail is uneven like whoever made it couldn't move steadily. For another, there's smears of blood on leaves and trees, as well little trails of it that no doubt dribbled down his leg. Surely Axus could have followed this.

Well, they might not have been able to if Juniper was keeping them busy in a hole. James, in his panic, probably didn't even know that Juniper was in there, because even dazed and injured, he would have tried to help her, no doubt. No, he must have wrenched the hook from his leg as soon as Axus fell in the hole, then scrambled to his feet and ran as much as he could on his bad leg. Regulus is assuming that, at some point, he found somewhere to hide where Axus couldn't find him.

Regulus will. He'll search every nook and cranny of this forest if he has to, and so he starts doing just that, following the trail. Along the way, even though James likely wouldn't have been able to climb, Regulus never fails to look up.

Evan would be proud of him for that, he thinks.

~•~

The next time James comes to, he feels significantly worse than he did before. His leg hurts so bad that even breathing makes it worse, and he groans through clenched teeth the one and only time he makes the mistake of gently prodding above where the hook went through his leg. Just a tiny push from his fingers makes his eyes sting with tears.

"Sirius," James whispers, breathing hard as he tilts his head back, blinking blearily at the roof of the cave. "Please."

He can't figure out why Sirius hasn't helped him yet. The only option that James can think of is that he can't afford the medicine, or the sponsors aren't willing to send it, but James is in so much pain that he can only shamefully resort to begging. He's so confused, because he knows Sirius would do anything necessary to help him right now.

Still, there's nothing. James can only sit there, in a cold sweat, shivering and whimpering every other breath. It's agony. The sort of agony that makes him think he'd rather just cut his leg off than deal with this fucking pain. Shit, it hurts.

Due to the discomfort, James can't get back to sleep. He's left with no choice but to feel it. There's also his thirst to deal with as well; his mouth is so dry. He's not hungry, at least. In fact, he doesn't think he could stomach anything at all. His appetite has completely vanished, despite the fact that he knows his body is showing signs of needing food for fuel, yet the idea of eating makes him feel more nauseous than he already does.

If James had a nightmare scenario, it would be exactly this. Between the loneliness, the grief, and the pain, he can't imagine anything worse to suffer.

No, that's not true.

James' brain is fucking awful, because it comes up with worse things easily. Regulus dead. His parents dead. Sirius dead. There's nothing in this world that could be worse than that, and James would suffer this for eternity if it was what it took to keep them alive and safe.

Desperate not to think about that anymore, because he can feel an anxiety attack coming on just from the mere thought, he attempts to think about literally anything else. Of course, this sends him into a spiral about Vanity, Hodge, Irene, and Mathias. Even Willa and Juniper. Evan. Mulciber. Avery. Dylan. There are nineteen people dead. James himself has killed three of them. How did he get here?

What about Peter? He's still alive out there somewhere, isn't he? James remembers seeing him beaten and passed out on the ground, but after what happened with Vanity, he completely checked out of his surroundings and all that happened. James didn't come back to himself until he heard Regulus screaming his name. He doesn't even know what happened to Irene and Mathias. He can only hope they didn't suffer.

So, where is Peter? Is he alright? James hasn't heard a cannon, so he's still alive, but is he hurt? What happened to him? He never set the third fire, so James is sure the death eaters found him before he managed to. Did they just figure out the plan and drag Peter, beaten and bloody, along with them? Why didn't they kill him? James is so grateful they didn't kill him.

He still has to die, the Regulus in his head reminds him.

For the first time in James' life, he wishes Regulus would shut up. Yes, obviously he knows that Peter has to fucking die, because the goal is still the same. Even now, the most important thing is getting Regulus home, which means twenty-three other people have to die, including Peter.

Including James himself.

It's a wild, freeing feeling to realize it, but it hits James that, at some point, he won't be dealing with all of this anymore. One way or another, he's going to be free of this fucking arena, even in death. Due to his pain, his suffering, his grief, and this heavy depression he can't shake off, James is so relieved by the thought that he nearly weeps.

The sound of a soft chime makes James turn his head, drawn out of his admittedly morbid thoughts. He blinks, not entirely sure if he's hallucinating or if what he's seeing is actually real.

A silver box comes floating through the mouth of the cave, drifting in with a tiny parachute holding it up. It bobs and weaves through the air, rocking further down, and James swallows as he watches it land gently next to him. It settles on the ground with a dull clatter.

Carefully, James reaches over with a wince to snag the string of the parachute, dragging the box over to him. It's not too big, but it's not small either. The lid opens easily, and James blinks down at what's inside in surprise. There's a bottle of water and a syringe that has a small dosage of something in it.

Okay, that's…not what James was expecting, if he's honest, but alright. He shakes his head slightly and pulls the water out first, taking a few careful sips and letting his eyes flutter shut at the relief of it. Fuck, that's good. Clean and refreshing. He wants to guzzle it, but he doesn't know how long he'll be stuck here, so he plans to savor it.

Hesitantly, James goes for the syringe next, eyebrows furrowed as he lifts it out. It's a very small dosage in a large syringe, just at the twenty milligram mark, and the needle is uncomfortably long. Whatever medicine is in there, it's clear.

With a frown, James peeks in the box again to find a white card at the bottom, and his hands tremble a bit when he lifts it out, because it's Sirius. A message from Sirius. Undeniable confirmation that he's watching, that he's close by, in his own way. James feels his heart jump as he reads it.

In the vein in your arm. For the pain. I'm here.

That's it. That's all it says, and James still starts crying anyway. He nearly drops the syringe, but fumbles to catch and sit it aside carefully, and then he covers his face with both hands and just fucking weeps. He can't help it.

"I miss you," James chokes out, dropping his hands, because more than the pain, that's what gets to him the most. Sirius can fix the pain, and he can't really fix that he's not here for James to reach out and touch, to talk to, but those two words at the end mend something in him, at least a little. I'm here. He's not, actually, but James knows what he means. He's watching; he's listening; he's here for James as much as he can be from where he really is. "I —I miss you so much, Sirius."

Of course there's no reply, but James can close his eyes and picture Sirius in his mind. All their shared looks and their inside jokes; the way they can practically read each other's minds just from meeting one another's eyes; how they can have entire discussions through a simple touch. He can still hear the last things Sirius ever said to him, a steady source of comfort, even now.

"Thank you," James breathes out, his hands shaking as he reaches out to grab the syringe again.

James has absolutely no idea how to do this, really, but he's gotten blood drawn before, so he tries to copy how that went. He eases one arm out of his coat and squints down at the bend of his elbow. Well, either it works, or it doesn't.

With care, James makes a fist and lines up the needle with his vein, then pushes in until he feels like it's enough, and then slowly presses the plunger down. There's a small dot of blood when he pulls the needle out and sits the syringe aside, which he wipes away. He blinks, but doesn't feel different.

Okay, so maybe he fucked that up. That's on him. At least Sirius tried, and really, James is just grateful to have heard from him. And bonus—there's water.

James eases his way back into his coat, zipping it back up and slipping the vial in his pocket, then reaches for the water. He sips on that slowly, dropping the syringe in the box and sitting it aside, keeping the card in hand as he runs his thumb over it with reverence. He touches it like it's treasure.

He's still looking at it, lost in doing that for several minutes, when he suddenly becomes aware of the lack of pain. It makes him blink and lift his head, mildly startled by the sensation, because fuck, he didn't realize how desperately he needed that until he got it. Oh, that's… That's really good.

"Oh, shit," James whispers, his lips parting on a soft sigh as the medicine really kicks in, and he goes from not only having no pain to feeling absurdly amazing.

Like he's floating.

Like he's weightless.

Like he's made of light.

James opens his eyes and tips his head back, watching the ceiling of the cave swirl above him, quite literally seeing stars. Oh, Sirius. James loves Sirius. That's his best friend. The best fucking friend anyone could ask for.

"The best. You're the best. Oh, I love you so much," James mumbles breathlessly, his head lolling from side-to-side as he giggles and lets his eyes slip shut.

Sirius isn't here to reply, but James easily knows what his response would be. Sirius loves him, too. There's no doubt in James' mind, especially now. When James falls asleep again, he does so feeling very loved.

Also very high.

~•~

Regulus is starting to get worried. It's past mid-day now, starting to creep closer to evening, and he refuses not to find James before nightfall. He's out here somewhere, no way to make a fire, no blanket, no food and no water.

Well, no, maybe that's not true. Maybe Sirius has sent him something, because Regulus knows deep down in his bones that Sirius will not let James die, no matter what it takes, especially not with the rule change. Still, Regulus would feel better actually seeing that James is well for himself.

Following the trail only got him so far. James, at some point, must have stopped to wrap his leg or something, because the blood trail eventually ended, even when the less obvious signs of someone passing through didn't. The broken twigs, the random footprint, things such as that.

Unfortunately, the trail eventually broke out into a clearing, and that's no doubt where Axus lost James, because that's where Regulus does, too. He can't pick a trail back up, so now he's just wandering around the area, looking for any place James could have hid. So far, he's found nothing.

Regulus keeps an eye out for Axus, in case they've decided to come looking for James again, but he sincerely doubts that's going to be the first thing on their mind. No, he'd bet a lot on the chances that Axus is out there looking to meet up with Bernice again. Safety in numbers, of course. The last two remaining death eaters; yeah, they'll be together, no doubt.

Peter is a wild card. Regulus wouldn't have assumed that Peter would work with the death eaters before the announcement, but Bernice is from his district. If they survive, they can go home; no different from James and Regulus, and Regulus knows just how enticing the idea of that is. Without that rule change, Regulus wouldn't even consider the possibility that Peter might be a future problem. In fact, he would dare to think that Peter would be helping him and James, in the end.

Now? He's not so sure.

Heaving a sigh, Regulus carefully skids down an incline and mutters under his breath, "James, where are you?"

Of course, there's no reply, so Regulus can only continue to make his way in circles, carefully pushing the perimeter as he looks—everywhere, basically. He loses more daylight to this and grows frustrated, genuinely worrying he's not going to find James before tonight, at least until he finds a footprint.

Regulus has been careful, literally observing everything with keen eyes, so he doesn't miss the tread in the dirt. The sight of it makes his heart jump, because there's a one-in-four chance of that being James, and he's quite sure James is in this area.

Slowly, he looks up and swivels his head, taking everything in around him as he goes in the direction the footprint was pointing towards. Less than five minutes later, Regulus sees a mound off to the side that looks promising, and he climbs his way up the incline. When he reaches the peak, he doesn't see much at all, not at first.

But there. Barely even noticeable. Tucked behind a cluster of trees, there's just the tiniest sliver of a cave that he can only just make out, even with how hard he's looking.

Regulus drops down over the side of the mound and moves forward, dagger in hand. It's quiet outside, excluding the creak of the trees and the gentle sounds of wildlife, particularly songbirds that whistle at one another. When he was young, he used to wonder what they talked about.

No sound comes from the cave, and the entrance is so small that he has to duck down and slowly ease his way inside, grateful when the roof immediately lifts as he goes further in and lets himself straighten up. It's dim inside, but the sunlight pours in from behind him, and it feels like an electric shock runs through him the moment he sees James.

He's there.

He's actually there.

"James," Regulus blurts out, moving forward immediately, gripped with mild panic when James doesn't respond, even though he's visibly breathing. He looks rough, and the wrap around his leg has bloodstains. There's a white card held in his limp grip, and Regulus can see a sponsor box on the other side of him, by his hip. Regulus sits his dagger down and reaches out to cup James' cheeks, turning his head and lightly tapping one of them. "James. Hey, James, wake up. James."

It takes another minute and a rougher smack, but James' eyes do eventually flutter open. He's hot to the touch, a bit sweaty, and his eyes are glazed where they're held only half-open. He breaks out into a smile and mumbles, "Sirius. You're here. You said you were, you said…"

Regulus blinks. James has never, not once in his life under any circumstances, mistaken Regulus for Sirius. "What? Hey, look at me, James. It's Regulus."

"Regulus," James whispers, his eyebrows tugging together, but the lucidity in his eyes are nonexistent. "Sirius, I promised. I'm still—I'm gonna do it. I'll get him home, okay? I'll make sure Regulus gets home. Whatever it takes."

It feels like Regulus' entire body goes cold. His hands slip off James' face, and he rocks back, staring at him as his ears ring. Regulus doesn't breathe for a long moment, can't manage it. He just stares at James, who blinks slowly and looks so sincere that it's painful. No. Not—no. That's not. No.

No.

It's not true.

That's not possible.

Regulus refuses to—no. He shakes his head, because there's no fucking way. James said—he said he would make it home. He said that, didn't he? He said…

All he ever said was that he would do what he needed to do. Regulus assumed that meant fighting to get home, because that's the logical conclusion, for fuck's sake. The idea that James meant—the chance that, this whole time, he's been—

No.

No fucking chance.

No, Regulus doesn't believe that. He refuses to even entertain that thought, because it is the single most ridiculous display of stupidity that he could think of—and he legitimately never even thought of it, because it's that foolish. Regulus knows James is a fucking idiot, but there's no way he would be this devastatingly obtuse and brainless. Absolutely not.

Clenching his jaw, Regulus reaches out to grab the white card from James' slack fingers. James makes a fussy sound and tries to grab it back, but Regulus snatches it away and swats James on the back of his hand, which makes him let out a soft, sad sound like a whirring machine slowly losing power. He looks at Regulus with big eyes full of betrayal.

"Sirius, that's mine," James murmurs petulantly.

Regulus ignores him and glances at the card, reading it, and then he frowns and leans over James' lap to peer into the box. He wrenches back and scowls up at the ceiling. "You fucking drugged him? Are you insane? He's already vulnerable as it is, and now he's high as a kite. You sent him something for the pain, but nothing to actually heal him?"

"Who are you yelling at?" James asks, trying to stealthily snag the card from Regulus' fingers. "I don't think anyone is here."

"Oh, just—" Regulus huffs and flicks the card at James, who beams as soon as he has it in his hands again. Shaking his head, Regulus once again leans over James' lap to grab the water bottle, then takes his bag off, digging through it to find the cloth. Once he has it, he focuses on James, who has his eyes closed as he smiles dopily and drags the edge of the card over his cheek. "James."

"Hm?"

"I'm going to take a look at your leg, alright?"

"Mhm."

"It might hurt."

James cracks open one eye and says, "You'll never hurt me, Sirius."

"Right," Regulus replies flatly, taking a deep breath before slowly letting it out. He huffs out a bitter laugh, shaking his head as he scoots down to James' leg. "Brilliant. I wasn't aware this entire experience could get worse, and yet here we are. James, do me a favor and just—don't talk to me."

"But I miss you," James tells him.

Regulus sighs.

~•~

James is going to have to reevaluate his ironclad certainty that Sirius would never hurt him, because Sirius is hurting him. He's doing something to James' leg that hurts a lot, and also, Sirius is suddenly being so mean to him?

He's never done that before.

"You're being really mean," James announces, just in case he doesn't realize he's doing it.

Sirius just rolls his eyes, but like, in a mean way. Not like him at all. It's really attractive. "Well, if you'd hold still…"

"I'm trying, but it hurts."

"I did tell you that it would. Stop whining."

"When did you start being so rude?" James sputters, flinching when Sirius does another painful thing to his leg. Oh, what is he doing? James really hopes he stops soon.

"When did you turn into a big baby?" Sirius shoots back.

James huffs a weak laugh and leans his head back, gazing at Sirius with a lopsided smile. "Regulus says that to me, you know. He called me baby once, in a cute way. Isn't that cute? Well, you might not think so, but it was really cute. He's really cute. I—oh, you have to—you need to be here so he can see you. Don't leave until he's seen you. He probably won't show it, but he misses you as much as you miss him."

"Shut up, I do not," Sirius grumbles.

"Sirius, it's me," James reminds him, exasperated. "I know you miss him. Nothing wrong with that, you know. He's your little brother; it only makes sense. I miss him, too. I mean, in a very different way, but you get my point."

"I'm literally begging you to stop opening your mouth and letting out relentless stupidity," Sirius says, his voice strained.

"That was really mean," James mumbles.

Sirius sighs. "Yes, you've mentioned."

"You know who else is really mean to me? Speaking of your brother," James says with a wistful sigh. Sirius huffs a soft laugh, and James briefly wonders when he started being so quiet. "But, you know, it's okay when he does it. Actually, I really enjoy when he does it, because then at least he's paying attention to me. Not ignoring me. That's pathetic, isn't it?"

"Yes," Sirius confirms bluntly.

"He is nice, though. Sometimes. Like, he gave me a parting gift—not here in the arena, I mean, and it was—" James cuts off with a sputter, because Sirius clamps a firm hand over his mouth, making it impossible to continue.

"Why don't you keep that to yourself, yeah?" Sirius asks, then coughs and slowly drags his hand away. James blinks at him, confused, and Sirius shakes his head. "That's really no one's business but those involved, James."

James stares at him incredulously. "But I tell you everything."

"Seriously?" Sirius breathes out, as if disgusted. "He's my brother. You have to draw the line somewhere."

"Well, I didn't tell you. I wasn't going to, because I was coming here, and now I'm guilty about it." James pauses, then purses his lips. "Actually, not guilty about doing it, just guilty about not telling you, or just actively choosing not to tell you. It wasn't—we didn't do anything, really. Well—"

"Okay, James," Sirius cuts in sharply, and James blinks at him, shutting his mouth slowly. "That's enough. Let's never talk about it, yeah? I really don't want to talk about it."

"You do have a point about him being your brother. You're not even going to want the details," James says, giving Sirius a significant look. "Just as long as you get the point that there are details to give, because something happened."

Sirius scoffs and mutters, "Barely anything happened, but okay." He heaves a sigh and shakes his head when he looks up and finds James frowning at him. "No more talking about Regulus, alright?"

"But I miss him, too," James mumbles.

"Oh, for fuck's sake," Sirius declares in exasperation, then he does another painful thing that makes James whine and try to squirm away from it.

"Fuck!" James gasps out. "Sirius, if you do that again, I swear I'll just—I'll—"

"You'll what?" Sirius asks sarcastically. "What exactly can you do at the moment, James? Nothing. So, shut up and stop moving. I'm almost through with cleaning this. It's—I mean, it's really bad. It's infected, which is…"

"Sirius?" James murmurs, his anger evaporating as he watches Sirius swallow, his face grim. He looks upset, and James can't stand by and do nothing about that. "Hey, it's fine."

"It's really not," Sirius rasps, then tips his head back. "Do you see this? I can't do anything about it. He needs help. Drugging him doesn't fucking fix him. Can you just—I mean, fucking hell, what are you waiting for?"

James looks up, but he only sees the top of his cave. He leans in and murmurs, "Sirius, who are you talking to? It's—I promise it's just a hallucination. It's not real."

"What?" Sirius shoots him a strange look, but he seems ultimately distracted as he leans back and unzips his coat. He takes his dagger—wait, is that—

"How did you get Regulus' dagger?" James asks.

Sirius ignores him, which is unlike him and extremely upsetting in every way, but he is busy, to be fair. He's slicing off the bottom part of his shirt all the way around, big enough that the scar on his side shows. Wait, when did he get a scar on his side? He has a scar on his stomach (and many others elsewhere), but not on his side.

James snaps his hand out and snatches Sirius' shirt up further, looking for the scar he knows is there, but it's gone. Confused, he lifts his gaze to find Sirius looking annoyed as he swats James' hand away and pushes his shirt back down. It doesn't fall all the way, due to the portion he cut all the way around.

It takes a moment, but James realizes that Sirius' hair is shorter than it's supposed to be. It's—he's not…right. There's something—off. James blinks, then blinks harder, reaching out again to gently pat the side of Sirius' head, his hair, and he flicks his gaze up to meet James' eyes, and oh.

Oh, that's not Sirius.

Those aren't Sirius' eyes. Despite the similarities—nearly the same exact shape and eye-color—those eyes belong to only one person. The whole world warps in and out of focus, but there he is, coming through clear as a bell. Regulus.

"Oh, hey," James murmurs. "You're not—you were never Sirius. He was never here."

Regulus shakes his head, and for a moment, he almost looks apologetic, which may have something to do with the fact that James is utterly heartbroken that his best friend isn't here right now. "No, James."

"I'm—I think I'm really high," James says solemnly.

"Yeah, but I'm pretty sure you're coming down—or starting to, at least," Regulus murmurs. "Try to hold still for me, would you? I'm wrapping your leg again."

"M'kay," James mumbles.

Sirius isn't here. He was never here. Oh, James misses him. But Regulus is here, isn't he? Unless he's a hallucination of some sort. At this point, James wouldn't put anything out of the realm of possibility; these are some very, very good drugs. They even help make it hurt a lot less than it would without them when Regulus wraps his leg again firmly. It does hurt, but it's not excruciating, unbearable agony that makes him scream. At most, it makes him groan and curl forward, grinding his teeth through the pain, and then it passes like a wave breaking along the shore, receding out again when the magical medicine finally takes over once more.

"There, I'm done torturing you for now. You're fine. You'll be fine," Regulus tells him gently. "Just—just rest, for now. Sleep it off, alright?"

"You came and found me," James whispers, gazing at him through a haze, so tired and still confused, but the idea that Regulus would come for him makes him inordinately happy.

"Of course I did," Regulus whispers back.

~•~

What was Sirius thinking? Drugging James? In the middle of the fucking hunger games? That might be the most idiotic thing Regulus has ever known his brother to do, and this is Sirius he's talking about, so that's saying a lot. Sirius once flipped a cigarette in the air and tried to catch it with his mouth while it was lit, and kept doing it until he could actually consistently manage it, no matter how much it burned him.

Though, in fairness, he can still do that trick to this day.

And, in fairness to this, Sirius does come with the knowledge of everyone's position in the arena, which reassures Regulus a bit, because he knows Sirius would never put James at such risk under the influence while others are nearby. In any case, James' injury is really bad, so Regulus doesn't doubt that James was in a lot of pain. There's no way Sirius could ignore that and do nothing about it.

The only thing Regulus doesn't understand is why Sirius hasn't sent medicine to heal him. Not just take his pain away, but properly fix him. Some of the salve they had before would go a long way right now, surely. Regulus knows it has to be very fucking expensive, but Sirius is Sirius. If anyone can get it done, it's him, so why hasn't he yet?

James isn't doing well. He's been sleeping fitfully for hours now, the medicine slowly wearing off over time. He still hasn't woken up, thankfully, but he's been mumbling and groaning in his sleep, his brow furrowed and his face twisted with pain. Despite how sweaty he is, he's trembling like he's cold, and he clearly has a fever. The infection has set in.

Frankly, Regulus isn't entirely sure what to do. He has nothing to heal James, and from what he learned in the training room, James could easily die in as little as three days if sepsis sets in, depending on the severity of his wound. It's been twenty-four hours since he got the injury by this point, so it's a real issue.

Regulus considers his options. He'll do what it takes to get James home with him, because if he dies from infection when they're this close to the finish line, Regulus will tear his fucking hair out and probably never forgive himself, or James, or even Sirius. That's not an option. Regulus refuses to let that happen, which means he either has to find some way to heal James, or he has to figure out some way to get James home so he can be healed within the next two days.

Honestly, Regulus was already prepared to go out and kill everyone before, so if that's what it comes to… Yeah, he can do that. It's just Bernice, Axus, and Peter. They all could be in one group, or all separate, or it could be two of them with one alone. Either way, Regulus is pretty sure he can do it. He has his dagger and James' hatchet. If he's quick about it and catches them off-guard, maybe fights through the fear and climbs trees to attack from up high…

It's getting late now, though. Not dark just yet, but the sun is starting to set. Regulus will have to wait until tomorrow. For now, he has to stay here and make sure James doesn't die through the night. But after that, Regulus will handle it.

Regulus goes out with James' water bottle and his own water canister to go back to the closest stream he passed on his way here. It's a small one, and it's about twenty minutes away, so it's nearly an hour roundtrip. He stops to gather wood and kindling to start a small fire in the cave along the way, though he's admittedly antsy about being this far from James when he's so vulnerable. Even without the drugs, he's at risk. He can't move, or fight.

When Regulus makes it back, James is fine. In fact, he's finally awake, and he's clearly lucid, because he sucks in a sharp breath as soon as Regulus walks in with his hands full.

"Regulus," James breathes out.

Regulus ignores him and crouches down in front of his legs where they stick straight out, slowly setting up the fire for them, which he has no matches to light it with. He'll have to do it by hand. Okay, so now he regrets tossing all the supplies in a fit of dramatics and murderous rage. He could have at least replaced his matches, but in his defense, he wasn't really in the best place at the time, mentally speaking.

After he sits the water down and sets up the fire to burn later, Regulus finally looks up and stares at James, who is watching him closely. There's something different about him that wasn't there under the influence of drugs; sure, there's pain in his expression from his wound, but what really comes through is the sorrow in his eyes and the grief that carves into every angle of his face. What's more worrying than all of that is the complete lack of spark that James Potter has always, always carried with him for as long as Regulus has known him.

Nothing has ever managed to smother that spark, because James is never afraid to be the one who has hope. James won't hesitate to try and find the silver lining. James believes in purpose, and finding meaning in everything, and he does not give up. So, seeing him like this makes Regulus' heart drop.

"James," Regulus murmurs, shifting to the side to scoot closer to James and scan his face with a frown.

"You're here," James says, and his voice cracks.

It's the voice crack that gets to Regulus, really. He can't help it. Just hearing it causes something to crack within him, and it's immediately obvious that James is very fragile right now. He needs to be handled with caution. "Yes, I'm here."

James swallows thickly and reaches for him, so Regulus goes without complaint, closing the distance so James doesn't have to fold forward too far just to wrap his arms around him and bury his face into Regulus' shoulder. Regulus hugs him back, squeezing his eyes shut the moment he hears James choke out a muffled sob against him. He's shaking.

It's very hard, suddenly, not to break down and weep right along with him. There's so much to cry about. Blood behind his eyelids, stained on his hands, in his mouth. Screams. The sound of cannons. Death, death, so much death.

Regulus blinks harshly and rolls his jaw, releasing a deep, shuddering breath. James is clinging to him tight like he doesn't want to let go, but his leg also doesn't really give him much of a choice in the matter. He makes a low, pained noise and draws back with tear-tracks on his face.

"I've been here for a while now," Regulus murmurs, his fingers quite literally itching with the need to wipe the tears away until he gives in and just—does it. James lets him, leaning forward into his palms. "Do you remember?"

"No," James says, eyebrows furrowed. "Sirius sent me drugs. It gave me weird dreams about him and you. Like—like you were him, but he was really hazy around the edges so I couldn't tell, and then you transformed back into yourself. It was really strange, Reg. Very confusing. I can't remember it all, but I can safely say I wasn't in as much pain, so there's that."

Regulus decides now isn't the best time to mention that those weren't exactly dreams, because James was very awake and doing all of that in real time. He clears his throat. "And now? How much pain are you in now? I cleaned and redressed the wound, but it's—it's not looking good, James."

"Doesn't feel good either," James mumbles wearily, glancing down at his leg, then immediately looking away from it. "I'll be fine. Probably. Maybe not. Doesn't really matter, does it?"

"What is that supposed to mean?" Regulus asks sharply, a frisson of alarm surging through him. "Of course it matters. It could fucking kill you."

James just stares at him, then huffs a humorless laugh and nods like he's so very exhausted. "Right, well, don't act like that's not helpful for you in the long-run. One less person between you and home, yeah?"

"What?" Regulus snaps. "Fuck you, James. If you think I'm not going to do everything to get you home with me, then you—"

"What?" James cuts in, blinking at him.

Regulus pauses, then frowns. "The announcement. Did you hear the announcement?"

"What announcement?" James asks, visibly confused.

"Oh," Regulus breathes out, deflating a little as he stares at James in horror. He'd wondered, really, why James didn't have that spark, especially with the rule change, even despite the grief and pain he's suffering. Because if James knew he could get home and see his parents again, see Sirius again, and bring Regulus home with him—he wouldn't give up. Wouldn't even dream of it. "There's been a rule change. You must have missed it, but two people of the same district can be Victors. We can go home, James. Both of us."

James head tips to the side as his face crumbles, tears instantly filling his eyes as he rasps, "No. Is that—are you—please don't be joking, Regulus. If—if you're just—"

"No, no, I swear I'm not. It's real. I promise," Regulus says quickly, hushed, and he reaches out to grab James' hands and squeeze them like maybe that will get the point across better. James' lip is trembling, and he chokes out a harsh breath as he grips Regulus' hands tight. "We can make it. Me and you."

"Oh, fuck. Shit," James whispers, his head ducking forward as he starts crying all over again. Big, deep gasping sobs. He laughs, too, like a man discovering hope for the very first time. Like someone lost in the desert stumbling across a source of water. Like that first flicker of a flame in the deep-dark of the freezing arctic finally, finally catching to provide warmth.

"I know," Regulus murmurs, breathless, and he can't stop himself from leaning in to press his face against James' shoulder, feeling the same relief as him.

"We can go home?" James croaks, lifting his head.

Regulus lifts his, too, and their faces are really close together, so he can see in perfect clarity that James' spark is back. It's there, in his eyes, and Regulus' heart flutters at the sight. He swallows and leans away. "Yes, James, we can go home."

~•~

Sirius heaves a sigh, reaching up to rub at his temple, the headache really setting in. Regulus, you emotionally-constipated little shit, he thinks. He can't believe he's even upset about this right now, but what the fuck was that?

Not only did Regulus completely bypass any intimacy or hint of past intimacy with James—yeah, Sirius can take a wild guess of what something James was talking about happening between them, though he doesn't really want to—but Regulus also just made that the least romantic reunion in history. A hug? That's all he could do? Not even another stupid forehead kiss or something? Come the fuck on, Regulus is smarter than this; he should be able to work out what the people want.

'The people', as it were, are not very happy at the moment. In fact, everyone is very disappointed that Regulus didn't collapse into James' arms and immediately confess his undying love. Of course Sirius knows that Regulus would literally never do that, but the people don't. They want what they want, and there won't be any help given to James until they get it.

Frankly, Sirius is very fucking tired and officially at the end of his rope. He told Slughorn that the push Regulus needed was hope, and he honestly thought that would work. Not because Regulus actually hopes for a future with James, but because he's smart enough to work out that everyone really, really wants to see their romance enough that they care about a happy ending, which he could use to his advantage. He could be using it to his advantage right now.

And, look, Sirius doesn't particularly want Regulus to be in this position where he's forced into doing these things that he doesn't want to. In fact, Sirius fucking hates this. It makes him want to tuck Regulus behind him and keep him safe and out of sight as he shouts at anyone who dares to demand anything from him. The last thing Sirius wants is for Regulus to end up like him. But, in the same breath, James' survival depends on it.

In situations as dire as this, there's no room to be unwilling to do something it takes to survive. If Regulus doesn't give them what they want, he'll be punished for it. Not only him, but James, too. The worst part is, Sirius doesn't think that Regulus isn't willing to do this. He's pretty sure Regulus would just suck it up and do what it takes, if only he knew.

So, as much as Sirius hates it, he's going to have to figure out a way to tell him. Because Regulus needs to know. Because Regulus has to do this if he wants them both to survive.

Sighing, Sirius swivels on the spot, slaps on a broad smile, and crosses the room while cooing, "Joffrey, darling, I think it's time I take you up on your offer."

Chapter End Notes

welp, we're in the home-stretch now, folks and friends! so let me get into it, i guess.

"I didn't know then and I still don't know now. I don't have the answers. I'm sorry, but I never had the answers. All I was sure about was you." — james potter, the man that you are.... he's so in love, im SICK no, because seeing james so defeated by grief/pain is such a horrible thing. like, at the beginning of all this, he always had a smile and was happily flirting with regulus, stress beat-boxing, just generally all-around trying to stay positive. so, to see him like this is fucking devastating. rest assured, he's still james, we'll still see him being himself, but he's just really struggling right now. considering everything, can't really blame him for that.

also: "you came and found me" "of course i did" — regulus black, the man that YOU are... oh, im SICK. they make me sick. i wanna hug them so bad 😭 the fact that regulus really planned to search that entire arena if he had to, if that's what it took to find james... babe, who are you fooling at this point??? 🤨

oh, and high james!!! lmaoooo, he just wanted to hold onto the card from the sponsor box and talk to his bestie, that was literally it. enter regulus black, stage left, coming to be a total bitch to him purely because he's WORRIED. nice to see sirius in the arena tho <3 and the confession. james letting slip that the plan was to get regulus home. you know what's hilarious? the fact that regulus literally just went: well, that's stupid and i Don't Like It, so im choosing to believe it's simply not true 😭😭😭 king behavior, honestly. yall are lying if you said you've never had that reaction to something before. regulus went right to denial, and i can't even blame him lmaooo. just: hm, Don't Like That, ive decided its fake because i make the rules.

it will come up again later, though, don't doubt that.

also², JAMES TRYING TO CONFESS THAT REGULUS GOT HIM OFF TO SIRIUS 😭😭😭 HE'S SO DUMB I LOVE HIM. HE REALLY TRIED GOODBYE. listen, james was just trying to be a good bestie, okay? and him talking about how cute regulus is and how much he likes him TO regulus, because he thinks he's talking to sirius. please know that sirius was face-palming while watching that entire interaction deeply sad that james just wants his best friend, though 😕 like, the fact that james is always there for sirius—has always been there—but sirius COULDN'T be there for james... that shit is devastating to me, because you just KNOW that sirius was also so upset about it.

also³, "regulus, you emotionally-constipated little shit" IM YELLING! GET HIS ASS SIRIUS 😭😭😭 he's so tired. give this man a break. he's literally the epitome of "i have to do everything around here" because he literally does. his back is hurt carrying this team, pretty much.

anyway, that's about it, i think. let me do numbers:

remaining tributes as of this chapter: 5
regulus
james axus bernice peter

i love the theories and feedback; you have no idea what they mean to me. i know it can sometimes feel like yelling into a void, but please know that im one person, and this void is echoing all the love back <3

EDIT: i realize belatedly that the "offer" sirius is taking this joffrey fellow up on comes off a certain way and can be genuinely distressing/worrying for some people, so let me reassure everyone!!! back in the earlier chapters (it was chapter 6, which was a while ago), sirius was at a party charming sponsors and basically getting them to promise future donations/support to his tributes. there was one man there named joffrey that sirius basically manipulated into promising an offer of a large sum of money if he ever needed it (yes, sirius is an icon, we been knew), so "taking joffrey up on his offer" is literally just him coming to collect the donation/support that joffrey promised him before, as a sponsor. that's it. sirius will not be coerced into sexual favors EVER in this fic, simply because i don't have the desire/willingness to write that, even if it may seem fitting for this world. my excuse for this is that sirius is literally That Bitch that can make people do what he want without having to do anything other than play into rumors, because i said so. hope that clears it up and sets your minds at ease!

Performance

Chapter Notes

hello, all!

warnings for this chapter:

-references to past death
-references to past child death
-vague hints/undercurrents of suicidal feelings? thoughts? implications? (idk how to explain this one because it's not like, an active thing, if that makes sense? it's very light/vague overall, and it comes from a place of guilt, basically, as well as grief. and no, it's not something that will lead into future problems dealing with suicide/attempted suicide, i promise. it's just a grief/guilt thing and will eventually pass/get better)
-depictions of injury/pain
-angst

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Regulus holds up the vial of venom he helped Vanity extract from Vespa, a lump forming in his throat as he turns it between his fingers. James sits next to him in silence, fiddling with the white card, tracing the edge of it with his thumb.

"Do you remember when you said you didn't want me to be changed?" James asks softly.

"Yes," Regulus murmurs.

James nods his head towards the vial. "That changed me."

"Losing Vanity?" Regulus checks.

"Yeah," James confirms.

"What about—" Regulus swallows and meets his gaze, his heart clenching. "You said that who you are, all that you're made of, couldn't be changed. What about that?"

"I'm still me," James whispers. "Just a little less, is all."

Regulus looks away, finding it very difficult to swallow all of a sudden. He genuinely can't think of anything more tragic than that. He can hate James Potter with everything in him, hate all there is of him, but he's never once wished for less of James.

James is too much of so many things to ever shrink. He's been this bright, this momentous, since Regulus met him; it's the one consistent thing that never changed, even when Sirius and Regulus himself did. Even when Regulus grew to hate it, he could always count on it. James doesn't deserve this. What Regulus hates more than James is his suffering.

"I killed Irene," Regulus confesses abruptly, reaching out to put the vial back in James' pocket.

"No," James replies immediately, and when Regulus glances at him, he's shaking his head. He instantly doesn't believe it. The sight makes Regulus feel like he could cry.

"Yes, I did," Regulus rasps, and James stares at him, looking right into his eyes. It takes a moment, but James' face falls slack, and Regulus knows he's seen the truth in his eyes. "It was—well, it was a joint effort between me, Mathias, and Axus, I suppose. I had the killing blow, though. Mathias—they didn't mean to, they were aiming for Axus, but they shot Irene in the chest with their crossbow. Axus was fighting Irene, and they turned her into the shot. We, um, took her across the bridge, and that's why I was over there instead of with you. I should have been with you, but I was too busy killing her."

James shakes his head slightly. "I don't understand. You… Regulus, you would never—"

"She asked me to. She was in a lot of pain, James, and there was no chance of her surviving, so she wanted it to be quick so she didn't have to suffer," Regulus explains, and the skin around James' eyes go tight. "I don't know if that was fair of her to ask of me, because I'm—I still feel guilty."

"You quite literally put her out of her misery, Regulus," James says softly, reaching out to cover Regulus' hand. He hooks his pinky through Regulus' and strokes the back of Regulus' thumb with his own. "It was a kindness. If it was you in her situation, wouldn't you be grateful?"

"Maybe," is all Regulus can say, because it's hard to see it that way when he still viscerally recalls the resistance of Irene's body when he slipped his dagger in between her ribs.

"And Mathias?" James asks.

Regulus presses his lips in a thin line. "Consumed by the need for revenge. They blamed Axus, no doubt, so as soon as they heard the cannon that meant Irene was gone, they went running after Axus to—well, I'm quite sure they planned to kill them. Axus snatched the bridge right out from under them while they were crossing it. I was too late to stop it."

"If I had been paying more attention, I could have stopped it," James announces, tipping his head back against the cave wall. The column of his throat rises and falls on a harsh swallow, and he closes his eyes. "I killed Hodge."

Regulus' first instinct is to deny it, because James wouldn't just murder a child, but then he remembers how he'd simply responded to Quinn attacking Evan. It was reflexive. He killed her without thinking. Bernice had been yelling for Hodge to kill Vanity, and if he actually did… Well.

"What happened?" Regulus asks quietly.

James' eyes flutter open. "He slit Vanity's throat. I was too late to stop it, too, but when I reached them… I didn't even mean to do it. Isn't that fucked up? Even though he just killed Vanity, I never intended for it to happen the way it did. I just—I pushed him. Shoved him away from her. We were so close to the river, right there by the water, and he…"

"He fell in," Regulus finishes.

"He was pushed in," James corrects. "By me."

"James," Regulus says gently, "it was an accident. You didn't intentionally kill him. You were trying to protect Vanity."

"Fat lot of good that did," James croaks with a bitter laugh, rolling his head forward. He winces when the movement leads to him jostling his leg a bit. "It's his birthday, you know."

"Hodge's?" Regulus asks. "Today?"

"Yeah." James nods. "Vanity told me. He would have been fifteen today, and because of me —"

"Don't do that. Stop it, James," Regulus whispers fervently, reaching out to grip his chin and turn his head. "The horrible reality is that it was a shit situation, and now he's dead. You didn't mean to do it. You're not—listen to me, you're not a bad person. You can't keep bad things from happening, and I'm sorry for that, but you said—you said once that we're here, and we're still trying, and that counts for a lot of things. It does. It still does."

James takes in a shaky breath, blinking hard, and he chokes out, "I don't know how I'm supposed to live with it."

"You just do," Regulus murmurs, because that's all he's got. He doesn't think there's some secret that makes things such as this any easier. It'll never get easier. You just learn how to keep going, despite how hard it is.

"A part of me doesn't want to," James confesses, and the words are softer than a breath, but they're as devastating as nuclear explosives locked on target. It leaves a wasteland behind inside Regulus.

Carefully, Regulus slips his hand from James' chin to his cheek, holding his gaze. His other hand is still under James', and he squeezes James' pinky with his own. Deadly serious, he looks James right in the eye and says, "Too bad."

"I—" James blinks, clearly startled out of his surge of emotion, because he obviously wasn't expecting that. He looks at Regulus for a beat, then huffs out a weak laugh. "Too bad?"

"Yes," Regulus says simply. "This isn't up for debate, James. I don't give a toss what some part of you may or may not want. I know this is all shit, but we are going home, even if I have to throw you over my shoulder and carry you there myself."

James' mouth twitches slightly. "Well, now I'll be very disappointed if you don't."

"You'd like that, wouldn't you?" Regulus muses lightly, practically goading James into flirting, at this point, because he's genuinely concerned about him. He can't believe he's thinking this, but he actually wishes James would be talking nonstop and flirting with him incessantly, compared to this.

"Yeah," is all James says, and he leaves it there. He teases no further, and he doesn't seem to have the energy or the inner joy to muster up a smile, or a wink, or a flirty comment.

Regulus' stomach churns, and he sits there in silence for a long time, not entirely sure what to say. He has no fucking clue how to be comforting, especially to James. It's not like he's Sirius, for fuck's sake. Literally, Regulus is the most awkward, stilted person on the planet when it comes to emotions of any kind, but particularly those of which he labels as vulnerable or uncomfortable.

It's strange how bad Regulus feels for that. He—well, it's not the first time in his life that he's put in a situation where he has to come to terms with the fact that he's not like most people. Usually, Regulus doesn't really care, but this time he wishes he knew how to be what he's never been, just so he could do something, anything, to help James right now.

In the end, Regulus can't figure out what to say, but if there's one thing he knows about James, it's that he's a very tactile person. Touch—he loves it, any kind, any place, any form.

He's greedy for it, whether that's giving it to others or getting it; just a point of contact pleases him.

So, Regulus pulls away and, because it's getting darker, he grabs his blanket from his bag and stands up to step over James and settle on his other side. James blinks at him, clearly not understanding what the fuck he's doing, but he makes no complaints when Regulus carefully tucks the blanket under his bad leg, pulling it up over his arm. He then stands up and steps back over before settling in up against James as carefully as possible, trying not to jostle him too much.

"Sit up a bit," Regulus murmurs, and James does, though he still looks confused.

The expression of bewilderment melts into brief delight when Regulus slips his arm around him from where he leans up and gently pulls him back. James is essentially tucked up against his side, scooted down a little due to his leg, and he has the space to lean his head over on Regulus' shoulder. Regulus encourages him to do so wordlessly by raising the arm around him and sinking his fingers into James' hair, pushing his head over as he kneads at his scalp. James pretty much melts.

"Oh," James breathes out. "That's—that's really nice."

Regulus doesn't respond. He just uses his free hand to tug the blanket up over them both, tucking it in under him so they're as snug as they're going to get. He keeps running his fingers through James' hair and looks off to the side, like he can ignore what's happening if he's not looking. Not once has Regulus held James, not like this. He's allowed James to hold him, and that's it, because that's different somehow.

But, if this is all he can do, if this is all he can offer as a form of comfort, then do it he shall. He doesn't know what to say, but maybe he doesn't have to say anything at all.

It's clearly a comfort, because it doesn't take long for James to slump against him, falling asleep. He's still not doing well, so he's sweaty and shivery, but he seems to be in optimal positioning for the least amount of pain. Regulus takes it as a win and drags his hand from James' hair to gently brush his fingers over the side of James' neck instead, closing his eyes and leaning his cheek on top of James' head. He keeps caressing his skin, lulled into a sense of calm he hasn't felt in who knows how long at this point, and even though he's no doubt going to get a horrible crick in his neck and his arm will for sure fall asleep, he doesn't plan to move.

Regulus is going to stay just like this for as long as he can.

It makes something within him settle.

It gives him heart flutters.

He's not sure how long he sits there before he hears a light jingle like windchimes that makes his eyes snap open. Lifting his head, he follows the sound to watch a sponsor box float down at the entrance of the cave. Fucking finally.

Regulus exhales in relief as he carefully pulls his arm from around James, which causes him to grumble. He tries to cling tighter to Regulus, but eventually relinquishes his hold as he wakes up, mumbling questions and groaning in pain. Regulus mostly ignores him and tumbles out of the blanket, shivering in the cold but continuing on nonetheless.

It's too dark inside the cave to really see the contents, so Regulus crouches down and opens it right there at the mouth of the cave where there's at least light from the artificial moon and stars. He's fully expecting to find salve for James' leg.

He doesn't.

Regulus finds what he assumes will be the salve but is instead a canister of warm broth, which does admittedly smell so good that his mouth waters. There's one plastic spoon and a tiny box of matches. Regulus stares at it all, feeling oddly hollow. Like, okay, thanks, but that's not what they need. The most imperative thing is medicine to heal James, and there's no way Sirius doesn't know that, so what the fuck?

Frustrated beyond measure now, Regulus pulls out the white card at the bottom and turns it towards the mouth of the cave, hunched over it and squinting to make out the words. There are only two. The card reads:

Thank him.

Regulus slowly lowers the card, keeping it face down, and he stares off into space while he tries to decode what the fuck that means. Thank him. Thank who? The only person Regulus is with right now is James.

Frowning, Regulus glances over at James, who's squinting one eye as he rubs the heel of his palm into the other one. He makes a groggy noise of confusion, clearly trying to wake up enough to ask what Sirius sent. Regulus just stares at him, trying to figure out what he's supposed to be thanking James for. What has James ever done for—

It hits him like a fucking train. The memory of Sirius grabbing him by his arm and telling him he should have been thanking James for making him desirable. A very recent memory, in fact, even though it feels like a lifetime ago. The day that James Potter announced to the whole world that he had feelings for Regulus Black, and the day the whole world decided they liked that.

Oh.

Ha. Well, fuck. For a moment, Regulus got so caught up in the fact that he and James would be able to go home that he forgot what made that possible in the first place. Their little love story. What everyone comes to see. Right. That.

Regulus abruptly realizes precisely why Sirius hasn't sent the medicine for James. He fucking can't, because everyone is chomping at the bits for a show. You don't get handouts in the arena; you have to earn every fucking thing you get, whether that's through the work your mentor puts in or through the performance you put on. Sirius has apparently done all that he can, and it's up to Regulus—and James—from here.

"Regulus?" James mumbles. "What does the card say?"

"Nothing for you," Regulus replies stiffly, crumbling the card in his fist and picking up the box before moving over to the place for the fire. He strikes a match and gets the fire going, where he immediately drops the card.

"He sent matches?" James asks, eyebrows furrowed, an orange glow dancing with shadows over his face.

"Yes, and also broth for us to share. It's warm," Regulus says, trying to soften his voice. He isn't sure if it works. Carefully, he lifts the blanket and sits underneath the edge of it, putting the broth in his lap.

James stares at it, seeming to come to terms with the fact that Sirius has not sent medicine. He swallows and gives Regulus a tight smile. "I'm not really hungry."

"I don't care. You're going to eat. You need it, and it'll warm you up," Regulus declares.

"But—"

"James, don't argue with me."

"Oh, fine," James grumbles, grimacing as he pushes himself up to sit up straighter. He starts to reach for the broth.

Regulus pulls it away and coughs, then meets James' gaze as he says, "No, let me do it."

James blinks, then raises both eyebrows. "Let you…feed me?"

"Yes," Regulus says, wanting to gouge his own eyeball out with the fucking spoon. His skin is crawling.

"Um, sure?" James' face twitches, visibly baffled, but he drops his hands and immediately starts fiddling with them. Regulus notices he does this when he's restless, nervous, or confused, or all three—and he especially does it when he's anxious.

Taking a deep breath, Regulus dips the spoon and scoots closer to carefully lift it to James' mouth. James' eyebrows are furrowed, but he dutifully sips it, eyeing Regulus over the top like he's finally lost it. Yeah, Regulus relates.

They're utterly silent as Regulus quite literally feeds James the broth and occasionally steals bites for himself in between. On the bright side, the broth warms him and sits well on his stomach, so that's nice. Everything else? Fucking awful.

This feels distinctly lacking in romance. Regulus is really, really bad at this. He doesn't know where to start, because he knows it's going to take something major to get James his medicine, and Regulus' mind is utterly blank. He could really use James' help right now, but bluntly asking him out loud to lean into a fake romantic moment sort of defeats the purpose. But maybe James can sort of…take the wheel on this one?

"I think we should talk about us," Regulus announces.

"Us," James repeats, blinking.

Regulus clears his throat. "Our relationship."

"Our—" James rears back a little. "Sorry, what? We have one of those?"

"Obviously," Regulus grinds out, agitated that James isn't immediately jumping on this opportunity as usual. Yes, he's been through a lot, but this is crucial. Regulus is going to need James to get it together. "Everyone has relationships, even if it's just two strangers. Being strangers defines the relationship between them. And the relationship between us is…"

James' eyebrows are throwing a fucking party at the top of his forehead. "It is…?"

"Complicated," Regulus settles on, finally.

"Yeah, that's a word for it," James mutters.

"Just—I think we should…talk about it," Regulus insists, struggling not to grimace. He would literally rather rip his fingernails off. "Because we're going home…"

"Oh!" James nods, like that makes sense. "Right, well, obviously we'll be working together to get home. You don't have to worry about that. I'll be with you the whole way."

Regulus nearly groans, but swallows it at the last moment. Oh, why is James doing this to him? "No, that's not what I meant. I know that. I'm talking about…us."

"Us," James repeats yet again, confused once more.

"You know, feelings," Regulus clarifies. James stares at him like he's speaking an entirely different language. "Like—like how I had very big, very embarrassing feelings for you."

James' lips twitch. "You want to talk about that?"

I would rather die, but it's your life on the line, not mine, so here we are, Regulus thinks. He forces himself to mumble, "Well, we're sort of stuck here for the night, so why not?"

"I mean…if you want," James says slowly. "I already know about your feelings for me back then, though."

"Not really," Regulus tells him, taking a deep breath as he lifts up to feed James more broth. He buys time by taking a bite after, then drops his gaze to the spoon. "You only really know that it was from the age of ten to fifteen."

"Five years," James murmurs, sounding wistful. "Only half of how long I've had feelings for you. We're the definition of right person, wrong time."

Regulus glances up to find a sad smile on James' face, and it makes his heart flutter and clench at the same time. "You've had feelings for ten years? All of them?"

"It was always you," James says softly, his gaze meeting Regulus', warm with sincerity. "It's always going to be you."

"Right," Regulus croaks, looking away because he's not sure how to look at James when he's saying things like—that. He swallows. "Well, what you don't know is that I…"

"You…?" James prompts.

"I, um—I was—" Regulus takes a deep breath, then slowly lets it out and forces himself to make eye-contact. James is just watching him patiently, looking ridiculously fond. "I mean, I was a goner from the moment I saw you. Literally the first time I laid eyes on you, I—I was enamored, pretty much. I remember that, when Sirius dragged me outside to meet you, and I wasn't—at first, I wasn't looking forward to it at all—"

James frowns. "What? Why?"

"Because I didn't want Sirius to have a best friend. I was worried he'd—" Regulus cuts himself off and shakes his head, watching James' face soften. "But then, the door opened and there you were. I remember thinking even then, even at ten, that you had the prettiest eyes I'd ever seen. Behind your glasses and everything. Just like that, I was very happy that Sirius had made a best friend."

"You blushed the moment I smiled at you," James says, smiling affectionately now. Despite his injury and the pain he's surely still in, his eyes are sparkling. Huffing out a soft laugh, he whispers, "You were so shy."

"I couldn't help it," Regulus replies quietly.

"I know," James tells him, his voice gentle like he's trying to be kind to that small boy with helpless feelings now, as if he can make up for the fact that he wasn't then.

Regulus chokes out a harsh laugh and spoons out another bite for James, and then himself. "You also don't know that I used to collect brown rocks if they reminded me of your eyes. I would watch out my window every day after school to wait for you to come up the sidewalk so I could meet you at the door before Sirius did. I think I filled at least two journals about you before I even turned eleven. You don't even want to know how many I ended up burning at fifteen. I—James, I thought about you literally all the time. You were—I was—"

"Regulus," James says, and his eyes are so unbearably soft. So pretty, even to this day. "You said—you told me that what you liked about me, what you grew to hate, was that I made you feel, but feel what? What comes after that?"

"Nothing," Regulus admits helplessly. "That's where it ended. You made me feel. You only had to be close to me, and I felt."

"Oh." James swallows. "I—oh."

"You weren't my first crush, James," Regulus whispers. "You were my first love."

James' eyes inexplicably fill with sadness, so much sorrow in his gaze that it's like he's mourning. "From love to hate. A great, big tragedy."

"James," Regulus rasps, his hands shaking so much that he has to sit the canister of broth aside.

"I wish I could be happy hearing that," James tells him, looking completely, utterly defeated. "How can I, though? You still hate me, don't you? Even now. Even after all this."

"I—James, I—" Regulus falters, because he knows what it will take. He knows what everyone wants to hear, but he can't say it, because he—because the words fail him, and he can't.

Regulus can't do this. Not here, not like this, maybe never. It's the equivalent of cracking open his chest and bearing his soul to the entire world, which is only slightly less terrifying than bearing it to James. Regulus can't do it, and he also can't afford to fail in getting James his medicine.

This whole time, Regulus has been steady on the fact that he wouldn't kiss James to save his own life, but he's apparently willing to do it to save James'.

That's exactly what he does. He can't speak, so he acts instead. Regulus doesn't realize he's going to do it until he's rocking forward on his knees and leaning in to press a closed-mouth kiss to James' lips. It's quick, over in a blink, almost awkward because James doesn't see it coming at all. It's barely a kiss, and Regulus knows as soon as he pulls back that it's not going to be enough. He desperately wishes it would be, because his heart is already slamming against his chest, just from that.

James stares at him with wide eyes, visibly startled, his mouth parted. He looks so, so confused—and it's wrong. It's wrong that Regulus is doing this to him. Regulus has no choice.

"Regulus?" James croaks, and there's so much hope in his voice that it's fucking heart wrenching.

"I want you to come home with me, James. I'll do anything," Regulus whispers, leaning in again close enough that James can see his eyes and face in detail. He needs James to get it. He needs James to understand what's happening.

James' eyebrows furrow as he scans Regulus' face, and slowly, his gaze drops to the broth and then the fire. Regulus can pinpoint the exact moment that it clicks what's going on, because it's in that split second that Regulus can almost hear James' heart shatter. His eyes visibly dim, and for one second—only one—he looks absolutely heartbroken.

Regulus knows what it is to hate himself—he's done it for years—but he's never hated himself as much as he does at this moment, and the worst part is, it's not even his fault. It's not James' fault. None of this pain is something they have control over, all the way from death to a kiss. There was a time that Regulus would have liked nothing more than to break James' heart, just so he could know what it felt like, but that time has long since passed. Regulus wouldn't, if he didn't have to.

"Of course you will," James says, and his voice cracks, which Regulus feels directly in his chest. A soft, sad smile curls James' lips, and he nods. He understands. Just like that, Regulus knows that he understands. "We'll be home really soon, love. Together, we'll get there."

"I know," Regulus murmurs, reaching out to grab James' hand, squeezing it. He waits for James to squeeze back before leaning in to close the last bit of distance between their lips.

This time, Regulus kisses James like he means it. Like he can't help it. Like he's never wanted anything more. He lifts both hands and cradles James' face, curling forward into him to kiss him slow and sweet, savoring the way his lips part around a soft sigh. When Regulus feels the tear roll down James' cheek, hitting his finger, he gently brushes it away. It's their secret. No one will ever know but them.

It's devastating that a tear shed in heartbreak is the only thing that they get to have for themselves, but Regulus isn't sure what else he was expecting. This is what they are.

A great, big tragedy.

And, despite that, the kiss is so fucking good that Regulus' head spins in mere seconds, even before he dares to deepen it. But he does deepen it, slowly and tentatively, his heart crashing against his ribs like it's trying to take flight. Suddenly, Regulus does mean it. He can't help it. He hasn't wanted anything more than this. Oh, this.

James reaches up to grip the back of his neck, making a quiet, needy sound into Regulus' mouth, and Regulus is so desperate to taste it that he's shaking. The inside of James' mouth tastes like broth and warmth, but mostly him, and the slide of his tongue against Regulus' own draws a helpless, broken noise out of him. If Regulus knew at the age of fourteen that he would be doing this, he would have thought every moment of pain leading to this point was worth it. Regulus, at this age, is finding it difficult to disagree.

A hand Regulus has memorized slides up into his hair, and James is the one kissing him now, really kissing him. It doesn't matter where they are, what they've been through, or even the state of themselves at the moment. The arena could collapse down on them, and Regulus doubts he would care.

James pulls away just enough to suck in a sharp breath, and then he's chasing Regulus' mouth like a man possessed, one hand in his hair and the other gripping his side to pull him closer. Regulus is so agreeable to that, actually. He presses forward, wanting more, wanting all of it, anything. He feels—oh, he feels—

"Fuck," James hisses, ripping away to turn his head with a grimace, glaring down at his leg like he's debating cutting it off for daring to interrupt them.

Regulus splays his hand against the cave wall by James' head, tucking his face down against James' shoulder. He tries to discreetly catch his breath, unwilling to let anyone in the world see how much of a mess that just made him.

A beat passes. Two. Three. Regulus and James just breathe, not moving or speaking for a long time. Finally, once Regulus is mostly sure that he's gotten his shit together, he lifts his head and clears his throat. His voice is a little wooden, like he's reading lines from a script when he mutters, "Well, that was a bit stupid to do when you're hurt. We can't do that, or anything else, until you're healed, James."

"Yeah," James says softly, dropping his gaze. "That's for the best. But it was—" He hesitates, then lifts his eyes to look at Regulus, and Regulus knows this is real. Whatever he's about to say, he's going to mean it. "That was one of the happiest moments of my life, despite the pain."

I'm sorry, Regulus wants to say.

"That was the best kiss I've ever had," is what Regulus says instead, because if he can't apologize, he can at least tell the truth about that.

James' lips tug up into a crooked smile, and though it doesn't quite reach his eyes, it's real, too. "Good to know."

"We should finish the broth and sleep," Regulus whispers, and he reaches out to grab the canister to do just that. Feeding James isn't awkward or uncomfortable anymore.

For some reason, it's much more intimate now.

~•~

James' medicine comes only a bit after they've finished the broth, less than an hour later. He knows he should be happy about that, but it mostly just leaves a bitter taste in his mouth.

What it took to get it…

James doesn't even want to think about it. He never imagined a scenario in which he could get something he's wanted for so long without even coming close to actually having it at all. It's not Regulus' fault, James knows that, but it still fucking hurts.

Well, now James knows that Regulus would kiss him in the pursuit of saving his life, if there literally was no other option. How fucking romantic.

It's fucked up, mostly. James doesn't want to be resentful, but he can't help the anger and hurt that festers in him. He's in pain, he feels like death warmed over, and he's had the best kiss of his life from the man he wants so badly he can't move on, but only to save his life. He would have never, never gotten that kiss under any other circumstances, and knowing that stings.

Their first kiss, and it's not even one he can be truly happy about. He almost wishes it didn't even happen.

Almost.

Regulus is more cheered by the medicine than James is, but it's hard for James to be happy when it feels like flames are licking up and down his leg.

Sirius has sent more of that magical salve that heals wounds at a rapid rate and also neutralizes infection; how well it will do when the injury is this bad, they don't know, but there's only one way to find out, right? It's not very much, just enough for James' leg, which makes sense because Regulus doesn't have any open wounds. He has a few bruises on his face and probably in other places James can't see, but that's it.

The card just says: I'm sorry. The sight of it makes a lump form in James' throat, and everything in him wants to reassure Sirius, but he finds that he can't. Right now, sorry doesn't feel good enough, and it's not even Sirius' fault in the first place. Regulus also doesn't respond to it; he just drops the card into the fire and looks away as it burns.

Regulus folds up the cloth and gives it to James for him to bite down on, which James does, and then he spreads the salve on the entry and exit point where the hook went into one side of his thigh and came all the way back out on the other. It's excruciating, quite frankly. James clamps down on the cloth and muffles his scream, pounding one fist to the cave floor like some other form of pain can distract him.

"I'm sorry. I know, I know, I'm sorry," Regulus chants in genuine distress, sounding strained and distracted. James knows, even in his agony, that Regulus is just rambling, which somehow makes it simultaneously so much better and so much worse when Regulus rasps, "It's okay. I promise it's okay. Almost done, baby. It'll be over soon. Shh, it's okay."

So, Regulus can't stop hating him, but he can call him baby and panic every time he's in high spikes of pain?

Lovely. Just fucking lovely.

Speaking of high spikes of pain, this one is so bad that James quite literally passes out. He doesn't know it's going to happen until the dark edges creep in, and then he's just relieved, because at least he doesn't have to feel this way anymore. He slips under while Regulus is still working on his leg.

James sleeps all the way through until morning, which he becomes aware of when he wakes up again. The first thing he makes note of is that he and Regulus are snuggled up under the blanket just like they were before the broth came. Regulus is holding James, even in his sleep, his fingers slack in James' hair like he was stroking it before he drifted off.

The next thing James becomes aware of the distinct lack of pain in his leg. He holds his breath as he lifts his head and looks at it, heart thumping hard when he sees how much better it is. Each puncture wound is significantly smaller, and his leg is no longer swollen and inflamed. It's not completely healed, but he should be able to walk on it, and James himself is feeling much better as well.

James exhales and tips his head back, taking a moment to bask in it, feeling the ridiculous urge to laugh hysterically, though he refrains because Regulus is still asleep. Carefully, James turns his head and looks at him. Like this, Regulus' face is slack and innocent, unbearably sweet like the angel he can pretend to be but most certainly isn't.

Slowly, James lifts his hand and gently pushes some of Regulus' hair back from his face. It's a little limp and greasy from a week without showers, but James knows he's equally as filthy at the moment. They're both a mess of sweat, dirt, and dried blood. And yet, as always, Regulus is still beautiful.

For a moment, James feels like he's drowning in the realization that they're both alive and they both can make it home. It's almost too hard to believe, but James can feel the hope winding its way around his bones, refusing to let him go. They're so close. James can see his parents again. James can see Sirius again. They can do this.

The determination and pure purpose that grips James leaves him breathless. All the grief and pain has to wait until he gets home, because right now, James is fighting for more than just Regulus—for the first time, he grants himself the privilege of fighting for himself, too. Regulus is getting home no matter what it takes, but now James is lucky enough to join him.

"Regulus, come on, wake up," James murmurs, gently passing his fingers through Regulus' hair.

A quiet, unhappy noise leaves Regulus' mouth, and he presses closer to James. He's still asleep, clearly trying to cling to it and James at the same time. A soft exhale leaves him, and James' heart clenches violently when he realizes what Regulus is saying. Just the gentle, sleep-slurred sound of his name on Regulus' lips. It sounds so sweet James could cry.

Again, James cards his fingers through Regulus' hair and nudges him a little. Again, Regulus says, "James," and this time, he sounds slightly indignant as he snuggles closer.

"I know, love, I know," James mumbles, heaving a sigh as he leans his head forward to press his cheek to Regulus' shoulder. He's exhausted, too. He's so, so tired. He wants to go home.

James gives Regulus just a bit more time, closing his eyes and taking a quick break himself. Just breathing. Not thinking. It's one moment he steals for both of them, and then he opens his eyes and takes a deep breath, because they still have a ways to go. He starts prodding Regulus awake more insistently.

When Regulus finally does wake up, he's grumpy in that way James can't help but be fond of. The affection he feels for Regulus is enough to strangle him, and after their kiss, the sensation just hurts. He finds it hard to look at Regulus, but really, that's all he wants to do.

Nonetheless, they have to get started. They can't stay here for much longer, because Bernice and Axus are no doubt out on the prowl, practically tasting victory at this point, much the same way James and Regulus are. Regulus is pleased to see that James can stand and walk, at least, though there is a little pain—nothing compared to what it was before, so James can absolutely tolerate it without complaint.

Regulus once again removes his coat briefly to cut off another section all the way around his shirt, bringing it a little above his belly-button and showing off how slim his waist is. The sight of it and the small of his back makes James' mouth go dry; he can't stop himself from looking, and when Regulus catches him doing it, he doesn't say a word. He just puts his coat back on—but doesn't zip it—and kneels down in front of James to wrap his leg again. It's as healed as it's going to get for now, but wrapping it keeps it from being exposed to anything as they move through the woods.

They don't speak much as they prepare to leave, and James wishes with everything in him that there wasn't this stifling tension between them. It puts him on edge. He doesn't want to feel angry, or upset, but he can't help it.

However, they can't just—set out with no plan, so they do eventually start talking about what comes next. It's somehow easier to talk about their next moves and their survival than anything else, so that's what they do. It's day seven, and only three people stand between them and getting home, so what exactly is their plan? Well, they barely get five minutes into the discussion before they're bickering.

"No," James snaps. "I don't believe that."

"James," Regulus grits out, "I know he's your ally—"

"Peter is my friend," James cuts in harshly. "He's my friend, Regulus. I promise you, he's not going to fucking team up with Bernice, alright? He wouldn't do that."

"Why?" Regulus challenges, stopping at the mouth of the cave to glare at him, his jaw set. "The chance to go home, to work with someone to get home—that's too good of an opportunity to pass up, James. If they're working together—"

"They're not," James argues. "Peter isn't a fucking death eater."

"So, where is he?" Regulus demands.

James clenches his jaw. "I don't know, but he's not with her. She wants us dead, and so does Axus. Peter wouldn't betray me like that."

"If he's prioritizing his survival, he might," Regulus counters, frowning at him. "Riddle me this, James. What happens when we come across him if he's not a death eater, hm?"

To that, James has no answer.

"He stands between us and home, too," Regulus reminds him, holding his gaze. "Say he is alone and wants to help us handle Bernice and Axus, then what?"

"I'm getting really tired of you asking me that," James grits out. "I don't fucking know, alright?! I don't know!"

"James," Regulus says, his voice softening, "you have to—"

"Shut up!" James bursts out. "For fuck's sake, just shut up."

Regulus jerks back a little bit, his mouth snapping shut so hard that his teeth clack together. He stares at James, and James stares back, breathing hard. He's so angry. So furious and frustrated about so many things.

James waits for the regret he knows he should feel, but it never comes. He's not sorry. He doesn't want to apologize or take it back. He wants Regulus to shut up, to stop shoving it in James' face how fucking awful everything is all the damn time. It's silent between them, and James is too angry to care.

Regulus drops his gaze and looks away, then starts walking out of the cave without another word. James follows, his hatchet in hand. Regulus brought it to him, and he holds it now, fingers gripping the handle tight.

Neither of them speak or look at one another as Regulus leads them to a stream so they can refill their water. James keeps waiting to feel bad for hurting Regulus' feelings, because he knows that he did; he saw it in Regulus' eyes the moment it happened. James keeps waiting, and the remorse never rises within him. Even when his anger simmers, he's not guilty.

At the stream, they both take the time to actually wet their hair and have bird-baths, using the cloth to wipe away dirt and grime that's been building for days. It's not even close to a shower, but James does admittedly feel better just to be even slightly more clean than before. He's even treated to the sight of Regulus' waist and hips gleaming in the sunlight with water droplets, and it's ridiculous how he wants to walk over and just fucking bite. Not a playful bite, no, James wants to sink his teeth into Regulus and leave the deep imprints of his teeth from one jutting hip bone to the other.

In the end, James has to look away to fight the impulse.

They leave the stream more hydrated and mildly cleaner, but no less tense. Still, even now, they're not speaking. James can see that Regulus is peeking over at him cautiously every few minutes, but he keeps walking and staring straight ahead.

James doesn't know where they're going. They never got past the discussion on Peter, so he's just walking in the same direction as Regulus. At this point, he refuses to even ask.

His leg still hurts, and the background pain slowly makes itself more known the longer he walks on it. Rather against his will, James slows a little bit. Regulus matches his pace immediately, not saying a word. The silence is so loud, and usually, James would absolutely hate it—but still, he's too angry to care.

They've only been walking for a little over an hour when James has no choice but to take a break. He's started limping, and he needs to rest for a moment, so he goes over to lean against a tree. He doesn't explain himself to Regulus, doesn't even call out to him, but Regulus stops the instant he does anyway.

"Your leg?" Regulus asks quietly, finally breaking the silence.

James just grunts an affirmative.

Regulus swallows, then turns away and walks off in between the trees. James watches him go, not even speaking when he loses sight of him. It takes a few beats of silence and the echo of Regulus' presence that he left behind, and then James feels the unease set in along with his weariness, agitation, and pain.

James doesn't like not being able to see Regulus. It makes a knot of stress form at the top of his spine; it puts him on edge. Make no mistake, James is still angry for some fucking reason he can't really figure out—perhaps angry at everything—but that doesn't mean he wants Regulus to leave.

As much as he needs this break, James starts to push himself back up to follow Regulus wherever he's gone, because that's him, isn't it? That's what he always does. It's pathetic. Yet, he can't stop himself, so that's exactly what he begins to do, only to stop when Regulus comes back into view again.

Regulus has a large stick, longer than it is wide, and he brings it right to James. He holds it out and mumbles, "For you to take some of your weight off your leg."

James doesn't say anything as he reaches out and takes it. He just looks away and rests against the tree. The pain in his leg is dulling slowly but surely.

"James," Regulus says softly, and he's not quite able to meet James' eyes when he looks at him. "I'm sorry."

"It's fine," James replies shortly, his tone making it very clear that it's not fine, though he honestly doesn't know what it is he's actually upset about.

"Right," Regulus whispers. "Okay. Sorry."

They fall silent again, not looking at each other, and then they start walking a few minutes later when James thinks he's ready. The stick helps a lot, so much so that James almost wants to thank Regulus for the idea, but the words are blocked by the thick knot of frustration in his throat.

Another hour passes in suffocating silence.

"Alright?" Regulus asks, eventually. "Your leg, I mean."

"Fine," is James' clipped response.

Regulus comes to an abrupt halt, making James walk past him. James doesn't stop or look back, just keeps right on going, and then Regulus rasps, "James."

At that, the way Regulus says his name, James stops. He sounds so upset. Genuinely hurt. Maybe even a bit scared. Despite everything, hearing Regulus sound like that tugs on something deep in James, like it hooks right into his soul and drags him out of his own feelings. Slowly, he turns around.

For a moment, James is gripped with such blind fury and bubbling resentment that he almost can't breathe from it, and he can't figure out the source. It's all of it, he thinks. It's coming from all different directions, everything building up too high and starting to tip over. It's the loss, it's this arena, it's the memory of a kiss that wasn't real.

And how dare Regulus look at him like that? Like he's hurt, too. Like James' sharp edges are cutting into him, as if he's not made of stone. Like he's more afraid of James' anger than he is when someone is threatening his life.

"You know, you can't handle even a tiny portion of what you give," James tells him, his voice sharp.

"I know," Regulus murmurs, his shoulders slumping. "I'm aware that it's a flaw."

"So, how does it feel?" James challenges. "Hm? Does it feel good, Regulus?"

"No," Regulus says softly, "it doesn't."

James nods sharply. "Maybe think about that next time you forget to care about other people's feelings. I have them, you know. Has it ever crossed your mind that I'm struggling, too? Don't you think this is getting to me as well? All of it? I hate it, Regulus. I—" His swallows, his chest tight as the tangle of emotions inside clump together within him and bang around against the hollow of his ribs. "I need something good, and I can't find it. You won't even help me look."

"James," Regulus croaks, his face sagging with regret.

"I need to believe in something good," James chokes out, desperate for Regulus to understand. "Peter can't be a death eater, because I—I need him not to be. Why would you try to take that away from me?"

Regulus curls his arms around his stomach, hands coming up to grip the sleeves of his coat, fingers holding the fabric tight, twisting it. "I just—I wanted you to be prepared. I don't want you to get hurt, James."

"It's too fucking late for that!" James explodes. "Don't you get it? You can't protect me from this, because I'm already here! I'm right fucking here; I'm in this with you, and you can't just expect me to be what you need me to be for your own comfort, then turn around and tear me down when I'm doing everything I can not to lose myself!"

"I'm—I swear I'm not trying to tear you down," Regulus starts, but James cuts him off.

"You treat me like I'm stupid for daring to see good in people, but if there's no good in anyone, then what's the fucking point?" James snaps. "I don't know about you, but I have to believe that there's good in this world, or otherwise what are we even fighting for? What's the point in living if we're not letting ourselves have reasons to? Not everyone in this world will let us down, and I'm not a fool for expecting the best out of someone, because we're all here, and we're all trying, and that has to mean something. I need it to mean something."

"Okay, James," Regulus whispers. He swallows thickly and nods, a deep sorrow in his eyes. "Okay."

James scoffs. "You don't agree."

"I'm sorry," Regulus rasps. "I wish I could."

"Why don't you?" James asks, frustrated. "I don't understand. At least I'm trying. You don't—you won't even try, do you know that? Why not?"

"The only good in this world I've ever known was you and Sirius," Regulus confesses, "and you both let me down."

"Fuck you, Regulus," James hisses, his hands shaking as anger surges within him. "Even then, even at fifteen years old, I was just like this. Trying, and trying, and trying. I really fucking tried, but you made that difficult. But did it ever, even once, cross your mind that maybe—" His breath hitches, and his throat feels swollen all of a sudden. "Maybe I needed—"

"James," Regulus says.

"Maybe I needed someone to care, too," James croaks. "Did that ever occur to you? I mean, I—I got it, you know? I really did understand that things were hard for you, but it was like… I don't know. It was like you forgot that, in all of that, you weren't the only one who lost something. I was fifteen, Regulus. Fifteen years old and trying as hard as I could, and you pushed me away."

Regulus looks away. "I know. I—wanted to."

"You wanted to," James repeats, his voice hollow.

"I think I forgot how to let anyone be close," Regulus says. "Maybe that makes me selfish, maybe that makes me cruel—"

"No, that's—I'm not—" James takes a deep, steadying breath as he shakes his head. "You were fifteen, too. Only just. We were children, Reg. Neither of us knew what we we're doing, and to be honest with you, I can't say we know now. But I'm not blaming you, alright? I'm not—I don't blame any of us. None of it was our fault. Not mine, yours, or Sirius'."

"And yet, you're angry with me for it," Regulus murmurs.

James clenches his jaw, then stiffly says, "Yes, I am. I wasn't just trying because that's who I am, Regulus. I was trying because I needed you. I needed you, and you didn't care. So, yes, I'm angry. I'm angry, because sometimes it feels like all I do is try, only to fail every time, and I don't know how to give up, so I'm just stuck in this same fucking cycle with no way out. And here we are—I'm still trying, I still won't give up, and it infuriates me that I still need you, and you still don't care."

"That's not fair," Regulus says quietly. "I can't give you what you need if you won't at least tell me what it is. You didn't then either, James, do you know that? You tried so hard, tried to do something when there was nothing you could do, and you just wouldn't quit, even when I told you over and over I didn't need or want you to take care of me. But you never once said you needed me, not until now."

"I didn't know how to say it," James admits hoarsely. "I didn't even know until it was too late. Isn't that fucked up? I wasn't even aware that I was hurting, because I was fucking busy trying to ignore it because it—it was easier to focus on your pain than let myself feel my own. I'm—I take care of everyone else because it makes me feel good, but it's also so that I don't have to face that sometimes I need to be taken care of, too."

The skin around Regulus' eyes are tight, and James can see his own regrets reflected in Regulus' gaze. So much history, so much pain between them, and maybe that's all they know. Maybe that's how they've survived this long in the arena. This isn't new. They've been suffering for years now.

"What do you need from me?" Regulus asks.

"You, mostly," James says with a bitter laugh, because he knows he won't be getting that, not really. "But I'll settle for you letting me keep trying. I don't want to prepare for the worst, but hope for the best; I want to believe that there's good in this world and the people in it, even if you don't agree."

Regulus takes a deep breath, then nods. "Alright."

"Alright," James rasps, the knot unfurling in his chest as he exhales shakily. "I just—I need this, Regulus. I really do. I have to believe there's still a point, because I—I can't—"

"There is," Regulus cuts in. "There's always a point, James, and wherever you find it—well, it doesn't matter who agrees or doesn't. We all have the things that keep us going. Yours is beautiful, you know. It's really beautiful."

James feels himself deflate as his eyes prick with tears. "Is it?"

"Yes," Regulus murmurs.

"What's yours?" James mumbles.

Regulus sighs, giving him a resigned smile. "Pure spite, mostly, but also… Fear. Fear keeps me going, because I'm afraid of what happens if I stop. I don't know if that makes me a coward, but I do know that your determination to keep going because you refuse to give up or stop trying… Well, it's not stupid, not at all. You're brave, James. Beautifully brave."

James feels like that cracks him open a bit. It hits him then how frightened he is, how desperately he needs his hope and his persistence in always trying, no matter his failures, because he's going to live. Because he can go home, and that means he has to live with what he's gone through.

And that's why he's so angry. He's upset because he won't get to just—escape the horrors of what's happened here, and he has to bear the weight of it after bearing so much already. It's infuriating. It's devastating.

But this—what Regulus has said to him—eases that fury, that fear, that failure. It crawls up from something innocent and soft in his center, in his very soul, and curls up around his heart, warm and snug. It makes him feel like he's going to be okay. It makes him feel safe.

"Thank you," James breathes out.

"We should go," Regulus says softly, turning to walk again, but he abruptly stops and looks back. "And James?"

"Yeah?" James whispers.

"If there's one thing all of this has taught me," Regulus tells him, "it's that I've always cared."

James sucks in a sharp breath, holding it as a balloon expands in his chest, his heart starting back to life with a harsh kick. He looks into Regulus' eyes, those eyes that he knows so well, and it's true. Regulus is telling the truth. That's real.

He's always cared.

Oh.

James breaks out into a helpless smile, feeling more like himself than ever, and Regulus' lips curl up at the sight before he turns and walks away.

Feeling much better, James happily follows.

Chapter End Notes

everyone: WHEN WILL THEY KISS??? me: be careful what you wish for so, that one was kinda heavy/angsty, huh? let's get into it, i guess.

it was really important to me to show that regulus was trying to comfort james and be there for him out of care (cough and repressed love cough) even before he was reminded of the love story the hallows are expecting from him. it was also really important for me to show just how much he struggles with that, because it doesn't come easily to him. it's not something that he knows how to do naturally, but the fact that he makes the effort for james is so, so important, and it is, in fact, a love language, honestly.

him being Completely Clueless about how to be romantic 😭😭😭 like poor babe, why did it have to fall on him? james would have THRIVED in that role, it would have been his time to shine lmaoooo but no, it was on regulus to lead the charge, as it were, and he ended up panicking and kissing his not-boyfriend. great job, reg, you're doing amazing sweetie 👍 (oh and honorable mention to regulus accidentally calling james "baby" again!!! the next time he does it, it's on purpose!!!)

i want all of you who were grinning, cheering, kicking your feet, and squealing to know that the hallows were doing the exact same things 🤨 no, you're no better than a hallow. it's okay, im no better than a gamemaker for essentially Making It Happen. yes, im becoming self-aware.

i make jokes, but really, that whole "performance" was so sad. like it wasn't james or regulus' fault, or even sirius', for that matter. im really putting james through the wringer in this one, aren't i? he's gotten caught in a bear trap, lost all of his allies/friends in one go, had a hook buried in his thigh, got dragged through the woods, suffered the pain of that and his grief, and THEN the man he's in love with kissed him out of necessity and for no other reason. like. the poor man can't catch a break 😔 which is why he was so pissed off. it was about time he snapped. like, he's been going THROUGH IT, so of course he finally reached the end of his unbelievably long rope. he had ENOUGH. hurt regulus' feelings though 😭😭😭 no, because regulus is a big baby when james gets mad at him. he's like: I Don't Like This Please Stop Please Don't Be Mean To Me. as much as i love regulus, he's absolutely the person who can dish it out but Cannot Take It. james snaps at him ONCE and he's like: 🥺 wait no love me again pls

james insisting that peter can't be a death eater and won't betray him; please know that this comes from a place of him literally just trying to cling to Something Good. like, he needs that, because he is who he is. it's not necessarily because he actually believes it, he just really, really fucking hopes. and he's so valid, actually, for how he tries to find purpose and meaning. it's not weak to hope, to believe that there is good in this world. i actually think that's really strong, and brave.

regulus is a bit too jaded for that, though, and he's just a different type of person, which is okay. he's right to say that however someone finds a point to things is okay, and it doesn't matter who agrees or doesn't, because we all need that, ya know?

this got unexpectedly deep for a hunger games au fanfic... ANYWAY, the real main character of this chapter!!! regulus admitting that he's always cared about james. GOODBYE. the way that literally jolted james back to life 😭😭😭 they're so in love...

next chapter is a Big One. very, very close to the end. so, you know, prepare for that!

let me do numbers i guess.

tributes remaining: 5
regulus
james axus bernice peter

Hesitation

Chapter Notes

hello, all!

warnings for this chapter:

-references to past death
-references to past child death
-depictions of a nightmare and a panicked/defensive response to it
-graphic depictions of violence
-mentions of blood
-murder/death
-angst

(i will be putting a more in-depth warning in the end notes, as i always tend to on the heavier chapters, so don't hesitate to check if you need to!!!)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

"Er, where exactly are we going?" James finally gets around to asking, after they've been walking for ages, at this point. The mood has settled between them, so they've had a few light discussions about meaningless things, especially while James is taking his much-needed breaks.

"The crimson river. If the others aren't already there, then they'll end up there at some point to look for supplies they won't find. Also, if we can beat them there, it's a good place to be, because it's surrounded by open space, so we'll see them coming when they do," Regulus explains.

"Why won't they find supplies?"

"I threw them away. All of them."

"So, wait, why did you throw away all the supplies?" James asks in confusion, not quite grasping the point of that.

Regulus' face does this odd twitching thing. "Well, I was stuck, and frustrated, so I…"

"Had a tantrum?" James says, amused by the thought.

"Something like that," Regulus mutters. "In any case, it was for the best. It ensures that the others can't use it, at the very least. Peter doesn't have weapons or supplies. Axus only has their hook, and Bernice has her sword, and that's it. They can survive out there, sure, but they're going to want the ease of supplies eventually. It'll draw them in, if it hasn't already."

James hums thoughtfully. "And what are we going to do if we get there and find Bernice and Axus already waiting?"

"They are going to try to kill us, and instead, we will kill them," Regulus responds without missing a beat.

"Just like that, huh?" James murmurs.

"I don't like it any more than you do, James," Regulus replies quietly, swiveling his dagger between his fingers, lips tipped down at the corners.

"I'm tired of all the death," James admits, looking down at his hatchet, not entirely sure when he became so familiar with it that his hand sometimes feels wrong without the weight of it.

Regulus takes a deep breath. "I know, me too, but it'll all be over soon. Maybe as soon as tonight. We could—James, we could be home by tomorrow. That's what we need to focus on."

"And then what?" James asks, admittedly smug that he gets to turn Regulus' words back on him.

"What?" Regulus blurts out, glancing over at him. As soon as their eyes meet, his face turns bright red. He looks away quickly, clearing his throat. "Sorry, what? I mean—what? What do you mean and then what?"

James' eyebrows shoot up in surprise, because Regulus is blatantly flustered at the moment—from the question, maybe? James isn't sure. "I meant what I said. We get home, yeah? And then what? What's next, Reg?"

"Oh. Well, first on my list, I want a long, hot shower," Regulus says, sounding wistful.

"That sounds really good, yeah," James admits, because it does. His lips curl up. "You know, in the interest of conserving water, we could have a long, hot shower together."

"Do I look like I care about conserving water, James?"

"Alright, fair enough, but you should care. Water is a limited resource, so it's important not to waste it."

Regulus shoots him a look. "Oh, yes, that's the reason you're interested in taking a shower with me. No other reason at all."

"Of course," James says with an innocent smile, because he's in a much better mood now after their earlier talk, after letting out some of his frustration. He'd forgotten how good it feels just to be—happy.

"I'd also like to sleep for, like, three days at least," Regulus declares, sounding genuinely serious.

James snorts. "Oh, yeah, that's high on my list, too."

"You're not going to suggest we sleep together in the name of sharing body heat, or… something?" Regulus asks.

"Actually, no," James says with a chuckle. "Don't take this the wrong way, but if there's anyone I'm sleeping with when I get back, it's absolutely Sirius."

"You two are so codependent that it's borderline worrisome," Regulus muses. "Do you ever get tired of each other?"

"Literally never," James admits.

"That's impossible," Regulus mutters.

"I know it's hard for you to grasp, Reg, but sometimes people actually just like other people," James teases. For some reason, this makes Regulus flinch a little bit, and James' smile fades. "What? What is it? What did I say?"

Regulus clears his throat. "Not you. It's just—it's something Evan said before he—before he died, is all."

"Oh," James says softly, immediately solemn. Carefully, he sways closer to Regulus to bump their arms together. "Do you want to talk about it?"

"No," Regulus replies.

James wants so badly to comfort him, but he knows now what he didn't at fifteen—pushing too hard with Regulus won't get him anywhere. So, he just says, "Okay."

Some of the tension leaves Regulus' shoulders, and they fall silent. It's a comfortable silence, though, both of them just left to their own thoughts. Just existing in each other's spaces.

They keep walking, taking a break nearly every hour because of James' leg, and the sun is starting to set. They gather berries and eat them; they stay hydrated and refill their water when they come across a stream; they keep going.

It takes all day to make it to the field twenty-four people started in a week ago, with only five remaining now. James' leg is mostly to blame for the length of the trip, because even though he can walk on it, he can only really go at a slower pace and there is still some pain, so the breaks are necessary. Regulus doesn't complain, for which James is grateful.

But, eventually, they do break through the treeline, the crimson river and the cave it surrounds coming into view. They stop on the edge of the forest, and they stare at it in complete silence, neither of them saying a word.

It's completely deserted.

~•~

Regulus and James have to wait a bit for the crimson river to ice over before they can cross it; his unease does admittedly rise even more when they bypass the scattered poles to step into the cave. It's empty in an eerie, cavernous way that screams of gutted, hollow things, a reflection of what last took place here. Regulus' skin crawls.

"You really cleaned this place out," James mumbles, looking around at—nothing, because Regulus quite literally dumped every single thing other than the tables and racks.

"Yes," is all Regulus can bring himself to say, taking his bag off and plopping gracelessly down on the floor with a sigh.

He's tired. Today has been especially taxing. Nothing even really happened; it's just how emotionally draining it was to have James actually, legitimately angry with him. Properly furious, and not just bickering or mild frustration. James has never before gotten angry with him—with everything all at once—like that. Regulus has decided he would like to never go through that again, because it had…

Well, honestly, it had actually really hurt his feelings, which was startling. He learned very quickly that he genuinely does care about how James feels towards him. It's a bit alarming, but Regulus does not like James being upset with him.

Regulus thinks he's handling this whole 'caring about James Potter' business really well, actually. He sort of knew, seeing as it's fairly obvious by this point, but he was clinging to the exact opposite before the announcement. He doesn't have to cling anymore, because now he and James can go home, both of them, so what's the harm in letting himself care? It's not the worst thing that's ever happened to him, like it would be if James couldn't come home with him.

So, sure, Regulus cares about James. Regulus cares about whether or not James is upset with him. Regulus cares about James' happiness and sense of purpose. That's fine. Regulus can handle this. Definitely. It's all under control.

At the moment, James looks as weary as Regulus feels about being back here. Neither of them have good memories here, and this is where nearly all of James' friends died. He hadn't been able to look in the direction where he cradled Vanity's body in his arms, and he hadn't been able to look down at the river when they were crossing the ice. Regulus hadn't been able to look away from the pale hands, and then he couldn't rip his gaze away from the pole Irene died against.

"What do we do if the others don't come?" James murmurs as he joins Regulus in sitting on the ground, groaning in relief as he takes his weight off his leg.

"If they don't…" Regulus presses his lips into a thin line and moves over to sit by James' leg, reaching out to untie the strip of shirt he put around the wound. "Well, one way or another, we'll all find each other at some point. The gamemakers will ensure that. It's best for your leg if we stay here anyway. Maybe they'll just…deal with each other so we don't have to."

"If I had to guess, Peter is probably back in the cave where we all were together," James says, his eyebrows furrowed. "It's a good place to hide from Bernice and Axus. I hope he's safe."

Regulus doesn't point out how contradicting that hope is; he leaves James to his heart wrenching kindness. Deep down, Regulus knows it's only going to end badly. He's quite sure that Peter is with Bernice, at the very least, and the thing is… Regulus can't even blame him, if he is. This is about survival, and if Peter has turned to the death eaters to make it out alive, then… Well, truthfully, not everyone is like James.

Not everyone puts their morals and what they believe is right over their survival. Regulus doesn't. Regulus wouldn't. If it was him, if it came down to survival, he would be a death eater, too. Fear and survival are strong motivators, and when they just so happen to intersect, it can lead to horrible choices. Regulus doesn't know if that makes him a bad person.

He thinks the arena makes everyone a bad person while they're here. The only exception to the rule is James. He's the only person who could drag himself through all of this filth and cruelty and still hold onto his shine.

Regulus hopes James never loses his shine.

"Well, it doesn't look worse," James says quietly when Regulus reveals his leg and they're both just staring at it.

He's right, it doesn't look worse. It also doesn't look better. The open punctures are still there, and though they're not bleeding or inflamed, they also haven't scabbed over. It looks like it's in a stasis, frankly. Like it would finish healing if they had a bit more salve, only a bit more, and then the wounds would close.

Regulus doesn't know if Sirius will be able to send more, and he really doesn't think James wants a repeat performance of the previous night. Regulus isn't even sure if he can do it, not again, not when it hurt James so much.

Another thing Regulus has learned, he absolutely despises it when James is in pain of any kind.

"It should be fine until we make it out of here. They'll be able to heal you up, no doubt," Regulus declares, folding up the strip of the shirt to the clean side and rewrapping the injury.

"It'll be an interesting scar, at least," James muses, and when Regulus shoots him a look, he snorts weakly. "What? Scars are sexy. Aren't I just so sexy, love? Tell me how sexy I am."

Regulus rolls his eyes, but his lips twitch, because honestly? He's so grateful James seems a bit better—not fully alright, but trying to be. "You are unfortunately…not horrible to look at. Does that suffice?"

"I'll take it," James announces decisively, clearly pleased. "I do recall you telling me that I'm…what was it? Unholy."

"The devil," Regulus says dryly.

James grins at him. "Well, you know what they say. The devil doesn't come to you with horns and a pitchfork, but rather in the form of everything you want. So, if that's what I am to you, I am not complaining."

"I take it back immediately," Regulus tells him.

"Too late," James teases. He leans forward slightly, his eyes sparkling. "Do I tempt you, Regulus?"

"To kill you? Absolutely," Regulus shoots back.

"Well, we both know that's a lie," James says, waving a hand lazily as he leans back. He tilts his head slightly, looking curious. "I feel like I can ask now, since we can both go home, but…would you really have killed me, if it came to it?"

Regulus says what he always says, what he's been saying from the beginning, and it's much easier to say now that he knows he won't have to put it to the test. "Without hesitation."

James just smiles.

~•~

They settle in for the night with the usual routine. Water, blanket, very small fire (both to avoid detection and also because they didn't find much in the way of supplies for a fire around the cave), and what James has come to associate as a treat in the form of their bodies pressed close.

Regulus isn't holding him tonight, going back to being the little spoon again. James lays on his side—not on his bad leg, of course—and drapes his arm over Regulus' waist under the blanket, feeling his (warm) bare skin against his own.

"Reg?" James murmurs to the back of his head, listening to the distant sound of creaking trees and whistling wind, almost drowned out by the closer sound of the crackling fire.

"Hm?" Regulus replies.

"You know that other life?" James asks quietly. "The one where we could have been happy together? Where we're not a great, big tragedy?"

Regulus is silent for a long beat, then he says, "Yes."

"Tell me something about it," James whispers. "It can be anything. Anything at all. Just… Will you—"

"We have a bookshelf," Regulus cuts in, sounding absolutely certain, and James closes his eyes. "Sirius built us a bookshelf, and you have the top shelves because you're taller, and I have the lower shelves because I keep all my journals on the very bottom. You never read them because I don't want you to, and you respect that, but you replace the flowers between the pages when they crumble, even when I don't ask you to."

"You'd never have to ask," James murmurs. "I'd just do it."

"I know," Regulus says softly.

James dips his head forward and presses his face to the back of Regulus' neck. "What else?"

"I write little notes and sneak them in your pocket when you're going somewhere, to work or just into the market or even to visit friends, and you find them later. It's not—well, it's short and usually just things I can't bring myself to say out loud. Sometimes it's reminders for something you need to do, because you'd probably forget otherwise," Regulus tells him.

"I'd keep them. All of them. Every single one, even just the reminders," James says, a lump in his throat.

"I profusely deny that I write them, even though I sign them all the same way—R.A.B.—and you just laugh and say you must have a secret admirer."

"You would absolutely do that."

Regulus hums, his fingers moving gently over the back of James' hand under the blanket, tracing the tendons and the hills of his knuckles. "Yes, I would."

"What else?" James prompts again.

"It's a modest life. Comforting in its simplicity. Mundane, almost, but never completely. Quiet and safe. Our home is warm and never absolutely spotless, showing signs of life, breathable because we exist there without worrying if we're doing it too loudly or not. We don't mute ourselves, and we laugh. Every day, we laugh," Regulus rasps. His voice is small and tight, strained like he's feeling too much. "Sometimes, before bed, you force me to my feet and pull me in, even when I complain. We dance by the firelight."

"You'd let me do that?" James asks, his heart clenching with how deeply the yearning hooks into him.

"In that life, I do," Regulus whispers. "I let you do whatever you want, and when you want to dance, we dance."

"Slow-dancing?" James checks, trying to imagine it, picturing their bodies flush together as they go in circles and press playful smiles to each other's cheeks; whispering in Regulus' ear, close and intimate; simply content with one another.

"Slow and swaying. Just holding on because we can, because there's some other life out there where we can't, where we don't, where we're a great, big tragedy—and we're so thankful it's not that one," Regulus croaks.

Because it's this one, James doesn't say, because he knows that to say it out loud would only put them in danger, but he's aware that it's true, more than anything else here.

It doesn't matter if they're going home. James is aware that what has happened here in the arena doesn't extend out to who they are when they get back. He would never expect anything out of Regulus because of what's taken place here, and Regulus has made his feelings very clear. He can care about James, and he can fight with everything in him to get James home, but that doesn't mean their love story is real.

James would like to try. Of course he would. He's all about trying, and maybe they could find solace and comfort with each other after this. It's one of those things that could bring them closer together or rip them further apart, and James won't know either way until they're no longer under the microscopic pressure of the demands they have to meet in order to survive. It can't be real, not here.

But maybe it could be real at home. Maybe, with time, if they actually tried, if they took it slow and turned what could have been into what could still be, then maybe—just maybe—they could have something real. James would treat Regulus right. He would be so good to him, given the chance.

Regulus said James was his first love, didn't he?

James would give anything to be his last.

~•~

Of course he's in the tree. Fuck, Regulus hates the trees. How he ended up here, he doesn't know, but for fuck's sake, let him down. He hates being up so high; he can't even see the ground. This is bullshit, because the trees—oh, how he hates trees—

"Why the long face, lover boy?"

"Why do you think, Evan?" Regulus snaps, lifting his head to glare at Evan, who sits further down the branch and swings his legs with a grin. "Because I'm in a fucking tree, I can't even see the ground, and some of us aren't lunatics like you, so we're not exactly happy about situations such as these."

"Ah, poor lamb," Evan says, clicking his tongue, though humor dances in his eyes. "Unfortunately, there's nowhere to go but up. Go on, keep climbing. Almost there."

"Where?" Regulus asks, tilting his head up and freezing as soon as he sees James and Sirius sitting on a branch so high they're basically perched on a cloud. They're laughing as they talk to each other and swing their legs, focused entirely on one another without bothering to glance down. When he calls out to them, they don't acknowledge him at all.

"Almost there, Regulus," Evan tells him.

"I can't reach them," Regulus croaks. "I'm too scared to climb. As much as I want to go, I think I'll just stay here. I think I'm just stuck here, Evan."

"Oh, you can make it to them; you just have to be willing to. You're not stuck, Regulus, not at all. You're just not ready to climb yet," Evan says. "You'll wish you had, though."

"What?" Regulus mumbles, eyebrows furrowing as he rips his gaze from Sirius and James to focus on Evan instead, and his breath punches out of him as soon as he sees the spear impaled through him. Evan seems unperturbed by it, still kicking his legs and resting one arm over the handle of the spear like it's a prop, like he's not bleeding out. "Evan…"

"You're so close," Evan murmurs with a sad sigh. "That's you, isn't it, lover boy? Perpetually close, but never close enough. If only you'd keep climbing…" He shakes his head and gives Regulus a sorrowful smile. "You can't stay here forever. I think you'd know this by now, but eventually branches break."

With a snap, the branch they're on cracks right in the middle between them, and Evan tips backwards, hand outstretched. Regulus remembers flinging himself up as Evan surged forward to catch his hand to pull him up on the branch on the very first day of the games, and he jerks forward thoughtlessly to return the favor. Evan managed to catch him, but now that it's Regulus' turn, he fails. Their hands just graze each other ever so slightly.

Evan falls, and Regulus chokes out his name in immediate horror, starting to tip himself forward, only to be snatched back by his collar. Regulus kicks out and swivels his head, letting loose a helpless, instinctive shriek of pure terror when he sees the spider with Avery's face yanking him further along the branch. Regulus can't get free, and all he can think to do is call out for Sirius, for James, begging them to help him, to help Evan. He screams their names over and over, desperate and loud. James and Sirius never stop laughing together; they never look down to where he is at all.

The spider drags him further, making him shake, and shake, and—and he's being shaken. He's—

The ground rises up to meet him, causing Regulus to roll into the bracing cold, pinning down the give of warmth beneath him. It's moving. It's a threat, shaking him and holding him. Regulus has his dagger to it before he even registers what it is, still hazy and disoriented.

"—gulus," says the warmth as the ringing in Regulus' ears start to fade, the world slowly shifting into focus. It takes a second, but that—it's James. It's James that Regulus is pinning to the floor, a dagger to his throat. James is watching him very carefully, holding very still. "It's me. I promise it's just me."

Regulus doesn't move, eyes darting around as he breathes hard, trying to puzzle reality back together. It takes him a long moment to regulate his breathing and make sense of what's going on; it was a nightmare, not his first and most certainly not his last. Glancing back down, James is still pliant beneath him, finally relaxing completely the moment Regulus meets his eyes. He must see some clarity in them, because the tension drains out of his body, and he gazes up at Regulus with his eyebrows furrowed in obvious concern.

"You were calling out for me and Sirius," James whispers, his eyes full of sorrow.

"Sorry," Regulus says gruffly, carefully pulling his dagger away from James' neck. He's really exhausted and barely has the energy to slip off James' lap where he's straddling him, but he's sure his weight is bothering James' leg, and as much as he jokes, Regulus is almost certain he doesn't actually like the fact that he came very close to having his throat sliced open just now.

"Hey, you're fine, stop," James murmurs, reaching out to grip Regulus' hips before carefully sliding his hands to his lower back under the blanket, pressing in and gently encouraging him to fold forward. "Come here, it's okay."

Regulus collapses down into James and buries his face into the crook of his neck, hunched in on himself and making his back into a shell-curve as he does his absolute best to fit his whole body into the circle of James' arms as they come up around him. Usually, the nightmares are something they don't talk about. They both have them, and they both have the decency to wake the other up if they see them afraid in their sleep, but they generally don't acknowledge them. Most of the time, it just leaves them sweaty and resigned and so, so tired.

This time, Regulus can't stop the words that fall out of his mouth in a hushed rush. "Evan was stupid. He was—" Regulus sucks in deep, stuttering breath, blinking rapidly. His voice drops down to a rasp. "He was just so stupid, James. That's why he died. Because he—he wasn't quiet in his tree. People don't look up, not unless they hear a sound that makes them, and he laughed." He swallows harshly, his body held tense as he croaks, "I made him laugh, and that's how he died. How fucking stupid is that? Isn't that just so stupid?"

"Regulus," James says, his voice soft as he rubs his hand up and down Regulus' back.

"I'm not even funny," Regulus chokes out, his face twisting, and then he's clapping his hand over his mouth to muffle the sound that seems to wrench out of him, but it's no use, really.

Things like this can only exist in the dark, in the dead of night where the whole world seems to be in a slumber, that way it's easier to pretend no one can see how he unravels. Regulus tries his best, he really does, but there's genuinely nothing he can do. It just comes pouring out of him, and he wonders why now? Because of the dream? There were so many layers to the dream that Regulus doesn't even bother trying to make sense of them. So, why is he losing it over Evan now? Again? He thought he already did this. He can't keep doing this.

That's the thing about grief, Regulus is learning. It doesn't just go away. He doesn't just get to be upset when it happens; he has to go on and be upset for the rest of his life. It's not fair.

He thinks he should have known. After all, he's been familiar with grief since he was fifteen —just not like this. Not death. It's a different grief, a hopeless one. Regulus can still climb to James and Sirius, but Evan? The branch broke, and he's gone.

Why does this always happen to him? Every time, this is what happens to him. Like it's his curse. Regulus gets so close to something he wants, and then it's gone. Never close enough.

Maybe it's stupid, because realistically, Regulus only knew Evan for a handful of days, at most. He didn't know his middle name. He didn't know anything about his family, or his childhood, or what hopes he had for his future. They barely spent more than a day together, all-in-all, and yet it still fucking hurts like losing a best friend, even more so because they never got to be. Lost potential is another thing to grieve, and Regulus knows that well by now.

Regulus doesn't need to know more than he already did about Evan to know he trusted him, to know it was easy with him, even in this bottomless abyss of shit.

James is murmuring to him. Gentle words. Kind words. All the words that are meant to be soothing. Regulus doesn't listen to them, mostly because he can't hear them over the sound of his own sobs. It's nice of him to do, nonetheless. Of course it is. That's James. He's always so ruthlessly kind.

Regulus lets the background sound of James' voice wash over him, feeling it seep into his skin and go deeper, resonating in his bones until they're strong enough to stop shaking. His tears slowly drift to a stop until he's just breathing into the curve of James' throat, his eyes shut, eyelashes clumped and wet. James has fallen silent, just rubbing his back.

Regulus lifts his head with minimal effort and rasps, "Am I hurting your leg?"

"No, love, you're fine right where you are," James assures him, and Regulus instantly collapses back into him once more, all the fight gone out of him. "I've got you, Regulus. I promise."

"Will you—" Regulus cuts himself off and squeezes his eyes shut, because this, with James, is no different from climbing a tree so tall it scrapes the sky. He gets it. He gets the metaphor now, okay? He understands how it's similar—the fear of falling, the strain of pulling himself up from the safety of the ground he's used to, the sensation of being stuck, the threat of a broken branch that can't hold the weight of what they were, what they are, and all that they could be.

"Anything," James murmurs, and it's like he's leaning down and begging Regulus just to take his hand. James would pull him up; James would never, never drop him. Regulus knows that, and still, that doesn't make the fear go away. "All you have to do is ask, Reg. Whatever you want or need—"

"Your hand—will you—can I have—" Regulus can't figure out how to make his request, because it feels oddly juvenile, and it somehow feels like it's not allowed.

"You want?" James asks, not quite finishing with words, and instead he nearly whacks himself in the face in his haste to literally offer Regulus his hand, so earnest about it.

Regulus can't explain why, but he starts crying again, feeling as fragile as a butterfly's wing. He chokes out a sob and nods helplessly to make it clear that yes, he does want, he really does, and then he reaches out to grab James' hand to twine their fingers together. It's awkward and a bit clunky, but Regulus doesn't care. He just ducks his head and starts pressing desperate kisses over their fingers, crying so hard that he's hyperventilating a little bit.

"Is—is that better or worse? I genuinely can't tell," James admits, very blatantly distressed.

Regulus doesn't respond. He isn't sure if he has the words to make it make sense how important James' hand is to him right now. Hands can be tethers that stop you from floating away, pulling you from where you're drifting up into the sky; just the same, they can be the pull you need when you're falling, when you're sinking, when gravity is dragging you down. Regulus was fifteen the first time he held James' hand, and it kept him grounded. Now, it's James' hand that could help him climb, if he'd just let it.

Still weeping, Regulus tucks their joined hands under his chin and curls around them like he's trying to keep them safe in between their bodies. James lets him, keeping his other arm around him, still stroking his back.

In one hand, Regulus clings to James' fingers. In the other, he clings to his dagger. Isn't it sad how they both comfort him? Isn't it sad how he can't fathom letting either go?

Isn't it sad how neither can stop him from being afraid?

~•~

James doesn't go back to sleep, even when Regulus eventually stops crying and drifts off. The way Regulus had been calling out for him, and for Sirius, had scared him so much that he's actually a little terrified to close his eyes. He thinks he's going to have a nightmare about it, and he's already woken up from awful dreams about Vanity and Hodge tonight.

So, he just stays awake. He may have lied to Regulus about his leg, but the ache from the weight of Regulus sitting astride his pelvis—making the injury in his thigh throb—is a small price to pay to be able to hold him, and comfort him, and be held and comforted by him. Regulus' mere presence is soothing James, helping him with his own grief.

Even when asleep, Regulus doesn't let James' hand go. He keeps their hands trapped between them like someone might come and try to steal them or break them up. James would sooner chew off his own hand to give to Regulus than let anyone take it away from him, at this point.

James isn't entirely sure what Regulus' whole…breakdown was about, really. The nightmare, he's assuming, but he'd also been upset about Evan? He'd also seemed quite desperate to hold hands, then even more upset when they did? Frankly, James doesn't think there needs to be answers or reasons for this sort of thing. Grief manifests in strange ways, and they both have a lot of things to carry grief for. It's not something they just get to put down, not ever. James knows that from his own mother, and from Sirius. If all they can do to help each other is hold on, then James is grateful that they get to.

It was late when Regulus had his nightmare, so it's not long before the temperature starts to change and the night slowly begins to give way to morning. It's still cold, still dark out, but James can see the sky lightening outside the cave. Soon, the river will thaw, which means they need to get up if they want to make it across. They don't know when exactly the ice will melt, but they did agree they didn't want to be trapped here all day with no food or sources of water.

"Reg," James says gently, nudging him a little. This earns little more than a grumpy, displeased grunt that, despite everything, brings a small smile to his lips. He huffs a quiet laugh and squeezes Regulus' hand while using his other hand to nudge him again. "I know you hate it, love, but it's time to get up."

"No," Regulus mumbles and just—snuggles in closer.

"Regulus," James declares, biting back a laugh.

"Don't do this to me, James, please," Regulus whispers-groans, sort of nuzzling into James' shoulder that he's been using as a pillow since he ended up on top of him.

Admittedly, James is so stupidly delighted by the way Regulus wants to lay all over him that he would be willing to let him literally do it forever. However, Regulus would kill him if they got trapped over here when James could have kept it from happening. "We don't know when the river thaws, remember? It's best if we cross it now, so we don't get st—"

A scream splits the air, drowning out the rest of James' words and it has Regulus immediately jerking awake, his head snapping up as he rolls right out of James' lap and to his feet, dagger at the ready. James is right behind him, snatching up his hatchet and bracing the top of it to the ground to help him stumble to his feet. His leg protests, but it hardly even registers as Regulus yanks up his bag to put on, and then they're both heading for the cave entrance.

They make it there at the same time, just about, so James hears Regulus suck in a sharp breath of pure horror even before he fully processes what he's so horrified by. James' brain can hardly make sense of it.

Like, he knows that it's a huge spider, but where the eyes would usually be, there's a protruding torso that leads into Irene's face, which is framed by sharp, clicking pinchers. The Irene-spider is scuttling behind Peter, Bernice, and Axus, chasing them at frankly terrifying speeds while they all shout and run.

All James can think about is how Irene hated spiders. The fact that the gamemakers did this to her—to anyone, really—makes him feel fucking sick. All the color has drained from Regulus' face, and he looks like he might vomit as well.

"James!" Peter shrieks, garbling out a desperate screech as he sprints at full-tilt through the field, arms flailing.

"Help! Fucking help us!" Bernice screams at them, sounding so terrified that James instinctively does want to help her, despite everything that's happened thus far.

"James," Regulus croaks, "the river hasn't thawed. The—fuck, fuck, they're leading it right to us!"

"Can we even kill that thing?" James asks incredulously.

Regulus sends him an indignant look. "I don't know!"

"Well," James mutters with a grimace, lifting his hatchet with a deep breath, "only one way to find out."

"Oh, for fuck's sake," Regulus groans, flipping his dagger into his palm as James proceeds to run out of the cave.

"Axus, your hook!" James bellows as the others draw closer.

"Are you fucking mental?!" Axus shrieks back, nearly slipping on the ice as they come barreling over.

Bernice actually does slip, landing on her knees and fully just gliding all the way across like a rockstar or something equally cool, then she uses her sword to brace against the ground and stumble to her feet. "Don't be a bitch, Axus! We have to fight this fucking thing anyway! Use your damn hook!"

"Everyone scatter!" James roars, and they all instantly split off in multiple different directions, which does seem to confuse the spider for just a split second. The empty poles make it harder for the spider to move. It selects a target, going right for Bernice, who is steadily backing up. "Okay, get behind it!"

"Not yet! Not yet!" Bernice orders through clenched teeth, holding one hand out to hold off Axus, who is running along beside the spider, a little behind it, swinging their hook. Bernice's other hand grips her sword, doing that cool swivel thing that Mulciber also knew how to do.

In his brief moment of delirious disbelief and panic, James wonders why all the mean people know how to do cool stuff. Even Regulus—

"Now!" Peter shouts.

Axus immediately lets their hook fly, catching the spider all the way across to the other side, embedding in the dip between the torso and the body. Regulus dives forward to grip the rope with Axus, and they both pull, actually managing to throw the spider off course at first, then losing momentum when Axus lashes out and punches Regulus in the face.

"Really?! Is now the time?!" Regulus roars in what James knows is a mixture of disbelief and rage.

To their credit, Axus does wince as they call out, "Sorry! It was a reflex! You're right, that can wait!"

"Fucking pull," Regulus snarls, and then they both do.

"Pete! Help me tackle it!" James bursts out, which spurs him and Peter forward as they essentially just throw themselves at the side to the spider while Axus and Regulus yank it over from the other side. Bernice, from the front, is slashing wildly with her sword, keeping herself from being eaten.

The spider wobbles with a hiss, then tilts over, crumbling on its side. James immediately raises his hatchet and slams it down into one of the spider's legs, the grotesque crunch and snap ringing in his ears. The spider writhes, trying to get up, but Axus and Regulus continue to yank it over every time. Peter stoops down and grips the twitching leg James is chopping off, gagging even as he does it, but he doesn't let how disgusting it is stop him from tugging on the leg with all his might until James breaks through and it pulls apart.

This doesn't go over well with the spider, predictably. It hisses shrilly and flails on the ground, striking out wildly at Bernice. It's getting harder to keep it down, and James knows it's not going to stay put much longer.

"I have an insane idea," James gasps out to Peter, whipping towards him with his chest heaving. Peter is staring down at the spider leg in his hands in pure disgust. "Peter!"

"Oh, oh, that is nasty," Peter chokes out, dropping the leg and shuddering in revulsion. He looks up with wide eyes. "What? Wait, what idea? James—"

"Give me a boost," James declares, reaching out to brace his hand on Peter's shoulder.

Peter gapes at him. "You are mental."

Nonetheless, he threads his fingers together and makes a platform between his palms, holding steady as James puts his foot in it and does three little bounces before pushing himself up and throwing himself up onto the body of the spider. He nearly goes right over the side, and for a second, the only thing he can see is Regulus' face red from exertion, his eyes wide and his mouth dropped open as he realizes James is on the spider at the moment. James manages a quick, lopsided grin.

"James, you fucking idiot, get down!" Regulus shouts.

"One second, love!" James shouts back with a cackle that sounds more like Sirius than him, actually. Weirdly, he hasn't felt this alive and exhilarated in days.

With a grunt, he shifts to wriggle up to where he can see his feet under him. Don't spiders have hair? Some of them do, right? Vanity would know, and the passing thought steals the smile right off James' face. Either way, this spider has no hair; it's body and legs are made of something that feels like leather or rubber, or both, and there's no easy way to grip it.

Still, James gets his balance enough to crawl forward and bury his hatchet in the back of the spider's torso. The discomfort from the fact that it's Irene's torso is overshadowed by the horrible hiss the spider releases, the sound of the pinchers clicking rapidly in distress. The arms flail, trying to reach back and snatch the hatchet out. James beats it there, yanking it free and standing to full height to grip the spider by the back of its hair—Irene's hair—to hold it in place as he swings his hatchet with all his might at the side of its neck.

That only really distracts it, honestly, but Bernice provides assistance by darting forward to shove her sword right through its torso. James snatches the hatchet back out while it's held in place, then brings it back down.

He does it again.

And again.

And again.

And once more for good measure, which finally slices all the way through to the other side, making the spider's head quite literally roll off its shoulders. Irene's head, except not, which becomes apparent when the head hits the ground by Bernice's feet with a dull thud, black eyes glazed over and pinchers still.

The spider slumps all at once, still twitching, and James goes stumbling right over the side with a grunt, not at all prepared to be displaced so abruptly. He hits the ground with a groan, his hatchet skittering from his hand, across the grass. As luck would have it, he has fortunately not fallen at Regulus' feet, which means he won't have to see Regulus glaring at him for doing something so reckless. James is taking his wins.

"James?" Regulus calls.

"I'm okay," James wheezes. "Ow."

"Ow? That doesn't sound okay, James," Regulus snaps.

"No, no, I'm completely fine," James insists weakly, breathing hard. "Just, ya know, taking a moment to really appreciate the authenticity of this artificial grass. Honestly, I'm grand."

Regulus releases a huff. "You are so fucking stupid. That was incredibly reckless! You could have—"

"Yeah, yeah, yeah," James mutters, pushing up to his hands and knees with a grunt. Oh, his leg is not happy with him right now. "Have a go at me. Don't thank me or anything. It's always you're so stupid, James; it's never you looked so sexy and heroic while saving everyone from the murderous spider, James."

Usually, Regulus would have a bitchy comment lined up for him, but he's suspiciously quiet all of a sudden. James reaches forward for his hatchet, only to freeze when a boot comes down to step on the handle before he can grab it. Slowly, James tilts his head up to see who it is and feels his heart sink right to the pit of his stomach.

"Peter?" James whispers, a lump forming in his throat, a horrible dread turning his veins to ice.

Peter sighs and slips his foot back, crouching down to pick up the hatchet. He looks at James for a long moment, then swallows and murmurs, "I'm sorry, James."

"No," James croaks. "No, Pete, tell me you're not—tell me you aren't working with—"

"Us?" Bernice whispers in his ear, swinging her head around to grin at him, eyes sparkling. He jerks a little bit, and she laughs at him. "Ol' Petey fits right in, he does. He's a smart biscuit, if you really give him a chance. Shame he never got to prove himself while spending all his time with perfect, pure, principled Potter. That's alright, we appreciate him."

"Make that mistake, I dare you," Regulus hisses from behind him, and Axus chuckles. "When I get that back—"

"Shut up, Black, you're the one who threw the dagger at me to start with," Axus cuts in. "Got me in the arm good, you prick."

"Like I said, wait until I get my other one back," Regulus snaps, then makes a quiet, displeased sound.

"Yeah, there you go," Axus declares, and then they say nothing else, and neither does Regulus.

Peter once again swallows harshly and there's true remorse in his eyes. "James, you—you have to understand. I want to go home, too. I want to—"

"That doesn't make it right," James chokes out.

"Oh, yeah?" Peter challenges, nostrils flaring. "I told you, James. This is the hunger games! It's—it's war, and you do what you have to do to survive a war. We can't always do the right thing, and you're a fucking hypocrite, you know that? What would you have done to get home? I would have had to die for that to be possible, and you know it. So, what was your solution? Kill me? Betray me? Go on, then."

James doesn't have anything to say, because he doesn't know. He still doesn't know. He never did, and he doesn't think he would have ever figured it out. That, James imagines, would have been something Regulus would have needed to handle. Things were so much easier back when he believed he wouldn't have to live with his own choices.

"Yeah," Peter says sharply. "That's what I thought. You can think I'm a bad person all you want, and you can hate me, but that doesn't change the fact that I'm only the one in the wrong because I beat you to it first."

All James can think to say is, "I never would have done this to you, Peter."

"So, you would have died for me, then?" Peter asks.

"I would have at least wanted to," James rasps, his eyes stinging, because it's true. In another world where Regulus' name was never called but James' still was, he doesn't think he would have made it home anyway. He would have died for someone. Vanity or Peter, most likely. "A part of me still wants to. Will you even mourn me?"

Peter flinches slightly, and again, his eyes fill with remorse, shiny in the rising sun. They stare at each other, and James wasn't aware that heartbreak took this form as well. He's never been through anything like this, where he realized that his life didn't matter to someone else the way he thought it did, the way their life matters to him.

"Oh, enough of all the melodrama," Bernice mutters, sounding bored. She grips James by the back of his hair and yanks him to his feet, putting her sword to his throat. He can feel the curl of her smile against his ear. "Peter's going to kill you, and I've been looking forward to your death for a long time, Potter."

"You know, I sort of got that impression," James admits, wincing as she snatches him around, turning him to face—oh. Shit. "Oh, fuck no. Regulus—"

"I'm fine," Regulus grits out, the words barely intelligible with how hard he's clenching his teeth together. Axus has the dagger Regulus apparently threw at them pressed to his throat, their lips pulled up into a smirk. The one Regulus had is on the ground where he can't grab it.

"Let him go," James blurts out instinctively, ready and willing to fight, or plead, or do anything to get Regulus out of this situation. He swallows, careless to the sword at his own throat.

"Not sure you should be too worried about him, pumpkin," Bernice tells him, amused. "You two are just so sweet, do you know that? Really, it's very adorable. Don't worry, we'll make sure you can say goodbye and have a heart-to-heart and share a cute little kiss before we kill you. We're not monsters."

"I'd really like to know your definition of monster," James grumbles under his breath as Bernice drags him over to where Axus and Regulus are. Curiously, the spider is just—gone, as if it dissolved on the spot. The gamemakers' doing, no doubt.

"Listen, I have a heart, alright? I think you two make for a lovely couple," Bernice announces, sounding absurdly serious as she kicks the backs of his knees to get him to kneel down while Axus does the same to Regulus right across from him. "Now, make your goodbyes, give your speeches. Go on."

Always got to have a good show, giving the viewers what they want. Even they know how this goes, because they're in it, too, putting on their own performances. James isn't in the mood, so he doesn't look at Regulus. No, he looks at Peter.

"Peter," James whispers, looking up at him with this stupid ache in his chest. The worst part is, he's not even angry. More than anything, he's just hurt. He trusted Peter not to let him down; he needed Peter not to let him down. But that's not how the world works, is it? That's not how the story goes, right?

"Don't look at me like that, James," Peter chokes out. "Do you think this is how I wanted it to go? When—when they found me at the third fire, I brought them back because I thought we would be able to handle it. We outnumbered them, and all of you had weapons, so why didn't it work? What went wrong? Because it wasn't me. I did everything I was supposed to, and you still—you let her die. We were supposed to protect her!"

"I tried," James rasps, tears building in his eyes.

"You didn't try hard enough," Peter says, and his voice cracks. His face sags with regret. "I—I didn't either. It was my fault, James. I brought them there. I thought—I didn't mean for that to happen. I thought you would save me."

"I didn't know," James tells him softly, his chest feeling far too tight. He can barely breathe. "I would have, Pete, if I could have. I'm sorry that I couldn't."

"Now I have to save myself," Peter declares, his own eyes glittery and bright with tears. "I didn't even think I would make it this far. I just want to go home, and the worst part is, I don't even know where that is anymore, because it felt like it was with you, and Vanity, and Irene, and Mathias, and even your scary fucking boyfriend. So, where do I go from here?"

James swallows. "I don't know. I never knew the answer to that. It's on you to figure it out now. The truth is, I never could. That's your burden to bear."

Again, Peter flinches back, his eyes widening slightly, and he turns away as he sucks in a deep breath. James lets his gaze fall to Regulus, who is looking at him with genuine sadness. He knew. He knew this would happen, and he tried to save James from the pain of it, but James refused to listen.

"Can you two kiss and cry already?" Axus demands, waving their hand between Regulus and James.

"No," Regulus says shortly.

"No?" Bernice checks, keeping her sword right where it is, pressed under James' chin. "Potter, don't you have anything you want to say to him?"

"He knows," James murmurs, meeting Regulus' eyes, seeing them and knowing them as he always has. What Regulus knows is the same thing James knows, all of which have very little to do with their little love story and everything to do with how neither of them are planning to die like this. Not here, not now, not this close, not without a fucking fight.

"Well, that's…disappointing," Bernice mumbles.

"Yes, life generally is," Regulus replies blandly, and then he tosses his weight back against Axus enough to make them stumble, the both of them tumbling backwards. He fumbles to knock the dagger out of Axus' hand and actually manages it, the both of them rolling around on the ground.

"Shit!" Bernice bursts out, once again yanking James to his feet to drag him out of range. "Okay, no more playing around. Kill him, Axus! And you, Peter, kill Potter."

Peter is frozen in place, his eyes wide as Bernice jerks James by his hair, holding him still. Their eyes meet, and the whole world seems to shrink down to this one moment.

A thousand things seem to flash between them, all at once. Their first meeting, when Peter—scared and resigned—admitted that he didn't expect to live past the first day. And James was there to reach out and offer help, to offer friendship, as if there was no possibility that they'd end up right here. But here they are, and survival is about will. It's about reason. You have to want to survive to survive, and that means bearing all that comes with continuing on.

It could be seconds or years before Peter whispers, "I can't bear it," and flings the hatchet to the side, where it skitters out of range. Bernice releases a shout of anger, just as Peter comes barreling right at them both. They all go down in a tangle of limbs, knocked off their feet. James gets hit in the face with the hilt of the sword, but he's mercifully not cut.

There's a grunt, and then James is kicked hard in the back, making him roll away from where Bernice and Peter are fighting. Then, with no warning, there's a horrible shout from Peter that has James hastily jumping to his feet. Bernice's sword is stabbed through Peter's stomach where he's bent over her, and he chokes out a harsh breath as he pulls himself back, but he doesn't fall. Instead, he grabs Bernice by her hair, stumbling and coughing up blood as he hauls her up to her feet and gets both arms around her.

James feels it hit him only a second later what that means, and he tries to change course mid-stumble, frantically whipping around to see Peter lifting Bernice clear off her feet as she kicks and screeches and fights to get away, but his hold is unrelenting. Even when she slices at his forearms with her sword, he just keeps right on going.

"No! Peter, no! My baby! Please, you know about my baby! My baby!" Bernice shrieks. "Don't! Fuck you, you fucking traitor, you fucking rat!"

"Wait," James breathes out, shakily running forward as his mind races, because the sun is up and it's warm out, and not again, not again, please not again. "Peter! Peter!"

James tries to save him. Despite everything, he still tries to save him. Even though Peter did betray him, even though he would only be putting off the inevitable of the burden neither of them want to bear, James can't stop himself from trying. He tries, and just like with Vanity, he fails.

Peter quite literally body-slams Bernice right into the river, which has thawed some time recently. They go in with a splash, and hands raise up instantly to drag them beneath the surface. Bernice is screaming when she goes under. Peter is quiet. They disappear together, and James skids to a halt, breathing hard as he stares at the water with tears in his eyes.

Peter wanted to go home, but didn't know where that was.

He'll never find out.

~•~

As soon as Bernice starts screaming, Axus is thrown off their game, which means Axus is quite easy to get away from when the splash echoes over to them.

In other words, Regulus gets to punch Axus in the face, which is very satisfying, frankly. Axus is so distracted by everything that's going on—the possible deaths of their last remaining allies—that it's easy to push them off of him, both of them rolling apart. Axus stops close to the dagger they dropped, and Regulus stops next to James' hatchet. They both instantly dive for them at the same time, grabbing their weapons and launching to their feet.

Around two minutes after the initial splash, there's two cannons, one right after the other. Axus whips their head to the side, and so does Regulus to see James standing on the edge of the river, his hands limp by his sides.

"Two to one," Regulus murmurs, drawing Axus' gaze. They still have his dagger, but he still has the hatchet, and his last dagger is so close to him—

"Ha!" Axus grins at him. "More one to one, I'd say. Potter's no threat. I'll deal with him easily."

Clearly, they intend to prove this, because they whip around and start running right for James. Regulus panics as he shouts James' name like it's being ripped from his soul, raising the hatchet and flinging it through the air without missing a beat, scrambling to grab his last dagger in case he needs to throw that, too. He doesn't. The hatchet lands true, burying itself right in Axus' back and making them shout in pain as they stumble forward, unsteady on their feet.

At the shout, James whips around in enough time to brace himself as Axus trips into him. Regulus freezes, holding his breath, watching in what feels like slow motion as they collide. James releases a punched-out sound, hands bracing against Axus' arms, and then he twists to the side and shoves Axus right into the water.

A splash.

Pale hands rising.

Silence.

A minute.

Two minutes.

The cannon.

Regulus exhales, his eyes fluttering shut as he deflates all at once, choking out a harsh breath that's somewhere between a sob and a laugh. That's it. Oh, that's it. They did it. They fucking did it. It's just them, and they can go home. Regulus is shaking from head-to-toe, and his ears ring as he waits for the announcement that they're the Victors.

And waits.

And waits.

And waits.

Slowly, Regulus' eyes peel open. James is still facing the river, his head tilted up as he looks at the sky like there might be answers there. Regulus wants him to turn and look at him, face him with a reassuring smile that can stop the fear crawling through him right in its tracks.

Suddenly, Regulus would give anything for James' optimism. They made it, didn't they? Why are they still here? They did everything right. They played the stupid games and followed the rules. They—

"Attention tributes," comes Slughorn's voice, and Regulus goes very still, "the rule change allowing two Victors from the same district has now been…revoked. There can only be one Victor. May the odds be ever in your favor…"

The silence is deafening. Regulus can hear himself breathing, but he's not sure how he is. Oh, he's so stupid. How could he have let himself believe, even for a moment? Regulus Black, daring to trust anything that's too good to be true, just because he wanted to believe in it so much that he wouldn't even let himself doubt it. He let himself care about James, he let himself think—let himself hope—

This.

This is why Regulus is afraid to climb. This is why Regulus stays on the ground, because branches always break. Every time, he gets so close, so fucking close…

Never close enough.

Almost casually, James rolls his head to the side to look at him, a strain around his eyes. He doesn't turn away from the sunrise, doesn't do anything other than glance over at Regulus with a small smile. It's a sad one. His eyes flick down to the dagger in Regulus' hand, then right back up to hold his gaze.

"You're hesitating, love," James says softly.

Regulus releases a rattling breath. He hasn't even raised his dagger. He's trembling. His vision is blurring. This is it, isn't it? The real test. Because it's just them now, the last two, and James is the only thing standing between him and home. He's always said he would do what he had to, always said he would kill James if that's what it came to. Without hesitation.

And yet.

The truth—the horrible, ugly, gut wrenching truth—is that Regulus can't. He thought—he really thought he would, he thought he could, if that's what it came down to; that's an easy thing to believe when he was so sure it wouldn't come down to that. But here they are, and Regulus was wrong.

"I—I can't," Regulus chokes out, and the dagger falls from his grip to land on the ground, never to be picked up again. He won't pick it up. "James, I can't."

James' face softens, and his gaze is so warm, despite the pain that tightens the corner of them. His lips curl up further, and he murmurs, "That's okay, Regulus."

"No, it's not," Regulus croaks. "Nothing about this is okay. I can't do it. I can't kill you. I—James, I—"

"Shh, don't worry about it. You don't have to," James whispers, slowly turning to face him.

Regulus' gaze trails down to where James is cupping his stomach, blood pouring through the crevices of his fingers, spilling over his hand. "James?"

"Axus got me on their way into the water. At least it was your dagger, I suppose," James says with a weary chuckle, his throat bobbing on a harsh swallow. His mouth quirks up a bit at the corner, gentle and lovely. "Maybe this makes me insane, but if I'm honest, I wish it had been you."

The world drops right out from under Regulus' feet, and there's nothing that could bring it back to him. He's unsteady, coming apart at the seams, everything crumbling around him until nothing makes sense. James holds his gaze, and then he falls to the ground, his legs giving out underneath him.

The sun is still rising. It goes up, even as James goes down. Regulus waits for it to explode. Regulus waits for it to go out, to dim and shrink and burn itself up, dying as James does.

It doesn't.

Chapter End Notes

more in-depth warning for those of you who need to be spoiled/prepared: james and regulus go back to the original cave, and they stay the night. the next morning, axus and peter and bernice are chased to the cave by yet another hallow-made spider (like avery, except this time it's irene), and the last five remaining have to come together to kill it. peter has joined the death eaters, but when it comes time to kill james, he can't do it. instead, he fights bernice—who stabs him with her sword—and then he throws both of them into the crimson river. meanwhile, regulus and axus are fighting. when bernice and peter die, axus decides to target james with the dagger that regulus threw at them, like, four chapters ago. regulus throws james' hatchet and hits them in the back, and they stumble into james, who turns and tosses them into the river. james and regulus are not announced victors; instead it's announced that the rule change is changed back and there can only be one. regulus admits he can't kill james, but james says he doesn't have to and turns to reveal that axus stabbed them on the way into the river.

for those who have finished the chapter...

Well, That Didn't Happen In The Books/Movies 😤 i just KNOW some of yall are like: zar, wtf do you think you're doing? but listen. hear me out, okay? im gonna need everyone to just trust the process.

that was one bitch of a cliffhanger, though, not gonna lie. you're so valid if you want to tear your hair out, actually. or mine. (just a reminder to those who need it, those who have had a POV will not die) anyway, i led in with a false sense of security again, i think, because james and regulus seemed to be in better moods at the start. a little flirting, a little mutual daydreaming about A Happy Life Together. no, because i think it's important to note that regulus believes his "other life" with james is happy and safe, and they have a home together entirely different to the kind of home he grew up in. like okay, ill just go dunk my head in a bucket of acid, nbd. the bookshelf??? the flowers???? the secret love notes?????

and so we see evan again. well, "see" is a bit of a strong word, but you get my point. it was never going to be one of those things where someone dies, it's very sad, and then it's not really mentioned again. like no, this shit is going to Haunt Them. there's really no way around that. but trust evan to show up in regulus' dreams and talk in metaphors and shit before dramatically reenacting his own death lmaoooo another thing i wanted to cover: peter. i have been very tight-lipped about peter this entire time for this very reason. because, in this setting, he is not and never was the Bad Guy. like, he never intended to betray his friends or get anyone killed; he thought that the others save him. just didn't quite work out for...anyone, basically. he cared about vanity and james just as much as the rest of them did, and he got fully immersed into the arena just as they all have.

however, peter DID intend to "betray" james after the rule change, by going to join the death eaters. i use the term "betray" lightly in the sense that He Is Valid For Doing That, from a survival standpoint. still, the parallels to canon is heartbreaking, which was The Point. i do think that if it came down to it, peter wouldn't have been able to look james in the eye and kill him—not unless you're characterizing him as Actually Evil, which is fair to do in a canon setting, honestly, if that's your interpretation. but in this setting, it's a little different. anyway, there's more about that later. it's one of those complex things where some people are gonna hate him, fullstop, and others are gonna feel bad for him, while some won't even care, and ya know what? all of it is valid.

"you're hesitating, love" now james potter, why would you say that? the way i can make even the seemingly most innocuous things sad... why am i the way that i am? no, because i know a lot of you were expecting the rule change to be changed back, but the way regulus was so fucking upset about it.

and then james getting stabbed and being like: hey babe don't even worry about it, ive just solved all your problems. like james??? honey, no, that's not how it works! forgive him, he was just stabbed, so he's likely in a bit of shock 😔

(oh, also, side note: i said last chapter that we're close to the end, and i meant that as in we're almost to the end of the 84th hunger games. no, there's...a lot of fic left) anyway, let me do...numbers....i guess... 😬

tributes remaining: 2
james
regulus

(idk thats kinda redundant, but it felt like i had to do it, ya know? just a full circle kinda thing)

The Choice

Chapter Notes

hello, everyone!

warnings for this chapter:

-references to death/murder
-heavy descriptions of blood
-heavy mentions of pain/grief
-technically attempted suicide??? (it's a sacrificial thing, not out of a place of being suicidal, if that makes sense)
-descriptions of guns/threats of gun violence
-one reference to child death

i will, as always, be putting a spoiler-y, in-depth warning in the end notes for those of you who need it, which is so very valid. and ill also be putting reassurances there for anyone else who needs it.

(also, did you know that someone can survive stab wounds to the abdomen up to hours and even DAYS, depending on the placement?)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

James hadn't felt it when the dagger went in. Perhaps that's ironic, but between the adrenaline and everything else that had just happened, it genuinely didn't register to him at all at first. He was just standing there, reeling from the final cannon that meant he would get to go home, and then he felt the wet, sticky drag of heat that he's come to recognize as blood sliding down his skin. Because he recognizes it now. Because he's bled enough at this point to know.

As soon as he touched the blood, the pain broke through. It wasn't anything like he imagined it would feel like. A heavy, throbbing burn more so than a stinging sensation. But it was okay, in James' mind, because they had won. They had made it to the end, and they were going to go home.

James is tired of trying to hope. He thinks he'd like to stop now. He thinks it's best if he doesn't do it anymore, because it never seems to work out for him.

In a way, James is almost relieved. As much as he would have liked to go home, he's come to terms with the fact that he wouldn't be able to once, so it's easy to do again. He accepts it with no fuss, just as he did when he made his choice from the very beginning. It's okay, he thinks. It's going to be okay.

Because, see, James did it. James helped Regulus make it to the end. All that he set out to do at the start, and he's done it. He didn't fail. Regulus is alive, and he's going to go home.

On the bright side, at least Regulus won't have to kill him. At least James knows for sure now that Regulus can't, and even with that fact, it's not an issue. James is bleeding out, slowly but surely, and Regulus doesn't have to worry about a thing.

Though, honestly, James had meant it when he said that he wishes it had been Regulus. Maybe it's a strange, pyschosexual thing, but he feels like he's sort of been flirting with Regulus and his daggers this entire time, so to be stabbed by him would surely have been more satisfying. Regulus would have made sure James felt it, adrenaline or not. He isn't sure why that's so attractive to him, but it really is.

Maybe James is in shock. Maybe James actually does have a knife kink. Maybe James is just in love, and he wants anything he can get from Regulus, even if it's literal death.

Instead, what he gets is Regulus' hands hauling him up and dragging him to one of the poles closest to them, leaning James against it and causing him pain, because he's so fucking mean. Oh, he's so mean. James is madly in love with him.

"Let me see. James, let me see," Regulus chokes out, kneeling down beside him, bag thrown on the ground and tipped over so everything has fallen out, all the contents spilled in his haste to find something that will work. He's pale.

"Stop," James murmurs, reaching out to catch Regulus' hand with the one not cupping his stomach, keeping Regulus from touching his blood. "You don't need to see. There's nothing to look at because there's nothing to fix."

Regulus' eyes are clouded with a film of tears, his breathing wonky like it's a chore. "James —"

"Just sit with me," James says, sliding his hand up to thread their fingers together. A broken sound falls out of Regulus' mouth. "Shh, don't do that. It's fine, love."

"We were supposed to go home together," Regulus whimpers, shaking his head. "It's not fair."

"I know," James agrees, "but if it couldn't be both of us, it was always going to be you."

"You said—" Regulus swallows, reaching out with his free hand to cup James' cheek. It's such a kind thing for him to do, and it feels so nice. "You said something when you were high. James, you… You said something about getting me home, whatever it takes, and apparently you made a promise to Sirius to do that? You were high, so I figured it wasn't true."

James sighs quietly, leaning his face over into Regulus' palm, studying his eyes. Regulus was never supposed to know about that. Is it cruel to confirm it now? James' biggest fear is that Regulus will hate him for it, but he's dying. Perhaps it's underhanded, but he likes to think that gives him a free pass.

"It wasn't true, right, James?" Regulus whispers, holding his gaze. When James doesn't immediately respond, Regulus sucks in a sharp breath. "James?"

"The day our names were called, I made the choice," James admits. "I did promise Sirius, and I told my parents goodbye, but I made my decision the moment we locked eyes on that stage. Right then and there, I knew."

"This whole time, your plan was to get me home. That's what you were fighting for? Not yourself, James? Me?" Regulus asks, his voice cracking.

"Of course, love," James tells him, because anything else is unfathomable to him. It always was. "Of course."

"No." Regulus shakes his head again and drops his hand down from James' cheek to cover the back of James' hand over his stomach, uncaring of the blood. Yet, the moment he comes into contact with proof that James is bleeding out, that James is dying, his face twists as the tears in his eyes spill over.

"Don't cry," James whispers. "Really, it's—it's okay."

"No, no, no," Regulus moans pitifully, his shoulders heaving as he starts crying in earnest. He folds forward and buries his face into James' shoulder, but only for a few moments. A few breaths. He gasps out a sob, then seems to swallow it as he lifts his head and gazes at James from up close, blotchy and tear-streaked and absolutely beautiful. "I can't do it. Don't do this to me. Please don't do this to me."

"I'm sorry," James murmurs gently, because he really is. He can see that it's hurting Regulus, and he never wants that, but it can't be helped. He can only be sorry. "I really am, Reg."

"Then—then try," Regulus demands. "Keep trying. I—I need you to—James, please just—"

"I'm tired," James says softly. "I'm just…really tired, and it's okay. I promise it's okay. I don't regret it. I never regretted it from the moment I made my choice. Not once."

"Why would you do that?" Regulus rasps, more tears filling his eyes as he holds James' gaze. "You—you have so much to live for, James. You have Sirius, and your parents, and your friends. So, why—why would you choose this? I don't understand."

"Because I love you," James whispers, like it's their little secret. "Because I'm in love with you. Because I am so pathetically in love with you that I can't ignore it. I can't ignore you. I can't escape it, and I'm willing to die for it. I'm happy to, because living without you would be worse. You don't understand because you don't feel the same, and that's okay. You don't have to. Just know that I love you, and that's why. I've loved you for so long, for ten years. Never forget how loved you are, Regulus, how loved you've always been."

Regulus hiccups out a shaky breath, his expression crumbling, and he curls forward to press his face into James' shoulder, weeping so deeply, so heartbreakingly grief-stricken, that it hurts more than dying does.

And James would know.

~•~

Remus knows how quickly things can fall apart, but he doesn't think he's seen such levels of destruction in such a short amount of time like he just witnessed when Sirius' hope was crushed. They'd only just had breakfast, and Sirius was just about to leave to go to the watch party like every other day, but Remus cut on the screen as he was heading to the door in just enough time to catch Peter, Bernice, and Axus running right for James and Regulus with a spider chasing them. Remus had called him back, and he'd stayed.

The moment James collapsed, Sirius did as well. At first, he'd been on his feet, fucking ecstatic because he thought they'd won, and then the rule change was revoked. And then James turned to reveal that he'd been stabbed. And then James fell.

Sirius fell with him.

He's there on the floor. Hands in his hair, gripping his skull. Watching his best friend bleed out. Rocking back and forth as he struggles to breathe.

Rocking.

Rocking.

Rocking.

Remus wants to take care of him, but he doesn't know how. This time, he doesn't think he can.

~•~

Have you ever had something become so much a part of you that you can't imagine your life without it? For some people, this could be something as simple as a habit—smoking, biting nails, a pattern of sock-shoe-sock-shoe instead of the correct sock-sock-shoe-shoe. For others, this could be a person—a best friend, a lover, or even a stranger you see every day.

For Regulus, this is a feeling. Hating James is so deeply ingrained within him that he's quite sure it's in his DNA, at this point. He doesn't know who he would be if he didn't.

James is dying, and Regulus doesn't know who he is.

James loves him.

James loves him.

James loves him.

Of course he does. Of course he would, because they're a great, big tragedy. Of course James spent ten years loving him just short of the time when Regulus would have been able to accept it. Of course they would have everything they ever wanted from each other, just too late, too soon, two hands reaching out for one another that never quite made it. The branch broke long ago, and James is about to hit the ground.

Regulus wants to catch him.

When Regulus was nine years old, he found an old book in the bin in his school library, discarded for the story between the pages. A revolution on paper. Contraband, really, because no one was ever supposed to come into contact with anything that could promote rebellion. This included the Trojan War.

In particular, Regulus was fascinated by the Trojan Horse used to enter Troy. It struck him, the brilliance of hiding something within something else, because no one saw it coming, no one could have predicted it, and it was fool-proof. It influenced him so much that when life waged a war on him at fifteen, he thought to turn himself into that Trojan Horse.

When Regulus hid, he hid within himself. He folded himself down and retreated just like the Greeks, waiting and waiting for the cover of night to return, but it never seemed to come. He thought—he always thought he was stowed away, just awaiting the moment it was time to destroy Troy.

It's some kind of cruel irony to realize that, in truth, Regulus was never the Trojan Horse.

Regulus is Troy. He's always been Troy, because the real Trojan Horse, this whole time, was love.

Regulus, without even knowing it, hid his love within his hatred, and no different from the Trojans, he pulled the wooden horse of his hatred in like a trophy. After a fruitless ten-year long siege, night has fallen, and the time to destroy Troy has come.

Regulus can feel it. Just like the men escaping the Trojan Horse, Regulus' love comes pouring out to wreck him, to burn Troy to the ground.

From love to hate? No. They were always the same.

It was always the same thing, and he is fooled just as Troy was, a city burning into the morning light, the war-cry of victory more of a mournful croon. If he'd known—if only he'd known, he would have—what? Stopped it? That's the whole point to the Trojan Horse; you can't stop it, because you're too blinded by what you believe it is to look inside.

It was supposed to be hatred. Regulus thought it was hatred. It had to be hatred, because this —what it really is—would only lead to a fallen city, the destruction of Troy, of him. He never climbed, because branches break; he never looked inside his hatred, because he thought he was the wooden horse.

James is dying, and Regulus hates him.

James is dying, and Regulus loves him.

James is dying, and Regulus hates and loves him, because they were always one in the same. This whole time—not for five years, not for ten, but for fifteen—it's been the same. I hate you, he says. I love you, he means. I love you, he feels. I hate you, he knows. Ouroboros. Around and around, but the cycle is made of the same from beginning to end.

It's ripping him apart, and so it is love. He's burning, and so it is love. So it is love, and he should have known, because only love can hurt like this. Everything everywhere hurts, agony that resonates so deeply in him that it echoes through to the past, and is this why he once looked at James and felt so close to falling apart, because somehow, impossibly, something in him could feel that he would end up here?

"Hey," James murmurs, gently nudging Regulus' head on his shoulder with his cheek. "Reg, look at me."

Slowly, Regulus lifts his head. He looks at James, and he is a city burning to the ground, crumbling into ash. He is being torn down brick-by-brick, dismantled piece-by-piece, a place more than a person now, one suffering catastrophe.

"My fingers are going numb," James informs him, sounding ridiculously calm about this. "I think—I mean, I'm fairly certain that means I don't have much time, so I—"

"James," Regulus rasps, numb and cold all the way through, shaking like he's about to fall apart.

"Listen to me," James whispers, breaking their hands apart to reach up and frame Regulus' face, gently thumbing under his eye. His face feels puffy and raw, but James just gazes at him like he'd like to do that forever, until his last breath. "I know you're upset, but it's—look at it this way, yeah? You and Sirius will have each other."

"I'm not what Sirius needs," Regulus chokes out. "That was always you, James. He needs you. He—please don't do this to him. I can't—I don't know how to be enough for him. I need you to do it. He needs—"

"Stop it. I know you, and I know him," James tells him, holding his gaze. "You will mend. Together. You just need a bit more time, is all, and now you'll have it. Don't waste it."

Regulus shakes his head. "This isn't right. It's not—"

"My parents—" James pauses, then swallows, then gives him a wobbly smile. "My mum and dad cook dinner every night, and perhaps this is unfair of me to ask, but I'd hope that you would join them at least once or twice a week. They're used to feeding two, so it would be nice, I think, if you joined Sirius."

"Stop. Please stop," Regulus demands, his voice cracking. His eyes are itchy and swollen and abused.

"The hat," James continues anyway. "Your hat. I kept it for you. Remember where I said it was? In my—"

Regulus cuts him off by leaning forward to kiss him, squeezing his eyes shut as his relentless tears spill over again, burning, leaving trails of fire on the city-walls of his cheeks. James' lips are dry and warm, and he tilts forward into the kiss instantly, despite the fact that it's not a very deep one. It's firm and hard, but close-mouthed, more of a move made from desperation than a kiss born from desire.

James' eyes are shut when Regulus pulls away, lips parted like he's savoring it, like it's a gift. It wasn't. Regulus didn't do that to be kind; Regulus did it because he wanted James to shut up, and because he needed time to think, and because he wanted to do it when it was real, at least once.

Exhaling, Regulus sets his shoulders, feeling his resolve harden within him like iron infusing with his bones. He studies James' face for a long, long moment and reaches the conclusion he was barreling towards at full speed anyway, the conclusion that's been building within him since they entered this fucking hopeless, hapless arena.

Regulus doesn't want to go home without James. He's not sure if home exists at all without James. Ironic, isn't it? He said he'd do anything to make it back home, and he's had home with him this entire time. Just failed to realize it, until it's too late for it to matter. Always so close, but never close enough.

What were Regulus' motivations? Not his parents; if he's honest, it would almost be a relief to never make it back to them. He has no friends; there's Barty, but he's one person, just one, and he has other people in his life. It wasn't for Sirius, because he didn't even have Sirius to go back to.

So, what were Regulus' motivations to make it home? What did it come down to? What was the driving force behind his desperate need to survive?

His hatred for James. The true reason behind it all was that he hated James and refused to lose to him, as he has so much loss in every capacity with James already. Except, as it turns out, Regulus' hatred for James has been nothing more than a wooden horse holding his love within, and that's manifested itself in the arena in countless ways. So obvious now. How did he miss it? He'd been so sure…

The Trojans were fools, too.

So, what are Regulus' motivations to get home now? Troy is burning, and he knows the truth. He doesn't have parents who will welcome him into a safe, loving home when he gets back. He doesn't have more than one friend who will be glad for his return. He doesn't know how he'll ever manage to be enough for his own brother, especially when they'll only look at one another and see the person they both weren't ready to lose.

What are his motivations? What are they? He doesn't have to ask himself to know the answer, but he hears Sirius' voice in his head anyway, just like the day his name was called. Are you planning on coming home, Reggie? That day, Regulus had said yes.

Today, now, he says, "No," because fear was always a motivator, too, but he's not afraid anymore.

"What?" James mumbles, eyes fluttering open as he blinks at Regulus. "Was that another parting g—"

Again, Regulus doesn't give him the chance to finish. He folds forward once more and kisses James hard, fiercely; like he really fucking wants to, because he really fucking wants to; like it means something, because it does. James makes a muffled noise into his mouth, leaning forward into the kiss, eager, always so eager. Regulus uses that to his advantage.

Carefully, he pats around on the ground as he dips in closer, his heart jumping the moment he comes into contact with what he's looking for. As soon as he has it, he practically climbs into James' lap, ignoring his grunt of pain—either from his leg or his stomach, or both—and kissing him harder and deeper until he's giving a breathless moan, despite his pain.

"What?" James wheezes against Regulus' mouth. "Reg? I—I don't know what's happening, love. Is this—"

"Shh, it's okay," Regulus whispers, pressing gentle, fleeting kisses against James' mouth. He slides his empty hand down James' arm, grabbing his wrist. "Lift your arm for me."

James responds to the words like a puppet on strings, his arm raising as his breath rattles in his chest. He's struggling to breathe, Regulus can hear it, and it's not just from some kiss. He's surely in pain, especially now that Regulus is straddling him, and yet he remains compliant, happy to participate. As a reward, Regulus dips in and kisses him again.

It is admittedly quite fucked up, because it's to distract him, too. James is so caught up in the kiss that he doesn't realize what's happening, so there's nothing he can do when there's a distinct click and clang of metal on metal. James' mouth goes still against his own, and Regulus eases back with a shaky exhale, watching James blink rapidly and tilt his head up to stare at where Regulus has handcuffed him to the pole.

The pole has hooks that the supplies were hanging off of, which means James can't just stand and ride the handcuffs up and off the pole. He's stuck.

James gives a small tug in visible confusion, looking at where he's trapped with no understanding of what's happening. He pulls again, seemingly instinctively, then frowns and looks at Regulus. For a moment, neither of them speak, and Regulus feels his heart break a little bit, because he's about to shatter James' for the second time—and this time, he's choosing to.

"This is not how I expected myself to go, if I'm honest," James mumbles, eyebrows furrowed. "Reg, what are you doing?"

Regulus swallows and folds forward to press a gentle kiss to James' forehead, his hands coming up to frame James' face and hold his head still. When he pulls back, he meets James' gaze and gives him a wobbly smile. "Sirius needs you, James. Your parents need you. The world—the whole fucking world needs you. The only place you're going is home."

"Regulus," James says, an edge to his tone as Regulus shifts backwards and starts to ease out of his lap. He surges forward to fist the front of Regulus' shirt, holding it in a grip so desperate that the stitches and seams make ripping noises as James stretches them out trying to drag him back. "What the fuck do you think you're doing? Come here. What are you—"

"You chose me, and now I'm choosing you," Regulus murmurs, grimacing slightly as he grips his shirt and forcefully yanks it from James' grip. James trips forward on his knees with a groan, scrambling to swing himself around and grip his stomach—which is still bleeding—as he pushes himself out as far as he can go, reaching for Regulus.

"Wait, wait, Regulus, please," James chokes out, sounding genuinely distressed as he rocks onto his feet, half-bent over from where the handcuffs won't let him stand all the way. He must be in immense pain, but he just lets out a muffled noise and drops his hand from his wound to reach it out towards Regulus, his palm covered in blood. "Just—just please, okay? Come here. Will you come here please? Stop backing away, alright? We can—let's just—"

"I'm sorry I never worked out how to be alright enough to give us the chance we deserved," Regulus rasps, because that's what it all boils down to. "You, more so than me, deserve to be happy, and I wish I could have tried to help make you happy, but I couldn't. I have a lot of regrets about that."

James leans out as far as he can go, both arms spread wide as he tries to bring them closer. Regulus takes another step back, and James' breath goes even more erratic than it was prior. His eyes are wide. He looks terrified. "Just wait a fucking second, would you? Think about this, love, okay? Whatever you're doing, whatever you're trying to prove, just don't. Please. Please just come back here. Just stay with me."

"I can't do that," Regulus whispers.

"Regulus… Regulus," James snaps, panic tinging his tone as he yanks fruitlessly on the handcuffs, straining forward. "Stop. Fucking stop it right now. Don't you dare do this to me. You don't get to do this to me, not after everything, not after you've spent years making me sure that you never would. Please."

Regulus takes a deep breath, then slowly releases it, feeling oddly calm. It's a strange sort of serenity that falls over him, something in him settling down. "That's the thing, James, I spent years doing everything I could to make sure I believed I never would, but the truth is—I understand. You said I didn't understand because I don't feel the same, but of course I understand; I've understood longer than you have what it is to love someone so much that you know you'd never recover from losing them. I never recovered. I lost you, and I lost Sirius, and I lost myself. But I understood then, and I understand now, and I've understood always. I never stopped understanding."

"Stop!" James bursts out, surging forward frantically as Regulus starts backing up with purpose. "Regulus, get back here. Don't—please don't. Regulus. Please just—just wait, alright? I'll—I'll never forgive you. I'll never recover, okay? So, please—I'm begging you, just please stop."

"Even if you hate me, you'll still love me," Regulus tells him, lips curling up sadly. "Trust me, I know all about that."

James releases a choked noise, folding over a little bit like the words are a physical blow. He stumbles against the ground from where he's trying desperately to yank his hand free from the handcuffs, to no avail. He groans through his pain and whines with his fear, and Regulus has no pain and feels no fear, because acceptance is easier when it's driven by love.

"Keep eating meals with your parents. Take care of Sirius, and let him take care of you. You've had my hat this long, so you may as well keep holding onto it for me," Regulus says, coming to a halt on the bank of the river. James seems to be holding his breath, like one move will be the push that sends Regulus over the edge. "If I'm lucky, James, maybe I'll have a slice of paradise waiting for me. If I do, then you know where I'm going. However long it takes, I'll be there when it's time for you to come; we'll dance, and we'll laugh, and none of this will even matter. The other life where we're not a great, big tragedy—that's where I'll be waiting for you, baby."

"Please," James begs, and it's a mere breath, almost lost to the wind because it's so soft and feeble. He shakes his head, tears steadily building up and spilling down his cheeks. "Please don't leave me."

"I'm sorry," is all Regulus can think to say in his last moments, because he is. He's so, so sorry about so many things, and it's too late for him to do anything about it. So close, and as always, never close enough. He's sorry that Sirius has to see him die, after losing so much of himself to do everything he could to keep him alive. He's sorry he was too lost and too fucked up to even realize what he wanted, let alone let himself have it. He's sorry he didn't climb higher; he's sorry he never looked inside the wooden horse; he's sorry he's Troy. He's drowning in his regrets before he ever hits the water.

It's easy, somehow, to give himself over to gravity, relaxing back into the freefall. He hears James yell, calling out his name in frenzied desperation, and it's the last thing he hears before he hits the water with a splash. The crimson river welcomes him like it was waiting; it welcomes him with cold, clawed hands that drag him deeper beneath the surface.

Regulus realizes very quickly why it only takes two minutes for those in the crimson river to die—because it's not just the drowning one has to worry about. It's also the hands yanking at him, claws dipping in deep and ripping at his skin, trying to pull him apart. They're relentless, ruthless, and he can't stop himself from opening his mouth to scream underwater, lungs protesting and pain exploding in every limb. Except it's not water, it's blood, and it's thick in his mouth as he swallows it and swallows it, instinctively trying to survive even now, just as he has been this entire time. There are hands raking at his chest, one pushing in like it's trying to get to his heart and snatch it right out like a trophy—and that's exactly what it's doing, he realizes. And that's how he will die. Heartless.

No one can hear him beneath the surface, but his muffled, water-logged screams take the shape of a name. In his panic, in his haze of pain, it's Sirius he instinctively calls for.

~•~

The raw, devastated scream of grief echoing through the building is so loud that those in the suites above and below the one occupying one Sirius Black can hear it with horrifying clarity, a sound so cataclysmic that it hooks into the soul and floods one's empathy until the pain is too unbearable to withstand—and it's not even their pain.

Imagine how Sirius feels.

It's his. The pain is his. The grief is his. Because his little brother just tipped himself over into a river he can never resurface from, hands yanking him down in seconds. The moment he disappeared, Sirius felt his heart cave in, like it hardened and then absurdly broke apart into fractures all at once, as soon as Regulus was lost to him.

Sirius is here, and he doesn't want to be here. He wants to go away. He wants to stop existing and, perhaps selfishly, not experience this moment. He wants to forget. He wants to lose this, because he can't tolerate it. He can't handle it. Why won't his mind and memory let him escape now?

At first, Sirius doesn't even realize he's screaming. He thinks it's only James, because it's James' wail that plays out in his head, exactly the same length and level of agony that Sirius feels assault him, like they're synced even in their pain.

And then, "Sirius, Sirius, hey, stop—"

Sirius doesn't know he's slamming his hand into the side of his head—trying to forget, begging his memory to fail now, wanting it more than he ever has—not even aware of the action until Remus collapses on the floor next to him to yank his hand away. Arms wrap around him, holding him in place as he folds forward into the crook of Remus' elbow, trying to spill out of his arms, trying to crawl away, like he can physically escape the grief if he just moves.

"My brother, he's my brother," Sirius chokes out, desperate for someone to understand, needing someone—needing the entire world—to grasp how fucking devastating this is. If they realized, if the universe understood, maybe someone or something would make it stop.

"Okay, okay, hey, I know," Remus whispers, hauling him a little bit, holding him.

"We—we didn't—we never even got to—" Sirius cuts himself off with a small sound, weak and helpless like he's drowning, too. They didn't get to fix it; they didn't have enough time. Sirius never got to tell him that he loves him.

"I'm sorry, Sirius, I'm so sorry." Remus fists his hand in the back of Sirius' shirt, letting him slump into him, his face turning into Remus' arm. He can feel the hot drip of his tears smearing his face and Remus' sleeve. Remus keeps himself together, being the rock Sirius needs him to be right now. He kneels right there and lets Sirius sob against him, not saying another word.

Sirius tries to forget, and this moment remains seared into his memory, vivid and solid. He'll never forget how much pain Regulus is causing him right now.

Never.

~•~

James yanks so hard on the handcuffs that his shoulder aches, a starburst of pain that joins the rest in his stomach and leg, nothing compared to the sight of Regulus falling into the river.

The strain on his shoulder makes James collide down on his knees, his ears ringing as he curls forward and digs his bloodied hand into the ground, yanking at grass as he tries fruitlessly to drag himself forward, even if it means ripping his fucking arm off. It doesn't do much in the way of results; it only brings the tilting whirl of the world into sharper focus.

James is struggling to breathe, light-headed and delirious from pain and blood loss, dark edges creeping around the corners of his vision, but he blinks and fights it with all that he has left. He can't—he won't do this. It wasn't supposed to happen like this; he had his plan, he made his choice, so this—it isn't fair. It's not right. James can't. He—

"Give him back to me," James chokes out, lifting up to fall back on his heels, glaring up at the sky through his tears. "I'm not doing this. Bring him back! Please—just, please bring him back. I—I can't. I can't. Please, I love him."

No response. It's just him. He's alone here, left to every version of pain there is to feel, only becoming more unbearable by the moment. Even the water is still.

James can't bear this. He won't. He never wanted to, and he refuses to let it end like this. The cannon still hasn't sounded, so James shakily fumbles in his pocket, fingers wrapping around the vial of Horcrux Hornet venom from Vespa—the last thing Vanity ever held onto.

"Sorry. Sirius, I'm so sorry," James croaks, hastily flicking the stopper out of the top of the vial. He takes a deep breath, then exhales. "You either give him back to me and let us go home, or you don't get either of us. You said—you told us we can go home, that there can be two Victors, so that's what it will be. The two of us, or neither of us."

With that, James raises the vial to his mouth without even a split second of hesitation, his ultimatum announced to the world with nothing but promise. If Regulus dies in that river, James will ingest the venom, and he'll be dead before anyone can reach him. They can't have him, not without Regulus. They can only have them both.

So, despite knowing that doing this would cause him excruciating pain, ending in a horrible death, James puts the vial to his lips and turns it up, fully not fucking around. He's going to do it, and he thinks that he won't even notice a difference in pain level. This is excruciating as it is.

The venom is thick in the vial, sliding green and shimmery like honey, getting closer and closer to where his mouth is parted. As soon as that cannon sounds, he's downing it. He closes his eyes, wondering almost hysterically how it will taste. Maybe he'll meet Vanity when this is all over, and he can tell her, because she'll surely be curious to know.

"Stop!"

There's a loud splash, and James' eyes snap open as he draws the vial away from his mouth, breath catching at the sight of pale hands lifting Regulus out of the water and depositing him back on the bank of the river. Streams of red spill off of him, and he's hacking and coughing as he crawls forward, deep slashes through his clothes that reveal gouges in his skin, pouring blood. He's more of a crimson river than the one he just resurfaced from.

"Congratulations," comes the tight, shaky voice of Slughorn. "May I present the…Victors of the 84th hunger games!"

James drops the vial, wheezing out a harsh breath as his vision blurs. Across from him, bleeding profusely, Regulus is still crawling and choking. James strains forward as far as he can go, reaching out, but Regulus collapses before he ever makes it. The world tilts, going dark, and James collapses, too.

~•~

Horace swallows thickly as he stares at the blown-up screen in the center of the room. On it, James Potter and Regulus Black are slumped on the ground, arms outstretched with their hands only inches from meeting.

"Sir?"

"Play the victory banners and bring them out," Horace orders, releasing a deep breath as he watches the screen fade into the Hallow emblem—a triangle with a circle inside and a line through it—with pictures of James and Regulus on either side.

The heli-carriers are dispatched, and Horace grinds his teeth as he glances at the screen displaying James and Regulus' vitals. They're going to live, and now they're expected to. He wonders if James realized in his endeavor to save himself and Regulus, he would be condemning someone else.

Horace wonders if James did know, would he even care once he realized it was the head gamemaker he was condemning?

Horace had expected Tom to be pleased by the rule change, much like everyone else. He is the Master of the Hallows, so surely he would be in support of their excitement and delight with something that had never been done before. Horace had anticipated praise. Horace had not gotten it.

"The entire point to the hunger games is that there can only be one Victor," Tom had said, looking at Horace with those chilling, chilling eyes of his. "You're right, Slughorn, there has never been two. There's a reason for that."

"Yes, but isn't something new exciting?" Horace had asked hopefully, because he believed in it, because he was so very excited by his idea. Two Victors. Two young men in love, who get to go home and have their happily ever after. Everyone would love that; everyone loves a happy ending, even Horace himself. He was looking forward to it, in fact.

Tom Riddle didn't care about that, not one bit. "Something new is dangerous. The Hallow doesn't tolerate a threat, not from the outside and not from within. All threats are eliminated. Do you intend to be a threat?"

"No," Horace had been quick to say. "Of course not."

"Then see to it that you don't become one," Tom replied, and Horace knew instantly what he had to do.

The problem is, Horace can't fathom how there's a way around this, since James saw to it that only one Victor wasn't an option. It was either both of them, or neither. All or nothing, and the Hallows would not be satisfied with nothing. There was no easy solution, because even if Horace let Regulus die in that river and dispatched people to get James, he would be dead from the venom before they ever reached him.

The only other option was to let James drink the venom and bring up Regulus from the river, but James was waiting for that cannon. Even if Horace brought Regulus up and just let James bleed out, he couldn't be sure that Regulus and James wouldn't collaborate to just die together; they seemed to have reached the point where neither of them were willing to leave that arena alone, and they both proved they were more than willing to die for that. On top of that, if Horace brought Regulus up and didn't announce them as the Victors after all of that, the world would surely riot.

Horace can't say what the proper answer for this was; there's never been two Victors, but there's also never been no Victors, and Horace's reputation would be in tatters if he disappointed all the viewers in such a way. He just—he only wanted to give the people what they want, and he was in a very difficult position as well. Surely Tom will understand…

There's a heavy weight settling in Horace's stomach that makes him think that, no, Tom will not understand. It puts a spike of fear Horace has never fully felt before right down the length of his spine. He gives the final orders—have the Victors carted to the infirmary and the mentor notified—and then he slips out of the room. He's staying in a suite towards the back of the building, down on the lower levels, and he goes through the trouble of taking the lift down to the basement level and walking swiftly in between the empty cells of the servants to reach the elevator on the other side, riding it up to his floor.

It's quiet on the way to his room and inside his room, but he can't shake the feeling of paranoia that slithers under his skin. He feels like he needs to move faster, to get away, as if he's being chased; though, there's no evidence to back up that claim. It's just…the memory of Tom's eyes, the shameless way he'd made it very clear that, if Horace were to do something he so happened to dislike, then it would be labeled a threat and dealt with as all threats are.

Horace never meant to become a threat. He has a feeling that Tom won't see it that way, though.

Frantically, Horace throws practically his entire wardrobe into his suitcase, then dumps half out and empties nearly the entirety of the liquor cabinet into his bag instead. He starts to grab his cell and laptop, then pauses and remembers each and every 'personalized' ad that popped up after he typed in something specific, indicating that he can be and has been monitored on the Hallow servers. With suspicion, Horace dumps them on his bed and leaves them behind.

Again, when Horace leaves, he takes the lift down to the basement level. He breathes easier as soon as the doors shut, tipping his head back and shutting his eyes. Where shall he go? Where can he go? Not home, of course. Surely someone would allow him to…lay low for a bit in the city? He has connections, people who he's sure would help him. All he needs to do is—

Ding.

Horace's eyes snap open, head lifting as he steps forward to exit the lift, bag in hand. He keeps his eyes peeled as he moves swiftly through the basement level, heading right for the underground garage that will let him leave the building through the back. He has no car, but he can order one at the pub just up the street, a place he frequents often.

As Horace listens to the echo of his shoes snap against concrete with every step, he comes to the horrifying and dreadful conclusion that he has no earthly idea what he's doing. Trying to hide within a city from the man who runs it is a bit redundant, he would think. All of his connections are people who would, realistically, sell him out the moment they believed it could move them up further in this world. Frankly, Horace has no idea where to go, or even what to do.

Is this even necessary? He can't help his own skepticism, but again, there's an instinctive twist in his gut that is telling him it's very necessary, so insistent that he can't even imagine not listening to it. The thought strikes him—but is this what it is to have survival instincts? Proper ones that grip you when you're in danger of—well, not surviving. Is this how it feels for those in the arena, or even a fraction of it? Horace is learning very quickly that the feeling is quite unpleasant and not as entertaining when it's him, rather than people on a screen.

As Horace ducks past the entrance to the garage, skirting around the lowered gate, a smooth voice says, "And just where are you going, Mr. Slughorn?"

Jumping slightly—and yelping—Horace whips around with his bag clutched to his chest, his heart pounding as pure terror turns the blood in his veins to ice. He finds the culprit quickly, a young woman with a long, silver cigarette holder that has a dragon ornament wrapping all the way around it, the mouth open and the fangs where the cigarette goes. She inhales, and it makes the dragon look like smoke is coming out of its nostrils. His heart calms as he puts a name to her face.

"Ah, Ms. Meadowes," Horace says wearily, deflating slightly. He clears his throat. "You gave me a fright, dear. I must ask, why aren't you inside, celebrating? The tributes you designed for are Victors and will surely need your expertise soon."

"Oh, they'll have it, don't you worry about that," Dorcas says. He's quite sure that's her name, in any case. If he's honest, he doesn't much like her as a stylist—a bit too radical for his tastes—but he did appreciate her work on Regulus and James for the way it invigorated the viewers. "You seem to be in quite the rush, sir. I would have thought you'd be inside celebrating yourself, actually. And yet…"

"Yes, well…something came up. Lovely talking to you, but I really must be going," Horace declares quickly, nodding at her politely before turning on his heel.

"He will find you eventually," Dorcas announces before he can take even one step, and he freezes in place. Slowly, he turns back around. She smiles at him without any warmth and drops the cigarette from the holder, grinding it under her heel as she slides the holder into the top-knot on her head, making it look like the dragon is sleeping in a nest of braids. "As I thought. Riddle isn't pleased, is he?"

Horace doesn't know what to say, and Dorcas doesn't give him very much time to think up a response, leaving him flustered.

"It's a shame," Dorcas continues lightly. "I think what you did was revolutionary, Mr. Slughorn." She pauses, cocking her head and smiling wider, meaner, with an edge. "Though, I suppose that's why Riddle isn't pleased."

"I didn't—" Horace swallows, flexing his fingers around the handle of his bag. "I had little choice. My hands were quite tied, seeing as the boy—James—left me no options."

"Mm," Dorcas hums, lips twitching, "I sympathize. I really do. That's the thing about the sun, isn't it? No matter what, it just keeps rising. You can't keep it down."

Horace frowns. "What was I meant to do in that situation?"

"I imagine Riddle would have preferred you to kill them both rather than let them live," Dorcas muses. "It's a dangerous thing, giving power to those that aren't meant to have it."

"I wasn't giving power—"

"That may not have been your intention, Mr. Slughorn, but that is nevertheless what you've just done. It's a threat. What do you think Riddle does about threats?"

"He eliminates them," Horace rasps, his mouth dry.

Dorcas smiles again, just as sharp as before. "When he can find them, that's exactly what he does. I'm assuming you'd like not to be found, yes?"

"I'm not a threat," Horace insists, shaking his head, feeling too old and too out of his depth for such accusations.

"Then why are you running?" Dorcas whispers, lips curled as her eyes gleam. She stares him down, her gaze piercing, and then she walks up the dipping driveway out of the garage to stop on the street by a black car. She opens the passenger side door and turns to face him. "Get in, Mr. Slughorn."

"I—I really have to be going," Horace says, his heart slamming away in his chest.

"I said," Dorcas repeats slowly, pushing open her coat by her hip to reveal a gun strapped to her belt, "get in."

Horace forgets how to breathe for a moment, and he's quite sure his knees would be knocking together from how hard he's shaking if he dared to shift his feet. In his panic, he can only bluster, "What will you do? Shoot me in the street?! Where did you even come by a firearm? Only Aurors—"

"Clearly not," Dorcas interrupts flatly, one eyebrow sweeping up as she rests her hand lazily on the gun, comfortable with it in a way that sends a chill down Horace's spine. "And, if I did shoot you in the street, who would care? I daresay Riddle would consider it justified, now wouldn't he?"

To that, Horace has no reply, because he thinks she's right.

"Get in the car," Dorcas orders sharply. "I won't tell you again."

Slowly, Horace walks forward on shaky legs, his heart pounding so hard that he can hear it in his head. He holds onto his bag like a shield, utterly terrified, but Dorcas watches him side-step his way cautiously up to the car and ease inside. As soon as he's in, she shuts the door behind him and walks around to get in on the other side.

"Where are you taking me?" Horace croaks, gripping his bag in his lap as Dorcas drives.

Dorcas doesn't respond.

In fact, she doesn't speak at all for quite some time, and Horace is almost certain she's doing it on purpose, just to further unnerve him. They drive deeper into the Hallow, into the heart of the city, and Horace debates on what he can do about his predicament. He's never fought anyone. He's never had a gun in his proximity as a threat, only ever as a form of protection. He's never felt—fear. Not true fear, like this. Fear for his life. The closest he ever came was when Regulus tossed a dagger at his head, and that had genuinely kept him up all night, thinking about how terribly close it had been.

Horace is at first very sure that Dorcas Meadowes works closely with Tom and is the one tasked with seeing him eliminated, as all threats are. His mind races with the desperate need to avoid his fate, but no matter what he eventually comes up with, no plan seems practical.

Then, without warning, Dorcas says, "Mr. Slughorn, I work with an organization that takes issue with…many things, all of which Riddle currently sits at the center of. The hunger games, the forced poverty, the inequality spread throughout the districts in comparison to the Hallow—just to name a few."

"You—" Horace swivels his head to blink at her, admittedly startled. The only thing he can think to say is, "But you're a Hallow, Ms. Meadowes."

"Ah, so you do see the issues, but you simply don't care when they don't apply to you," Dorcas murmurs, shaking her head as she heaves a sigh. "You're not ignorant. No, you're worse. You're aware and willing to perpetuate the problems."

"I do no such thing," Horace sputters.

"I'm aware that I'm a Hallow, Mr. Slughorn," Dorcas continues, as if he hasn't spoken. "That doesn't give me the right to avoid what's wrong in this world, or who is the source of it. Do you want to know how I'm so sure that you've just provided ammunition to the side of the war that Riddle isn't on? The rule change. See, I spoke with Sirius yesterday, who gave you the idea to do it in the first place, and he said—"

"No, you're misinformed," Horace cuts in. "The idea was mine."

Dorcas glances over and gives him a placid, patronizing smile. "Sure it was, sir. In any case, Sirius mentioned that you were quite pleased about it. So, why change it? You're the head gamemaker, and the only person who ranks above you with any influence on the games is Riddle himself. So, if you didn't want to change the rule, the only other person who could make you would be him. Now, why would he demand you change the rule back if he didn't feel that Regulus and James were a threat to him? A threat to everything?"

Horace stares at her with wide eyes, once again feeling very out of his depth. He's not entirely sure what she's insinuating, and he doesn't understand what she means by war. There is no war; he can't fathom why there would need to be a war. What other side is there, and what are they even fighting for?

"To your credit, you did make an attempt to follow his orders," Dorcas continues. "You just didn't follow through, and that surprises me. Surely you knew your life was at stake."

"I—I was aware, yes, but again, I wasn't sure what I was meant to do in that situation," Horace admits. "If I did kill them both, my reputation would be in tatters."

"Is your reputation more important to you than your life, Mr. Slughorn?" Dorcas asks.

"It's second only to my life," Horace declares with a frown, because a reputation is all a person has, really. It's all he's ever had. His reputation gets him connections, and his connections get him where he wants to be in life. Yes, to be alive is more important, but what is it to live if he's not living as he wishes?

Dorcas chuckles sardonically. "Oh, they're going to eat you alive at the Phoenix."

"What?" Horace's heart jumps again. "The Phoenix? What is that? Is that—is it a prison? Like Azkaban? Am I going to prison?!"

"Eh," Dorcas says lightly, tipping her head from side-to-side and waving her hand lazily.

"I'm going to prison?" Horace chokes out.

Yet again, Dorcas doesn't respond. She abruptly straightens up in her seat and grips the wheel with one hand, reaching down to grab the gearshift and yank it into a different gear. The car jolts forward, and Horace frantically looks out the front windshield, his eyes bulging as he realizes where they are.

At the back of the city, there's a tunnel that was once undergoing construction decades ago, but was abandoned for some reason or another, and the only thing Horace knows about it for sure is that it's collapsed at the end and has a sinkhole in the middle. A sinkhole that Dorcas is speeding towards without batting an eye, the car revving as she pushes them faster, so much so that Horace feels sick.

"The—the—there's a sinkhole!" Horace shrieks, flinging his hand up and bracing it against the ceiling of the car.

Dorcas just laughs, low and smooth, as they approach the sinkhole far too quickly for them to be able to stop in time. Horace squeezes his eyes shut and flinches back into his seat, waiting for the impact, waiting for—

"You can open your eyes now," Dorcas says, amused.

"What?" Horace rasps, eyes snapping open to see them slowing a bit as they continue into the tunnel. He whips around to stare out the back windshield, his brain throwing question marks in every direction because the sinkhole is still there. "How did we…?"

"It's fake," Dorcas tells him. "The Order filled it in years ago and used tech to keep up the illusion that it's still there. It works as an alert system as well, so any second—" She cuts herself off as the car starts ringing, the screen on her dash lighting up. She chuckles and reaches out to answer, grinning as she says, "How did you know it was me?"

"Because you're the only one who speeds through," comes the stern, unimpressed tone from what Horace is sure is a woman. She sounds disapproving, like a mother. "I'm in mind to leave you stranded at the gate, Dorcas."

"Oh, don't do that. I have something the Order is really going to like. Get the train going, please," Dorcas says.

There's a beat of silence, then a hum. "I see. The gate is dropping now. The train will be ready when you arrive."

"Thank you," Dorcas replies, then leans forward to press the screen. There was no display number or name.

"It's collapsed," Horace points out in distress as they head towards the blocked-off end of the tunnel that's just a wall of rocks and rubble. Aged and dusty.

"Oh, yeah, that's actually still real," Dorcas agrees as they drive right towards it.

Horace reaches up to grab the handle above the door, clinging to his bag with his other hand, his heart hammering away as they get closer and closer. He's tempted to close his eyes again and only just manages not to as they abruptly dip down a decline in the pavement that's not visible until they're driving down it, only a few feet before the collapsed end of the tunnel.

The ground evens out again, and Horace stares wide-eyed at the long, dark tunnel beneath the one they just drove through, illuminated by the lights of Dorcas' car. When he glances back around the seat, the road that dipped down is rising back up, a ramp into the tunnel below that lifts in less than a minute.

"Has this always been here?" Horace murmurs in awe.

"Not always," Dorcas replies, "but for a long fucking time. Longer than Riddle has been Master of the Hallow, though."

"He's been Master for quite some time," Horace says.

"Believe it or not, there are people who are older than Riddle," Dorcas tells him. "People did come before him."

"I'm older than Tom Riddle," Horace feels compelled to point out. "If you mean who was the Master before him, of course I know that. I remember him, even all these years later. Gellert Grindelwald."

"I'm not talking about the history of the Hallow," Dorcas declares, the car slowing as it goes around a curve and pulls off to the side. In front, there's an old train-car—just one, and it's quite rusty. "I know that already, even better than you do."

Horace scoffs. "Impossible. I lived it."

"Only one side of it," Dorcas counters, taking her seatbelt off and raising her eyebrows at him. "I've heard about the side you didn't even know existed. Now, get out."

"Where are we?" Horace demands suspiciously, but Dorcas just ignores him and slips out of the car, going over to meet a woman that moves off the steps into the train.

The woman has grey hair and wrinkles around her pinched mouth, but despite the signs of her age, she's dressed in black tactical pants—a gun strapped to her belt also—and a black tank-top that shows off the tattoos that cover her arms from the top all the way to her wrist on both.

After a beat, Horace takes a deep breath and hauls himself out of the car, bag in hand. He approaches cautiously, and both women fall silent as soon as he comes within range.

Dorcas turns to him, and the other woman stares down her nose at him like he's less impressive than a lump of dirt. Her lips press into a thin line, and she steps back, letting Dorcas wave him forward, gesturing to the train. Horace frowns, but does move past her to look at the train, eyebrows furrowed.

"It's your ride," Dorcas explains, and Horace turns to stare at her in disbelief, not even caring that he's standing next to the other woman. He's agitated that Dorcas has the audacity to believe that he's simply going to board a train without knowing where he's even going. She must see the indignation on his face, but it only makes her smile. "Oh, don't worry, Mr.

Slughorn, the train is perfectly safe. It's never failed to make it to its destination before, and I can assure you it never will."

"I'm not going to just—just get on that train, Ms. Meadowes, not without answers! That's preposterous!" Horace hisses.

Dorcas raises her eyebrows at him. "You're right, you do have another option, of course. We won't make you go if you decide not to." Her eyes are cold as she steps forward, making him step back instinctively. "Your choice: you can either get on that train, or you can have your brains blown out."

As soon as the words leave her mouth, Horace feels cold metal press against his temple, and he hears the distinct click of a gun's hammer tugging into place. He freezes, his stomach falling right out from under his feet, and it takes no time at all for him to start trembling all over. His fingers clasp the handle of his bag tight, and as much as it terrifies him, he darts his gaze to the side to look—and yes, that's a gun resting against the side of his head in the hand of a woman who looks unafraid to pull the trigger.

"If you get on that train, you will be taken somewhere safe. You will be given food, your own space, and protection in the form of the only place in this world that Riddle cannot find you," Dorcas explains. "In exchange, you will not be asked to fight in a war. You will not be required to get your hands dirty in fixing the problems you helped maintain. You will not be tortured, or killed." She steps forward again, reaching out to grasp his chin, eyes bright and blazing. "Where you will go, if you so choose, you will have better than you deserve."

A whimper escapes Horace against his will.

"I hope you say no," Dorcas whispers, her voice so sinister and harsh that Horace is just frozen, staring into her eyes like prey caught between the jaws of a predator. Her nails dig into the side of his face. "I would relish in getting to scrub your blood off the concrete beneath our feet, because you do not deserve to live, Horace Slughorn. Children are dead because of you, so I beg of you, choose not to get on that train."

"I—I—I—" Horace's breath hitches, and he can only stumble over his words, feeling smaller and more afraid than he ever has in his life. He can't stop shaking.

"How does it feel, gamemaker?" Dorcas asks softly, wrenching his head to the side to push him harder into the gun. A choked sound falls from his mouth, and Horace is helpless to the tears that spill out of his eyes. "Are you entertained?"

"Please," Horace whimpers, squeezing his eyes shut.

Dorcas digs her nails in deeper for a lingering moment, making it hurt, and then she releases him. His eyes peel open, and she curls her lip in disgust. "This is the last time I'll ask you, Mr. Slughorn. Will you get on the train, or not?"

"I—" Horace swallows, his breath escaping him all wobbly and shaky. "Yes, I'll—I'll get on the train."

"Shame," Dorcas murmurs, and nothing has ever frightened Horace as much as the genuine disappointment in her voice, not even Tom Riddle's empty eyes.

"Get in, then," the woman declares, lowering her gun and gesturing to the stairs. Horace practically rushes to get inside, and as he goes, he hears the woman say, "I'll see you in a few months time, Dorcas."

"You won't be at this post?" Dorcas asks.

"No, Dumbledore has plans for me," is the woman's response, and the last thing Horace hears as he enters the train.

Chapter End Notes

for those of you coming down for the warnings:

attempted suicide/sacrifice: james is bleeding out/dying, and regulus essentially realizes that he would rather die than let james die, for various reasons, so he decides to do exactly that. he handcuffs james to one of the poles in front of the cave and goes to fall back into the river. james, being james, is Not Okay with this, obviously, so he announces to the world/gamemakers that they either give regulus back, or he'll drink the horcrux hornet venom, and fully intends to do so.

guns/threats of gun violence: dorcas shows slughorn a gun on her hip to threaten him into a car, and later, she informs him that he can either get on a train or get shot. a gun gets put to slughorn's head, and dorcas sort of pushes his head into it in a threatening manner. no one is shot.

reassurances: regulus doesn't die, james doesn't die, they're announced as victors to the 84th hunger games and are lifted out to go home. they will live!!!

to everyone else...

how are we feeling? 😬 well, that was fucking awful, wasn't it? literally no one was having a good time throughout that.

im never going to get over the fact that the we SEE the moment james came to the decision to get regulus home. like, if you go back to chapter one, in the very first regulus POV, that moment when their eyes meet on the stage—that's the exact moment james made his choice. oh, im sick.

not regulus and james pulling some romeo and juliet shit. a lot of people guessed that they would, sort of, but i didn't see very many people guess that regulus would ever go into the crimson river at some point, and those who did all seemed to have abandoned that idea/was convinced it WOULDN'T happen.

and like, do you even know who i am? 🤨 i put a BODY OF WATER with PALE HANDS within the vicinity of regulus. of course he was going in that river. i have not written one fic where there's not some sort of scene of regulus drowning in it, because i am Evil.

also, that scene of regulus going into the river has been planned since the beginning. james being handcuffed—which is why the handcuffs were mentioned earlier in the chapters—to the poles as well. i specifically wrote poles into the arena just so regulus could handcuff james to one and go yeet himself dramatically into the river.

originally, the plan was for regulus to NOT come back out of the river. the first time i got this idea for this fic, it was going to be MCD, and regulus was going to die. i wrote the venom into the story AFTER i decided regulus wouldn't die. originally, james was just going to be handcuffed to that pole with nothing, stuck there, and he'd hear the cannon...

the only thing is, im weak and soft and have never written MCD before, so i decided to go a different route and delve into the whole Taking Down The Government thing, yada yada yada and so on. so now the fic has grown out of control and im in wayyyy too deep. im sorry? your welcome? whichever suits you, you decide!

also, the sirius scenes... short, but fucking devastating. we see a lot of sirius and remus over the next few chapters, i promise. i miss wolfstar a lot (actually that's kind of a lie because i just finished writing a scene about them, but you get my point) finally, dorcas!!! an icon!!!! a queen!!! she's so cool, im so sorry, im obsessed with her.

oh, i just KNOW some of you are pissed that slughorn got a POV 😭😭😭 listen, LISTEN, it was very necessary for the plot, okay? it was also to sort of show how hallows are in contrast to others like, for example, dorcas and pandora. say what you want about slughorn, love him or hate him, but that man is a slytherin in any universe and his self-preservation instincts are off the charts lmaoooo. he got a Gut Feeling and DIPPED. Seneca crane could never...

besides, dorcas has officially scared the hell out of him, and like, yeah it was disturbing from slughorn's POV, but honestly? from dorcas' POV, she's still a day or two out from vanity and hodge dying and seeing how much it upset marlene, and still feeling how much it upset her. i don't blame her, frankly.

also, the other woman. you know her, and some of you probably already know who she is, but still, feel free to drop theories if you like!!!

next chapter we get sirius reuniting with both regulus and james!!!!

this feels necessary:

tributes remaining: 0
victors: 2

as always, thank you all so much for the comments and feedback!!!

EDIT 09/14: i have just posted the fic where regulus does die, like a divergence fic, and you can read it from here to see what that MCD would have been like. it has no impact on crimson rivers overall, and it's entirely separate.

Arena Aftermath

Chapter Notes

hello, hello!

warnings for this chapter:

-heavy mentions of blood
-descriptions of vomiting blood
-brief mention of I.V./implied needle??? (like in a hospital, and only mentioned once, in passing)
-depictions of ptsd/ptsd-related responses (nightmares, lashing out, paranoia, things such as that)
-mentions of injuries/scars/surgery
-mild depictions aquaphobia (fear of water)
-a bit of medical mumbo-jumbo and likely very inaccurate to real life (again, im using the excuse that the Hallows have, like, crazy advancements in medicine. it's fanfic, okay? sue me)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Sirius launches out of his chair the moment the doors open, demanding, "Can I see them now? Are they—"

"Mr. Black," the nurse says, holding up their hand in a soothing gesture, "I just came to update you. Mr. Potter is still in surgery, but he's almost finished and he's expected to wake up tomorrow. He won't be recovered enough to be fully released for at least two more days."

"But he will recover?" Sirius insists, because he's been here for fucking hours and no one has given him any answers. It leaves him restless and ready to riot.

The nurse hesitates, then clears their throat. "Mr. Potter will recover fully from the stab wound to his abdomen, but his leg unfortunately has severe enough nerve damage that he will be required to use a cane if he's going to be standing for long periods of time or moving great distances, especially when it's cold or he's doing anything strenuous. Of course, he will learn over time when the cane is necessary, as well as his pain tolerance, but we do believe he will need it frequently over the next two months, which means he'll need it during the Victor interview, sadly. The Hallow will provide it, I assure you."

Sirius grinds his teeth, infuriated that this nurse thinks he gives one fuck about how James will look on that stage, over his health. As if how he's presented to the world matters more, when Sirius couldn't care less.

"And Regulus?" Sirius whispers, hands balling into fists.

"The nature in which he received his scars means they will never heal completely, unfortunately. We're treating them, so they will fade a bit, but—"

"Not—I don't mean the fucking scars. Is he okay?"

"He ingested quite a bit of blood from the river," the nurse informs him, which is when it hits Sirius that the river in the arena was actually made of blood—just now, he realizes this, and it makes him feel close to vomiting. "Due to this, he'll be vomiting quite a bit through the night and will likely suffer intense abdominal pain until tomorrow, at the very least. We're flushing his system with fluids and medicine to fight any bacteria or infection, which will help."

"Anything else?" Sirius demands.

"Due to the nature in which he received his injuries, the scars will always remain, but they should be faded before the interview, and easily covered by makeup," the nurse says, as if that's going to comfort him, as if Sirius even cares. Clearly seeing that this is not helpful, the nurse tries again. "He'll be released tomorrow, if all goes well, but we'll be holding Mr. Potter for an extra day to have a specialist come in and work with him on what he should expect with his leg."

Sirius exhales shakily. "Is—is my brother awake?"

"He is, yes," the nurse confirms gently.

"Can I see him?" Sirius chokes out.

The nurse's face softens. "Of course. Follow me, Mr. Black."

"Thank you," Sirius breathes, his shoulders slumping as he surges forward to follow the nurse through the doors.

"I don't want you to be alarmed," is the warning Sirius gets as they move through the clinically-white hall, taking a corner and stopping at a closed door. The nurse glances back at him, lips tipped down. "His scarring is…quite extensive."

Sirius just nods, his hands trembling as he tries to regulate his breathing, starkly aware that his baby brother is on the other side of the door. He's begging his memory not to fail him now, because he wants to be here for this. He needs to be here.

The door opens with a creak, and the nurse steps aside to allow him in, carefully shutting the door behind him as soon as he steps inside, leaving Sirius alone with—

Oh.

Sirius doesn't mean to, but he sucks in a sharp breath, his heart sinking right to his feet. Regulus is there, on the bed, looking so small, his head turned away. There's an I.V in his arm, a few other cords hooked up to him for his vitals and such, and he's in a gown, leaving his legs bare to his knees and his arms bare up to right above his elbows.

The nurse wasn't lying. Regulus has scars all over his arms and legs, dragging down in harsh, red arcs like there are still claws yanking at him. They're closed, but still healing, leaving them fresh and stark against his pale skin. Every group of scars comes in four or five, making it clear that hands did this to him, and they're not thin like the lines on Remus' back, nor do they layer and criss-cross over each other. Where the gown slips down over Regulus' shoulder, Sirius can see scars slashed over the hill of his collarbone and towards his back; it disappears beneath the cloth, but Sirius is quite sure that his back and chest are suffering the same fate.

At the sound of Sirius' inhale, Regulus' head rolls to the side, his eyes unsettlingly dull, and there—on the other side of his face, the left side, there are scars starting right at the bolt of his jaw and curving down the side of his neck. They're not as deep, not as stark, but the sight of them still makes Sirius' stomach lurch. Regulus was being ripped apart in that river.

Regulus clearly wasn't expecting it to be Sirius coming in, because the blank void of his eyes shift as soon as it seems to hit him that Sirius is there. It takes maybe all of five seconds for those eyes to fill with tears, and then Sirius is moving.

Regulus is already rising up from his bed by the time Sirius reaches him, and he should be gentle with him—he wants to be careful—but he just—he has to get his arms around him, he has to hold onto him and know that he's here, make sure that he's alive and here, where Sirius is. Regulus doesn't seem to care about being treated tenderly, because he practically molds himself into Sirius' arms with a horrible, choked sob.

Sirius shudders out a harsh breath and tips his face down into Regulus' hair, squeezing his eyes shut because they're stinging. He clings to his little brother for a long moment and just breathes, and it feels like he can breathe for the first time since Regulus walked away from him to enter the arena.

A bolt of energy bordering on desperation zings down Sirius' spine, and his hands fling up to frame Regulus' face and ears and hair as he snatches back and looks down at him, waiting for Regulus' watery eyes to meet his before speaking.

"Listen to me, okay, Regulus?" Sirius says firmly. "I love you. You're my brother; of course I love you. Always have, always will, and nothing—absolutely nothing in this world could ever change that, do you hear me? You're enough for me, and I love you. Never, never fucking doubt that."

Regulus stares up at him for a moment before promptly bursting into tears all over again, his whole body deflating like a popped balloon. He ducks his head forward and presses the top of it to Sirius' chest like he's five instead of twenty-five, hiding away from the world. Sirius loosens his arms a bit in case he's actually hurting him, but gently scrubs his hand back and forth over Regulus' head.

For a long time, neither of them move. Regulus eventually stops crying, his heaving shoulders just—drooping. Sirius feels like a weight has just lifted off his chest, which is ironic because the top of Regulus' head is still resting there, but that's neither here nor there. The important bit is, Sirius has told Regulus that he loves him, because he didn't get to before, and he's so grateful that he gets the chance to now.

Sirius doesn't need Regulus to say it back. He knows. Just from all that's happened between Regulus asking Remus to take care of him, and Regulus admitting to Evan that he missed him, and Regulus begging James to live for him—yeah, Sirius knows. Even now, just this, the way Regulus leans into him like Sirius is his port in a storm, a shelter to crawl into for safety when the winds grow too harsh; the way just hearing that Sirius loves him is enough to make him weep so deeply, so wholeheartedly, that the touch of grief is almost worth it.

Regulus doesn't say it back, but Sirius hears it anyway, hears it in all the ways it's said without words, and always has been for years, even wrapped in pain and anger. Sirius doesn't expect Regulus to say it back, because he's Regulus, and he always struggled to say such things, even long before all of this. Sirius has the same issue at times, likely from the way they grew up, but he's had something that Regulus purposefully distanced himself from—James Potter's influence. So, Sirius can say it, and Regulus doesn't have to. What matters is that Sirius hears the response loud and clear, echoing over the distance, after all this time they spent unable to meet halfway. He hears it.

He knows.

Regulus abruptly goes stiff against him, and to his credit, he does try to rock back in enough time, but he doesn't quite manage it before he's vomiting up copious and alarming amounts of blood right on Sirius' shirt. He curls over and nearly falls to the floor, his body heaving, and Sirius frantically dives for the pan on the stand by the bed, holding it under Regulus' head and making sure he doesn't fall.

It's violent. Regulus shakes and shudders through it, gasping and choking, and Sirius tries not to freak the fuck out, but watching someone you love throw up literal blood isn't really cohesive with serenity.

"Okay, okay, hey, just breathe," Sirius blurts out, pushing Regulus' hair back from his face as he shakes, only to quickly drop his hair again when he sees how bad Regulus looks. It leaves him red from strain, face swollen, blood dribbling from his mouth and tears streaming down his face.

Regulus' body seizes again, curling forward, and Sirius grimaces as he rubs between Regulus' shoulders. He doesn't know if that helps, but he keeps doing it anyway, just in case it does. There's another round of vomit that leaves Regulus groaning and clutching weakly at Sirius' arm where he's holding the pan for him. The smell of iron is thick in the air.

Finally, the brief moment of sickness seems to subside, at least for now, and Regulus pants as he rocks back, trembling all over. He looks like shit, quite frankly, not that Sirius would ever tell him this. It doesn't seem proper to mention it.

"Sorry," Regulus rasps, his voice hoarse and soft like it hurts to talk—which, after all that, it likely does. Regulus stares at Sirius' shirt, looking miserable. "I'm sorry. I—"

"What, this?" Sirius huffs out a forced laugh and very pointedly doesn't look down at where he's currently covered in hot, sticky blood that his brother just projectile-vomited on him. That's the stuff of nightmares, frankly, and so he would like to not see it, thank you. "Not my first time being covered in blood. It's fine. I didn't even like this shirt."

(Sirius really liked this shirt.)

Regulus continues to look miserable, and also like he's in pain, so Sirius swats away his ridiculous thoughts—realizing that he's absurdly nervous—and sits the pan aside to move over and grab a wet-wipe from the pack sitting on the stand, then takes the paper-cup on it and fills it up with water from the small basin in the corner.

"Here. Wipe your mouth and rinse it," Sirius murmurs, holding out the wipe first.

Regulus reaches out to grab it, then immediately drops it. His hands are shaking too hard, far too unsteady. He tries; it's very obvious how hard he's trying, but he can't manage to hold onto the wipe, so it repeatedly falls from his hand to land in his lap. He makes a noise of frustration, something quiet and fussy, like he's on the brink of a fucking breakdown.

"Fuck," Regulus croaks, sounding dangerously close to tears, and Sirius knows this. He knows how hard this is, how close to falling apart one feels when they make it out alive. You do make it out alive, but that doesn't make living easy.

"Okay, just." Sirius clears his throat and reaches out to snag the wipe, flicking Regulus on the end of his nose, upwards to get him to look up. The moment Regulus does, Sirius quite literally wipes his entire face with no finesse, as quickly as possible, because he knows Regulus is going to—

That. He's going to do that. Regulus sputters and flinches back in disbelief, looking downright appalled that Sirius is wiping his face like he's a fucking toddler. Regulus may not like it, but when needs must and all that. He'll just have to deal.

"Sirius," Regulus hisses, "I don't need you to—"

"Shut up," Sirius interrupts, holding out the cup as he balls the pink-tinged wipe in his hand. "Rinse and spit."

Regulus scowls at him. "Fuck off. I'm not an infant."

"Rinse and spit, Reggie, or I'll waterboard you under the tap," Sirius tells him, eyebrows raised.

"I hope I vomit on you again," Regulus grumbles, but he dutifully takes the cup in his shaking hand and manages to down it, gurgling before spitting it back in the cup. Like the wipe, it's tinged with pink.

Sirius tosses the wipe in the bin, then takes the cup and pan to the basin to clean them. As he does, he keeps talking to Regulus, speaking over the running water. "Wouldn't be the first time, and I'm not talking about this time either. I have a memory of you showing up at the foot of my bed—you had to have been either five or six—and you told me you weren't feeling well approximately three seconds before you vomited all over me and my bed, then started crying. Is that—did that actually happen, or is my brain making things up again?"

"No, that actually happened," Regulus confirms grudgingly, and Sirius can't help but smile a bit, because he didn't lie. The memory is fuzzy, but real, and it fills him with a fondness he's happy to let flood through him right now.

After shutting off the tap, Sirius carefully eases out of his coat, which thankfully is blood-free, and he peels his shirt off to ball up and toss in the bin as well. Following that, he cleans off the damp spot of blood that soaked through his shirt, then puts his coat on and zips it up. When he turns around, Regulus is still sitting on the side of bed, hands braced on the edge of it.

"Well, not much difference in all the years in between, I suppose," Sirius says softly, despite the fact that it's the boldest lie he's ever told. All the years in between have made all the difference in the world—and yet, here they are.

Regulus lowers his gaze. "I'd say vomiting blood is a key difference." His throat visibly bobs. "Did they tell you why? It's because I ingested so much blood in the arena."

"They told me," Sirius admits.

"I swallowed so much blood," Regulus whispers, his gaze distant, something chilling and tragic in the lines of his face. "The whole time, I was just swallowing blood."

"Regulus," Sirius calls quietly, cautiously, his chest feeling tight because it's quite obvious that Regulus is…not okay. Which, yeah, he wouldn't be, but this is—

"I couldn't breathe," Regulus rasps, lifting his gaze to look at Sirius as if he's not even seeing him. "I had to swallow it to breathe; that's all I was doing the entire time. I couldn't breathe, Sirius, and it's still—it's in me, it's still—"

"Okay, hey," Sirius blurts out, moving forward to crouch down in front of Regulus. "It's not—it won't always be—" He halts, swallowing harshly, feeling like a liar because it will. It doesn't matter if Regulus' body rejects every drop of blood he swallowed down, he'll never get rid of the taste. He'll never forget choking on it. Sirius wishes he could tell him that it will get better, get easier, but that's simply not true. And it's not fair that Sirius can't even comfort Regulus right now, not without lying. All he can say is, "You're getting it out, Reggie. Should be gone by morning, all of it, and—and you're breathing now, yeah? You can breathe now."

"They told me I'm a Victor, but I should be dead," Regulus announces with a startling steadiness to his tone, and Sirius flinches instinctively at the words. "I don't trust them. You have to—I need you to tell me if—"

"You got out," Sirius cuts in instantly, because he knows this, too. He knows the surreality of actually making it; he knows how hard it is to believe. "You're here."

"Okay," Regulus croaks, deflating a bit more, trusting him instantly, which makes Sirius feel like he could fucking cry. There's a pause, then Regulus glances down at his legs, specifically the scars on them. "I—I thought it made sense, because why would I have scars if I was dead?"

"Don't worry about them," Sirius tells him, shaking his head when Regulus glances up again. "Not now. Not today. You don't have to think about them right now, okay?"

"I've never seen your scars," Regulus says quietly. "I knew you had them, of course, but I've never…"

"Well, I don't make it a habit to get undressed in front of you, do I?" Sirius mutters, but he knows what Regulus means. It's just another way that Sirius never opened up and let Regulus in after his time in the arena. Sirius would have ripped his skin off before showing Regulus the scars he bore for him, scars he volunteered to have so that Regulus wouldn't. And now, Regulus bears scars of his own.

"Yes, well, if it was a competition, I feel compelled to point out that I'm winning by an unfortunately large margin," Regulus grumbles, cringing as he tips himself to the side, trying to get back onto the bed. The way his mood swings from concerning to seemingly stable reminds Sirius of himself.

"I know, which is terribly upsetting, frankly. There's nothing more distressing than knowing your little brother looks cooler than you," Sirius murmurs, moving over to help ease Regulus down, because he's clearly struggling.

Regulus seems too exhausted to really fight the assistance, and he slumps down with a weary sigh, curled up on his side. It takes him a second, and then his gaze slides up to lock on Sirius as he whispers, "James?"

Sirius wonders how long he was working up to that.

"He got out, too," Sirius says softly. "He's alive. They're working on him in surgery now for his leg. As nice as the medicine was, it couldn't fix everything, so he has nerve damage severe enough that he'll need a cane. But he's okay, Regulus. He should be awake tomorrow."

Regulus' eyes sink shut, his fingers curling into the sheet beneath him. He's like a marionette with all his strings cut at once, slumping into the bed as he releases a deep exhale.

"Okay," he says, not opening his eyes. Sirius moves across the room to grab the chair from the corner, bringing it to the side of the bed so he can sit down, and Regulus' eyes flutter open to look at him. "How? They—they changed the rule. They—"

"James," Sirius cuts in, a lump forming in his throat. The mere memory makes his skin crawl. "He—well, he essentially said either both of you were making it home, or neither of you were. He refused to leave that arena without you."

"But I—I handcuffed him to the pole," Regulus says, his voice ridiculously small and oddly betrayed. "He didn't—he couldn't have done anything, I made sure of it. He had no weapons, couldn't reach any, and he was bleeding out, for fuck's sake."

Sirius heaves a sigh. "The venom from the Horcrux Hornet that James kept after Vanity died —it was still in his pocket. He was going to drink it. He would have been dead before they could have reached him."

"Why would he do that?" Regulus chokes out, his chest heaving on a deep, shuddering breath.

"Because he loves you," Sirius says quietly.

Regulus seems to gag on a harsh inhale, then tips himself forward and proceeds to vomit up blood right into the pan that Sirius actually manages to shove under his face in time. It's as violent and awful as it was before, and again, Sirius rubs in between Regulus' shoulders carefully in what he hopes is a soothing gesture. Just like last time, Regulus shakes and sobs through it, and this time, he doesn't stop when it's over. He just continues to fall apart.

He doesn't even protest when Sirius cleans his face for him again, just lying there limply and crying silently, which is somehow worse than weeping where he can be heard. He rinses and spits again when Sirius urges him to, then stares up at the ceiling for a long time without saying a word.

When Regulus does speak again, his voice is hoarse and brittle as he says, "Will you stay with me?"

"I'm not going anywhere," Sirius replies firmly, reaching out to lay his hand on Regulus' arm, careful not to press too hard on his scars. Regulus looks over at him, his eyes bright with a sheen of tears he's clearly fighting valiantly not to let fall. Sirius nods at him reassuringly. "I promise."

That vow seems to be the final blow that takes all the fight out of Regulus, and the tears tip right over the edge. He closes his eyes and cries, and cries, and cries.

~•~

Remus feels strange without Sirius around. He's been gone all day, literally from the moment James and Regulus were announced Victors. It's getting close to evening now, and Remus will have to go to his cell soon. He has spent the entire day stress-cleaning quite literally everything.

He can't stop worrying about Regulus and James, as well as Sirius, and that leaves him restless. Everything had happened so quickly, a sequence of events that took place so rapidly that it was hard to follow. There was Sirius losing it because James was dying, then losing it because Regulus was, then left reeling for a long moment when they both survived. All of that had happened in less than ten minutes, and frankly, Remus was just as fucking stunned by the emotional upheaval it all caused as Sirius was. Then, less than five minutes after the Victor banners played on the screen, Sirius was picking himself up in a desperate scramble to go to the infirmary.

It's not that Remus isn't used to spending a good portion of his day without Sirius; it's just that Sirius is usually back by now, and Remus really just wants to know that everything is okay. He has this churning anxiety in the pit of his stomach, making it hard to focus, and he just—he wants to know something before he goes back to his cell tonight.

The sound of the door opening makes him look up, fully expecting Sirius, because the only people who can get into the suites are those who actually stay in the suites, but it turns out to be Pandora. She also technically stays in the suite, so he supposes he shouldn't be surprised, but he—well, alright, deep down he was hoping it was Sirius.

"Oh, darling, you look stressed," Pandora says gently, her face softening as she moves over and holds out her hand to him.

Remus takes it after only one beat of hesitation. He's still not very used to physical contact with anyone who isn't Sirius, but he's not opposed to it when it's Pandora. While watching the games together, they've instinctively reached out to each other in moments of distress, even embraced when celebrating. So, in a wild turn of events Remus didn't see coming, it's Pandora he's most comfortable with after Sirius, at this point.

"Have you seen them?" Remus asks, unable to keep the hope out of his voice, settling down when Pandora leads them over to their seats where they sit side-by-side.

"James won't wake until tomorrow," Pandora murmurs. "He needed surgery for his leg, so he's still recovering, and they won't allow visitors just yet. Regulus is awake—or he was—so Sirius is with him now. I didn't go in; Sirius wasn't sure if Regulus would want anyone to see him, and he was sleeping, so he couldn't say. But Sirius did come out to speak to me."

Remus instantly feels some tension drain out of his shoulders, blowing out a deep breath as he nods. "What did he say?"

"He's staying overnight with Regulus, and will likely spend most of the day between him and James tomorrow. Regulus will be released tomorrow, but James won't be released until the following day. Sirius won't be returning until he brings Regulus here, so he asked that I would come and let you know that they were both alive and recovering, and he was also doing alright, and that he'd see you tomorrow," Pandora explains.

"Okay," Remus breathes out, finally feeling better, also wildly grateful that Sirius—in the midst of everything—thought about him and his feelings enough to actually send someone to give him answers. Sirius is so fucking considerate.

"I have to bring him some clothes to change into. Apparently there was an incident that made him lose his shirt." Pandora shrugs when Remus blinks at her. "Don't ask. He wouldn't give me details. All he said was that you might like to choose for him, so if you want…"

"Oh," Remus mumbles, admittedly startled when she stands up and holds her hand out to him again. After a brief pause, he reaches out to take it, letting her pull him to his feet, dropping his hand as they start towards Sirius' room. "Was he alright? I mean, did he seem okay?"

"As okay as he could be, considering everything. I think getting to be with Regulus has helped him, and I'm sure seeing James tomorrow will as well," Pandora murmurs as they push inside, heading right for the closet. "Unfortunately, that's not the end of everything. There's still the final interview."

"Right," Remus says. "Do we have a schedule for that? I know it's different every year, depending on how much recovery time the Victors need, but did Sirius say…?"

"They haven't confirmed it yet, but the Hallow as a whole is very eager to see James and Regulus again, so I wouldn't be surprised if it's the day after they're released," Pandora replies as she sweeps into the closet.

Remus falters a moment in the doorway behind her, a lump forming in his throat that he feels incredibly guilty about. He knows that James and Regulus—and even Sirius—will feel more at peace at home, but he can't stop himself from thinking about what happens when they do leave.

Back to wearing his mask full-time. Days and days on end in his cell back in Azkaban, only granted time away when he's out on assignments, if he's assigned to any events or parties at all. No talking, no freedom, no Sirius.

Swallowing harshly, Remus pushes it from his mind, refusing to think about it. Not yet. Not now. He knows it's coming, but he's not ready, so he ignores it.

Taking a deep breath, he goes inside to pick Sirius' clothes.

~•~

Sirius doesn't get much sleep. This isn't very new, honestly, not since Regulus and James' names were called, but it's much worse this time. He stays up all night, repeatedly taking care of Regulus as he vomits up blood until he can't even speak, waking up from nightmares that have him lashing out.

It's a bad night. Regulus spends most of it vomiting, in pain, and delirious from all of that and nightmares. He asks for James no less than fifteen times, and he hits Sirius in the face completely by accident at least twice, just flailing and trying to get away while Sirius tries to calm him down. He's a sweaty, bloody mess, honestly. Sirius cleans his face when he's too tired, soothes him when he's too out of it to realize he's not still in the arena, and manages maybe two hours of sleep all together, in total. It's exhausting, but Sirius does it anyway.

By morning, Regulus is practically nonverbal, mostly communicating in one-word answers or just not acknowledging anything anyone says to him at all, not even Sirius. He doesn't cry anymore. He doesn't ask for James. He just lays there, staring off into the distance with dead eyes. It's deeply unsettling, as well as concerning, but it's not completely unexpected. Sirius had hoped this wouldn't happen, but it doesn't surprise him that it has.

After getting back, there is a grace period where everything that you went through doesn't fully hit you. Sirius knows this well. Your brain literally can't make sense of it all, especially when there's so much else going on—being in the infirmary, dealing with nurses and injuries and pain, realizing you actually survived. But then, eventually, it all catches up to you, bearing down on you like this weight you'll never be free from again—and you won't, not ever, because the only thing that happens is that you just learn to carry it. All of it settles in your mind, in your bones, in your nightmares; it consumes your every waking thought, until there's no escape.

Sirius can't erase what happened to Regulus, or James. He can't fix the suffering they endured, or the suffering they will continue to endure. He can only be here for them, and take care of them, and so that's what he intends to do.

While Regulus is blatantly doing worse mentally, and emotionally, he's doing much better physically by the time the sun rises the following day. The nurses repeatedly treated his scars throughout the night, and though they'll never fully fade, they have gotten better. They've shrunk, getting a bit thinner, and they're no longer an angry red, but a soft pink. Time is the only thing that can take them from that to opaque white lines.

The vomiting has also stopped, thankfully, and he seems to be in less pain. When he's cleared for a shower, he just—doesn't get out of bed. They tell him that he can, and he doesn't move.

"Regulus," Sirius says quietly, "come on, have a shower, yeah? It'll make you feel more human, I promise."

Regulus just looks at him blankly, as if he's not sure he'll feel even close to human ever again.

"This is going to be really embarrassing for both of us if I have to pick you up and carry you into the shower," Sirius warns, his voice strained. He so desperately hopes that Regulus' distaste for any form of vulnerability will cause a spark within him, but it doesn't. Regulus doesn't even twitch.

Sirius leans forward to reach for Regulus, genuinely planning to help him up if he has to, but Regulus catches his wrist and says, "No."

"You'll feel better," Sirius whispers, feeling helpless.

"The water," Regulus croaks, and there is something in his eyes now, something that breaks Sirius' fucking heart. Fear. "Don't make me get in the water."

"Okay, Reggie. That's okay," Sirius murmurs, his heart sinking as he settles back in his chair. He's stumped, honestly. He isn't sure what the fuck to do in this situation, because Regulus will have no choice but to come in contact with water at some point. He'll have to get clean before his interviews, for one thing. Maybe he just needs more time.

Regulus lets him go and returns to staring at the ceiling.

A few more hours pass from early morning to mid-morning, and then there's a knock on the door. Sirius gets up to see who it is, relieved when he finds Pandora on the other side.

"How is he?" Pandora asks.

"Been better," Sirius mumbles. "I don't—I'd say come in, but I don't think that's a good idea. At least not now. He's being released this afternoon, though."

Pandora nods. "That's fine. I just wanted to check. I think I'm going to stay with—stay in the suite." She gives him a significant look that he reads easily. They've been speaking entirely in code and unfinished sentences about Remus since the previous day. "Heard anything about James?"

"Nothing yet," Sirius says. "I'll update you when I get back. Is the…suite alright?"

"Yeah, but I think it's better if I'm there," Pandora replies, which basically translates to Remus won't be alone.

"You're a gem," Sirius informs her, and she cracks a weak smile. He reaches out to pull her into a hug, and for a long moment, they just hold onto each other.

"And you?" Pandora whispers as they break apart. She searches his face. "How are you?"

"I'll be alright," is all Sirius can bring himself to say, and she sighs as she squeezes his hand. He squeezes back.

Pandora doesn't stay for much longer, so Sirius goes back into the room with Regulus, who hasn't moved an inch. He's so still and quiet that Sirius has to repeatedly stare at his chest to make sure he's still breathing. He's doing just that when a nurse comes in to tell him that James is awake.

That gets a reaction out of Regulus. Not much of one, honestly, but he does turn his head to look at them. The nurse waits to show him to James' room, but Sirius…hesitates.

"I'm coming back," Sirius tells Regulus, needing to make sure that he knows that. "I have to come back anyway when you're released, alright? I can—I mean, maybe I can bring James over to visit you, so you two—"

"No," Regulus cuts in, and again, there's fear in his eyes. He seems to shrink into the bed.

Sirius frowns. "I'm sure they have a wheelchair I can bring him over in. Is that—" He glances at the nurse. "Can we do that? Can we make that happen?"

"Yes, it shouldn't be a problem," the nurse assures him.

"No!" Regulus bursts out, louder and more animated than he's been this entire time. It makes Sirius jump and stare at him with wide eyes, genuinely caught off-guard. Regulus has his sheets clenched in his hands, and he's as pale as a ghost, shaking his head fervently. "No, don't bring him here, Sirius. I don't want to see him."

"You were just asking for him last night," Sirius points out, so startled by this response, not sure what to make of it.

"I don't care. I don't want him here. I don't want to see him. Get out," Regulus chants, his voice a stilted rush of panic and anger all mixed together. Defensive and lashing out like he did when he was having nightmares. "Go. Just—just go to him, and leave me alone. Don't bring him here."

"Okay, hey, I won't," Sirius says quickly, raising his hands like he's soothing a wild animal, which agitates him as soon as he's done it, because he always hated it when people did it to him. He drops his hands and exhales slowly. "I won't bring him, Regulus, I promise. And I'll go, that's fine, but I'm coming back. Just…get some rest, yeah?"

As soon as Sirius makes it clear that he's going to comply with his wishes, Regulus relaxes again. Or, well, he sort of just deflates and goes limp, like someone abruptly unplugged him. He returns to that unnerving silence and stillness, turning his head once more to stare at nothing.

Sirius tells Regulus twice more that he's coming back, which gets no response, and then he lets the nurse lead him out the room. James isn't very far at all, only three doors down, which honestly soothes Sirius more than he could ever say. Well, it does until he hears muffled shouting from within James' room, and he's bursting in before the nurse can even open the door.

James is apparently giving the nurses trouble. There are three surrounding his bed, trying to hold him down, loudly pleading with him to calm down and take it easy, he's still healing, but he's just blatantly not listening to them. They must read as some sort of threat to him, or maybe he's just belligerent from confusion, because he's responding like they're trying to fucking kill him. He's shouting his head off, not making much sense, and despite his injuries, he's lashing out with all limbs and actually making progress, almost out of the bed entirely.

Despite the fact that Sirius knows they're just trying to keep James from hurting himself further, he reacts like they're a threat, too. Not even meaning to, he just responds, surging forward to yank the tallest man back, clearly the strongest. He has him flat on his back in seconds, boot pressed to his throat as he swivels his head to glare at the other nurses.

"Let him go, or I'll stomp this man's windpipe to dust. Back the fuck off," Sirius snaps, and the silence that rings after is somehow louder than the yelling from before.

The other nurses step away slowly, which may have something to do with the fact that James has sunk back into the bed, staring up at Sirius like he's some sort of divine entity he never thought would come to bless him. The man on the floor whimpers, and Sirius removes his foot carelessly, focusing on James entirely as he shifts closer to the bed.

"Sirius?" James whispers, sounding downright breathless.

"It's me. You're fine," Sirius whispers back, approaching the bed with none of the wariness the other nurses seem to have. They're all shuffling back, even the man from the floor, who has gotten up and swiftly gotten out of range. Carefully, Sirius perches on the edge of James' bed. "Relax, James. What's all the fuss about? Tell me, and I'll fix it."

"Regulus," James says instantly, and there's this razor-sharp edge to his voice that seems to put everyone else on pins and needles, but only makes Sirius' heart clench. "They won't let me see him. I don't—I need to see if—they said he was alright, but I—I just need to—"

"He's alive," Sirius assures him, because he gets it. James doesn't trust these people any more than Regulus does, any more than Sirius did when it was him coming out of the arena. "I promise he's alive. I was just with him."

James chokes out a harsh breath, finally slumping back against the bed like all the fight has gone out of him at once, only for it to flood right back in. He surges up and asks, "Can I see him? Just—just to—I just need to see that he's okay."

"He's resting," Sirius murmurs, taking a deep breath and slowly letting it out. Oh, this is hard. He'd love nothing more than to take James three rooms over and put him at ease, but that's not what Regulus wants. "You'll see him tomorrow when you're released, alright? For now, you're both healing. But trust me, he's alive."

"Tomorrow?" James says warily, like he's not sure if tomorrow even exists—and yeah, Sirius knows what that's like, too.

"I promise," Sirius tells him, reaching out to gently push James back down to the bed by his shoulder. "Just breathe. You're still on the mend."

"Yeah, ow," James mumbles, blinking rapidly as he slumps again, this time like he's exhausted. The adrenaline wearing off, no doubt, letting his pain catch up to him. He reaches up to fumble for Sirius' wrist, then seems startled when he actually wraps his fingers around it. He gives a gentle squeeze, staring and staring at where they overlap, and then he looks up at Sirius with wide, watery eyes. "Oh. I've missed you."

Sirius chokes out a laugh, fighting valiantly not to break down into tears, and James gives him a weak grin, even as the tears spill from his eyes. James shifts a little, tightening his grip on Sirius' wrist, then fully just yanks him down.

They sort of fall into each other, embracing and laughing through tears. Sirius can't decide if this is the best he's ever felt, or the worst. He thought—for a bit there, he really thought he'd never get this again. Never see his best friend again. Never hug him, speak to him, simply exist with him. The relief is overwhelming, and it still can't erase all the fear and pain that came from nearly losing James.

At some point, James is just weeping and clinging to him, and he's bigger than Sirius, though not by much, but he still feels so incredibly small and fragile at this moment. Delicate, almost. Sirius feels like he's cradling him, and nothing short of death could rip him away when James needs him. He'll hold onto him forever, if that's what it takes.

James quite literally buries his face into Sirius' hair and refuses to budge an inch, even when his sobs turn soft and quiet, then eventually stop. He's just breathing, as well as keeping Sirius awkwardly slumped over him on the bed, arms linked around his back like they're made of steel.

"Mr. Black," says one of the nurses, sounding wary, "we really do need to check Mr. Potter's wounds. Is—is that alright?"

"Why are they still here?" James mutters, sounding rather agitated, which Sirius understands. He would also like for other people to stop existing right now. Can't they see this is a very important moment between two best friends?

Sirius heaves a sigh. "They'll go away once they check you over. It'll be quick, and I'll be here the whole time."

"Fine," James grumbles, but he dutifully lets go, allowing Sirius to straighten up and shift to the side.

He watches with his arms crossed as the nurses come to examine James—excluding the one Sirius possibly unfairly assaulted, who apparently left the room at some point. They're still wary, and Sirius glaring at every move they make doesn't seem to help their nerves, but he can't bring himself to care. It clearly soothes James to know that he's there, being on guard, which works out because Sirius can't really help it anyway.

One nurse works on removing the wrap around James' stomach where he was stabbed because the medicine did the job of healing it as much as it ever will. All that's left is time, which will make it fade but never erase it entirely. Sirius doesn't know whether to be amazed or baffled by the fact that James was stabbed in the same exact spot as Sirius was when he was sixteen. They quite literally have matching scars now, even if they look different.

The scar on James' leg is also healed, but he has an additional one on the outside of his thigh, all the way down to his knee, from the surgery. The two points where the hook pierced him look like scars the size of coins, matching on each side, the skin knotted and raised. The only other scar James has is the faded lines from where the bear trap went into his leg, so faint and small that they're barely even noticeable.

"Hey, we match," James says softly, while poking idly around the scar on his stomach, grimacing every time he does it.

"Yeah, and take it from me, prodding it while it's still healing isn't the smartest idea," Sirius replies, reaching out to grab James' hand and tug it away. James keeps holding on, so Sirius doesn't let go.

"I didn't feel it when it went in," James tells him, his voice quiet and pensive. There's a far-away look in his eyes that makes Sirius' stomach twist. "Hard thing to miss, being stabbed, and yet I still…"

"I didn't really feel it either," Sirius offers. "It's the adrenaline, and with so much going on…"

James swallows, his gaze unfocused. "Yeah."

"Did they tell you about your leg?" Sirius asks, desperate to get that haunted look out of James' eyes, at this point.

"Hm?" James blinks and looks over at him.

"About needing a cane."

"Oh! Yeah, they—yeah. It's—I mean, it's fine. I suppose I'll get used to it."

Sirius feels his chest go tight at the resignation in James' voice. Just quiet acceptance in his tone, like he's not even allowing himself to be upset about it, about how unfair it is that he's suffering this at the result of something he should have never had to deal with, or go through. Nothing about this is fine, and just hearing James say it makes Sirius so angry that he has to take a steadying breath to remain calm. That's what James needs right now. A soothing presence.

They're both quiet as the nurses finish up, then quickly leave with instructions for James to remain in bed. As soon as they're gone, James tugs on Sirius' hand, urging him to climb in next to him without even saying a word. Sirius doesn't deny him, equally as desperate to be close as James is.

It takes a bit of maneuvering, but they eventually settle on the bed together. James can't really lay on his side, so Sirius does it for him, curled up against him as they just—breathe in perfect sync. In and out, together, as one.

"I'm so tired," James whispers.

"Me too," Sirius confesses.

"It's not over, is it?" James asks softly.

Sirius shifts back to look at James, who turns his head to stare at him with his eyebrows furrowed. "No, not yet. You won't be released until tomorrow, and then there will be the interview you and Regulus will have to do together. It's—it's hard, James, I know, but don't think about that right now, yeah?"

"I'd rather think about what's coming than think about what already happened," James croaks, blinking rapidly.

"Okay," Sirius says instantly. "Well, Regulus gets released today, so I'll have to take him back to the suite, but I'll come back and stay the night with you, then stay until you're released, too. I haven't gotten confirmation on when the interview will be taking place, but these things generally happen quickly while things are still fresh. After the interviews, we'll stay one last night, then leave the following morning."

"So…less than a week?" James checks.

Sirius hums. "Less than a week, probably, and then you're home, James. It's almost—" He halts, because he was about to say it's almost over, but they both know it's not that simple.

James is silent. He doesn't respond for a long time, just breathing. Sirius lays there and lets James fiddle with his fingers, a restless motion that speaks of anxiety. He doesn't know how to soothe it other than letting James play with his hand, pinching the knuckles gently and moving his fingers at will, with no resistance. Sirius wouldn't resist anyway; if he thought it would help, he'd cut his hand off and give it to James like a fucking stress-ball.

"Thank you," James croaks, suddenly.

"For what?" Sirius asks, a touch incredulous as he tips his head back to look at James, unable to fathom what he could possibly be thanking Sirius for when he didn't do anything.

James swallows. "For what you said, before I went into the arena. I—I needed to hear it. I thought about it a lot, and I think it was one of the only things that made everything seem more…bearable. So, thank you."

"Oh," Sirius whispers, dropping his gaze immediately as a lump forms in his throat, shame curdling in his gut. He doesn't know what he said. He can't remember. Something important to James, that helped him, and Sirius wasn't even fucking there for it.

"Sirius?" James mumbles.

Taking a deep breath, Sirius lifts his gaze and bites the bullet, giving James a bitter smile. "I, um. I don't—I can't remember what I said. I'm sorry, James. What did I say?"

"Ah," James says softly, his eyes sad. "You—you lost that, didn't you? Our last moments?"

"Yeah," Sirius admits.

"Oh, Sirius, I'm—I'm so sorry," James rasps, tangling their fingers together, squeezing them. Even now, even here, James is still trying to take care of everyone else.

"What did I say?" Sirius insists, because he's not standing for it. He remembers what James said in the arena, what he told Regulus about how he takes care of others to avoid the fact that he needs to be taken care of, too. Sirius isn't going to let that happen, not again, not when he's here to stop it.

"Well, you told me you loved me," James murmurs, and Sirius feels something in his chest shrivel up and crumble when he processes that, because he told James he loved him. He told James, even when he wasn't himself, but he couldn't figure out how to say it to Regulus, and it doesn't matter that he's said it now, because he didn't say it then, and Regulus almost died. He could be dead, never knowing, and Sirius—oh, he would have never forgiven himself. "I—well, you don't remember, but I said it back. But you also… You told me…"

"What?" Sirius demands, a little harsh because he's still upset with himself, unable to let it go.

James exhales shakily. "I forgive you. That's what you said. You forgave me for—leaving you."

Sirius' breath punches out of him, almost sounding like a laugh, because isn't that just… It's fucked. He looks at James and feels his insides knot up, a deep sweep of pain unfurling through him. He forgave James and didn't even know it.

"But you didn't, did you? That wasn't—" James cuts himself off, gazing at him, pained. That wasn't real. That wasn't true. That wasn't you. However that sentence ended, it works, and it's not fair. It's not fair that something that brought James such comfort, that helped get him through the arena, wasn't what he thought it was.

The worst part is, Sirius thinks he would have said it anyway, if he had been present for their last moments. To give James that comfort, to absolve him, he would have said it. He would have lied. Because it is a lie.

It's a complex thing, this weird jumble of resentment and relief. Sirius didn't forgive James for choosing to die, and he still doesn't, even knowing that, originally, it would have meant the loss of Regulus—another thing he couldn't handle, or forgive. There's no simple solution to this situation, there never was, and the only thing that fixed it was that he lost neither of them, which is exactly what happened.

That doesn't mean it just makes the feelings of anger and hurt go away. They're still there. Sirius thinks they'll always be there, existing in some liminal space where he can simply avoid it, because it didn't happen. He'll never forgive anything that could have ended with losing James or Regulus, even them, but he doesn't—he isn't angry with them for it, for the choices they made. He doesn't blame them.

Because, honestly, what's the point? They're here. They're alive, and here, with him. It didn't happen, and Sirius doesn't want to be upset with them about it. He knows better than anyone what being in that arena will push someone to do. It's a strange comfort, but Sirius reminds himself that they wouldn't have done that under any other circumstances.

It was never that they wanted to leave him. Sirius knows that. He knows that, in a perfect world, neither of them would have ever even considered dying. But this isn't a perfect world, far from it actually, and now Sirius has to live with the fact that he knows what it's like to lose them both. It was only moments, in reality, but he experienced those moments in visceral detail, enough to know he wouldn't have survived it.

"It doesn't matter," Sirius whispers, squeezing James' hand and taking a deep breath. "None of that matters now, James, because it didn't happen. You're here. You're both here."

"Your forgiveness was one of the things that kept me going, Sirius," James chokes out, his eyes brimming with tears, and it feels like Sirius' chest is caving in. To have that comfort ruthlessly taken from him, shattered before his very eyes by the source, by the one person who has never failed to comfort him before—it has to be crushing. Sirius feels like he's being crushed right along with it. "Do you forgive me now?"

James is looking at him like he's desperate, like Sirius' forgiveness is the only thing he needs, and without it he would simply give the fuck up, like the guilt would eat him alive. So, Sirius softens as much as he's able to, and he says, "Of course I do, James. There's nothing in this world you could ever do that I wouldn't forgive you for."

James releases a deep, gasping breath and starts crying again, and Sirius shifts up to hold onto him as much as he's able to, letting him sag against him and leech comfort from him as much as he needs to. Sirius finds himself grateful, despite everything, for lying to James then, just so he would be comforted in the arena.

Much the same, Sirius is grateful for the lie now, for the comfort it brings to James. Because still, even now, it is a lie. He can never fully forgive what would have resulted in having James taken from him, but he doesn't have to.

This is a lie he can live with.

~•~

Remus swings his head in perfect sync with Pandora when the door opens to the suite and Sirius comes shuffling in with Regulus right behind him, both of them looking exhausted.

Remus isn't sure why, exactly, but the mere sight of Regulus makes him feel a little faint, a bit spooked, like catching a glimpse of a ghost out of the corner of his eye. It's at this moment that he realizes some part of him was still stuck on seeing Regulus go into that river, not entirely sure he ever came back out until now, when he's in front of them.

He's clearly seen better days, that much is for sure. Regulus has a set of scars down the side of his throat, pink lines that disappear underneath the collar of his shirt, undeniably from where he was dragged beneath the water. If he has more, they're not visible, because he's in a long-sleeve shirt.

He looks very tense, clearly uncomfortable and uneasy, sort of hovering next to Sirius as he flicks his gaze around the room like he's waiting for something to jump out at him. He doesn't speak, or meet their eyes, or acknowledge them at all. Sirius murmurs something to him, and he nods stiffly before making his way swiftly through the room, heading down the hall to presumably go into his room, the door shutting quietly.

Sirius watches him go, blowing out a deep breath, then reaches up to run his hand wearily down his face. He looks dead on his feet, completely depleted of energy, and Remus' heart clenches violently in his chest.

"I can't stay long," Sirius mumbles as he moves over to them, his tired eyes tugging at Remus' heartstrings. "Just—can you keep a check on him through the night, Pandora? I don't think he wants to talk, really, but I'd appreciate it if you'd knock and stick your head in every once in a while."

"Yes, of course," Pandora replies immediately. "Is he hungry? We made sandwiches. I can bring him one."

"You can try," Sirius says softly.

Pandora immediately stands up like a woman on a mission, heading into the kitchen as Sirius steals her seat next to Remus. He deflates for a long moment, leaning his head back with his eyes shut. A minute later, Pandora sweeps right back out of the kitchen with a sandwich on a plate, going down the hall without a stutter in her stride.

"Hi," Remus whispers when Sirius opens his eyes and rolls his head to gaze at him.

"Hi," Sirius whispers back, his lips curling faintly only for a moment before flattening out again. He studies Remus' face for a minute, quiet, then, "Will you kiss me?"

Remus leans over to cradle Sirius' cheek, granting his request with a tenderness he didn't even know he was capable of. It's a soft kiss, and Sirius sighs into it like he's coming home. Even though it's not deep, or teeming with passion, Remus feels it hook in his chest and tug at him until he's glowing from the inside out. It ends naturally, gently, their foreheads pressed together as they sit there in silence and breathe.

"I have to go," Sirius tells him. "I'm staying the night with James, but I'll—I'll check in on Regulus in the morning, so I'll see you then. I'm sorry, Remus, I just—"

"Don't apologize," Remus cuts in gently. "It's okay, Sirius. Regulus is going to be okay here with Pandora, and I'll check on him as well before I have to leave for the night. You stay with James. It's okay. Everything is going to be okay."

"It doesn't feel like it," Sirius admits.

Remus tilts his head up to press a kiss to Sirius' forehead, then leans back to hold his gaze. "One day at a time, remember?"

"One day at a time," Sirius repeats, blinking slowly, sluggishly, like he's too tired to hold his eyelids open for long. And yet he still does. He still fights to.

"Don't forget to take care of yourself in all of this, especially if I can't be there to help," Remus says. "Try to get some rest, at the very least. Eat a sandwich before you go."

"Okay," Sirius replies. "As for Regulus, I'm worried about him, Remus. He's not—well, obviously he's not doing well, and I don't expect him to, but I'm still—I'm really—"

"Worried?" Remus fills in, when Sirius can't seem to finish.

Sirius swallows. "Yeah. Really worried."

"He's alive," Remus reminds him, because saying that has always comforted Sirius. "I know you're going to worry, Sirius, but you're doing everything you can. You're taking care of them, and that means something, remember?"

"Thank you," Sirius breathes out, his eyes fluttering shut. When they open back up, he reaches out to gently push Remus' hair to the side, just a bit, grazing his fingers over his forehead. "And you? Are you okay, Remus?"

"I'm okay," Remus murmurs. "For now, I'm okay."

"Do you need anything?" Sirius asks.

Remus quirks a tiny smile. "Another kiss, if you're willing."

"For you, I'm forever willing," Sirius says softly, a light teasing undertone to his words, counteracted by the heavy truth in them. He means that. Of course he does.

Sirius rocks forward across the small space between them and kisses him again, slow and tender and warm. It's precious, and Remus treasures it, cherishing each moment between them, only more beloved because it's finite. Sirius speaks of forever between them like it's an option, and Remus can taste it from his mouth, but forever isn't a hope that they'll ever get to have.

"You're so precious to me, did you know that?" Remus whispers when they break apart.

A slightly high-pitched giggle tumbles out of Sirius' mouth, bordering on delirium—likely from the lack of proper rest he's gone without—and, despite everything, he blushes that lovely blush of his as he gazes at Remus with fucking stars in his eyes. His giggle rapidly turns into a mildly hysterical bark of laughter as he chokes out, "Oh, fuck, that was embarrassing."

"Humiliating, really," Remus teases, smiling helplessly. Sirius settles down with a gusty exhale, just gazing at him with undeniable affection, even while he still looks so tired. Oh, but Remus loves this man. He really—

Oh.

Oh, Remus thinks, his heart doing this bittersweet sort of clench-and-release in his chest as he realizes that it's true. Not just in abstract. Not just them heading towards something they can never really have. Not just falling in love—but landing. Remus loves Sirius. He loves him. It's already there; it's already happened. It's love. He's in love.

Remus swallows harshly and blinks rapidly to fight the stinging in his eyes, and Sirius' eyebrows furrow with obvious concern, clearly about to ask what's wrong. But that's the thing, this is so right, they're so right, and there's nothing wrong with being in love with Sirius at all. It's everything else that's wrong, all those things they can't do anything about, and that's what hurts. He saw this coming, and he's still not prepared for how much it impacts him.

Before Sirius can even speak, Remus folds forward to kiss him one more time, just as slow and gentle and loving as each time before. Sirius melts into it, as he always does, and Remus lets this—all of it with Sirius—curl up safe and warm next to his heart, where he will guard it and keep it, because it's all he gets to have, which is better than having nothing at all.

They break apart at the sound of steps approaching, and Pandora returns with an empty plate and a triumphant gleam in her eye. She says, "He's eating."

Hope blooms in Sirius' eyes once more.

Remus cherishes that, too.

Chapter End Notes

well. james and regulus are officially out of this arena! and they are not having a good time 😃 let's get into it, ig.

first, the sirius and regulus reunion. oh, you don't even KNOW. it's probably obvious by now, but i have family trauma, so NOTHING fucks me up like the dynamic between regulus and sirius. genuinely, there is no angst in canon, or fanon, or outside of either that rips my soul to shreds like regulus and sirius do. keep in mind, the LAST thing that sirius said to regulus—that wasn't just notes on a card in the arena—was literally "i promise you won't" after regulus told him he didn't want to die. it's been EIGHT DAYS since that (but 16 chapters). like, the last thing sirius said to regulus was a promise that he wouldn't die, and then regulus didn't, and the first thing he says when regulus makes it back is that he loves him. nah, i was WRECKED.

just, like, at the end of the day, no matter what else, when it comes down to it—they love each other. they're BROTHERS. im gonna die.

regulus is Struggling, which is fair. everything in the arena + going into that river really fucked him up, and yes, im evil, because in chapter 24, regulus said he couldn't wait to have a hot shower, and now... yeah, it's something he deals with throughout the fic, among other things.

also, not wanting to see james... there is a reason for that—not that he needs a reason after all that he's been through, honestly—but there is one, and we find out later.

on the topic of james, he's Not Doing Too Hot either, which is also fair. yes, throughout the fic, james will have a cane off-and-on as needed. i didn't go a Full Peeta (which, if you've read the books, you know what im talking about).

the sirius and james reunion... no, because they're BEST FRIENDS 😭😭😭 im gonna fucking cry just thinking about how much they love each order. they love each other soooooo much. like, sirius was about to Kill A Man for james—and he would have, no hesitation. don't sleep on sirius, he's fucking DANGEROUS. you think regulus is unhinged? sirius is so, so much worse 😳 but also, heartbreaking that sirius—even in the midst of dissociative amnesia—told james he loved him when he couldn't say it to regulus. that shit is so devastating to me GOODBYE. also, the fact that the last thing sirius said to james before he went into the arena was "i forgive you"??? 😭 HE FORGAVE JAMES FOR LEAVING HIM AND IT WAS A LIEEEEEE. why did i do that? who let me do that? why have none of you hunted me down and burned me at the stake yet?

and finally, remus!!! a king!!! an icon, as always!!! head over heels IN LOVE with sirius, and valid for it!!! his "oh" moment 😭😭😭 no im in love with him. and him being sad/upset about how little time he and sirius have left together... THEY DESERVE THE WORLD. (i do indeed have the power to give them that, and might just, at some point...eventually...)

honorable mention to pandora!!! she's always a woman on a mission, putting in the effort, helping as much as she can!!! she got regulus to eat!!! (okay she literally just went in and chattered at him until he agreed to eat so she would go away, but you know what? she still DID THAT!!!).

i feel weird at the end of these notes for not having to do numbers anymore (for the arena, i mean). like, i dunno, i feel like im Missing Something.

oh!!! oh, yeah, i wanted to say that i do realize that The Medical Stuff isn't realistic to real life (there's no way people just heal That Fast), but 1) ive established that the Hallow has advancements in healing/medicine and have no shame in using the excuse that im paralleling it to the magical world in canon, and 2) its fic and what i say goes, and ive decided that This Is Just How It Is. so, any nurses/doctors/medical field workers out there, i apologize to you and you only bc im sure you were Cringing at some medical parts, which is so valid, but please let me have this, okay? thanks. love you. appreciate you!!!

okay, no, i still feel like im missing something without the numbers, but alas, im sure ill get used to it.

Responsibilities

Chapter Notes

hello, hello!

warnings for this chapter:

-ptsd/ptsd-responses (defensive, lashing out, paranoia, things such as that)
-depictions of aquaphobia (fear of water)
-refernces to child abuse (because of walburga and orion's a+ parenting)
-brief hints to a minor panic attack (VERY brief and mostly implied, you might not even notice it)
-vague hints to addiction/references to past addiction (also very vague and implied, you might miss this too, and it's about drinking and nothing else)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Remus glances up when Sirius steps into the kitchen, his expression pinched like he's trying very hard not to let it show on his face what he's feeling.

"I'm assuming it didn't go well?" Remus asks carefully, wrapping the sandwich he just finished grilling for Sirius and passing it to him.

"He punched me. Again," Sirius mutters. "He was still sleeping, so he just—reacted. I should have woken him up before touching him."

Remus sighs. "You were just eager to check on him, don't beat yourself up about it."

"Don't have to, do I? He did it for me," Sirius grumbles.

"Oh, stop it." Remus snorts and shakes his head. "I don't see a bruise. Are you hurt?"

Sirius' lips twitch. "No, I'm fine. I blocked it, mostly. In any case, he didn't even realize it happened. Wasn't happy with me when he fully woke up, anyway. Or, well, I don't think he was."

"Still not talking?"

"Not a word. I think he's just doing things to get people to go away, really, so at least that's one way to get him to eat. He doesn't want to come out for breakfast, so would you…?"

"Yeah, I'll bring it to him," Remus assures him.

"Thank you. You're the best." Sirius leans in and pecks him on the mouth, smiling distractedly as he pulls away.

"Anything else I can do?" Remus asks.

"Unless you can coax him into a shower…" Sirius' smile falls, and he starts chewing on his lip, his habitual concern taking over once more. "He's—well, he's afraid of water, I think. Can't say I blame him, but he's going to have to take a shower at some point. They'll make him before his interviews, and if he refuses, it won't be pretty. I just—I don't know how to…"

"I'll see what I can do," Remus murmurs, his heart sinking in his chest. "Have you seen Pandora?"

"James said he didn't mind seeing her, so she's already gone off to visit him." Sirius glances up at the clock on the wall with a small frown. "I really should be going. They're giving James his cane soon, and I have a meeting before he's released."

Remus blinks. "With who?"

"People who are going to tell me when the interview is," Sirius says. "I'll update you when I get back, yeah?"

"Alright," Remus replies.

Sirius nods quickly, clearly still distracted, and he once again leans in to give Remus a quick kiss, this time on the cheek in parting. Remus has his hands full with finishing breakfast, so he can only lean into the contact, and then he watches Sirius leave with a quiet sigh. Life is rarely kind, and he finds it particularly cruel for not giving them enough time together.

It's quiet in the suite once more when Sirius is gone, as well as Pandora. Remus finds the silence foreboding somehow, like an omen of what's to come when they're all gone for real.

Breakfast isn't too heavy, just something light that Regulus can keep down. It takes a bit for Remus to actually work up the courage to go and knock, because there's something deeply unsettling about the dead look in Regulus' eyes every time Remus sees them. He's not entirely sure how to appropriately treat him. Gently, with care? Or as if nothing has happened?

There's no answer when Remus knocks, but there never is, not for anyone. It's just a warning so he doesn't react explosively at someone intruding on his space. Carefully, Remus nudges the door open and peeks in. As expected, the room is empty.

Regulus has taken to sitting out on the balcony. Remus isn't entirely sure why, but he seems to prefer it out there than anywhere else. Remus would think that the sounds of the city would be overwhelming, after everything, but something about the location seems to bring Regulus comfort anyway.

Again, Remus knocks before he slips out on the balcony, unwilling to be punched on his way through the door. It's immediately clear that Regulus is tense, but he always seems to be, so Remus doubts it's just because of his presence.

"I made breakfast," Remus explains as he sits the plate down, then hesitates only for a moment before sitting in the chair on the opposite side of the table. Regulus doesn't respond or look at him. "You don't have to finish it."

Again, nothing.

Remus doesn't know what to say, or do, so he releases a muted sigh and mumbles for Regulus to let him know if he needs anything, then he leaves. He goes back out and cleans up from breakfast, just to give himself something to do.

He then tasks himself with gathering clothes and washing them, just to pass the time.

After that, he goes back to collect Regulus' plate, only to find it sitting outside the door, empty. Well, at least he ate. Remus considers that a win and takes the plate to wash that, too.

Remus dusts.

Remus wipes counters.

Remus sweeps the floor.

Remus folds clothes and puts them back where they belong.

Remus spends hours just trying to figure out how he can help Sirius help Regulus, simply because he wants to, because he wants to help in any way he can, if he can at all. Nothing comes to mind, and maybe that means the proper thing to do would be to leave it alone and he should just stay out of it, but when has Remus ever been any good at being proper and doing what he should? Never, that's when.

So, Remus gathers his resolve and once again knocks on Regulus' door, then knocks on the balcony door when Regulus is predictably still out there. He doesn't look to have moved an inch, still tucked up in his chair like he's trying to disappear into himself, staring blankly out at nothing.

Remus thinks that, if it was him, he would appreciate honesty, so that's what he leads with. There's no easy way to deliver the truth when it's something you don't want to hear, so he just dives right into it with, "They're going to make you shower."

Regulus goes stiff all over, jaw clenching so hard that the muscle at the bolt of his jaw twitches. For the first time, he turns to look at Remus, really look at him, and the expression on his face clearly states that he's willing to fucking kill someone if they dare to try. It's chilling.

"I understand why you don't want to," Remus continues, because he does, "but not everyone is going to care about that. The Hallows…" Remus swallows. "Well, whatever serves them is what they'll do. Do you understand what I'm saying, Regulus? They will force you, if they have to."

The murderous intent in Regulus' eyes shifts into something else, something that makes him look small where he's curled up into the chair, rather than a predator coiled up like he's about to attack. It's blatant fear.

"It's wrong," Remus says firmly. "It's not fair, and I'm sorry, and if there was any way around it, Sirius would find it. For you, he would find it, but—there isn't a way, so I think you should be free to do it yourself."

"I can't," Regulus rasps, squeezing his eyes shut.

Remus takes a deep breath, sitting on that for a second. He thinks about what makes Regulus afraid of water. There are too many reasons behind it, too many possibilities, so a solution isn't simple to come up with. He doesn't know the exact source, so the only thing he can do is ask.

"Is it the water itself?" Remus murmurs, watching Regulus' eyes flutter open. He looks haunted. "Too much water? Running water?"

"I—" Regulus seems to struggle, his face twisting, and then he shakes his head. "It's cold. It's—it's so cold, all the way to the bone, and it gets in my mouth, weighs me down, but it's blood, and—and the hands—"

"Okay," Remus cuts in quickly, his stomach falling out from under him when he gets it, fully and completely, because Regulus is talking like it's still happening to him, even now. Like any contact of water on his skin just takes him right back there. "So, alright, what if—what if the water was warm? What if there wasn't very much of it? You have a tub, Regulus."

"I don't know. I don't know. I don't—" Regulus gives up and presses his face to his knees, breathing in and out.

"Alright," Remus says quietly. "Just—just give me a second, alright? I'll be right back."

Again, Regulus doesn't acknowledge him. Remus gets up and leaves to go into the kitchen, grabbing a cup, and then he heads back into Regulus' room—still knocking, just in case. Regulus is still out on the balcony, so Remus shuts himself in the bathroom, closing the door to muffle the sound of running water. The shower comes with a tub built in, likely between eighteen and twenty inches deep, but Remus only fills it about a quarter of the way. Only enough for him to press his palm flat against the bottom and reach just a bit above his wrist.

The water is hot, no chance of it being cold, but not too hot that you can't touch it. On the cusp, maybe, but Remus thinks the stark difference might help, rather than be an issue. He pours some of the body wash in the water and swirls it around, just to fill the bathroom with a nice aroma, nothing that will remind Regulus of blood. On the side of the tub, he lines up the body wash, shampoo, and conditioner with the cup, then picks himself up and heads back outside.

Regulus is pale and shaky when Remus knocks and slips back out on the balcony. He's clearly worked up, struggling with even the thought of this.

"Obviously you don't have to," Remus starts, "but I think, if it was me, I'd like to do it on my own terms. The water is hot, and clear, and there's not very much of it."

"I don't know if I can," Regulus snaps, the words coming out sharp like a whip-crack, full of frustration and anger and fear.

"Do you want to try?" Remus asks calmly.

Regulus is silent, just breathing. He flexes his fingers on the side of his legs, his body held tense like he's about to snap. It takes a while—and Remus waits patiently—but he does eventually unfurl from his chair, standing stiffly.

"I can go," Remus offers. "Or I can stay. I can sit outside the bathroom, or inside it. I can talk, or I can be quiet. Just tell me what you want me to do, and I'll do it."

"Didn't Sirius tell you that you're not our fucking servant?" Regulus spits out, visibly on edge.

"I'm a servant to the Hallow," Remus says. "This—what I'm doing now—I'd like to think it's just helping a friend."

"We're not friends," Regulus informs him, though there's less bite to his tone now. Remus is quite sure the back-and-forth is calming him down, taking his mind off the water.

"You don't have to be my friend for me to be yours," is all Remus says. "Let me help you."

Regulus works his jaw, hands clenched into fists, but he does follow Remus from the balcony. Remus opens the bathroom door and lets Regulus in, standing in the doorway and watching as Regulus observes the water like it's actually a tub full of flames. He just stares at it, frozen in place.

Remus brushes past him, careful not to touch, and he bends over to put his hand in the water. He swishes it around for a moment, then lifts it out and flicks his fingers.

"Here," Remus mumbles, holding out his hand towards Regulus, watching him with clear eyes.

"Sirius is going to get jealous," Regulus says absently, but he nonetheless reaches out to grab Remus' hand. Coming into contact with water like this doesn't seem to bother him, really. Remus thinks it's just…bodies of water. Rushing water. Too much water. Anything to remind him of the river.

"That's alright. He's cute when he's jealous," Remus replies lightly, huffing out a laugh when Regulus reflexively wrinkles his nose a bit. It reminds him of every time Sirius did basically the same thing when James would flirt with Regulus in the arena. He made that same exact face. It's oddly adorable on both of them, honestly. "Now, do you want me to stay, or go?"

Regulus drops his hand with a sigh. "Well, I don't want you to see me naked, for fuck's sake, but…"

"I can close my eyes," Remus tells him.

"I'm supposed to trust that?"

"You can trust that the only person I have an interest in seeing naked is your brother."

"I liked it better when you seemed afraid of me," Regulus mutters, which…okay, that's fair. Remus was a bit afraid of him; not because of what he might do, or how he might lash out, but because Remus wasn't sure how to interact with him and didn't want to get it wrong. "Just…sit outside the door."

"I can do that," Remus says, and then does just that. He steps back out the bathroom and sinks down the length of the wall beside the door, staring at the bed in front of him.

Neither of them speak, but Remus can hear Regulus slowly getting undressed, the shush of clothes sliding against skin and hitting the floor. The sounds eventually come to a stop, but there's nothing else. No tiny splash of water indicating that Regulus has stepped in, or even dipped his fingers in. All Remus can hear is Regulus' shaky breathing.

So, Remus starts talking. At first, it's tentative, not entirely sure if that's what Regulus wants, or needs. When Regulus doesn't tell him to shut the fuck up, Remus settles into it more, choosing one of the stupid, meaningless stories about the drama between Hallows that he's overheard in the last five years, because he has a whole vault of those. After at least ten minutes, there's the sound of a faint splash, something small, definitely not an entire body going into the tub, but it's progress, so Remus assumes he's doing something right.

Remus keeps talking, and talking, and talking—and, eventually he hears the squeak of limbs against the tub, the splash of water that indicates Regulus has gotten in. It's very quiet otherwise, which honestly worries Remus, but he keeps talking anyway. There's the distinct sounds of someone in the bath, cascading water and the pops of caps on the bottles, which Remus thinks is a good sign, at least.

"Welda was upset because Kinsom kissed her wife, but Kinsom told her that it wasn't his fault, because he was just drunk, which is a load of tosh, obviously. I mean, it's double the damage, really, because she lost her wife and her friend, and I found out last year that they got married and Welda tried to burn their house down, and honestly? Can't blame her for that one," Remus rambles, shaking his head as he recalls all of that drama that swept through the Hallow. There's a quiet, choked noise from within the bathroom that steals his attention. At first, he thinks it's a laugh—which would be fair, because the gossip is absurd, honestly—but he realizes that it's actually a faint sob. "Regulus?"

"F-Fine," Regulus calls back, and it's immediately clear that he's crying, which makes Remus sit forward warily, fighting the urge to swing his head around the doorway to check on Regulus. "Just—just keep talking, please."

Swallowing harshly, Remus squeezes his eyes shut as sorrow crests within him, but he exhales and keeps talking. "Welda ended up getting remarried, though, and her ex-wife cheated on Kinsom with his mother, which is just karma, really…"

Heart heavy, Remus continues to talk, and inside the bathroom, Regulus continues to weep.

~•~

"How did your meeting go?" Pandora asks.

Sirius heaves a sigh and tears his gaze away from where James is slowly making his way across the room with his cane, his eyebrows furrowed with concentration. "It went."

"Bad news?" Pandora murmurs.

"I'm not happy about it," Sirius admits, lips pressing into a thin line. "I hoped they'd at least have a day where they could…acclimate, a bit, but that's not going to happen. The interviews are taking place tomorrow afternoon, and then we'll stay that final night and leave the following morning. I thought that would be the case, but I really did hope they'd at least have an extra day to get ready."

"They'll be ready, Sirius," Pandora says softly. "We'll make sure they are."

"I don't want to do this to them," Sirius croaks, glancing over at her. "What we have to do, what we have to prepare them to do… Pandora, I don't want to."

Pandora grimaces slightly. "I know, but it's—" She looks around, then leans in and lowers her voice. "You know it's necessary. What James did…"

"I know," Sirius cuts in, swallowing. "How well I know."

"He doesn't know," Pandora whispers, turning her gaze to where James is steadily making his way back across the room, leaning on his cane for support.

"No, he doesn't," Sirius agrees, a tight clench of fear squeezing down at the base of his spine. "It—yes, it was defiance, but he didn't do it to be defiant. He did it…"

"For love," Pandora fills in.

Sirius sighs again, voice grim as he mutters, "Yeah."

"Well, at least he won't have to lie," Pandora murmurs, then clears her throat and straightens up. "If you want, I'll go ahead and check on Regulus while you walk James back."

"Thank you," Sirius tells her, then catches her arm as she goes to turn, reaching down to grab her hand and bring it up to his mouth to press a kiss to the back of her fingers. He meets her eyes and smiles. "Really, Pandora, thank you."

Pandora smiles back gently, squeezes his hand, then leaves him alone with James. Sirius watches him take another circuit of the room, then moves over.

"I'm a bit slow," James mumbles sheepishly as he lifts his head and looks at Sirius, a slight strain around his eyes. The cane might be helpful, but it can't erase all the pain entirely, especially so fresh after the injury itself.

"That's alright. We'll go at your pace," Sirius assures him.

James hesitates. "I'm free to go, then?"

"Indeed you are. Come on, I'm breaking you out of here," Sirius says grandly, offering James his elbow with a wink.

"Back to the suite?" James asks with a weak huff of laughter, reaching over to curl his fingers in the bend of Sirius' arm, his other hand gripping the cane as they head towards the door.

"Mhm."

"Where Regulus is?"

Sirius struggles not to roll his eyes and repeats, "Mhm."

"What?" James mutters. "Why the face?"

"There was no face."

"There was a face. You made a face, Sirius."

"I didn't make a face."

"I saw it. You did make a face when I mentioned Regulus."

"I really didn't," Sirius protests.

James pinches his arm lightly and insists, "Yes, you did. Come on, why the face? Do you—are you upset? You don't like it, do you? How I feel about him, I mean. You don't approve?"

"James, I don't think we should talk about this right now, alright?" Sirius says quietly, staring straight ahead as they make their way through the hall.

"Well, we didn't really talk about it before," James replies with a heavy sigh. "I know why we didn't, because we both thought there wouldn't be a point, but now I think we…have to."

Sirius squints slightly and runs his tongue over his teeth, fighting his agitation as much as he can. "We really don't."

"You're upset," James states glumly.

"Obviously I'm—" Sirius takes a deep breath and works to keep the bite out of his tone. He glances over at James, who is watching him cautiously, which takes all the wind out of his sails at once. He sighs. "It's complicated."

James snorts weakly. "You're telling me. Trust me, I know."

"You never fucking said anything," Sirius whispers a little heatedly. "Ten years, and you never said a word, James."

"What was I supposed to say?" James asks quietly. "Hey, Sirius, by the way, I'm head over heels for your brother, who hates my fucking guts and has issues with you, but don't worry about it, because nothing will ever come of it, seeing as he would be more likely to spit in my face than ever give me a chance anyway. I mean, no offense, but what would be the point of saying anything? It would only cause problems."

"The point is, I'm your best friend, and it's something that you were dealing with," Sirius hisses. "You were struggling with it; you were hurt because of it. You just carried that on your own, kept it close to your chest, and I—I never even got the chance to help you with that. You didn't even give me the choice to care, but I would have, James. I would have chosen to care."

"I just… I didn't want to make things harder for you," James croaks, his head ducked down. "You and Regulus were already so… You know how it was, and I didn't want to put you in a difficult position and add to the burden."

Sirius exhales slowly and lifts his free hand to cover James' fingers where they're tucked in his elbow. "You're not a burden. You're never a burden. Not your pain, or your problems, or anything."

"But he's your brother," James tells him, biting his lip.

"Yes, I'm aware," Sirius mutters dryly, and James ducks his head again, this time because he's flustered. "I get that it's complicated. It was then, and it still is, but I'm your best friend. You can trust me with anything, James, even…that."

James lifts his head and frowns. "You don't like it, though."

"Not because of the reasons you might think," Sirius murmurs with true regret. "It's not that it's my best friend and brother. It's not because I'm ragingly jealous in both directions, even though I am, so beware of that. What it really is…" He swallows and meets James' gaze. "It's the circumstances in which it came about. I—you know, I don't really care, because after everything, I would hope that both of you get to have even a slice of happiness. I mean that, alright? The problem is that neither of you had any agency in it. If it had happened last year, before all of this, maybe I wouldn't feel so upset about it, but it didn't. It was about survival, and that's not fair to either of you. Both of you deserved so much better than this."

"Maybe," James says, his voice sounding heartbreakingly hollow, "but regardless of the reasons, what I feel for him is real. It's real, Sirius."

"I know," Sirius replies.

James is silent for a long time, leaning into Sirius harder the further they go, and he doesn't speak again until they're in the lift. "He said… Before he—I mean, I'm not—I don't expect anything, you know that, but he—"

"James," Sirius says very carefully.

"He chose me," James rasps, looking at Sirius with wide eyes, big and brown and swirling with emotion. "He didn't say he loved me, but he said something like it, I think, and I… Sirius, I still don't know what any of it means. Somehow, I'm still fucking confused, and I'm —I'm so angry at him. I begged him not to do it, and he still… Why would he do that?"

Because he loves you, Sirius thinks, but he forces himself not to say it, because that's not fair. It's one thing to say it to Regulus about James, who made it very obvious, who stated it right to his face multiple times. It's something else to say it to James for Regulus, who didn't say it, who showed it with actions, but it's not that simple with him. Love is very different for Regulus than it is for James, and that's something they have to figure out together, if they want to, if they even can. The thing is, Sirius doesn't know if Regulus is going to be willing to.

Sirius can't tell James that Regulus loves him, even though Regulus does love James—and Sirius knows that for a fact now. The problem is, love doesn't solve everything. Love isn't going to fix what's wrong with the world. Love won't stop Regulus' nightmares, or heal James' pain. Love can't change their past, and it refuses to solidify their future. Love only makes this harder. It's something they'll have to choose to work on together, and Sirius can't promise that they will; Sirius can't give James that hope when he doesn't know if they can.

So, all Sirius can think to say is, "I don't know."

"I just…" James blows out a deep breath and shakes his head as they unload from the lift. "Maybe it doesn't even matter right now, because everything is… It's all too much. I can barely deal with everything, so I know he won't be ready to, at least not now. But I just—I want to see him. That's all. It would be enough just to see him and know he's…here, you know?"

"He, um…" Sirius winces slightly, and James looks over at him warily, which is fair. "Well, he hasn't been in the best mood, honestly. He's not really talking to anyone, so just… All I'm saying is, be prepared for him to ignore you, yeah? Don't take it personally. He's just… It's hard right now. You know that."

"He doesn't have to talk to me," James says instantly. "I just want to see him."

Sirius nods. "I get it, James. You will soon. Very soon, actually. We're almost there now."

"Will you…?" James trails off, uncharacteristically awkward.

"What?" Sirius asks.

James looks at him with some chagrin. "You—you don't have to, of course, but will you sleep with me tonight?"

"Yeah," Sirius answers immediately.

"Thank you," James breathes out.

They're silent the rest of the way to the suite. It's a bit slow-going because James is still getting used to his cane, but Sirius doesn't rush him, or let him rush himself. This is going to be an adjustment, and that takes time. They're both very impatient when they're working towards a goal, so Sirius has to make sure that James doesn't push himself too hard. Really, he expects too much out of himself at times.

When they make it into the suite, Sirius looks around in the vague hope that maybe Regulus has ventured out of his room, but he's nowhere to be found. In fact, Remus is also missing. Pandora is the only one there to greet them, and she stands up with a tight smile as they come in. Sirius instantly directs James to a chair to let him rest, but he looks at Pandora curiously, because the look on her face…

"You should go check on Regulus," Pandora says, and James' head snaps up, his eyes wide. "I'll stay here and get James something to drink. James, what would you like?"

"Something to take the edge off, please," James mumbles wearily, propping his cane up against his chair.

"No," Sirius protests quickly, because he knows better than most how slippery of a slope that is. James frowns at him, but Sirius just shoots him a stern look before focusing back on Pandora. "Water is fine. I'll be right back."

"Sure," Pandora murmurs, shrugging at James when he groans and tosses his head back against the chair.

Sirius pats James' shoulder apologetically, but he doesn't let James' sad eyes change his mind, which is actually a major achievement, because he would usually cave immediately.

James grumbles under his breath as Sirius leaves, which is fine. Sirius can't blame him. Nonetheless, he doesn't let that stop him on his way down the hall to Regulus' room. He knocks when he reaches the door and starts to turn the handle, only to find the door locked. He blinks, then immediately feels panic grip him, but the door opens a bit before he can freak out.

Again, Sirius blinks when he sees Remus' face peeking out at him through the crack in the door. As soon as Remus sees him, he shuts the door once more, leaving Sirius baffled on the other side. There's a muffled conversation, and then the door opens up yet again, revealing Remus for the second time.

"Where's James?" Remus asks.

"Um…sitting in the main room?" Sirius says, bewildered.

The door closes, and there's another muffled discussion that Sirius can't quite make out. He hears Regulus' voice, though, which means he's talking. That sparks hope in Sirius' chest, and he feels a wave of affection wash over him to know that Remus actually managed to get Regulus to talk again.

After a minute, the door creaks open again, and Remus slips out with a sigh. He shuts it behind him and clears his throat, giving Sirius a weak smile. "Hi."

"Hi," Sirius replies, eyebrows raised.

"You can go in," Remus tells him. "I just have to stand out here and make sure…" He pauses, flicking his gaze down the hall, and then he leans in and lowers his voice to a whisper that Sirius almost can't hear, let alone anyone else. "I have to make sure James doesn't. Regulus doesn't want to see him."

Sirius feels his heart sink. "Still? But… Fuck, James really wants to see him, Remus. Just see him, that's all."

"I mean, you can try, but…" Remus makes a face like he sincerely doubts that Sirius will make it happen. "I don't think you should push it. He's…had a rough day."

"Regulus?"

"Yeah."

"What happened?" Sirius asks, tensing all over.

Remus swallows. "He took a bath. It was—hard. I helped."

"You—" Sirius rears back a little. "By help, you mean…?"

"I mean I helped," Remus repeats, lips twitching when Sirius' eyebrows tug together. "Don't worry, I didn't see him naked or anything. I just sort of sat outside the door and talked to him. It was—well, it was still fucking awful for him anyway."

Sirius stares at him incredulously. "How the fuck did you get him to do that?"

"I just…talked to him?" Remus shrugs. "Honestly, I don't know. He's sort of been following me around ever since. He was out of his room. Still wasn't talking much, but he sat in the kitchen while I cooked and seemed to like it when I talked. He holed himself in his room as soon as Pandora came back and said that James was on his way, though."

"He was following you around?" Sirius murmurs, softening helplessly by the mental image.

Remus seems baffled, but he nods. "Yeah, pretty much. Sort of like a very quiet shadow."

"You're a marvel," Sirius breathes out, utterly astonished. There's something oddly amusing about the idea of Regulus just trailing around after Remus wherever he goes, but Sirius supposes that makes sense. After all, if Remus did help Regulus with something he was so afraid of, he would find comfort in him after that. "Thank you. Remus, really, I—"

"You don't have to thank me. I wanted to help," Remus tells him gently. "And, you know, I think I did. Even just a bit."

"Of course you did," Sirius says softly, his heart swelling is his chest because Remus seems genuinely pleased that he actually managed to help at all.

Sirius shakes his head, feeling such a rush of love for this man grip him that he almost can't breathe around it. He can only step forward and reach out to catch Remus' face in his hands, drawing him into a kiss. Remus tips forward into it eagerly, his hands coming up to cup Sirius' neck on either side, ever so gently stroking his skin like it's precious. For a long, long moment, they just stand there and kiss slowly, feeling every inch of it for as long as they can before they break apart.

"Go on," Remus whispers, tilting his head up to press a careful kiss to the very tip of Sirius' nose. "Go see your brother."

Sirius hums, his eyes fluttering open, and he feels his face heat up the moment he sees how fondly Remus is looking at him. The blush makes Remus laugh quietly, and Sirius laughs along with him, rocking forward to kiss him one more time, quickly, and then he pulls away to go into the room.

"It's just me," Sirius announces as he shuts the door quickly, because Regulus is watching his entrance suspiciously, his eyes narrowed and his body tense where he's sitting at the top of his bed. "James is resting anyway."

"Resting?" Regulus asks, clearly interested and doing his absolute best to hide it.

"Yeah. He's getting used to his cane, but that doesn't make the pain in his leg just go away, unfortunately," Sirius mutters as he moves over to sit down on the edge of the bed, only a few inches away from Regulus' sock-clad feet.

Regulus is silent for a long moment, the tension slowly draining out of his frame. At least he's comfortable with Sirius, which is a nice thing to be sure of. Sirius scans him carefully, because he hasn't seen him since this morning, and he can't stop himself from looking for any changes.

It's clear that Regulus has gotten a bath. His hair is a little damp, no longer limp and greasy from sweat, now holding healthy waves and curls. He's clean, too, and in a new long-sleeve shirt and pair of joggers. The only scar that's visible is the one on his neck.

"Is he okay?" Regulus says, finally. He doesn't lift his gaze, and he plucks at the seam of his joggers with a small frown.

"He's…doing his best," Sirius replies, because no, James isn't okay. Neither of them are, frankly, but Sirius knows James so well that he can see how bad off James is currently. Maybe it's not obvious to most, but the random bouts of silence he goes into, the way he drifts off, how he bristles like he's about to fight when someone he doesn't instinctively trust gets too close to him—all of it, and more, is so obvious to Sirius, but James is still trying, because of course he is. Even now, he is.

Regulus frowns harder. "And his leg?"

"The pain will get better with time," Sirius explains. "He'll need the cane for a while, but he'll eventually be able to go without it, just not always."

"Has he…?" Regulus doesn't finish.

Sirius purses his lips, then carefully says, "You can see him, you know. He's only a room away."

"No," Regulus denies immediately. "I don't want to see him."

"Reggie," Sirius whispers, "he really wants to see you. Just see you, that's all. It's just—he just wants to see you alive for himself, okay? That's all it is. Won't you—"

"No," Regulus snaps.

"You don't have to talk to him," Sirius tries, his voice strained. He doesn't want to push, but at the same time, he knows how much better James would feel just to see Regulus. "You—"

"I said no!" Regulus shouts, his head snapping up, eyes slightly wild. His chest is heaving and his hands are clenched into tight fists. "I don't want to fucking see him! I won't!"

"Alright, hey, that's—it's okay, you don't have to," Sirius says quickly, backtracking immediately when he sees that this isn't just Regulus being contrarian or stubborn. It's clearly an issue for him, a big one, which is going to be a problem tomorrow when he'll have no choice in the matter. The more pressing issue is to set Regulus at ease now, and Sirius reaches out instinctively to touch his arm in the endeavor to do that.

It's a mistake. As soon as Sirius' fingers lands on his arm, Regulus snaps his arm out and backhands Sirius right across the face, hitting him hard. It's done with such force that Sirius' head whips to the side, and he curses sharply as he surges to his feet and puts space between them.

"I'm—fuck, I'm sorry," Regulus chokes out, nearly tumbling off the bed with wide eyes full of instant regret.

"You're fine. It's fine," Sirius grits out, reaching up to prod at his face with one hand and lift the other to try and wordlessly tell Regulus to stay back. "I know you didn't mean to. It's—"

"Sirius, I'm sorry," Regulus says yet again. "I shouldn't have done that. I didn't know I was going to do that. I—"

"Regulus, it's okay," Sirius cuts in firmly, dropping both hands and releasing a deep breath as he steps forward to let Regulus look at him. "See? It's fine. It was just a reflex."

"I'm sorry," Regulus repeats, this time much softer, his eyes drifting shut before he lifts both hands and swipes them over his face. He gives a hoarse laugh and shakes his head as his hands fall limp to his sides. "I—I've never hit you. Not once. No matter what, I never hit you, and now—"

"Stop it." Sirius is quite sure now is not a good time to mention that Regulus has been attempting to beat the shit out of him in his sleep multiple times already. Probably for the best to keep that to himself. He sighs when Regulus looks at him with this horrible, awful self-hatred in his eyes that Sirius knows for sure he's seen in the mirror before. "Look, just—can I touch you? Is that alright?"

"I don't know," Regulus rasps.

"Alright, so I won't," Sirius says simply.

Regulus swallows. "You should be able to. You're my brother."

"It's not that simple," Sirius tells him, giving him a bitter smile. "Reggie, you're two days out of the arena. Do you think I don't understand? I—" He sucks in a sharp breath, holding it because he's never told anyone this, not even James. It's one of his greatest sins, in his opinion. One of his biggest regrets. Something he's always been ashamed of. "I—I hit Effie."

Regulus stares at him, clearly startled.

"Yeah," Sirius mumbles. "I didn't mean to. It was an accident. The day after I got out of the arena, she startled me, and I just reacted. I hit her, tried to tackle her to the floor, and she…

Well, she made me eat dirt, actually." He chuckles, and Regulus blinks at him. "Had me pinned on the ground in seconds, at least until I calmed down, then basically coddled me afterwards when I had a meltdown for hurting her."

"She wasn't angry?" Regulus whispers.

"Far from it," Sirius says wryly. "In fact, she mocked me for being too slow to properly finish her off. She's more dangerous than you'd think, that woman. But it's… I get it, yeah? I'll tell you like she told me; you're still in survival mode, and you have no reason to be ashamed for what counts as a threat to you. I know it doesn't seem like it now, but you'll feel safe again. You will, Regulus. You just need time."

"I don't want to hurt anyone else," Regulus tells him, and the words wrench at Sirius' heart because he knows that feeling well. "I don't want to feel like this anymore."

"I know."

"When does it stop?"

It doesn't, Sirius thinks, and he can't bring himself to say it. He can't do it. He can't crush Regulus with the truth. He'll find out eventually, but Sirius doesn't want to hurt him either.

"You know, James is good about it," Sirius says instead, and Regulus' lips press into a thin line. "He's always been one to reach out mindlessly and touch, you know that, but when it matters…he always seems to know when to ask. If you're worried he'll touch you, or you'll hurt him, you don't need to be. He's been through this before with me, and he's—well, he's going through it now, too."

Regulus' eyebrows pinch together, like the mere concept of James being violent doesn't add up in his head. "He's…"

"He was fighting the nurses when I went to visit him the first time," Sirius admits. "It's not just you, okay? It's not that you're predisposed to violence."

"Is that what you thought?"

"Yeah, and that's why I know you're thinking it."

"Because of Mother and Father," Regulus says softly.

Sirius inclines his head. "It's easy to believe, isn't it? We grew up in a violent home, Reggie. Only makes sense that we'd think we're more violent because of it."

"And we're not?"

"That's not what this is. Obviously we're not unaffected, but being abused doesn't make us into abusers."

"I suppose not," Regulus agrees slowly. He huffs out a laugh without any humor. "No, we became killers instead."

"We didn't choose that," Sirius replies very, very carefully. It's a fine line to walk, Sirius is realizing, because he can't very well go on not blaming them, or holding them responsible for their actions in a situation they never had control over, while doing the exact opposite for himself. It makes him uncomfortable to think about, but he also had no control, and it's becoming increasingly obvious to him that he's been unfair in refusing to forgive himself for what he had to do.

"I'm tired," Regulus announces abruptly, turning to settle back down on the bed. He's usually more subtle about wanting to avoid talking about something, but he doesn't seem to have the energy or the care to be anymore.

"That's fine," Sirius says softly. "If you need anything, just shout for me. I'll be in James' room tonight, but I'll hear you if you call. And I won't bring him along, I promise."

"Thank you," Regulus mumbles, picking at his joggers again. He clears his throat. "Remus can come back in here."

Sirius clicks his tongue. "Is this what you're doing now? Not just my best friend, but you're stealing my man now, too?"

"I'm collecting them all," Regulus tells him, his mouth curling up in one corner. It's faint, and it doesn't last very long, but it's there. It's fucking there, and Sirius feels like something in him pops and comes loose, letting him exhale just a little easier.

"I'll be sure to let him know," Sirius mutters dryly, fighting a smile as he heads towards the door.

"Sirius?" Regulus calls after him.

"Yeah?" Sirius asks, glancing back over his shoulder with his hand on the doorknob.

Regulus opens his mouth, hesitates, then swallows thickly and shakes his head a little. "Sorry about your face."

"It's alright," Sirius assures him yet again. He's quite sure he has a bruise this time, but it'll be fine. After a beat, he flashes Regulus a grin. "Sorry about yours. Must be dreadful being stuck with it."

"Fuck off," Regulus grumbles.

Sirius takes his win and cackles as he slips out the door, quite literally bumping into Remus' back as he comes out. There's something mildly hysterical about the fact that Remus is essentially standing guard outside Regulus' door right now. Remus blinks in surprise when he sees him.

"What happened?" Remus hisses, reaching up to press his fingers gently to the side of Sirius' eye.

"Oh, this is just the bruise finally blooming from where I tripped and fell the moment I saw you," Sirius says sweetly, and Remus' concern fades as he releases a startled huff of laughter. Sirius grins and slides his hands up Remus' chest to wind around his shoulders, leaning in to pepper kisses along his jaw, heading for his mouth.

Remus hums in approval the moment their lips meet, his arms slipping around Sirius' waist to drag them closer together. It's easy now to let himself sink into it completely, because James and Regulus are alive, and they're here, and Sirius doesn't have to worry about them nearly dying in the arena. No, there's just this, Remus' strong arms and Remus' warm mouth.

Sirius is fucking obsessed with being close to Remus, kissing Remus, touching him and having him. He can't get enough of it. Even still, it makes his heart race and his stomach swoop, full of butterflies. Remus can kiss him, just kiss him, and have him rattling like he's about to fall apart, or fucking explode.

"Mm, so I assume that it did go well with Regulus, despite the bruise on your face?" Remus asks breathlessly when they pull apart, both of them dazed.

"Yes and no," Sirius admits. "But, well, you've been granted blanket permission to be around him, so there's that. He didn't say he wanted you to go back in, but he basically did. You don't have to, of course, but…"

"He wants me to?" Remus murmurs.

"In his own Regulus way, yes," Sirius says, amused. His face softens when Remus snorts. "I have to go talk to James and then have a shower anyway. By the time I get finished with everything, it'll almost be time for you to go."

Remus sighs softly. "Yeah. There's never enough time."

"I know," Sirius whispers, reaching up to push his fingers through Remus' hair before shutting his eyes and leaning in to press their foreheads together.

"Go ahead," Remus whispers back after a long moment, his arms sliding away from Sirius' waist. He pauses long enough to squeeze his sides, then drops his hands. "You have things you need to do. I have gossip to spread."

Sirius blinks. "What?"

"Regulus likes gossip," Remus informs him.

"Regulus doesn't give a fuck about gossip," Sirius corrects, because he's quite sure that Regulus doesn't. In fact, he would say that Regulus finds gossip irritating.

Remus arches an eyebrow. "Trust me, he likes it."

"Please tell me that's not a euphemism," Sirius says.

"A—what?" Remus stares, then busts out laughing, his entire face lighting up. "Fucking hell, Sirius, no. I'm not joking, he actually likes gossip. I swear it."

"If you're sure…" Sirius squints at him playfully, and he feels like he's going to melt into a puddle just from the way Remus' eyes gleam bright with humor. "Obviously this isn't an issue, but I'll ask for my peace of mind anyway. You've no interest in my brother at all, right?"

"Well, he is quite—"

"Remus!"

"What?" Remus asks with a straight face. "You asked. I'm just saying, he's really—"

"I know you're fucking with me," Sirius cuts in.

"Of course I am," Remus murmurs, his lips curling up as he reaches out to brush his knuckles down Sirius' cheek, unbridled affection practically oozing off of him. Sirius' knees almost fucking buckle. "Am I predictable now? Has the novelty worn off already?"

"You couldn't be predictable if you tried," Sirius murmurs, gazing at him with his bottom lip caught between his teeth. "You're entirely unique, Remus Lupin."

"Mm, I've always aspired to be, you know."

"Well, aspirations reached. Nothing exists in this world that could ever come close to you."

"You're biased, sweetheart," Remus teases softly, leaning in to bump their noses together, their lips grazing.

Sirius feels like a cooked noodle. He's about to collapse. "Is that a thing? Can that be a thing? I want it to be a thing."

"What? Sweetheart?"

"Yes, please."

Remus chuckles and presses a smile against the corner of Sirius' mouth. "Well, I couldn't possibly deny you that. You've asked so nicely. So polite."

"I can be…so polite," Sirius mumbles, his breath hitching as Remus' mouth trails down to his jaw, then dips even lower. "I have manners. So many manners. All of the manners."

"Mm, good job," Remus says, the words muffled into the bend of his throat, and he's there, doing lovely things to Sirius' skin for only a second, and then he's abruptly pulling away and lifting his head. He blinks like he's coming out of a fog.

"What? Why?" Sirius asks in dismay. "But I was polite."

"I—" Remus blinks again, then laughs, his lips spreading into an open-mouthed smile so wide that his eyes crinkle. He shakes his head in amusement. "Yes, you were, and trust me, I'd love nothing more than to reward you for the bare minimum at literally any given moment, but need I remind you? James. Regulus. You need a shower. I have to spread gossip."

"Oh. Right. Got a bit…" Sirius coughs and steps back, waving his hand around his head, admittedly a little frazzled, as well as flustered. He's blushing again, which amuses Remus. "Yes, we have—things. To do. Important things. Right."

"We can finish this tomorrow," Remus declares, flicking one finger between both of them. "If you want to, that is."

A tight coil of anticipation curls up in Sirius' stomach, and this is the first time he actually allows himself to be really, really excited by the thought. His mouth is so dry. "Yeah," he croaks. "Tomorrow. We'll—yeah. That's. Yeah. Good. Okay."

Remus looks at him fondly, laughing softly as he leans in and presses a quick kiss to Sirius' mouth, then his cheek, and then he pulls away and slips into Regulus' room with one last lingering look over his shoulder as he goes.

Sirius takes a second to let his legs gather their strength back, regulating his breathing, and then he sweeps off to go do what he needs to do. It's nice getting to go with a smile.

Chapter End Notes

ahhh, an overall lighter chapter!!! or, well, maybe not. ive only just realized that maybe my measurement for what's, like, really angsty in my fics are super diluted, because im the one writing it, technically. so, like, ill drop a chapter and be like "oh it's so much lighter" and then the comments are like: zar i just cried until i threw up. and then im sitting there like: 😟 so, to ME, this was a light chapter.

like, okay, regulus is having a rough time, but...well, that's to be expected, really. can't blame him for that. and like, that whole scene where remus helped him through bathing—in a very non-invasive way—was just. idk, it was really special/sweet to me. like, obviously it fucking sucked that it was hard for him and something he struggled with (and will continue to), but the fact that remus helped him through it? because regulus GENUINELY wouldn't have been able to do it without remus, which is essentially why regulus pretty much immediately latched onto him.

like, regulus is in a pretty vulnerable state and constantly on edge, and remus just basically made him feel extremely safe while he was dealing with something that scared him the most. it's just. remus lupin, my love, you are SO IMPORTANT TO ME. idk why im getting emotional about it NOW, like i didn't fucking write it, but remus is just such a good person. he's a really, really good person. i love him so much.

and yes, remus and regulus are now friends. i did say a while back that they'd end up getting close/being friends. something about the moon controlling the tide something about remus helping regulus with his fear of water. im connecting the dots, i say, as if i didn't sit down and write this fanfic myself.

anyway, moving onto sirius!!! oh, sirius my beloved. the truth comes out! he doesn't give a shit if regulus and james are together at this point because he just wants them to be happy, but he also knows, realistically, that it's not that simple in the aftermath of the arena. we see him talk about more about his Feelings and Thoughts about jegulus in chapter 29.

sirius and james' talk was super important, though, because like. james literally Never Spoke Of This for TEN YEARS. he never once breathed a word of it to sirius—and like, his reasoning for NOT came from a place of good intentions (he didn't want to be a burden, basically), but it was really important for sirius to be like: hey idiot you're NOT a burden, you could NEVER be a burden, i am here for you FOREVER. even when it's about his brother. sirius is such a good person, too, im gonna sob. james really needed to hear that 😭😭😭 also, thinking about how desperate james is to see regulus—just SEE him—is so, so sad. he's not. it's like, he has his issues, yes, but he's quite literally zeroing in on One Thing to avoid it as much as he can, and the moment it catches up to him... well, it DOES catch up to him. regulus isn't the only one who's traumatized.

however, regulus NOT wanting to see james isn't just like. him being stubborn or him refusing to out of an unwillingness to deal with His Feelings. like, i hope that came across loud and clear here that the idea of seeing james invokes a legitimate trauma response out of him—which we find out why in the next chapter. like, he LITERALLY panics immediately. but it's also obvious how much he cares about james bc he keeps asking about him etc etc.

the fact that regulus has been smacking the shit out of sirius in his sleep without even knowing it and sirius is like: you know what? im not even gonna mention it bc you're THAT pitiful right now bro 😭😭😭 GOODBYE. also, sirius hitting effie... the way that's one of his greatest sins, in his mind... HEARTBROKEN. but also the fact that she immediately knocked him flat on his ass and still held him when he broke down for lashing out??? SHE'S A MOTHER!!! euphemia>>> and finally, wolfstar 😌😌😌 my babiesssss. my one true loves. our only source of joy at the moment lmaoooo. they're so cute, im obsessed with them. not sirius literally about to swoon every single time remus Just Looks At Him. he's so real for that, actually. and remus calling him sweetheart bc he knows sirius like pet names 😭😭😭 THEY'RE EVERYTHING TO ME

(honorable mention to pandora again. i am also gently kissing the back of her hand rn) oh, and yes, we will be getting a jegulus reunion next chapter, so don't fret about that. or do, that's your prerogative, but either way, it's coming!

Breakup

Chapter Notes

hello, all!

warnings for this chapter:

-ptsd/ptsd-responses (lashing out, paranoia, mild hallucinations, nightmares, more of the same from the previous chapters, things such as that)
-references to past death
-references to past child death
-depictions of aquaphobia (fear of water)
-depictions of panic attacks
-mentions of blood (not in real/present time)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

James is running, but he's not going to make it. Somehow, he knows this. Regulus is there, standing next to the river, waiting for James with his hand outstretched.

He keeps running anyway, closing the distance between them as fast as he can, his heart pounding and Regulus' name snatched from his lips, lost to the wind. He draws closer, and the hope starts to take root. Maybe he can make it; maybe he can grab Regulus' hand and pull him away from the water; maybe if he just runs faster, tries harder—

The river is in turmoil, bubbling and rocking in waves of blood, slapping along the sides of the ground and seeping out towards Regulus' feet. A hand raises up and claws into the ground, and then another joins it, and then another, and another… The hands snap out at grotesque angles, and James watches in horror—even while he sprints—as Hodge drags himself out of the river, followed closely by Peter.

Their eyes are dead, and their limbs move like dolls that have been broken, a horrible creaking and shuffling that makes them look like stop-motion corpses. James calls out to Regulus, trying to warn him, and he's close, so close…

Hodge and Peter's hands slip around Regulus' throat and chest, fingers digging in. Regulus doesn't scream; he just closes his eyes. James is right there, close enough to reach out and grab him, nearly managing to before a hook buries itself into his leg and yanks him back at the last second. His hand almost grazes Regulus', but it doesn't. It doesn't.

The pain in James' leg makes him cry out, but it takes the shape of Regulus' name as he's dragged back into the river by Hodge and Peter. Helplessly, James tries to crawl forward, determined to reach in and pull Regulus right back out, but the hook in his leg tugs harder.

When James scrambles to look at who is yanking him back, he chokes out a harsh sob to see Vanity at the other end, blood pouring out of her throat even as she holds the rope.

"Please," James begs. "I'm sorry, I'm so sorry, but I need to get to him. He's dying. I have to save him."

"You can't. You couldn't even save me," Vanity says, and the cannon sounds, making James jolt as he surges up with a deep gasp, shivering violently while scrambling around and trying to find his hatchet.

"—mes," filters through, a disjointed voice that warps in James' ears as his heart races, the oppressive darkness creating shapes and spots in front of his eyes.

Something touches his arm, and James immediately lashes out at it, somehow sure that the ghosts of those he's responsible for being dead have come to life to keep him from making it to that river. He has to get to the river. He won't let anything stop him, not even the solid mass that he slams his hands against, fighting with all his might to make it stop moving. Like Mulciber. What if it's Mulciber? Where's his fucking hatchet?

There's a grunt, then James finds himself flipped so quickly that he can't make sense of how it even happened. He's held down, legs wrapped tight around his knees and arms locked around his chest, keeping him from moving. Belligerent and hostile, James tries everything to get free, flailing and shouting and struggling with all that he has in him.

"James! James! James!" By the third shout, it registers that it's Sirius' voice in his ear. James goes still.

How is Sirius here? How did he—

Slowly, it comes to James in fractures. He can hear Sirius panting in his ear, and it takes him a long time to realize that Sirius is holding him from behind, trapping him in place. It takes even longer for the tension to slowly ease out of him, his confusion receding like the tide, finally pulling back to reveal the shore of reality.

Oh.

Nightmare.

All at once, the fight goes out of James, and he slumps as he gasps for air, head rolling forward as he finds himself weeping. Sirius' grip loosens on him, only a bit, going from restricting to cradling in seconds. He shifts, letting James turn into him, and then he's just holding him as James sobs into his chest.

"Okay, hey, I know," Sirius whispers, his hand coming up to cup the back of James' neck, gently squeezing it.

"Where are we?" James chokes out, because he doesn't—he can't see, and he doesn't know. "I can't—it's dark, and I—"

"Shh," Sirius soothes him, briefly leaning away, and there's a click before light washes over them both.

James frantically looks up, staring around desperately as he tries to reorient himself, letting it slot into place that he's no longer in the arena. He's in Sirius' room in the suite, in his bed, not in a cave or on the ground or near a river. It takes another few minutes before James' breathing evens out, slowly calming as Sirius rubs soothing circles on his back.

"I'm—I'm sorry," James stutters out, flinching back from Sirius as if he's been scalded. "Fuck, did I hurt you?"

"No, you're fine, it's fine," Sirius assures him, pushing himself to sit up and hold his arms out like he's presenting himself, providing proof that he's unharmed. "See? I'm fine."

"Fucking hell," James croaks, squeezing his eyes shut and blowing out a deep breath as he lifts his hands to cover his face. He stays like that for a long moment, feeling himself shake, and then he drops his hands and pushes himself up as well with a wince. His leg is throwing a fit, and he can feel the phantom pains of the hook buried in his thigh, even now.

"You're alright, James," Sirius says softly, watching him carefully. "You're not there. You're here, and I've got you."

James fights the surge of emotion that nearly overtakes him, because he remembers how many times he said those exact words to Sirius after he got out of the arena. James is only just now realizing how important those words are, because hearing them when he needs them makes him feel more safe than he ever has in his life. James has to fight the urge to ask Sirius to say it again, and again, and just never stop reminding him.

"I'm sorry," James says instead. "I'm a fucking mess. I'm—"

Sirius snorts, reaching out to grab James' hand, letting James cling to him without complaint. "Oh, don't even start that nonsense. As many times as you took care of me when I was the one going through this…"

"Maybe it's selfish of me to say, but I really wish I wasn't going through this," James mumbles, averting his gaze as he stares at the wall. The way the shadow drapes over the table by the door makes a silhouette next to it. To James, it looks like the outline of a man with a hatchet sticking outside of his head. It's morbid, but he can't look away, even as his gaze unfocuses and he remembers it. His first kill.

"For what it's worth," Sirius tells him, "I wish you weren't either."

"I wasn't supposed to go through this," James whispers, feeling exhaustion seeping into his bones until even just breathing saps him of energy.

That's the thing, isn't it? James never planned to go through this, and he's only just now realizing that some part of him had been grateful that he wouldn't have to, because he knew. He knew how this would happen, because he's seen it through Sirius, even a bit with his mum, and it's hitting him that a part of his choice was to avoid this, too.

James wouldn't be going through this right now if Regulus hadn't gone into that river. Perhaps it's irrational, but James is angry at him for it. He's so fucking angry at Regulus for doing that to him, for putting him through that, and now leaving him alone in this. James needs him. He needs—

But Regulus won't see him. Won't let James see him. Not even a fucking glimpse. James just needs to see him. Just lay eyes on him and know that he's alive, proof for himself, no matter what anyone else tells him. They don't even have to talk, or touch, or spend longer than a second together.

Just a glimpse. James needs just a glimpse.

"James."

"Sorry, what?" James mutters, blinking as he turns his head to stare at Sirius, who swallows.

"Called your name a few times," Sirius admits. He takes a deep breath, then slowly lets it out. "Look, I… Well, I know all about ghosts, yeah? Things that haunt you from the arena. People. Pain. Fear." He squeezes James' hand. "You don't have to talk about it, but I'm here if you need to."

"Yeah, thanks, I just…" James swallows past the lump in his throat. He and Sirius haven't spoken about anything that happened in the arena yet, and James isn't sure if he'll ever be ready to. He just wants to block it all out; he wants to cover his ears and close his eyes and stay one step ahead of it all. "It was just a rough nightmare, Sirius. I'll be alright. I'm—my mouth is dry, so I'm going to get some water."

"I can get it for you," Sirius offers immediately.

James shakes his head. "No, I need to—my leg is stiff. I need to walk a bit, but thank you."

"Okay, I'll come with you," Sirius says instead.

"Sirius," James mumbles weakly, "I love you, I really fucking do, but I just… Can I just have a moment? Please?"

Sirius' face softens. "Yeah, of course. I love you, too."

James gives him a tired smile and eases himself to the edge of the bed, leaning forward with a grimace to grab the cane that's propped up next to the stand by the bed. He plants it on the floor, using it to brace himself as he stands, gritting his teeth through the sharp ache that blooms in his thigh. He takes a moment, just breathing as the pain settles to a dull throb, one he can actually tolerate as he walks.

He's still getting used to the cane, so he's a bit slow, but he's nonetheless very grateful for it. He leans into it as he takes one step after the next, feeling genuine relief from the weight it takes off his leg. It's mostly about support, because without it, his leg will just buckle and send him to the floor. He's been reassured that the threat of that will lessen with time.

"James," Sirius calls as he reaches the door.

"Yeah?" James asks, pausing as he glances over his shoulder.

"Don't…" Sirius hesitates, then exhales deeply and sets his shoulders, holding James' gaze. "Don't go to Regulus. I'm sorry, I know you want to see him, but he—"

"But he doesn't want me. Yeah, Sirius, I know," James snaps, and Sirius' mouth shuts with a loud click. "What else is new?"

Sirius can't seem to find a response before James opens the door and shuffles out into the hall, shutting the door behind him. He stands there for a moment, then sighs.

Obviously James doesn't go get water.

No, of course James goes right to Regulus' door.

He doesn't just barge in, though, no matter how tempted he is. He also doesn't open the door and dare to steal a peek, no matter how desperately he wants to, because just one quick glimpse that Regulus possibly won't even know about would be so easy, and it would help him exponentially. Instead, he presses his forehead to the door and blows out a deep breath, eyes closed as he raises his hand and knocks.

It's late, James is sure. The middle of the night. There's a certain kind of stillness like the whole world is caught in a slumber, except for those that rest doesn't come easy to. He's among them now, and he doesn't doubt Regulus is as well. Even still, Regulus might be asleep, and James doesn't want to wake him if he is, but if he isn't...

"Regulus," James calls softly, knocking yet again.

When he gets no response, James drops his hand and fights the tears that sting at his eyes. He swallows thickly and flexes his fingers around the handle of his cane, taking measured breaths. There's no sound from the other side of the door.

"I don't know if you're listening… Shit, maybe you're asleep," James murmurs, turning slightly to press his shoulder against the door as he looks down to fiddle with his cane. "But if you aren't, and you can hear me, I just—I wanted to say—"

James halts, blinking harshly as he rolls his jaw. As hard as he strains his ears, he can't hear anything from inside the room. Regulus has always been good at being quiet, though.

"Do you remember when I told you about Schrödinger's cat? You and Sirius never learned about it in school, but my personal tutor taught me, and you were…" James feels a small smile curl at his lips, despite everything. "Oh, you were just fascinated by it when I explained. You wanted to know all about it, asking so many questions that I never had the answers to, and I barely understood it myself." His smile slips as he tips his head back, eyes wet. "I get it now. Regulus, you're my Schrödinger's cat right now, okay? You're alive, and you're dead, and I—I need to see in the box. Do you get what I'm saying? It doesn't have to be anything else, but please…"

Nothing.

Complete and utter silence.

James squeezes his eyes shut and hangs his head, holding his breath as everything seems to twist up inside him, a torrential storm he can't get out of, because it's just him. He feels on the verge of exploding, fighting every impulse to rail against the containment of reality, so harsh and unforgiving, because all he wants is just a little reprieve. Something. Anything.

There's nothing.

And then, from the other side of the door, softly, "James."

The sound of Regulus' voice genuinely feels more piercing than getting stabbed. He reaches up to press his hand over his mouth as tears flood his eyes instantly, even though they're shut, and he leans harder against the door. He works so hard to muffle the quiet sound that rises up his throat, hitched and weak, but he doesn't know if he manages it or not.

"Regulus," James croaks as soon as he drops his hand. It's silent again, but James knows that Regulus is standing right there on the other side of the door. He wants to open it, and his leg is aching, and he feels like his emotions are spilling out of him all over the place, like a pot boiling over—and he just can't, he can't keep it together, no matter how hard he tries.

Carefully, he slides down the length of the door, using his cane to help him get down safely. Once he's there, he leans his head against the door and breathes. Tries to breathe. Tries not to cry. Regulus is alive, and maybe James doesn't even need a glimpse. Maybe just the sound of his voice is enough.

"Oh," James chokes out, half-laughing and half-sobbing as he blinks rapidly. "Fuck. Fucking hell, it's—it's good to hear your voice. Thank you for—thank you."

Regulus' voice is muffled through the door when he responds. "Are you on the floor?"

"I needed to sit down," James admits, taking a deep breath and slowly letting it out. He gets no response for a while, just more silence. "Sorry for… I know you didn't want this. I know you don't want to see me. I'm sorry, I just…" Again, more silence. James swallows and draws his cane over his lap, anxiously fiddling with it. "Well, I suppose I just needed to know that you were okay for myself. I mean, are you okay?"

There's no response for so long that James thinks he's not going to get one. Maybe Regulus has gone back to bed, or maybe he's gone out on his balcony. James has almost made his peace with that when Regulus does reply, and his voice is lower to the ground like he's sitting on the floor, too.

"I don't know," Regulus says.

"Yeah, I, um… I don't really know either," James confesses quietly. "You don't have to talk to me, you know. You're not required. This was foolish of me. They said—" He shakes his head, blowing out a deep breath. "Sorry. I'm stupid."

"No, you're not," Regulus tells him. His voice sounds thick, and James doesn't know if it's from the barrier between them, or because Regulus is crying.

"I just needed to know," James croaks.

"Schrödinger's cat," Regulus says, like that makes sense to him, like having that comparison helps him understand.

James nods, even though Regulus can't see him. "Yeah, exactly. I mean, Sirius said you were alive, but I still... You told me you can't help if I don't tell you what I need, so I—I guess this is me telling you what I need."

"What do you need?" Regulus asks.

"You," James whispers. "I need you, love."

There's more silence, and then James falls slightly as the door opens up a sliver, just a small slice. James catches himself quickly so he won't be pushing the door open with his weight, and he holds his breath as he swivels, peering through the crack in the door. Regulus' face hovers just on the other side of it, only one eye and one corner of his mouth and one small portion of his hair visible, but he's there.

"Oh, hey," Regulus says, and his voice cracks, and then the door wrenches open all the way, because apparently one glimpse was all he needed.

James barely gets to brace himself before Regulus is quite literally crawling right onto him, sucking in deep, gasping breaths as he carelessly shoves James' cane aside. It slides away with a clatter, and then James has him, James has both arms around him, holding him, pulling him closer.

It's a complete mess. For some reason, James is crying, and he can't stop, and it's so difficult not to just fall over as Regulus insistently attempts to meld them together. He's not letting any space between them, or giving James much room to really move, so it takes concentrated effort to scoot them both back so he's propped up against the doorway. Finally, that support seems to work for them both, because they get situated in a tangle of elbows and knees.

James isn't entirely sure which of them is clinging to the other harder. Maybe it's an equal exchange. It's borderline aggressive, actually, the way they both dig their fingers into each other, holding on too roughly like they share the same fear that the other might be snatched from them. James locks both arms around Regulus and refuses to ever let go again, burying his face in his shoulder as he trembles so hard that his teeth chatter. He can feel Regulus' arms wrapped around his shoulders, fingers curled tight in his hair.

It's not the first time James has had Regulus in his lap like this, and really, it's an improvement in some ways, because they're not in the arena and James' leg doesn't even hurt that much in this position, just a small twinge he can ignore with ease after all the pain he's had to deal with.

Regulus isn't crying, but James is almost positive he's having some sort of panic attack. His breathing is short and stuttered, and he's shaking as badly as James is. James wants to help him, comfort him, but he's too busy falling apart at the same time to manage it. They're both a fucking mess.

"Let me—James, I need you to stop touching me. Don't touch me," Regulus wheezes, and James instantly draws his arms back and plants both hands on the floor, palm-down. Regulus exhales sharply and relaxes a little more. Just a little.

"Better?" James asks, choked-up, unable to help it, and Regulus nods jerkily before he's suddenly groaning and shaking James a little violently right there against the doorway.

"I hate you. I hate you so much. Why would you do that?" Regulus breathes out, fisting his hands in James' hair even tighter and just—yanking a little. "You weren't supposed to fucking do that, James."

James sobs out a hoarse laugh, letting his head tip back as he stares up at Regulus through a haze of tears. "You're a hypocrite, Reg. Fuck you. I'm so—I'm so angry at you."

"I don't care. Shut up, I don't care," Regulus whispers, sort of tripping over his words as his chest heaves. He shakes his head. "That was so stupid. You're so fucking stupid."

"Me? Me?" James demands, a fresh wave of tears just streaming out of his eyes, even as he laughs. "Oh, I have nothing on you in terms of stupidity. What the fuck were you thinking? You nearly died, you idiot."

Regulus' hands slip from James' hair to cradle his face, swiping his tears. "You were dying. What was I supposed to do? I didn't know what else to do. I—I couldn't—"

"Okay, hey, let's just—let's just—can we just—" James can't figure out where that sentence ends. All he knows is that they're both barely hanging by a thread at the moment, and he desperately doesn't want it to snap.

"Yes, alright, okay," Regulus agrees, even though James didn't even really suggest anything at all.

And yet, something shifts. They fall silent and just breathe slowly, leaning into each other. Regulus is the only one holding on, his grip more gentle now, and James is left to feeling his weight against him. James closes his eyes and risks letting his head rest on Regulus' shoulder again, and Regulus presses his face into James' hair as he slips his hands down, one resting in the curve of James' neck and the other draped over his chest, right where his heartbeat is slowly calming.

Suddenly, it's like this moment could exist anywhere, like it already exists everywhere. James can feel it taking shape in the flow of time, hollowing out a space for them to huddle into. They're in the arena, and they're in the Hallow, and they're home. It doesn't matter. This is forevermore.

James is so tired, but he's scared. He's genuinely afraid to fall asleep. He doesn't want to, so he peels his eyes open, coming face-to-face with scars on the side of Regulus' neck that he's finally settled enough to properly notice. The sight of it makes a lump form in his throat, because he knows what it is immediately. The skin is a soft pink, but it's caved in a little where the claws legitimately ripped into him.

Carefully, James says, "Your scar," and Regulus stiffens against him.

"Please don't look at it," Regulus whispers.

"I'm sorry," James whispers back, turning his head instantly as he leans back to look at Regulus. He's apologizing for so many things, barely sure where to start.

Regulus just shakes his head, clearly unwilling to talk about it. He studies James' face for a long moment in silence, and then he abruptly looks stricken. "Where are your glasses? Why haven't they given you your glasses back yet, James?"

"Sirius said I'll get them back after the interview tomorrow," James murmurs. "I'll be wearing them soon, I promise."

"Will you feel strange, wearing them?" Regulus asks softly, his eyebrows furrowed as his lips tip down, like he's displeased by the mere thought.

"I don't know," James replies honestly.

"I'm sorry," Regulus rasps, and it seems like he's apologizing for more than just one thing, too.

James wants to smile. He wants to be someone that smiling comes easy to, like he was before, an unconscious thing rather than something that feels perpetually out of reach. He tries, but it doesn't feel like it fits on his face right. "Don't be upset. Even if that is the case, I'll get used to them again."

"Okay," Regulus says quietly.

"Regulus."

"Yes?"

"I want you to know that I don't—" James takes a deep breath before slowly letting it out. "I don't expect anything from you, alright? You don't have to do, or say…anything. I'm not—it's not like I'm—I'm waiting for—" He stops, frustrated that he's failing to get this right. It's so important, and he's fucking it all up. "Just don't feel pressured to—"

"James," Regulus cuts in.

"Sorry. I'm—I mucked that up. Please tell me you get what I mean," James mumbles, strained.

"Do you mean about—the arena?" Regulus asks carefully.

"Well, that too, but I was talking about…us," James replies, just as cautious as he scans Regulus' face warily.

Regulus' expression flickers, and then his lips press into a thin line, and he sort of just—deflates. He blows out a breath so deep that his cheeks round out, tapping James' chest as he releases a laugh that cracks in the middle. "Us. Right, that."

"I shouldn't have brought it up," James announces, knowing it down to his bones. He wants to rewind time and take it all back. He wants to snatch the words back from where they fell carelessly, impulsively from his mouth.

"No, you shouldn't have," Regulus confirms, and James feels his heart sink. "Do you know why I was so fucking scared to see you, James? Every time I thought about it, about actually laying eyes on you, all I could think was that I would look at you and have to go back there. I knew seeing you would take me right back, and it still feels like I'm there, and I don't want to be there anymore. I want to go home."

James bites down on the inside of his bottom lip hard, feeling those words like a blow to his chest, and he can't even blame Regulus for that. He gets it, actually. Even just having Regulus in his lap like this, on him just like this, makes the world go hazy around the edges, and there's a part of him that's utterly terrified that he's not actually here, that he never got out.

He can't look at Regulus without thinking about the river, without feeling the weight of his hatchet missing from his hand, without hearing Vanity's scream in the distance and seeing Mulciber's chest split open behind his eyelids every time he blinks. He can't have Regulus without experiencing the crushing desperation to keep him safe. They're here together, and James is still trying to survive.

"Every time I look at you, I'm ready to go into that river," Regulus rasps, his eyes wet. "I don't want to feel that way anymore, James. I'm sorry. I'm so sorry."

"Hey, no, I—" James' voice catches, and he clears his throat violently, shaking his head. "No, it's okay. I—I get it."

"You do?" Regulus asks, the tears shining brighter.

"I'm still trying to save you," James admits, utterly crushed as he gives a wobbly smile and shrugs helplessly.

"It's not fair," Regulus whispers, his bottom lip trembling as the tears finally spill. "James, it's not fair. We've had this taken from us twice. I get so close every time, but I never get close enough. It's not fair."

James swallows harshly. "I know, love. I know it's not fair. I'm sorry. I'm so fucking sorry."

"I don't want to be a great, big tragedy anymore," Regulus chokes out, looking at him almost desperately.

"Me neither," James admits. "Maybe, someday, we won't be. Maybe, one day, we'll look at each other and see that other life, and maybe we'll actually get to have it. I can find it in me to hope for that, even after everything. I've had so much practice these last ten years, so I'll just do it for us both."

Regulus releases a hoarse laugh, his body sagging as he tips himself closer into James' chest, eyes sinking shut. "Of course you will. It has to be you, doesn't it? I don't know how."

"I can teach you."

"Start now."

"Well," James says softly, "first you have to figure out what it is that you even want."

"I want you," Regulus exhales, the words a mere breath, and he doesn't open his eyes. In fact, he squeezes them shut even tighter like he can pretend he didn't even say it if he doesn't open his eyes to see James' reaction.

As for James' reaction, his heart nearly stops beating in his chest, and he briefly stills out of a rush of pure fucking joy, despite absolutely everything, because he's been wanting to hear that for ten years, and that outweighs even the trauma stitched into his skin now. He has to force himself to keep breathing, to remain calm, but it's genuinely a struggle.

"Right," James croaks, his heart racing. "Right, well, after that you just… You, um. You…"

"I…?" Regulus cracks open one eye, peeking at him, clearly waiting for further instructions, which is really quite adorable.

James coughs. "To be completely honest with you, love, I never really got farther than that. I —I never thought… I mean, I didn't expect that you'd ever—that we could be—"

"So, basically, you also have no idea what to do next?"

"Er, yeah, pretty much. Sorry."

Regulus' lips twitch. "You're so stupid, James Potter."

"Stupid about you, yeah," James tells him with no shame whatsoever. "It's supposed to be simple, isn't it? I mean, wanting you has always been simple. I've been doing it so long that it's as habitual as breathing now. But past that? I suppose I don't have practice with hope for it, not like I thought, and it's—it's more complicated now."

"Yeah, it is," Regulus agrees, swallowing. "I don't know if I can, James. You're right, it's not simple, and I can't—I don't think I can handle it. I can't even bear to be touched, really. Everything is too…much, and I'm not even sure if I'm willing to try, or if I ever will be."

"So…" James hesitates, because it feels like—an end. The ending of the beginning they never even got. Saying goodbye to someone you haven't even met yet. It shouldn't hurt, it shouldn't feel like his heart is being carved into, but it does.

"Let me go," Regulus says softly, so soft, and it breaks James' heart immediately. "You held on for ten years, and you can't possibly know how much that means to me, but you're holding onto someone who doesn't know how to hold you back, and you deserve to be held. You deserve better than me."

"There isn't better than you," James protests weakly, his eyes burning. "You threw yourself into a river for me, Regulus."

"And every time I look at you, all I know is that I'd do it again," Regulus tells him. "Without hesitation."

"Talk about character development," James croaks, because he wants to laugh, instead of cry. He does some mixture of both.

"I'm sorry I can't give us what we should have gotten to have. I'm sorry it was stolen from us," Regulus says, lifting his hand to cradle James' jaw. "I'm sorry, James, but it's—it's gone. Our chance, it's been gone a long time, and it's gone again. So, let me go. I'm telling you to let me go now, okay?"

"I don't know how," James chokes out. "I don't want to."

"I want you to. I want you to try." Regulus looks so fucking sad. His eyes—they're full of remorse and something James hasn't ever seen before. Heartbreak of his own. "You asked me to return your heart, and now I am. I'm sorry I didn't treat it right. Let someone more capable take care of it, because I don't know how. You should have someone who does."

"Stop," James rasps. "I don't want anyone else, Regulus. Don't you get it? I told you that it's you. It's always been you, and it's always going to be you."

"I'm tired of breaking your heart," Regulus mumbles, his eyebrows drawn together. "You've been so gentle with mine."

"Do I—you mean I have it?" James asks, his breath hitching.

"You've had it since I was ten," Regulus admits, huffing out a weak, sardonic laugh. "You know, it's ridiculous, really. What a fool I was to think I ever took it back."

James searches his eyes for any hint of dishonesty, as if maybe Regulus is just indulging him to soften the blow, but it's real. This is real. "Well, that will just have to be enough, then. I can live with this, Regulus. Just knowing that you… I mean, even if you can't, knowing that you want to is enough."

"You deserve more," Regulus says, sounding so upset.

"So do you," James reminds him sadly. "It's not just me, love."

"I hate that they took it from us," Regulus grits out, his jaw clenching. "And I hate you. I hate you so much, James."

"Still?" James mutters petulantly.

Regulus' face softens. "At all times, baby, at all times."

"You can't call me baby when you're telling me that you hate me ceaselessly," James complains, even though his heart jumps in his chest and does a ridiculous little twirl. He heaves a sigh and gathers his courage. "So, this is…it? On us, I mean."

"Yeah, James, this is it," Regulus murmurs.

James swallows harshly, blinking hard as he firms his jaw and nods jerkily. "Right. Okay. That's—it's okay. Maybe time is all we need. Maybe that's the answer."

"Maybe," Regulus allows. "Maybe not."

"Well, I'm going to hope for it anyway," James declares, holding his gaze in a challenge. "You can't stop me. We're right for each other, Reg. We just—all we need to do is find the right time, that's all, and I believe we will."

"It's selfish, but I'm so glad that you do," Regulus whispers, then gives him a small, aching smile. "Close your eyes for me and hold very still."

The thing is, James is capable of being selfish, too, because he knows what's coming, and he wants it so badly he can't even think. So, he closes his eyes and holds still, keeping his hands on the floor.

The kiss comes to him gentle and unwavering, so steady that James can let himself sink into it, and it's theirs; their true first kiss, alone, and its one that tastes of goodbye. Regulus' mouth is warm against his own, tender and tragic. It's not everlasting.

It's a parting gift.

Five minutes later, James is slipping back into bed with Sirius, and the moment he turns to face him, James breaks. His face crumbles as he ducks his head and starts weeping so hard that it comes from the very depths of him, wrenching at his very soul as he lays there and shatters, and shatters.

"Oh, James," Sirius whispers sadly, shuffling over to wrap him up in his arms immediately. "I told you not to go to him."

James folds into him and doesn't reply, too busy sobbing his little heart out to do so, and the part of him that is weak and sad and scared wishes he had listened.

~•~

Regulus doesn't want to like Remus Lupin, but he likes Remus Lupin. To begin with, admittedly, Regulus was indifferent about Remus on the whole. He was aware that Sirius was tripping all over himself every time Remus so much as looked at him, and frankly, Regulus was more than happy to ignore their first little stumbles into love, because he honestly had more pressing matters to deal with, up to and including the steady approach of his required presence in a death arena.

The death arena has come and gone—though it continues to loom over him at all times—but Sirius and Remus remain as stupid about each other as ever. Regulus still has more pressing matters to deal with, really, so he remains indifferent to whatever the fuck they have going on. He is mildly relieved to know that he doesn't have to put any energy into worrying about it, because it's quite clear that Remus is one of Sirius' only sources of happiness in the Hallow.

However, Remus as a separate entity from Sirius is something else entirely. Before, Regulus just treated him as he would anyone else, curt and distant, because he doesn't like people. It's not that Remus is a servant. That's not something he really thinks about, because he refuses to play into the Hallow's absurd and barbaric methods for dealing with criminals.

Now, after Remus helped him… Well, that's the thing, isn't it? Remus did help him. While Regulus sat there in the water, tears streaming down his face as he took a bath, it was Remus who kept him tethered, kept him from going right back to the echoes of clawed-fingers digging into his body; it was Remus' voice that kept him from hearing his own muffled screams; it was Remus' close presence that kept him from tasting blood. Remus helped him, and Remus isn't afraid to be blunt and honest, and damn it all to hell, Regulus likes him.

What matters the most, Regulus thinks, is that Remus kept his word. He took care of Sirius. Regulus will always be grateful for that, even if he'll never say it.

So, it's easy to be around him. Well, it's easier to be around him than anyone else, though Pandora is a strong contender, which Regulus honestly didn't see coming. She has this way about her that makes everything she says sound so…rational, like it's the right way to be. She's dangerously persuasive, but never in an underhanded way, just sort of like she makes everything she suggests make too much sense to argue with. And she's—comforting. Regulus didn't expect that either, how comforting people who aren't James and Sirius can be. Remus, most of all.

"You know," Remus muses, "you're going to have to see James eventually, so putting it off is a moot point."

Regulus heaves a sigh and keeps staring out past the balcony edge. The Hallow is teeming with activity today, people no doubt excited about the upcoming interview that Regulus is doing his level best not to think about. He and Remus are once again sitting out on the balcony, where Regulus prefers to spend most of his time. Regulus can feel Remus' eyes on him where he's bent over in his chair, arms braced on the table.

"I already saw him," Regulus confesses, swiveling his head to look at Remus. "He came to my door last night."

"Oh," Remus says, clearly startled. "How'd that go?"

"We broke up," Regulus murmurs.

"Oh," Remus repeats, still startled. "You were…together?"

Regulus frowns, gaze drifting to the side. "No."

That's the thing, isn't it? They were never together, never even got to be, not really. They exist in almosts, not absolutes. It doesn't matter what they want, or how badly they want it, because they never get to have. It should be simple, but it's not, and here they are. Defeated by circumstances. Time and time again, that's all it is. Always a great, big fucking tragedy.

A defiant part of Regulus wants to fight it anyway, to go to James and cling to him, and never let go no matter what tries to tear them apart next—but that takes effort. They both have to put in the work for that, and Regulus is tired. James is tired, too, he can tell. They're both so beaten down by everything that's been attacking them for the last ten years. When things just keep hitting you over and over and over, eventually, at some point, you just close your eyes and give into it.

Maybe, one day, when the hits stop landing, they'll both be able to pick themselves up and brush themselves off, tend to their bruises, let them heal, and figure out how to meet in the middle when they're not under attack anymore. It's a tentative thought in Regulus' mind, tasting faintly of hope in the back of his throat, and it scares him, but he's unwilling to shove it down and hide away from it. If that's all he can do for James, then he'll do it. James deserves that, at the very least.

"Well," Remus says carefully, "either way, it's shit. Sorry."

"Thanks," Regulus replies.

Neither of them speak for a while, and Regulus likes that about Remus, too, that he knows when not to talk, or just randomly has no idea how to fill the silence at the exact right time. Regulus finds safety in silence now, the same way he does in not sleeping; not talking ensures he doesn't have to give life to the horrors in his head, and not sleeping ensures he doesn't have to confront them in his nightmares.

Every time he sleeps, Evan is there. Irene is there. Avery, and Mulciber, and Vanity, and everyone. They're all there. And he's there, swallowing blood just to breathe. With every inhale and every exhale, he can taste where it coats his teeth.

There's a knock on the balcony door that immediately makes Regulus' muscles bunch up under his skin, and for a brief moment, he asks himself who he is going to have to kill so that he and Remus will survive. It makes his stomach churn, the way he responds like this every time, and no one is safe. Anyone close to him, he'll just drag right into the arena with him, and then he wonders how they'll die, if their blood will be on his hands, literally or metaphorically.

Then Sirius pokes his head through the door, and Regulus wills the tension to seep out of his frame. Sirius is safe. Sirius is a dream, actually. Every time Regulus looks at him, he can feel the flicker of doubt in his mind that maybe he did die in that river, and seeing his brother again is his reward for doing one thing right in the end. But, in the same breath, Sirius told him that he's alive, he's here, and there's no one Regulus instinctively trusts more than Sirius, even now.

The sight of Sirius always makes a confession lodge in Regulus' throat without fail. He should have said it. He—he wants to say it. He looks at Sirius and thinks I love you, too as loudly as he can, practically begging the words to crawl out of his throat, willing to vomit them up if he has to, even if they come out covered in blood.

Of course Regulus loves his brother. Despite everything, despite all their history, that never went away. He supposes he hated Sirius for that, too. He hated Sirius for a lot of things, he thinks, but he doesn't remember them anymore.

Suddenly, it's as if Regulus can't recall any reason he was ever angry with Sirius, not ever. It's different now, from the other side of it. He can only think about how he hit Sirius, and he imagines how Sirius must have been after he got out of the arena. He knew that it was bad, distantly, only in the abstract. After all, Sirius never let him see it, always kept him at a distance with James' help, pushing him out until he turned inwards and vowed never to try to go back.

But Regulus gets it now, firsthand. He understands in a way he didn't before, and he's not angry. He doesn't hate Sirius anymore, not at all, not even a little bit. Regulus loves him so much that he chokes on it every time he looks at him.

He wants to tell Sirius so badly that it hurts, because the fact that Sirius didn't say it when Regulus was going into the arena, but he said it when Regulus got out, is so important to him. It means so much to Regulus that he can't even articulate it. Because Regulus has killed people, and Sirius still said it. Because Regulus isn't the one who took care of him, and Sirius still said it. Because Regulus is mean, and miserable, and no longer that boy that was once worth loving; now he's just this, just someone who doesn't deserve it, and isn't worth it, and Sirius still said it. Sirius still said it, and he meant it.

Regulus wants to say it back. He wants Sirius to know that he loves him, too, even after everything, even though this is who he is. He's still capable of it. He swears he is.

He just can't get the words out.

Completely oblivious to Regulus' inner turmoil over this, Sirius steps outside, leaving the door cracked as he gives Remus a soft smile. Remus returns it immediately. Regulus looks away, because privacy is so, so important to him now. Everyone deserves privacy. Everyone.

"Reggie," Sirius says, drawing Regulus' gaze, "I know you're dreading it, but I need you to come out to the main room so Pandora and I can prep you and James for the interview."

"How much time do we have?" Regulus asks quietly.

Sirius grimaces. "An hour, and then you both have to go meet with Dorcas. You—you'll have to bathe."

Regulus hates the way he's instantly terrified, every cell in his body screaming out in protest. No, no, he doesn't want to do it again. Please don't make him do it again.

"Dorcas has agreed to only filling the tub a small bit, and she's promised to stay with you the entire time," Sirius says softly, and Regulus wants to just—toss shit around. He wants to slam his dagger into something, or someone, and he doesn't even have it anymore. He keeps searching for his daggers without meaning to, his hands feeling misshapen without them.

Regulus hates feeling like this. Vulnerable. Broken. He hates that the mere thought of water can make him want to crawl right out of his skin. He hates that he's scared, that panic instantly floods his entire nervous system, that it's the equivalent to his life being in danger every time.

What is he going to do? How is he going to do this? Because not being clean is just as much of an issue; that takes him right back to the arena, too. Every bath is—it's torture, it's pain, it's memories and blood clogging his throat and fingers digging into his skin, dragging him down down down…

How is Regulus supposed to live like this? He can't expect someone to talk him through bathing for the rest of his life. He can't just—not bathe for the rest of his life. He doesn't know what he's going to do. He doesn't—

"Regulus," Sirius calls, crouching down in front of him, so close that Regulus clamps down on the arms of his chair so he won't lash out like his instincts demand him to. "Just breathe. Breathe."

Regulus inhales sharply, feeling it stutter in his chest, catching and hitching. Sirius watches him with visible concern, so much of it that Regulus just feels guilty.

"There you go," Sirius murmurs a few moments later, as Regulus' breathing slowly starts to settle into a rhythm that's acceptable. "It's going to be quick, okay? Dorcas promised. In and out and over before you know it, I promise."

I love you, too, Regulus thinks, and he doesn't speak. He can't.

"Come on," Sirius says, standing up. "It's going to be okay, Regulus. I promise it will. Come on, we need to talk."

"I'll go find something to do," Remus mumbles as he pushes to his feet at the same time Regulus does.

Sirius frowns at him. "Don't be ridiculous. You're coming, too. I mean—well, only if you want to. You don't have to, obviously, of course you don't, but—"

"Obviously he's coming," Regulus mutters as he pushes past Sirius, rolling his eyes. Oh, honestly. He genuinely cannot understand how Sirius doesn't realize that there's nothing Remus wants more than just to be around him. Idiots.

"Well, apparently I'm obviously coming," Remus says in wry amusement as he follows them through Regulus' room.

Sirius says something under his breath that makes Remus snort, and Regulus picks up his pace because he really does value privacy more than he ever has, so he refuses to be an interloper to their stupid flirting. Not that he particularly wants to anyway, but regardless.

When Regulus steps out of the hall, he comes to a brief halt, because James is walking around with his cane, apparently getting a feel for it. Practicing. Letting it become an extension of him, because he has to rely on it now, as well as in the future when he needs it. Seeing it makes Regulus want to rewind time and rip Axus' fucking head off.

And that. It's that. Even just looking at James takes him right back. The mere sight of him pushes him to the brink, where he's willing to kill for him, willing to die for him. Being on the brink is terrifying. He doesn't want to be there anymore.

As James turns, he glances up, then comes to a stop as well. Regulus sees his hand clench on the handle of his cane, and despite that, his eyes are soft. Sad. Adoring. There's love there, in his eyes. Regulus misses his glasses.

"Hey," James greets, seemingly calm.

"Hello," Regulus replies, just as steady, despite the fact that this exchange feels so terribly inadequate following the events of the previous night. Regulus wants to crawl into his arms again. Regulus wants to never be touched again.

"I'm, ah…" James clears his throat and gently taps his cane to the floor. "I'm getting better with it. The pain is a bit better today. Shouldn't look like too much of an idiot when walking out on the stage, so that's…you know, nice, I suppose."

This is where Regulus would usually say you always look like an idiot, but he can't bring himself to, because it would be a lie. James never looks like an idiot, certainly not while leaning on his cane. He looks beautiful. He's always so beautiful.

There's a barrier between them. A heavy sort of block that makes Regulus feel itchy. It's genuinely awkward. No matter what they've gone through, they've never been awkward with each other; they've never been uncertain about how to act; they've never been truly uncomfortable in the other's presence, and he's only just realizing this now, because it's the first time it has happened. He despises it.

"Come here, Regulus, sit down," Pandora calls gently, patting the seat beside her with a sympathetic smile.

Regulus looks away from James and moves over to do just that, only to stop a few steps later. He glances at James again, who swallows when their eyes meet. For a second, as their eyes lock, Regulus hears the countdown to the games in the distance. He waits for the cannon, but it never comes.

"You look—good. With the cane. Or, no, not—" Regulus sighs, exhausted already. He ignores the fact that Remus and Sirius are lingering in front of the hallway and Pandora is visibly holding her breath, all of them staring at him like maybe he's grown a second head. "You don't look like an idiot, I mean."

This is where James would usually smile and say no, no, you said I look good, say it again, but he doesn't. He says nothing. Regulus turns away and goes to sit next to Pandora, gaze lowered.

James is ushered into his own chair, while Remus and Sirius plop down next to each other across from Pandora and Regulus. They're holding hands, and their legs are pressed together, which Regulus doesn't look at. That's theirs, no one else's. Regulus thinks he would kill someone if they dared to think they were entitled to any part of it, and then he thinks he has to stop jumping immediately to murder for anything he takes issue with. He never wanted that to become a habit.

"Alright, we don't have much time, so I'm not doing this delicately," Pandora announces. She shifts slightly so she can face Regulus and James at the same time. "You two are going to be interviewed by Rita again, and just like last time, it's not going to be a fun process."

"Understatement," Sirius mutters, sounding oddly nervous, which is Regulus' first clue that something is…wrong. He feels suspicion immediately take root.

"Rita will talk about what happened in the arena," Pandora says firmly, completely no-nonsense and not pulling her punches just to coddle them, which Regulus admittedly appreciates. "That means everything. Everyone you killed. Everyone you lost. She will ask questions; she will want you to talk about how you felt during those moments; she will demand an explanation for the reasons behind every move you made, and every choice you settled on."

Regulus' stomach twists up into knots, his gaze shifting to look at James, who is so still that he looks made of stone. His face is slack, and he looks like he's going to be sick.

"You cannot, under any circumstances, respond aggressively to anything she says," Pandora declares sharply, and there's an edge to her tone that makes Regulus stiffen as he turns his head to stare at her. "You are not allowed to insinuate that you place blame on the Hallow, or Riddle, or the hunger games themselves. You both will take full responsibility for everything that happened, do you understand?"

"Are you fucking joking?" This, surprisingly, comes from Remus. He sounds absolutely furious. "But they're not—"

"I don't care," Pandora hisses, cutting him a sharp look that would make a lesser man shrink back, but Remus does not. If anything, it only seems to make him more defiant.

"Remus," Sirius says quietly, "stop."

"What?" Remus blurts out, whipping his head around to stare at Sirius with wide eyes. "You —"

"Please don't look at me like that," Sirius croaks, his expression pained as he drops his gaze. "I—I know it's—I know how it seems, but she's right."

"There's something you're not telling us," Regulus says as soon as he figures this out. He swings his gaze between Sirius and Pandora. Sirius doesn't meet his gaze. Pandora does.

"What you and James have gone through is not your fault. Neither of you are responsible," Pandora murmurs, her voice softening. "Unfortunately, it's crucial that you lie anyway. Do not acknowledge that everything that happened was out of your control. Even… Regulus, even when she mentions Evan, you can't respond with anger."

Regulus clenches his jaw. "Don't talk about him."

"Like that. You can't do that," Pandora says, her eyes full of remorse. "You have to… I know it's hard—"

"No, you don't," and that, shockingly, is James. Regulus looks at him to see that he's angry, too, his eyes blazing. "You don't fucking know. You don't know anything. You weren't there, and you will never have to be there, and you—you—"

Pandora swallows. "Yeah, that. You definitely can't do that. This anger you have, the both of you, can't exist during this interview. Even though I'm your friend, I'm still a Hallow, and you hold resentment." She lifts a calm hand when Regulus starts to open his mouth. "You have every right to. It's not fair. The Hallow is to blame, and so is Riddle, and I don't know. But that can't matter. On the stage, it can't matter."

"So, we're supposed to just go up there and—and pretend like we don't know that all those people who died never would have if it wasn't for all of this?" James snaps.

"Yes," Pandora whispers. "I'm sorry, but yes."

James scoffs. "Fuck that. They can't just continue in ignorance. They can't just—"

"James," Regulus interrupts, his voice soft and hollowed out, nearly empty. Because he knows. Because he's thinking about Gideon, and he's thinking about Fabian. Because he's sure that Sirius would never agree with their forced compliance if there wasn't danger waiting on them if they refused.

"No," James grits out, glaring at him. "Those that are gone, they deserve better. They deserve better, Regulus. Vanity—" His voice cracks on her name, and he flinches as soon as he's said it. He swallows and shakes his head. "She deserves better. She was too young. She was—I couldn't—I wasn't able to save her, and she was too fucking young, and I—I refuse to—"

"They're dead, James," Regulus rasps. "They're all dead."

"Regulus," James says, staring at him in nothing short of betrayal, looking absolutely capsized by the words.

"You know who isn't dead?" Regulus continues. "Your parents. My parents. Sirius. Barty. They're not dead, James, and I think if we'd like to keep them that way, we should do as we're told."

"What?" James looks around, surging forward with immediate panic, fear in his eyes that makes Regulus tense, automatically ready to kill whatever has him afraid—but this, he can't kill this. It's terrifying. "I—I don't understand."

"The games are still on," Regulus murmurs, closing his eyes as he exhales in a horrible mixture of exhaustion and relief. He's so tired, but he almost feels…better, just to think that there's a reason for him to still be so focused on survival.

The danger is still here. It's here. For some reason, the realization sharpens him. Clears his head. Makes it easier to focus, to breathe, to not feel so lost.

"Defying the Hallow in any blatant way is dangerous, James," Sirius croaks, and when Regulus opens his eyes, he sees that he looks tired, too. Haunted. Regulus understands now. Sirius enters the arena every year, even as a mentor. The realization is crushing. "I'm not—I don't want to frighten you, but it's imperative that neither of you come off as rebellious in any capacity, not even accidentally."

"Oh," Remus says softly, slumping back as his face twists, like he's suddenly understanding as well.

"Are my parents in danger?" James demands. "Sirius, tell me."

"They—no, but they—they could be," Sirius whispers, squeezing his eyes shut, as if the mere thought terrifies him so much that he just wants to block it out. "If this goes wrong, they could be. We all could be."

That settles between all of them, heavy and stifling. James sinks back into his chair, his hands trembling in his lap. Regulus is utterly still. I'm sorry, he thinks. Evan, I'm so sorry.

"Okay," James chokes out, finally. "Okay, I'll—we'll do it. We'll go up there and play their stupid game."

"If it helps, I'm going to essentially give you a script," Pandora mumbles. "When Rita talks about the people who died, those that you lost, you can respond in grief. You can talk about missing them. You can talk about them, that's fine, but you can't talk about how unfair it is that they're gone. You can't say that anyone is at fault for them being gone besides those that killed them. You can't get angry, or defensive, and it's… Well, it's best if you act like their sympathy is helpful."

"Can we say we don't want to talk about it?" Regulus asks.

"No," Pandora whispers. "I'm sorry."

"Then give me something to say," Regulus whispers back, swallowing harshly. "Anything, Pandora, please."

"If you don't know what to say, just—just say that you'll never forget them," Pandora tells him sadly. "Say their sacrifice will remain in your heart forever." She takes a deep breath and sets her shoulders. "There's something else that's—that's really important, and you're not going to like it."

"I never do," Regulus mutters. "What is it?"

Pandora's gaze flicks to James, lingering, and so Regulus looks at him as well. "James, what you did at the end, when you threatened to ingest the venom if they didn't let you and Regulus both come home… It was defiant. Too defiant."

"What?" James croaks, his eyes widening. "But I—I wasn't trying to—I didn't mean to—"

"I know. We know you weren't trying to disregard the system or rebel against order, but nevertheless, there will be some who see it that way," Pandora says, her voice strained. "This is why you're going to actively disband that notion by playing up your one and only motivation."

Slowly, Pandora's eyes crawl to Regulus, and so does James'. After a beat, Regulus glances around to see that Sirius and Remus are also staring at him, and it still takes him a second to realize what's happening. When it hits him, he releases a harsh laugh and launches to his feet.

"Oh, fuck no," Regulus snarls. "Absolutely fucking not."

"Reggie," Sirius says with a heavy sigh.

"No!" Regulus bursts out. "You—you can't seriously be asking me to—to do it again. To give them a fucking show, again. To play into romance for survival, again."

Sirius leans forward and lifts both hands to rub them up and down his face, and then he looks up from his palms to stare at Regulus as he whispers, "I'm sorry."

"What are we supposed to do?" James asks quietly, subdued.

"You're going to have to convince everyone—and I do mean everyone—that it was all about love," Pandora announces, just as regretful as Sirius. "That what happened at the end was out of desperation because you're in love. That everything you did, all of your motivation, was sourced from love. You'll need to present yourselves as—happy and together. A couple. A believable one that everyone will adore."

"I won't do it," Regulus hisses. "No. No, Sirius."

"You don't have a choice," Sirius says, shaking his head. "If this is going to work, you have to do this. It's—it is survival, Regulus, and I'm sorry, I'm so sorry—"

"Fuck off!" Regulus explodes, turning away while cursing vibrantly, feeling like he's about to fly apart.

"Regulus. Reg, come here."

"Fuck you, too, James."

"Regulus," James snaps, and his voice is harsh enough that Regulus actually does halt and release a huff as he swivels around with a glare. "Stop being a brat and come here."

"I should have fucking killed you," Regulus declares.

"But you didn't. Here's the consequences, love." James gives him a tight smile and leans forward, snatching up his cane and holding it from the bottom as he reaches out to hook the handle around Regulus' arm, giving a tug. "I said, come here."

"I'm not doing it," Regulus insists, even as he moves forward with a scowl.

James holds his gaze. "My parents could be in danger, so you will, in fact, be doing it. You're going to hold my hand, and you're going to smile at me, and you're going to tell the entire world that you love me so much that you went into that river because you couldn't imagine living without me. You're going to smile when I tell everyone how much I love you, and you're going to listen as I explain that I planned to drink that venom because I couldn't live without you, and you're going to kiss me back when I lean in for one. We're going to go up there on that stage, and we're going to act like we're so in love that it makes us crazy, and we're going to be so convincing that even we'll struggle to know it's not real. Do you understand?"

"Okay," Regulus whispers, unable to look away from the intensity of James' eyes.

"You're doing it," James reiterates firmly.

Regulus exhales slowly and croaks, "Fine. I'm doing it."

"Okay," James mumbles, his expression changing rapidly from one intensity to another, something entirely different that puts another unfortunate heart flutter in Regulus' chest. Oh, the heart flutters are still here. He'd thought—well, he thought they'd gone. James' voice is soft as he says, "Glad we agree."

"Right," Regulus says, studying James' face helplessly. "Right, yes, we definitely—well, actually, I don't agree at all, but—"

"But you're going to do what I say anyway," James cuts in, his gaze holding Regulus' with unwavering focus, keeping him trapped until it's just the two of them, and nothing else exists.

"Yes," Regulus blurts out, a little stilted and strained, as if he's not getting enough oxygen to his brain. Oh, he hates James Potter so fucking much.

"Well, that's a first," James muses. "How did I manage that, I wonder."

Regulus takes in a short, choppy breath. His chest stutters on his inhale, and that's—well, that's really quite embarrassing, actually. The tension is so thick he feels like he could swim through it, and it's so muddled with his confusion that he's not entirely sure if they're about to fight or—

Nope. No. No, no, no. Absolutely not. Regulus takes a firm step back, watching James blink like he's just been smacked right back into his own body with force. Regulus glances away, resisting the urge to clear his throat.

Sirius looks so uncomfortable right now.

Pandora coughs. "Great. Let's, ah, discuss details, then."

Chapter End Notes

welp.

okay, so first, before we get into me rambling about my own fic like i didn't write it, there's one thing i desperately need everyone to know. in the previous chapter, when sirius starts to leave regulus' room, and regulus calls him back, then hesitates before he says "sorry about your face" (because he hit him), he wanted to tell sirius he loved him. just, ya know, a bit more heartbreaking information for ya. k, thanks.

anyway, let's get into it now, then.

james from an outsider's perspective: seems mostly alright from james' perspective: barely keeping it together

so, yeah, babe isnt doing too well, sadly. he's trying very, VERY hard, as you can tell, and one of the things he was clinging to was regulus. he's STILL clinging to regulus, as in he's in love and intends to wait for their right time. however, he knows and understands that neither of them are in a good enough place for NOW to be the right time, which means that's not something he can really...focus on anymore. it opens up to a delayed trickle of trauma, basically. so he's gradually being unable to avoid his problems or just brush them off.

now, this may seem fucking awful, but opening himself up to the things he's struggling with allows him to get help for it in the future, and it takes time, but let me reassure you, he does. he lets himself be taken care of, after some time, plus sirius wouldn't stand for anything else anyway. like you see little moments of james trying to just Be Okay, like everything that happened to him didn't impact him at all, and then you see little moments of him acknowledging that he's not okay and getting help/support for it.

there's a promise of growth with james, i promise. i know a lot of people take comfort from him as a character (same, honestly), so i think it's really important to show that just because you're not okay doesn't mean you've given up/aren't trying, and that trying is good, yes, but taking care of yourself and letting yourself have help/support is equally important. it's okay not to be okay, and it's okay to need breaks.

right, that concludes the Deep Discussion in zar's overly long end notes. back to the rambling.

regulus! my boy! not doing great 😃 i feel like ive said that a lot in these recent chapters. his main struggles are with water and physical contact. oh, and paranoia, plus murderous tendencies. these are things he will indeed have growth/improvement with, in time.

i better not see one person being upset with regulus (and james, because it's kinda mutual, honestly) for not immediately falling into a relationship. like it's sad as shit, don't get me wrong, but now is NOT the time. and, like, despite this, there's obviously more jegulus in the future. im not a monster (yes i am, this shit is gonna break all of your hearts), they're IN LOVE, they will be happy (eventually...at some point...)

plus, THEY'RE not happy about it either. do you ever think about how fucking tragic it is that the arena is the thing that brought them together, and it's now the thing that's tearing them apart?

and it's in reverse for regulus and sirius. the arena once tore them apart as brothers, and now it's bringing them back together. oh, that's so fucked up.

anyway, the whole interview thing. rest assured, regulus and james talk about it more beforehand, especially boundaries and things like that. like, yes, they have no choice but to do this to keep the people they love safe, and that's devastating, definitely a problem for them, but they figure out how to navigate it as best they can.

also just...

regulus: our chance is gone regulus, less than twelve hours later: gets hot and bothered bc james bosses him around a little me: are you sure that chance is gone? 🤨

honorable mentions:

-shoutout to pandora for handling this, as hard as it was, especially coming from a Hallow, because sirius legitimately Could Not. she's amazing. she's lovely.
-shoutout to remus "be gay, do crime" lupin being a rebellious fucker and not cowering under pandora's glare, and sticking up for james and regulus!
-shoutout to sirius, just because. poor lamb is Doing His Best.
-shoutout to regulus for throwing a tantrum, because i like when he throws tantrums. go ahead, king! stomp your feet and curse up a storm. i support you!
-shoutout to james "you're gonna do what i say" potter shutting that tantrum the fuck down, because lives are at stake! (but also he talks to regulus more and does apologize for like, telling him he had no choice, basically, even though he doesn't. the point is, they talk about it. you get my point)
-final shoutout to wolfstar being stupid and cute in the background. i love them dearly. we see more of them next chapter.

Conviction

Chapter Notes

hello, all!

warnings for this chapter:

-references to past death
-references to past child death
-references to past violence
-discussions about sex
-some spice/heavily implied sexual content (i say heavily implied bc it's not exactly...explicit, if that makes sense? like, you absolutely know what's going on, sex is indeed happening, but i didn't write it out like "okay they're doing this and this is going here etc etc" and there's only light/vague descriptions of things that make you know what is happening, but without explaining in-depth what's happening. i hope that makes sense, and anyway, i will be putting a helpful little tip in the end notes for those of you who would prefer to know when/where to skip or skim read, which is, as always, very valid!!)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

"I miss Fabian," James murmurs as he tugs on the collar of his suit, his shoulder brushing Dorcas' as she walks between him and Regulus, escorting them to Sirius and Pandora.

Regulus is quiet and has been ever since he stepped out with Dorcas in the suit she chose for him. James had been left with two people to get him ready that didn't speak to him, very Hallow-esque in the worst way, in the way Fabian and Gideon never were and Dorcas still isn't.

"I know. Me too," Dorcas replies, and when he looks over at her, the gaze she pins on him is piercing. "Get into the habit of keeping that to yourself, James."

"You know what happened," James says, and he flicks his gaze to Regulus, who is frowning. "You saw our conversation in the arena. When we talked about it, I mean."

Dorcas visibly hesitates, then shakes her head. "They didn't air it, but I…worked it out."

"They—"

"Don't. Don't give me the details."

"Are you in danger?" Regulus asks carefully.

"Oh, don't fret about me, my loves," Dorcas tells them with a gentle smile, something shifting in her eyes that James thinks is solemnity. "I can take care of myself. All you two need to worry about is getting through the interview, yeah?"

"Will you be in the crowd?" James mutters hopefully, because he would give anything for a familiar face to cling to.

"No, not this time," Dorcas says softly.

They don't speak again, even when they reach the door. For a moment, they all linger there, and then Dorcas nods to James' hand and slightly reaches for it, asking for permission to touch him. He meets her halfway, expecting her to squeeze his hand in a gesture of support, but she lifts it to her mouth and presses a kiss to the back of his fingers.

"Oh," James says. "Um."

"Ask Sirius what it means," Dorcas muses as she lowers his hand, lips curling up. She does squeeze his hand, then turns to Regulus, reaching out as well. "May I?"

Regulus visibly hesitates, then shakes his head. Dorcas doesn't seem insulted, just accepts the refusal with a silent nod, offering him a small, warm smile. Regulus doesn't smile back, but his face is just a bit softer, and something passes between them that James doesn't quite understand. It's fragile and sturdy at the same time, somehow, something only they can figure out that seems to have existed between them ever since Dorcas helped him get ready.

James is ridiculously jealous of it. He wants, rather fiercely, to sever whatever it is and steal it for himself. It's an ugly feeling, possessive and envious, so he shoves it down with some sort of internal disgust. This is becoming more frequent; these small changes that are so loud, the worst parts of himself rearing within him more blatantly since getting out of the arena.

When Dorcas pulls away, she leans over and opens the door, letting them inside the room before shutting it behind them and presumably leaving. Pandora and Sirius are already in the room, and they both stop whispering the moment that James and Regulus walk inside.

"Lovely," Pandora says with a fixed smile. "You both look marvelous. Come, James, sit. You have a bit of time."

"Feels better to stand," James mumbles, clicking his cane to the floor to explain. It's a strange pain to navigate, because sometimes his leg aches if he sits too long, and sometimes it aches if he stands too long. It's getting better, little-by-little, or maybe he's just getting better at handling it.

"Alright?" Sirius checks as he comes over, darting his gaze between Regulus and James with equal concern.

"Yeah, fine," James says, if only to reassure him, and Regulus doesn't respond at all.

"You have about ten minutes," Pandora announces, taking a deep breath and slowly letting it out. "Sirius and I wanted to ask, and the decision is yours, but we can go sit in the crowd during the interview if you—"

"Yes," James and Regulus say in perfect unison, absolutely no hesitation in their tones at all. Regulus swallows and looks down when Pandora and Sirius' faces soften at the same time, and James exhales shakily. "Yes, please. Thank you."

"Of course," Pandora murmurs.

Sirius clears his throat, blinking hard. "That means we have to go now. We'll see you out there, alright?"

"Where will you be sitting?" James croaks.

"Front row," Sirius assures him.

"We'll let you two…get settled," Pandora says, a reminder for what they have to do and how to act, what roles they have to play. She looks so fucking sorry about it, even as she nods at them and threads her arm through Sirius', the both of them whispering goodbyes and well wishes before they go.

It's silent when it's just them, just James and Regulus, noise so absent that it's somehow loud and echoing. It takes James a second to realize neither of them are breathing.

How are they going to do this?

James doesn't want to do this. Everything in him hates it, because he never wanted to be here again, just pretending. Forced to put on a performance. Faking it. He's overly aware that everything they're about to do won't be real, and it's not fair. They could have had something real, once upon a time. The window of opportunity for that seems to be closing more and more with each passing demand they have to fulfill.

The worst part is, James is riddled with guilt for telling Regulus that he was going to do it, regardless of what he wants, or doesn't want. It sickens James a bit, but for his parents, he'll demand it. He'll do it. He'll do anything to keep them safe, to keep all of them safe, no matter how much it hurts. If nothing else, Regulus seems to understand that.

James exhales and apologizes anyway. "I'm sorry."

"Not your fault," Regulus mumbles.

"No, but I—" James swallows and squeezes his eyes shut, then leans hard on his cane as he turns to face him. "I shouldn't have spoken to you like—like you had no choice in this."

"I don't," Regulus says simply. "Neither do you."

"I know, but I—"

"Stop it, James. I was—well, you were right. I was being a brat about it, just because it's upsetting, but I would have still ended up right here, doing it anyway. You just…got me to the conclusion quicker, that's all. And—and don't act like you're not going through the same thing."

"I just—hate it," James confesses.

Regulus nods slowly. "I know. Believe it or not, that actually makes all of this more bearable. If it's worth anything to you, there's no one I'd rather be in this predicament with."

"That's worth so much," James whispers, and it is, and he doesn't even know what to do with that. He doesn't know how to handle it. He isn't used to Regulus being…sweet? No, that's not the right word. More like he's not used to Regulus being even slightly open to the concept of them that he doesn't scoff and respond with derision at the mere hint.

"I'm—James, I'm scared," Regulus whispers back, looking at him with wide eyes, and despite the fact that James has seen him covered in blood, he still looks so innocent. "I don't know how to do this. I'm not good at this. We broke up last night partially because I can't do this."

Well, that's…a lot to unpack, frankly. James isn't even sure where to start with that. His mind is in an uproar. "We broke up? This is news to me. I wasn't aware we were together."

"We weren't," Regulus says, heaving a weary sigh.

"Right," James says, frowning. He tries to make sense of that, then just gives up. "Right, yeah. That's… Well, I suppose that's on brand for us. Managing to break up when we're not even together. So much for not being a great, big tragedy."

Regulus' lips curl up sadly. "Always so close, but never close enough. At least we're consistent."

"I'd prefer to shake things up a little, if I'm honest," James admits sheepishly, and Regulus snorts. "Listen, about…this, I think it'll help to remember we're in it together."

"Yes, but you know how to be…" Regulus bites his lip, his eyebrows tugging together. "I mean, you're—you're so good at loving people. You just… You do it better than anyone I've ever known." James feels warmth flood his chest when he realizes that Regulus sounds like he admires him for that. "But me? I'm fucking awful at it. I never get it right."

"I beg to differ," James protests, and Regulus looks at him incredulously. James frowns. "Regulus, love isn't... When I talk about love, I don't mean romantic love exclusively, you know that, don't you? Love is—it's not just romance. It's in...everything. Life. The breeze. Sunshine and snow. It's everywhere, in us and around us, even just...blood. Love can be blood, too. Blood spilt. Blood in our veins. Blood flowing in the people around us."

Regulus stares at him, his eyes a little wide, lips parted a bit. Honestly, it makes James feel ridiculously flustered. Regulus looks—well, there he is, a star, and he's starstruck.

James feels his stomach go all topsy-turvy from a sudden migration of butterflies, and he has to violently clear his throat before continuing. "What I mean to say is, no matter what the Hallows think, romantic love isn't some goal everyone should feel the need to meet. Some people don't feel that way, and that doesn't mean there's no love in their life. No one needs romantic love to be fulfilled as a person. Not everyone wants it, and then there are those who aren't ready, and all of it is okay. That doesn't mean there's an absence of love, or that you're getting it wrong. You're not, Regulus, I promise."

"I know some people don't want it—romantic love, that is—and you're right to say that's okay, and that it's not required, but I—I do want—I—" Regulus halts, swallowing harshly, and James feels like his heart splinters a little bit. Regulus shakes his head abruptly, coughing. "Anyway, that's not—I'm not even getting the whole...love thing right from any angle, James. I'm—I'm genuinely shit at it."

"Regulus," James says softly.

"I don't know how to make people love me," Regulus croaks, "and I don't know how to love properly in return."

"I think you're being too hard on yourself," James tells him honestly. "Love isn't just something you say; more than anything, it's something you feel. If you feel it, then you're already doing it. And you feel it, Reg, I know you do. If for no one else, then for Sirius."

"I wish I could say it," Regulus rasps. "He should hear it."

"He knows," James murmurs gently, a promise.

"Five minutes," is the warning they get, very abruptly, the door opening as someone steps out, then leaves again right after. In the distance, they can hear the crowd cheering as Rita's voice drifts out to them, invigorating everyone.

All the color drains from Regulus' face immediately, and he looks frightened in less than a second, utterly terrified, which wakes something up in James. A ruthless, protective instinct that stretches out in his chest, somehow making it easier for him to breathe, to be calm. James can do this. He can help Regulus with this, and take care of him. Just this once, he wants to take care of Regulus and get it right.

James turns his back to the door, stepping closer to Regulus so he's all that Regulus can see. That, at least, seems to help. Quietly, James says, "Can I touch you?"

"You have to," Regulus whispers.

"Not yet. So, I'm asking. Can I touch you now, when it's just us, when it's not because we have no choice?" James insists, keeping his voice low.

Regulus stares at him, then swallows. "No."

James doesn't know if he's saying it just to be able to say it while he still can, or if he genuinely doesn't want to be touched, but either way, James is going to respect it. He'll wait right here until Regulus is ready, until he's okay with it, the Hallow be damned.

"Alright," James says simply. He holds out his hand not on his cane. "Whenever you're ready, Regulus, and not a moment before. And that's all we'll do. Just hold hands. That will just have to be enough."

"It won't be," Regulus whispers.

James holds his gaze. "Sucks for them, then, doesn't it?"

"Kiss me," Regulus blurts out, and James jolts, his hand twitching in the air. Regulus' face promptly turns red all at once. "I—I mean, out there. I can do one kiss. A small one. Short, preferably. At least once, James. If—if you're okay with that."

"Are you okay with that?" James asks quietly.

"I think—I think you're the only thing I'm going to be okay with out there," Regulus tells him softly.

"But are you okay with it?" James asks again.

"Yes," Regulus murmurs, and James searches his eyes, finding that he's telling the truth.

"Time to go," is the announcement they get when the person comes back. Regulus swallows and closes his eyes. James doesn't budge an inch.

"Not a moment before you're ready," James reminds Regulus, lifting his hand a bit from where it fell in his surprise about the kiss request. Regulus opens his eyes and looks at him and looks, again, starstruck. Awed. Adoring. It makes James' heart melt.

It takes a beat, then another, and then one more before Regulus exhales all at once and steps forward, reaching out to grab James' hand.

~•~

Regulus is probably strangling James' hand as they make their way onto the stage, the room practically trembling with the ear-splitting cheers and shrieks of people that are making their admiration and approval very clear. Regulus remains at James' pace, staying by his side all the way to their seats.

Rita is beaming at them. As the shrieks of delight die down, Regulus imagines slitting her throat, then struggles not to grimace at the thought.

"Well," Rita breathes out, "I think I speak for everyone when I say it is an absolute delight to see you both again."

"The pleasure is ours, Rita," James replies, his most charming grin plastered right on his face. Regulus sees right through it, but James is still beautiful, even putting on a show. So, that's who Regulus looks at. James. Just James.

Regulus forces himself to stop thinking about how fucked up this is, because he can feel his unease and his anger starting to rise in him. That's too risky here. He can't fuck this up; he can't be responsible for inviting more danger in their lives and in the lives of those they care about. Instead, he studies the way James' eyelashes kiss his cheeks when he blinks, committing it to memory.

"And here you are, with Regulus," Rita says. "You fought so hard to get here. You both fought so hard."

"We were just fighting for each other," James tells her.

"Is that so?" Rita asks, and then there's a long beat of silence. Someone in the crowd coughs, and then Rita chuckles, which makes more laughter ring out. "Regulus?"

Blinking, Regulus rips his gaze away to see that Rita is looking right at him with her eyebrows raised. "Sorry, what?"

"You seem a bit distracted by James, dear," Rita teases.

"Oh. Well, yes, I—" Regulus glances at James again, then just keeps looking at him, because he prefers that over looking at anyone else. It's the only source of comfort Regulus has right now, just the sight of James. But he has a role to play, so he thinks about the most sickening response he could give at this moment and goes with that. "You'll have to forgive me, Rita. I find it difficult to look anywhere else when he's around."

"Well, isn't that sweet?" Rita coos, and the crowd makes it clear that they agree. "I can understand that. Young love, especially in the aftermath of the battle you both fought for it—of course you're enjoying your spoils. You in particular, Regulus, fought very hard. I have to admit, it surprised me how determined you were to keep James safe."

"It felt like the only thing that mattered," Regulus murmurs, and maybe that's a lie, but maybe it's a little bit true, too. He doesn't know, not really, but he is sure that it's something they're all going to like to hear. And they do.

"You know, usually, we would talk about your time in the arena, but I'd like to spend more time talking about the two of you. I'd say we're all intrigued by your story, because there's a lot more to it than we originally thought," Rita muses, and Regulus feels a rush of relief and fear at the same time. "So, let's get the arena stuff out of the way first. Starting with you, Regulus, I wanted to talk about Evan."

Right out of the gate, no hesitation, not pulling punches—and Regulus hates her. He hates her for this, because he's not—he isn't ready. He doesn't want to talk about Evan. He wants to talk to Evan, but Evan isn't here, and it hurts. It still hurts.

"Evan," Regulus croaks, his voice thick against his will as he finally turns his gaze away from James, just slightly. He finds Sirius in the front row, Pandora right next to him, and they both look completely neutral, as if—at any second—someone might look to them to see their reactions.

"Yes, Evan," Rita says, her voice gentle, but it's all faked. She doesn't care, not really. The saccharine lilt to her voice grates on all of his nerves. "You got close with him, and he helped you and James as well. I believe it broke all of our hearts when he died. It clearly broke yours."

"He was my friend," Regulus whispers, and even from here, he can see the strain around Sirius' eyes, a mixture of pain for what Regulus went through and fear for what he's going through now. Regulus swallows thickly and drops his gaze to his lap. "He was my friend, and I—I will never forget him. His sacrifice will remain in my heart forever."

The worst part is that it's true.

"You carved something into the tree next to him," Rita says, and Regulus feels his heart jump, because it's—it's not good. It's fucking dangerous. He shouldn't have, but a part of him still doesn't regret it. "Hallow is Hollow. What does that mean?"

You know what it means, Regulus thinks. You all know what it means. All of you are hollow, carved out and empty, just shells of human beings, placeholders for all of those who deserve to live when most of you don't. Evan should be here. You should all be dead.

That isn't what Regulus says. He's been instructed on what to say, which is, "His loss was felt by all, I'm sure. The Hallow was hollow without him, as soon as he was gone that night. I know you all were grieving just as I was. As hollow as I felt when he died, I know you were all with me."

It couldn't be farther from the truth, and again, Regulus thinks I'm sorry, Evan, I'm so sorry.

"Very well put. It was tragic for us all," Rita declares, and the crowd makes soft, sympathetic noises of agreement. None of them have earned the right, and it takes genuine effort not to respond explosively. James grips his hand harder, like he's holding him still, reminding him to remain steady. "There are other moments in particular I'd like to talk about, as far as the other tributes. Mulciber, for example. You chopped off his hand, and I have to ask, what pushed you to do that?"

"He made James flinch," Regulus replies simply. Rita's eyebrows fly up, which makes him very uncomfortable, but he doesn't let it show "I told him what would happen if he did that. He was warned."

"Well, you're not wrong," Rita agrees, looking delighted. "And what about Irene? There was a moment, you know, when she was telling James you were jealous of her. Were you?"

"While you were carrying the bridge and I was walking back with her," James explains, when he's been quiet for too long, purely out of shock. Irene died in pain; he killed her out of mercy and sat with her until she was gone, and they care about if he was fucking jealous or not?

Regulus has to take another second to keep from shouting at everyone, but he plays it off with a cough, trying to tug a sheepish smile on his face. "Yes, well, jealousy is a bit of a character flaw, I suppose. I'm not immune to it."

"So, some part of you must have relished in being the one to officially kill her, yes?" Rita asks.

"I—" Regulus struggles with this, genuinely stunned. He knows what they want to hear, but he just—he can't do it. He can't. "No, I—I think, by the end, I was just…"

"He knew deep down that she posed no threat to our relationship," James swoops in with ease, and Regulus squeezes his hand in thanks. "He has nothing to worry about in that regard. No one else even compares."

Again, the crowd eats this up with relish.

"Yes, but you did seem to flirt with her," Rita points out, flicking her gaze between them like she's trying to poke holes through their relationship. "After all, when she insinuated that you two would have fun together, you agreed, didn't you?"

"I did," James admits calmly, "approximately five seconds after informing her that I wasn't interested, because the only person I'm interested in is Regulus."

"A loyal man. We love to see it," Rita comments with a sharp smile, and Regulus has to go back to looking at James so he won't just fucking lunge for her. Humans are so frail, really. He could snap her neck in seconds. "Why don't we talk about you now, James? Let's start with Vanity."

Regulus feels James go rigid next to him. His smile is frozen on his face, and there's pain blooming in his eyes that can't be hidden, and Rita… Oh, Rita…

Rita's days are fucking numbered.

~•~

"Vanity," James breathes out, trying to shove down the urge to vomit. He doesn't want to do this. He doesn't want to be here anymore. He never wanted to be here. He can't do this. He—

Regulus abruptly lays his head over on James' shoulder, pressing closer and quite literally just snuggling up to him while the whole world is watching. He's squeezing James' hand over and over, and James gets a brief moment to breathe as the crowd responds happily to their display of affection. It was more than James was expecting from Regulus, and he knows Regulus is doing it to try and help. James is so grateful for it.

Rita lets it happen, even if it seems to agitate her, and James forces himself to take control of the situation before she can.

"Yes, Vanity was a hard loss," James announces, and the crowd dies down immediately. "I can only hope that, in her last moments, I brought her a sense of comfort. Knowing her for the short amount of time that I did was one of the best things that's ever happened to me, and like Regulus with Evan, I'll never forget her and I'll carry her in my heart forever."

James tries to figure out if that's true or not. A part of him feels like it is, because he doesn't regret knowing Vanity, but at the same time, he's still so fucking devastated by her death. He wishes he could have saved her. He wishes…

"It was so sad that Hodge killed her. A boy she fancied, too, which makes it so much more tragic," Rita muses, clicking her tongue. "Is that why you killed him, James? To avenge her?"

James has had a gut wound that hurt less than hearing those words. Is that why you killed him? James killed him. A fourteen year old boy, a day before his birthday, and James killed him. I didn't mean to, James thinks desperately, his eyes stinging as he feels the tears start to gather in his eyes. I never wanted to. I never wanted to kill him, or kill anyone, and it wasn't my fault, but it was, and I'm sorry, I'm sorry, I'm so sorry.

"Hodge was just in the wrong place at the wrong time," Regulus says softly, stroking James' hand with his thumb. He lifts his head and heaves a sigh. "Just a boy running with the wrong crowd. What happened between him and Vanity was tragic, but I don't doubt that having James with her at the end made her feel safe, and loved. He's good at making people feel that way, no matter what's going on. I would know."

"Wrong place, wrong time. Yes, I'd say so." Rita nods and folds her hands on her crossed legs. "I can tell you're eager to talk about the love between you. Don't worry, not too long now. There's one more I'm eager to talk about. Peter."

"Peter," James repeats, feeling numb.

Rita hums. "See, you and Regulus didn't get to witness everything Peter did, not as the audience did. Not only did he betray all of you, which led to so many people dying, but he actively sought out Bernice and Axus after the rule change. You may not know this, but he went to them. He chose to be a death eater."

He just wanted to go home. He was just trying to survive, James thinks, a lump in his throat. He wants to say it. Even now, he wants to believe the best in people. Maybe Peter wasn't a person who did the right thing under circumstances that put strain on him, that led him to a brutal desperation for survival. Maybe he was a traitor—to James, to Bernice, even to himself at the end. But, if he wasn't there, if it wasn't about survival, would he have ever done anything wrong? He never liked violence. He was afraid. He just wanted to go home, and he never thought he would, and then he didn't.

James has horrible, messy mixed feelings about Peter, because as much as he wants to believe in him, he's also so fucking angry at him. He did betray James. He betrayed them all. James would have never done that. He would have died first.

But he was always willing to die for the right reasons, wasn't he? Peter… Well, James thinks he never was.

James hates him.

James misses him.

"He couldn't kill me," James says, finally. His voice is hard, unforgiving like steel. This is all he can say. "When it came down to it, he didn't have it in him to be the one to kill me."

"Do you think, if Bernice had killed you, he would have been able to live with it?" Rita asks.

"Yes," James croaks, because he does. He thinks that if it hadn't fallen on Peter to give the killing blow, if it was him and Bernice sitting up here now, he would have carried on. Would he have mourned James?

James still doesn't know.

"What do you think, Regulus?" Rita turns to him, curious.

"I think…" Regulus squeezes James' hand again, and James doesn't know how he knows, but he can tell it's a warning this time. Telling him to brace himself. Telling him he's not going to like this response. James holds his breath. "I don't care. All that matters to me is that James is here, and I'm here with him. Everything else…it doesn't matter. I don't care."

It's such a horrible, cruel thing to say—and James doesn't believe it for a second. There's no way Regulus doesn't care. You don't get to go through all that they have and be blessed with indifference when you come out the other side. Not caring would be easier. It would hurt less.

But. Well, there's something important about the fact that they do care. Even after everything, they still have it within them to care, and that means something. All this anger, this pain, this trauma—they have to feel it, because people matter, and those that are gone deserve to be cared about. All of them, every single one, twenty-two people who would still be here if the world wasn't what it is, if the world was what it should be.

"Ah, well, love does have that effect," Rita agrees, chuckling along with the crowd. "Alright, alright, we'll get to the good parts, then." As if those that have died are just on a checklist that she rushed through, because no one cares, not really. It makes James feel sick. "I want to talk about your history. You two were holding out on me! Imagine my surprise when learning that James was your first love, Regulus."

"My only love," Regulus is quick to correct, his voice soft and sweet, and the crowd goes ballistic immediately.

Rita grins. "Your only love, then. Very sweet. You two are just adorable, truly. Go on, give us the scoop. Tell us more."

"Well," Regulus says slowly, "it's like I said in the arena. I used to have a very embarrassing crush on James, for about five years. I took one look at him and…honestly, I never stood a chance. James…could tell."

"You were very obvious, love," James teases.

Regulus flashes him a quick smile, but his gaze is sharp, which makes it clear that this is still a sore subject for him. James doesn't think Regulus has any reason to be embarrassed, but of course Regulus doesn't see it that way. "I know. Looking back, it was really mortifying, actually. I was besotted."

"Did Sirius know?" Rita asks, always the one with the hard questions. Oh, she's evil. James does not like her.

"About my crush? I don't know. Sirius, did you know?" Regulus calls, leaning forward to look out at Sirius, who slaps on a grin as soon as all eyes turn to him. Well, that's one way to handle that question. Let Sirius handle it. Sure. James didn't even consider that, but Regulus has the mindset of a little brother, so James figures that makes sense.

Sirius chuckles and gives a lazy shrug. "I suppose I knew, at least in the beginning. I just sort of assumed you'd grow out of it. I didn't know it was…as deep as it was. It was cute, though. You blushed a lot when he was around."

"Alright, thank you, no more input from you," Regulus says, making a show of rolling his eyes, and laughter spills out over the room. James helplessly chuckles along with everyone else.

"But, from what I understand, you did grow out of it," Rita continues, arching an eyebrow. "In fact, you made it quite clear that you spent the next ten years hating him."

"Just in time for me to fall head over heels for him, too," James says with a put upon sigh, trying to give Regulus more time to find a response to that. "I suppose that's fair. I wasn't exactly the nicest about him having a crush before that, you see. I sort of teased him about it, actually. Not maliciously. I was just so young and couldn't even see what I had right in front of me."

"Well, it all worked out in the end," Regulus murmurs. James' heart clenches, because no, no it did not. "The truth is that sometimes, feelings persist, and sometimes you don't even realize it. I thought… I really did think that I had grown out of it, had grown to hate him, even, but when it came down to it, that wasn't the case. It was always love between us; it's always going to be love. We have fifteen years of proof of that."

"Your love is so special," Rita says softly, and James can hear people out in the crowd weeping. "It's so strong that neither of you seemed willing to live without each other." She leans forward and gazes at them, faux sympathy in her eyes. "I know this will be hard for both of you, but let's revisit that moment when the rule changed for the second time. Regulus, you walked right into a river for the man you love. James, you were planning to die if he did. Tell us about that."

"I just—I didn't want to be without him. All I could think about was getting him back," James whispers, and a few people gasp softly. "Nothing else mattered but him. Having him again. The thought of losing him—" His voice helpfully cracks in his throat, and he lets it. He gives into the fear, the desperation, letting everyone see it. "I couldn't bear it. All I wanted was to be with him, for us to be together."

"Of course, James. Of course," Rita agrees gently, her gaze turning to Regulus. "And you?"

"I felt the same way," Regulus says, and it comes out so earnest that it almost circles back around into performative. James presses his leg into Regulus' a little more firmly. More. There needs to be more. Regulus doesn't bother to disguise the way his breath shakes on his exhale, and then he gives them more. Plenty more. "It felt like I was dying because he was. I just wanted him to be okay. I—I realized then that there was no home without James. He's my home, so I—well, I would never have a home if he died. I didn't want to go on without him."

The crowd is a mixture of soft sighs and soft sobs, but James swivels his head to look at Regulus, who is already looking at him. James doesn't mean to, but he finds himself searching Regulus' eyes—those eyes of his. James knows them so well, and he can see the truth in them. Regulus wasn't lying.

James lifts his hand carefully to cup Regulus' jaw, and Regulus doesn't hesitate to turn his face up into the kiss that James very gently brushes over his mouth. It's innocent. Sweet, really. Barely even there, and it only lasts seconds. The crowd still goes wild.

Rita draws back, looking pleased. "Well, you two are just lovely, aren't you? We love your love, don't we?" She laughs and looks out at the crowd, everyone absolutely losing their minds in support and delight. It baffles James that they could be so invested in romance, so moved by love, yet so indifferent to death, to pain, to all that's wrong in this fucked up system only they benefit from. Rita quiets the crowd, then focuses back on them, beaming. "So, I suppose my next question is one we're all eager to know. What's next for you two?"

Regulus' voice is soft, so soft, when he says, "I think we'll go home and share a bookshelf, and dance late at night by a fire, and make up for a lot of lost time…"

James' eyes flutter shut as he listens to Regulus describe the other life they never got to have, the one where they're not a great, big tragedy. For one second, he lets himself pretend that's what they're going to do, wrapping the comfort of it around him like a blanket, even though that's not what's next for them. It should have been. They deserve that, after everything. And yet, it's not.

Just because it's not what comes next doesn't mean it's not in their future at all, though. Maybe, one day, they'll get there.

Maybe.

~•~

Sirius heaves a sigh as he slips into the suite, the tension easing out of him as soon as he sees Remus and Pandora sitting in the main room, heads bent together. He glances around, but James and Regulus are nowhere to be found.

"They're in their rooms. Just needed some time," Pandora explains. "How did it go?"

"Everything is handled," Sirius murmurs. "We leave early tomorrow morning. I need to—I have to talk to them, but—"

"Go," Pandora cuts in firmly. "You know how this goes. I'll see you off in the morning. No point in saying goodbye tonight."

"I'll wait for you in your room, if that's alright," Remus says quietly, standing up and not quite meeting Sirius' eyes. His tone is heavy, and so is Sirius' heart.

Sirius can only bring himself to nod, following Remus down the hall and watching him slip into his room as he continues on, stopping by James' first. He knocks gently and pokes his head in, finding James sitting on the floor against the wall beside his bed, his cane propped up next to him.

Cautiously, Sirius moves over and carefully sits down across from James right there on the floor, leaning back against the bed. Even with being in his direct line of sight, James still doesn't seem to notice Sirius at all. His gaze is unfocused, and he's staring down at his limp hands in his lap.

"James," Sirius says, getting no response. Swallowing, Sirius takes a deep breath and tries again. "James."

That time, James gives a violent blink, lifting his head just as a tear falls from his eye and slips down his cheek, almost like an afterthought. He absently dashes it away like he doesn't even realize it's there, giving Sirius a small, bemused smile. "Oh, Sirius, I didn't hear you come in."

"That's alright," Sirius murmurs, his heart clenching. He hesitates, not entirely sure if he should ask why James is crying or not. That's the thing, isn't it? There are countless things

James has to cry about. Sirius knows what it's like not to want to talk about them. Before he gets the chance to figure it out either way, James speaks.

"Was it enough? The interview, I mean."

"I'm quite sure that it was, yes. You and Regulus did good, James. You did everything right."

"Did we?" James whispers, his face twitching, and then he waves his hand like he can swat the implications of that question away. "Nevermind. So, it should be okay?"

"It should be," Sirius confirms, because he's quite sure that it will be. Everyone adores James and Regulus, their love story, their happy ending. It's all anyone can talk about, just that they loved each other so much that they refused to live without the other—and if they're talking about that, then they're not talking about how James briefly had the entire Hallow by the throat without even knowing it, without even trying.

"We go home tomorrow, don't we?" James asks hopefully, like he's eager, and Sirius can't blame him for that. He no doubt wants to see his parents again.

"Yeah, we go home tomorrow," Sirius says softly.

"That's it? It's done?"

Sirius hesitates, feeling cramped on the inside, like he's just going to—overflow. The guilt crawls under his skin, and he wants to rip it right out. "James…"

"It's not done," James corrects glumly. He looks at Sirius for a long moment, then releases a hoarse laugh. "Oh. Right. The fucking victory tour six months after. Tell me about that."

"Right." Sirius swallows. "Well, you know how it works, because we've had victors in our district every year. So, you and Regulus will have to… You'll stand on a stage and give a little speech about the fallen tributes from each district."

"A little speech," James repeats flatly.

"Don't worry," Sirius says softly, "Pandora and I will write something out for you both. It's—it's important that you and Regulus are a united front throughout this, and it'd help if you two would be affectionate on camera as well."

"Sirius—"

"No, okay, I know. James, I know it's fucked, and I'm—I'm so sorry. I'm really sorry. You—you have no idea how sorry I am."

James sighs. "I'm not blaming you, Sirius. I just don't think that Regulus will…do that. He and I—well, we broke up. That's what he said, in any case."

"You were together?" Sirius asks, startled as well as a little offended that he wasn't at least notified. When the fuck did this happen?

"No, not at all. This was news to me, too, don't feel bad." James shakes his head and throws up both hands, a mixture of fond and wry and exhausted. "To tell you the truth, Sirius, I haven't a fucking clue what's going on in your brother's head half the time. But, you know, apparently we broke up, so that's just… Well, it's shit, isn't it?"

Sirius opens his mouth.

"You have to agree and be here for me because I'm your best friend and I've been dumped without even being in a relationship, which is so sad and pathetic that I don't even know where to begin, so you are contractually obligated to feel sorry for me," James interrupts before he can ever speak.

Sirius closes his mouth. He pauses, adjusts, then gives a firm nod and says, "Yes, it's shit, and I'm very sorry. I'm… James, honestly, I am sorry."

"It's…fine," James mumbles, sighing again. He gives a pained sort of smile and looks away. "But, my point is, I don't really think that Regulus is going to…"

"I'll talk to him," Sirius assures him. "When the time comes, I'll handle it. You don't have to worry about any of that now, James. The most important thing is that as soon as tomorrow afternoon, you'll see your parents again."

James relaxes a little. "Yeah. That's… Yeah, thank you."

"What're you thanking me for, honestly?" Sirius asks, utterly exasperated.

"Because, if it wasn't for you, I wouldn't be seeing my parents again at all," James tells him bluntly, and even as horrible as that sentence is, he manages a sincere smile. "You saved my life, Sirius. You saved Regulus' life. You saved us both."

"I think we all had a hand in saving each other," Sirius says softly, and James nods. They stare at one another for a long, long time, not saying a word, so much sitting between them that it's hard to see past it. But they're here. For a moment, they both bask in the absolute gratitude they feel to just get to exist with each other again.

"You should go see Regulus," James says, eventually.

Sirius nods, shifting to lean forward, and then he pauses and holds up his finger. "Ah, wait, I have something for you." He reaches into his coat in the pocket lining the silk, drawing out James' glasses with a small smile. "I spoke with Dorcas after the interview, just checking in with her and saying goodbye, and she made sure to get these back to you."

James stares at them, then swallows thickly and reaches out to grab them with shaking fingers. He slowly looks up at Sirius and whispers, "Will you help me take my contacts out?"

"Absolutely," Sirius replies instantly, then shuffles over to do just that.

It's a bit of a process that somehow leads them both to laugh quietly when Sirius makes faces at James from up close, or when James accidentally pokes himself in the eye, or when Sirius speaks to James' eyelashes like they're sentient. Between the two of them, they do eventually manage to get the contacts out—more advanced Hallow shit, the kind that James never had to change, and could sleep with—and then James is slipping his glasses on his face while blinking rapidly.

Sirius stares at him.

"Do I look stupid?" James blurts out, sounding absurdly anxious, more insecure and nervous than Sirius has ever heard him. Sirius remembers when he got home and was so afraid his leather jacket wouldn't fit the same way before he went into the arena; he remembers crying profusely when it did.

"No, James," Sirius whispers. "You look like you."

James exhales slowly and reaches up to push his glasses up his nose, chewing on his lip. "They don't feel as strange as I was expecting them to."

"You've been wearing them your whole life." Sirius reaches out and taps the corner of the circular frames fondly. "No matter how it may seem, the arena and the Hallow and all of this isn't going to erase everything. It can't. Even with me, it never could. As much as it can take from us, there are some things that we'll always have."

"What's yours?" James asks curiously. "What's the one thing it never managed to take?"

Sirius smiles at him, gently. "You."

"I'd never leave you, not really. Even if I was—" James stops, then reaches out and presses his balled up fist to Sirius' chest, right in the middle, right between his lungs. He doesn't press hard, but Sirius feels the pressure anyway, and he welcomes it. It settles him. "I'm always with you, Sirius, no matter what."

"Fine, yes, I'll marry you and have your babies," Sirius says with a put upon sigh, breaking out into a grin when James is startled into laughter, dropping his hand as his eyes light up.

It's the first time James laughs—really laughs—since returning from the arena, and Sirius just soaks it up, letting it warm him all the way through. It's not that he forgot how nice it is to see joy on James' face; it's just that he hasn't seen it in so long. He's missed it, he really has.

"Oh, it's my dream come true," James teases, playful, his eyes sparkling. "I mean, both Black brothers? You know—"

"Why did you have to make it weird?" Sirius groans, scrunching up his face, though it doesn't last long when James laughs again, loud and hard and happy, like maybe he's just as eager to do it as Sirius is to hear it, and that's why he's making jokes, doing a bit, trying and trying and always trying.

James laughs so long and so fully that he just slumps over on his side and curls up on the floor, apparently needing to take a minute to catch his breath. "Oh, fuck, I needed that."

"You and me both," Sirius murmurs, lips curled up. He didn't really laugh that much, too caught up in his relief of seeing James laugh, but the statement still stands. "Come on, get off the floor, you freak. At least lay on your bed, for fuck's sake."

"Feels too soft," James mumbles, "and I—I don't want to sleep alone. I—"

"I'll come back after talking to Remus," Sirius offers immediately.

James bolts upright, jaw clenched. "You will do no such thing. You can come after Remus is gone for the night, but not a second before. I'll be fine waiting."

"James—"

"No. No, Sirius. I will be fine, and you—you deserve to spend time with him, okay? He deserves it. Just—I don't know—have sex with him or something."

"Have—" Sirius rears back, eyes bulging as he sputters in disbelief. "Sorry, what?"

"Oh." James bites his lip. "Are you two not there yet?"

Sirius blinks at him. "I mean… We—okay, well, we almost…you know." It's mortifying, but Sirius can feel his face getting hot, his ears burning. He feels stupid, like a modest little prude who starts squirming the moment anything hinting at sex comes up, which is ridiculous because he's never like this in front of… Well, he's only like this in front of the people who know him, really know him, and what he presents to everyone else—that's not real. It's a facade. A performance. This, in all his blushing, flustered glory, is Sirius Black at his most honest.

"You almost had sex?" James asks bluntly. Unlike Sirius, he has no such issues. He's a total whore. Sirius loves that about him.

"Sort of. A…form of it? We stopped before it went anywhere, and we didn't even get out of our pants," Sirius admits, covering his face with his hands.

"Ah, frottage," James says fondly, releasing a wistful sigh, and when Sirius peeks at him, he's got this look in his eyes like he's remembering something in vivid detail.

"You better not be thinking about my brother right now."

"I'm absolutely thinking about your brother right now."

"James," Sirius groans.

Chuckling, James grins at him. "What? I should have never kept it from you, really. I should have told you that same morning that it happened. I was so guilty that I didn't."

"Look, just—keep the details to a minimum, please," Sirius says, strained. "Broad statements are more than enough. In fact, the less you say, the better I feel. You really don't have to tell me all about it. He's my little brother, for fuck's sake."

"Well, you know, not much happened anyway. He didn't even get off," James says sadly. He pauses, his eyes glazing over a bit. "He got me off, though, which was—"

"Okay, enough," Sirius cuts in, waving his hands frantically back and forth through the air. James blinks at him, then huffs out a soft laugh. "I—really didn't need to know that. What I do need to know is unrelated to my brother at all."

"Sure, fire away."

"Um. Sex."

James raises his eyebrows. "Yes?"

"How?" Sirius asks weakly.

"Remus, you lucky bastard," James chokes out, laughing, and his gaze is bright with humor as Sirius' entire face explodes with heat. Delighted, James folds his uninjured leg up and leans forward, bracing his elbow on it as he props his chin in his hand. "Alright, settle in, it's time we had the talk."

"I am twenty-six years old, James. I'm not oblivious to the process. I'm an adult."

"Then what are you asking?"

"Um. Tips?" Sirius mumbles, making a face.

"Sirius, honestly, I think it'll be fine because you two like each other and want to be together. That's more important than technique anyway, and that's what will make it good—how you feel for each other, the emotion, above all else."

"Right, yes, but I'd like to be good at it."

"Oh, well, I'm sure you'll be brilliant," James assures him encouragingly, then snorts when Sirius glares at him. "You know, I can't really tell you what to do. It's different for everyone. We all like what we like, and that's not always the same, and it's—it's special to learn that for yourselves, to learn each other. Only do it because you want to; that's the first step. Everything else? Just do what feels right and don't be scared to communicate."

"That's not—helpful," Sirius complains.

"It is. You just don't know it yet. You'll see." James winks at him, but his smile is soft. "Go on, go get your spine realigned."

Sirius' hand flies to his throat instinctively, like a woman clutching at her pearls, staring at James, utterly aghast as he wheezes, "Get my fucking what?"

"Or, you know, realign his spine," James muses, thoughtful, his eyes gleaming with laughter. "Whatever suits your fancy, and his, I suppose."

"You're filthy," Sirius hisses as James laughs again, covering his mouth with his hand. "You're a dirty, dirty man, Potter, and I—I do not want you anywhere near my baby brother."

"Oh, the first chance I get, I'm going to let him snap my spine directly in half," James declares, lifting both hands and tipping his fists apart while making an obscene crunching noise in the back of his throat. The look of pure horror on Sirius' face makes James bust out laughing all over again.

Sirius makes a big show of being disgusted for a bit longer, just to keep James laughing, but the moment eventually passes, and James seems—lighter, just a bit, at least for now. It's probably a lot of different things, getting to laugh, knowing he'll see Effie and Monty tomorrow, even just the knowledge that Sirius is probably having sex for the very first time because he wants to, because he's at a place that he's comfortable, because he trusts Remus enough to do it.

"Speaking of my brother," Sirius says, once James has calmed down, "I'm going to check on him now, but I'll be back later."

"If you can walk," James teases.

"Slag," Sirius grumbles as he stands up.

"Prude," James shoots back. He pauses, then tilts his head a little bit. "Hey, you saw Dorcas, yeah?"

"Yeah."

"She told me to ask you. She, um, kissed my hand? She said you'd know what it meant."

"Oh, yes, that's a thing. It's common in the Hallow to kiss someone's hand if you hold them in high regard. It's a sign of admiration," Sirius explains.

"Oh," James says, blinking. "That's…strangely lovely?"

"It can be," Sirius agrees, lips curling up.

"Right," James murmurs. "Thanks. Now, go on, the sooner you leave, the sooner you get off. I expect all the details."

Sirius shakes his head fondly and stifles laughter as James calls after him suggestively all the way out the door. For a moment, he just has to pause out in the hall and breathe, letting himself feel good about the fact that he walked in on James crying and he's now walking out on James laughing. Sirius has never really thought about it, but maybe he makes things better for James the same way James does for him. It's a comforting thought.

Next stop is Regulus' room, and he knocks before poking his head in, wholly unsurprised by the fact that Regulus is out on the balcony. Sirius knocks on that door as well before easing out, and Regulus slowly relaxes when he sees him, which is something that causes a tender flare in Sirius' chest every time. It's good to know that he's—safe, for Regulus. It's been years since that was the case. Sirius has missed it.

"Did we fuck it up?" Regulus asks warily.

"The interview? No, you and James did perfectly," Sirius assures him. "I'm—I wanted to—to apologize again for—"

"Don't," Regulus cuts in, shaking his head. "It's not your fault, Sirius. I don't blame you. I know James doesn't."

"Everything in me wishes I could have stopped it," Sirius confesses. "All of it, Regulus."

"I know," Regulus says softly, looking away.

Sirius clears his throat. "James tells me you two…broke up?"

"We were never together, never got to be, but…yeah," Regulus replies with a heavy sigh. He glances over at Sirius and shrugs a little helplessly. "I know he's your best friend, so you must have a lecture for hurting him lined up, but I—"

"No," Sirius interrupts firmly. "No, I don't. There's no lecture. No threats, or warnings, or—or anything. Not for either of you. Whatever happens between the two of you, that's…" He swallows and gives a bitter smile. "That's yours and his, no matter what. I have no control, do you hear me? I can—and will—be here for both of you about it, about anything, but I'll never get involved otherwise, not again."

Regulus blinks at him. "Oh."

"Yeah," Sirius mumbles, ashamed, still so fucking upset about how he had to manipulate their relationship for their survival.

"So, this is you…trying to be here for me about it?" Regulus asks dryly, arching an eyebrow.

Sirius smiles sheepishly. "If you need me to be."

"It's not—" Regulus halts, then looks down and chokes out a laugh that has no humor in it. "Well, I'm used to it, really."

"Reggie," Sirius says quietly, utterly stricken.

"Everything and nothing has changed. I want him and I hate him. He wants to try and I'm not willing to. Always so close, so fucking close, but never…" Regulus whispers, squeezing his eyes shut and then lifting his hands to cover his face as his shoulders heave. The muffled sob breaks Sirius' heart.

"Hey, hey, can I—" Sirius launches forward to kneel down by Regulus' chair, hands hovering over him, and it's taking quite literally all the strength within him not to just snatch Regulus into his arms and hold him. "Is it okay if I—"

Regulus doesn't let him finish, just sort of spilling to the side and bumping directly into Sirius' chest, ducked down and curled over in on himself like he's trying to fold himself up until he's just gone. He's so small. He's five, he's fifteen, he's twenty-five and Sirius' little brother. Always his little brother.

Sirius wraps his arms around Regulus and holds him.

~•~

Remus looks up when the door opens, his heart jumping and sinking all at once as soon as he sees Sirius, somehow trying to shrivel up and expand at the same time. Sirius is here, and tomorrow, he'll be gone.

"Hi," Sirius whispers as he shuts the door.

"Hi," Remus whispers back.

Sirius swallows, the column of his throat rising and falling as he takes a tentative step forward. "Maybe this is unfair of me to ask, but can we—not say goodbye tonight? Can we have just one night where nothing is wrong? Can we—Remus, can we save all of that for tomorrow and just…have this, us, now?"

Remus exhales slowly, because he's relieved, so inordinately relieved to put it off for just a bit longer. He's not ready yet. He doesn't want to lose this yet.

"Yes, of course we can," Remus murmurs.

"I—I want you to know that I—" Sirius takes a deep breath and gives him a small, sad smile. "I have been through the unimaginable these last two weeks, and the only thing—the only thing, Remus—that made any of it the least bit bearable was you. I would not have known a hint of relief, or a slice of joy, if I did not have the pleasure of knowing you."

"Well, that certainly sounds like a goodbye," Remus scolds, his voice thick with the lump in his throat.

"I just want you to know that, perhaps I was the one to insist you take off the mask, and perhaps I was the one to grant you the space to live with the basic human rights anyone and everyone should always have," Sirius croaks, "but in truth, Remus, it was you who freed me."

"Stop," Remus rasps, because he really—he can't do it. He feels dangerously close to tears, his eyes prickling with heat, and he doesn't want to cry. He doesn't want to waste one second with Sirius in mourning when he hasn't even lost him yet. He can cry later, alone, when there's a reason to.

But, right now, Sirius is here. He's still here, and Remus loves him dearly, dreadfully, with a defiance that makes his heart sing. It is only fitting that he would love so deeply what he cannot keep, and it is a selfless, gentle sort of passion that will haunt him, an echo of an empty house he doesn't have the promise of ever getting back to, one he will always crave the comforts of all the same. He looks at Sirius and wishes to cook a meal and fold laundry with him, lock the door behind them as they lay down to go to sleep, ignore the storm that rattles the bones of the house because, eventually, they will break.

Just not yet.

Please not yet.

"Oh, oh, please don't cry," Sirius breathes out, moving forward instantly to reach out and cradle Remus' face, tilting it up as he stands in between Remus' legs where he's settled on the end of the bed. "I'm sorry. I'm so sorry, I didn't mean it. No, I did, but I—oh, I can't take it."

"Sorry," Remus rasps. "I wasn't—I was trying not to. I just—"

"Shh, no, of course you can," Sirius mumbles, his thumbs swiping away the tears with a tenderness that sends a fresh wave right down Remus' cheeks. "I mean, it's completely breaking my heart, admittedly, but you have every right to. You have the freedom to do even that, and I'll wipe every tear away. Can I cheer you up? Can I try that? Would that be okay?"

Remus huffs out a weak laugh, lips tugging up at the corners. Sirius is visibly frazzled, borderline desperate, and it's oddly cute. He's coming to the rapid conclusion that Sirius gets frantic when the people he cares about are hurting; it's a trait that he shares with his brother. Remus can't really put his finger on why, but there's something both adorable and tragic about that. Just that they're so acquainted with pain themselves that they're a mess the moment they realize someone that matters to them is the one dealing with it.

"Give it a go," Remus says softly.

Sirius promptly and without warning pushes Remus back a bit and proceeds to crawl right into his lap, settling down on the platform of his thighs as he strokes Remus' cheeks and brings their faces so close together that their noses nearly bump. Remus automatically and instinctively wraps his arms around Sirius' waist to make sure he doesn't fall. To be completely honest, Remus feels cheered already.

"Don't cry," Sirius coos, lips curling up as he leans in kisses under one eye. "Your tears control the tides, you know." He kisses under the other eye. "Why don't we have a calm ocean tonight? No shipwrecks. Nothing worse than a sunken ship."

"But that's where all the treasures are," Remus teases, smiling along helplessly, and Sirius looks pleased instantly.

"You're a treasure, Remus Lupin," Sirius murmurs, pressing a kiss to the corner of his mouth. "My treasure, the treasure I found in this sunken ship of a city. You glinted in the dark like the moon lights the sky, and I found you."

"So, I'm yours, then?" Remus whispers, eyes fluttering shut as Sirius brushes their mouths together. Really, he shouldn't be so enticed by the idea of belonging to anything or anyone, considering his position, but the mere idea of belonging to Sirius shoots a thrill through him.

"Mine," Sirius agrees. "All mine."

There's something heady about Sirius' tone, the undercurrent of possessiveness in it, something resolute and set in stone, indisputable, and Remus believes it. Something within him surges up in wild agreement, and it's true. The Hallow can't have him; Sirius has him. Remus is his.

Remus has nothing. Has had nothing for five years. No possessions and nothing to claim, so he can't be blamed for losing his breath when Sirius leans in and whispers in his ear, "And I'm yours. I'm all yours, Remus, only and always."

The Hallow can't have Sirius either, not when Remus does. It's good to belong, like this, when it's safe and wanted, when it's a choice, when it's a discovery they're happy to have made. Sirius rocks back and kisses him, slow and soft, and Remus thinks he would let Sirius own him.

He thinks, in the best possible way, Sirius already does.

It doesn't scare him, not one bit.

He's never felt so free.

The feeling emboldens him, and he slips his hands around to slide them up Sirius' chest, pushing his shirt up slowly. Sirius helps him, carelessly flailing to send it flying, and neither of them even notice it on the floor. It doesn't matter, nothing matters, all that matters is this. Them. Sirius making a quiet sound into their unbroken kiss as he snatches a little frantically at Remus' shirt, trying to yank it off.

"I'm not picking that up," Remus declares a little breathlessly as he backs off enough to let Sirius peel him out of his shirt and launch it clear across the room.

"That's fine. That's—it's fine," Sirius groans, biting his lip as he slides his hands down Remus' chest. "If you wanted, I would pick it up and bring it to you with my teeth."

Remus tries not to let that go to his head, but it promptly goes right to his head. He blows out a deep breath, willing himself to remain calm. It's not working, but he feels he deserves an award for at least trying. "Sirius, you shouldn't say things like that. It—it does have an effect, you know."

"Oh, in that case, I'll just continue," Sirius says, his words tumbling out of him in a rush, "because the goal is to have sex. Very good sex, hopefully. Just—you know, naked. Us. Being naked. At the same time. For—sex."

"Sirius," Remus replies, working very hard not to laugh, because Sirius is so red that it looks painful.

"That was a very bad way to suggest sex. I am so sorry," Sirius announces, looking mortified. "That's not—I didn't want to say it like that, but…I don't even know how to say it. I mean, I just said it, but I meant to say it in a way that at least sounded good. What I mean is, we should—well, if you wanted to, we could—um, you could absolutely realign my spine."

Remus' eyebrows fly up, and Sirius immediately chokes out a horrified noise before ducking his head and burying his face into his hands. Rather against his will, Remus bursts out laughing, and needs a second to calm down while Sirius shakes his head from side-to-side and releases muffled curses into his palms over and over. Remus reaches out and peels Sirius' hands away, grinning at the deep blush on his face.

"Oh, I can, can I?" Remus teases.

"This is all James' fault," Sirius whispers mournfully.

Remus snorts. "What does James have to do with this?"

"I went to him for sex advice, and he said you were going to realign my spine—probably as a joke, I think—and then he said you might want me to realign yours, and—and I would try, if that's what you want, but to be honest, I have no idea what the fuck I'm doing," Sirius tells him, visibly frazzled.

"You look so pitiful right now," Remus admits, and Sirius sighs and just nods glumly, which only adds to the whole pitiful look of him. Remus wants to bite him. "Fortunately for you, I do know what the fuck I'm doing, and I know precisely how to cheer you up."

Sirius clears his throat. "Yeah? How's that?"

"Well, I doubt I'll realign your spine, but I can promise to make you feel good, at the very least," Remus muses.

"And you?" Sirius asks, sounding oddly anxious.

Remus chuckles and reaches out to wrap both arms around him. "Oh, don't worry about that. Everything's good when it's with you, Sirius."

"Well, that's reassuring," Sirius breathes out, and it really seems to be, because he relaxes all at once, in just enough time to release a yelp as Remus stands to his feet and hauls Sirius up with him at the same time. Sirius stares at him in disbelief, even as his legs naturally wrap around him so he won't fall.

"Don't look at me like that. I've got you," Remus mutters, rolling his eyes as he turns to walk around the bed.

"You're so strong. It's maddeningly attractive," Sirius blurts out, hands gripping Remus' shoulders tight. "Wait, disregard that. I didn't agree to be carried around, Remus! That was not a part of the sex plans!"

"You need better plans. This only adds to the ambiance," Remus tells him, pausing next to the bed. "Besides, you're mine, yes? That means I can do what I like with you."

Sirius sucks in a sharp breath, looking dazed by the casual comment, his mouth forming a perfect circle as he gapes at Remus, stunned into silence. Remus' lips twitch, and then he dumps Sirius right onto the bed with no warning whatsoever.

"Yes," Sirius chokes out, belatedly, still looking dazed. He's sort of limp on the bed, staying exactly where Remus dropped him. "Yes, absolutely. You—anything. Whatever you like."

Remus hums. "Noted. Quick question, do you have anything? For the being naked at the same time and realigning one's spine sort of sex, I mean."

Sirius groans again and flings his arm over his face, but he dutifully points towards the nightstand by his bed. "Pandora got it for me just in case."

"Kind of her," Remus says mildly, stifling a laugh as Sirius apparently tries to smother himself with his own arm out of pure embarrassment. He digs around in the drawer to find what he needs, sending a mental thank you to Pandora, then gazes fondly at Sirius. "You shouldn't be embarrassed, you know. There's nothing embarrassing about pleasure."

"Fuck you, it's so embarrassing," Sirius counters.

Remus chuckles and bends over to crawl up the length of Sirius' body, waiting for him to lift his arm before dipping in to kiss him. Sirius eventually settles into it, distracted fairly quickly, forgetting all of his embarrassment right around the time Remus licks into his mouth and draws a moan out of him.

"Still embarrassed?" Remus asks, dragging his mouth away to kiss along Sirius' jaw. Sirius is panting beneath him, loudly.

"Oh, fuck, not even a little bit," Sirius says, his voice cracking, and he tips his head back as he wraps his arms around Remus' shoulders, hands sliding into his hair.

"I know this was your plan, but if you want to stop—"

"Don't you dare fucking stop, Remus."

"Sweetheart, we haven't even gotten started," Remus tells him as he pulls back to gaze down at him, amused.

Sirius blows out a deep breath. "Shit, we're not even out of our pants yet."

"There's no rush," Remus murmurs, leaning in to kiss him yet again, addicted to it. When he pulls back, Sirius chases his mouth, his eyes glazed. "Just let yourself feel good, Sirius."

"I don't really have any other option when you're around," Sirius croaks, his eyes fluttering shut as Remus dips in to start kissing down his chest. "I—you make everything feel so fucking good all the time. Like—like so good that it can only be a crime, that's how good it is."

Remus laughs softly against Sirius' stomach, pressing a kiss to the faded scar there. A star in his galaxy. He tips his head up to look at Sirius, who's looking down at him with his bottom lip caught between his teeth. "Sirius, I should remind you, this is quite literally a crime."

"Worth it," Sirius blurts out, wide-eyed.

"My thoughts exactly," Remus agrees, and it is. It is so fucking worth it; every moment with Sirius, every single one, is worth the risk, the danger, the possibility of future death, or torture, or worse. If that's what's waiting for him, he wouldn't regret one moment of any of this that led him there.

This, too, is worth it. Making Sirius feel good. Coaxing him away from his own shame. Letting him accept pleasure like he deserves. Every loud moan, every hitched breath, every time Sirius' mouth shapes around Remus' name. It's all worth it.

It's easy, really, like most things are with them. Remus doesn't rush it, as if they have all the time in the world. He doesn't let this exist like an exchange for what tomorrow will bring; it's only now, it's only them, it's something and everything and most certainly not nothing.

Sirius is a mess throughout. A lovely, stuttering mess that Remus is fortunate enough to hold in his arms, to have claim to, to keep in every way except for one. That doesn't matter, here, not when Sirius squirms against him and yanks on his hair and gasps into his mouth, chanting his name like a fucking prayer and begging, so far gone that he's shameless, and Remus can't deny him anything. Doesn't even want to.

Remus has been with people before, of course, but nothing could have prepared him for the intimacy of it. He's never been in love before, and he knows that now, because it's different. It's immediately different with Sirius, the whole world seeming to shape around him until nothing else exists but his fevered eyes and slack mouth and where their bodies meet. It's dizzying, feeling so much all at once, feeling good and feeling love and feeling completely, utterly free.

"You—Remus, you have to move," Sirius whispers, the words placed in a perfect sequence for it to be an order, but sounding only like a plea.

But I want to stay here, in this forever that we've made, Remus thinks, a little delirious and dazed, desperate to exist in this moment that feels caught in amber, everlasting.

Nonetheless, Remus does move at some point, and then he can't believe he ever waited. He can only fold forward and press his face into the bend of Sirius' throat, groaning as he slides his hands up Sirius' arms to tangle their fingers together and press them to the bed above their heads. Sirius clings to Remus' hands for dear life.

Sirius is loud. Very loud. It maybe drives Remus a little insane, but that's alright, he's sure. People can probably hear, and Remus does not give one ounce of a fuck. Let them hear, he thinks. Let the whole fucking Hallow hear. He hopes they do. He hopes the entire city hears Sirius and knows that he's not theirs, and knows that they can't have him, and knows that no one—ever—will be able to do to him what Remus does.

The only issue that comes about is that Sirius wholeheartedly protests any bit of space between them, which is only a problem because Remus would very much like to get him off first, and that requires leaning back to use his hand. Sirius is not having it. He practically throws a fit the moment Remus tries to let his hands go and lean up.

"Don't you dare. Don't you—don't stop. Please, please do not stop," Sirius chokes out, arching beneath him to try and press them closer, though they're already flush together as it is.

"I wasn't going to," Remus gasps out, squeezing his eyes shut as he tries to keep himself together. It's very difficult to do when Sirius, despite all his earlier reservations, is meeting his every thrust like a man possessed. "I just—I'd really like to see you first, Sirius, and as close as you may be, getting off on cock alone without even being touched doesn't always happen."

"It doesn't?" Sirius wheezes. "Are you sure? Because I'm—I'm really quite sure it's about to."

"Well, you can't until I tell you to anyway," Remus informs him, and then Sirius lets loose a string of vibrant curses before his jaw unhinges, and if Remus thought he was loud before—

"Oh, oh, fucking shit, I'm sorry," Sirius blurts on a whimper, his eyes fluttering open as he stares up at Remus, face flushed and chest heaving. He's pliant and relaxed beneath Remus, boneless, and even his words are slurring.

Remus shakes his head, huffing out a startled laugh, slowing his hips to a leisurely, easy roll that's not too much. Sirius shudders, his lips parting as his eyes fall shut again. "Why are you apologizing, Sirius? Literally for what?"

"You said I couldn't, and then I did," Sirius mumbles.

Remus has to kiss him for that, truly. Sirius hums happily and squeezes his hands, kicking up his hips in encouragement, and Remus doesn't come up for air until he's gasping for it. Too busy falling apart as everything good and perfect in the world hooks around the base of his spine and lurches forward until his ears are ringing and the only name being chanted now is Sirius', steadily spilling from Remus' mouth in reverence.

It takes them a bit to recover, admittedly. Love tends to have that effect, especially when you're making it.

~•~

"So?" James asks as Sirius crawls into bed with him.

"Yeah," Sirius breathes out.

"Spine?"

"Realigned. Absolutely, unequivocally realigned."

James busts out laughing, and Sirius grins even through his blush, folding forward to press his face into James' shoulder, feeling like he's floating, feeling so good that he barely even knows what to do with it, feeling love sweep through him as he thinks, rather helplessly and with immeasurable joy, that Remus came into his life and realigned that, too.

Chapter End Notes

to those of you who want to skip the watered-down sex scene: after remus tells sirius that what they're doing is technically a crime, and sirius blurts out, "worth it." just scroll from there—and it's fairly brief after that anyway!!!

to everyone else:

starting from the top, dorcas my beloved <3

then james and regulus' discussion pre-interview. first, okay, sorry i have to laugh bc regulus is just throwing around the fact that he and james "broke up" like it's fucking FACT, and james is like: wait, we were dating??? why wasn't i informed??? HELP 💀 also, that discussion about love!!! very, very important as well. i got a comment a bit ago talking about how the narrative that romantic love is, like, greater than anything else and is the only way someone can be fulfilled in life is harmful!!! and yes, it really is, and it was something i had wanted to address, specifically in this world where james and regulus' "romance" is treated the way it is. to that commenter, when i said it comes up, this is when i was talking about.

whenever i talk about the importance of love in fics, it's something i feel is important across all forms of love, be that between lovers, friends, family, etc—but also just love in life. like the love you can find in the world, because i do genuinely believe that in a world full of so much that hurts us, there's also so much love to be found as well. ya know, like a pretty sunset, the giggle of a child, a happy dog getting pets, a stranger offering a kind word on a hard day. that's all love, in its own way, at least to me. or maybe it's just something i desperately want to believe in, because isnt that just—so comforting? to me, it's comforting.

anyway, the point is, love as a broad topic—especially in my fics that deal heavily with love between lovers, between friends, and especially the love between sirius and regulus—well, it's important to me. special. and i always try to portray that through my writing. i hope it comes across the way i want it to

as for regulus and james, im sorry, but it's so cute to me that regulus was just staring at james like a lovesick idiot basically every time he said anything kind/insightful, especially when it was helpful to him, in particular. his issues with blood, for example, and james unknowingly spinning it in a positive light??? regulus is so in love. he's SO in love yall terribly sad though that regulus is worried he doesn't love people the right way. like, he genuinely thinks he does it wrong, isn't enough, etc etc. i wanna hug him :(

the interview... yeah, that was rough. but they did indeed smash it!!! rita can choke tho <3 okay, now, sirius... THIS BABE!!! oh, how i love him. the fact that james was the first person to get sirius to laugh after he got back from the arena, and now sirius is the first person to make james laugh after HE gets back from the arena.... BRB SOBBING no, they're so cute, they're besties!!! lmaoooo sirius going to james for sex tips GOODBYE 😭 james is so funny pls. he was like that mom off of mean girls like: do you need anything? snacks? no? okay, you two have fun! be safe! he's so supportive <3 and like, there is nothing embarrassing about pleasure, but there is a great amount of people out there that do indeed get embarrassed about it for various reasons. just the fact that it's not seen as a bad thing, or treated like someone being embarrassed/flustered is bad or wrong or a joke—that's important to me. like, yes, they tease and laugh, sure, but no one shames sirius for it, and they give him the space to, like, grow into being more comfortable with it. that's as equally important as not shaming someone for being shameless.

just the wolfstar in this chapter holds a special place in my heart because they love each other soooo much, which makes me want to chew on concrete and bite my pillow. this line: "my treasure, the treasure I found in this sunken ship of a city. you glinted in the dark like the moon lights the sky, and i found you." is probably one of my all-time favorite lines ive ever written in any fic EVER. idk why. i was just really proud of it.

honorable mentions:

-JAMES MFING POTTER GETTING HIS GLASSES BACK!!!! FUCKING FINALLY!!! yes, his glasses are A Thing in this fic
-james teasing sirius about Having Impure Thoughts about regulus
-pandora being a queen who cares about sirius having safe sex and providing him what he needed to do that -sirius getting off and immediately apologizing bc remus hadnt told him he could 😭😭😭
-regulus plotting rita's murder as we speak
-regulus hating to be touched but letting sirius comfort him

yeah that's about it. lemme wrap up and say thank you to everyone for all the support and kind comments. it means so much to me, you don't even know <3

Goodbye

Chapter Notes

hello, all!

warnings for this chapter:

-ptsd/ptsd-responses (nightmares, paranoia, things such as that)
-mentions of blood
-references to past death
-references to torture (heavily implied, but not discussed in detail)
-references to dissociative amnesia (it doesn't occur, just briefly discussed)
-references to past child abuse (mostly implied and very vague, so you may not even notice, but still)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

"Well, so much for climbing."

Regulus turns his head and heaves a sigh when he sees Evan shaking his head at him. "Oh, get fucked. You know how I feel about climbing, Evan."

"I do know," Evan agrees, winking as he points down. Regulus reflexively follows the gesture, immediately dizzy when he can't see the ground, and he clings to the sturdy branch beneath them as he curses under his breath. When he looks up with a glare, Evan only laughs at him. "Really, the view at the top makes every bit of climbing worth it. That's where we're all trying to go, you know. Just trying to get to the view."

"I'd rather be on the ground," Regulus grumbles.

"You say that as if every glimpse of the top doesn't steal your breath," Evan challenges wryly. "Being on the ground only means you can't get lower. Trust me, getting higher is exactly where you want to be."

Regulus scoffs. "I'm fine here, thanks. But you go on. Don't let me stop you if you're so eager to get to the top."

"Ah," Evan says, his face softening into a sad smile. "Well, unfortunately I can't go any higher than this. I'll never see the top, I'm afraid."

"But you can climb," Regulus mutters, confused. His face scrunches up. "You're, like, the best climber."

Evan breaks out into a grin and bats his eyelashes as he waves his hand as if to say oh, pish-posh. "You flatter me." He chuckles and shakes his head, then tips his head back and smiles softly. "Even the best climbers can fall, lover boy."

"Yes, which means the worst climbers are even more likely to, hence the reason I will be refraining from climbing at all," Regulus declares. "Can't I just stay down here with you?"

"Just because I can't climb any higher doesn't mean you shouldn't," Evan says, jerking his chin towards the sky. "I mean, who could begrudge you that view?"

Regulus tips his head back, his breath punching out of him when he sees James and Sirius perched on a branch high above them, so high that they're framed by a magnificent sunrise impossibly dotted with glowing, glimmering stars. They're kicking their legs happily and grinning, and somehow, Regulus can hear their laughter like it's in his head.

Instinctively, Regulus calls out for them, but they either can't hear him from here, or they don't care to acknowledge him at all, and he really can't tell which it is. He blows out a deep breath, deflating in on himself as he stares up at them with some kind of inner distress. They're so high. There's absolutely no way he could ever reach them.

"You could get there, if only you'd try," Evan murmurs, sounding oddly solemn, and Regulus glances back towards him, only to feel his stomach lurch when he sees a spear driven right through Evan's middle.

"Evan," Regulus chokes out.

"You're closer than you think, Regulus," Evan tells him, lips curling up like he doesn't even notice the spear embedded in his stomach. "All you have to do is climb."

"Evan," Regulus repeats, his voice coming out sharp with a restless, frantic panic that makes his heart race. He stares wide-eyed at the spear. "You… Evan, you—you—"

"It's okay," Evan whispers. "Falling isn't as bad as you think. In a way, it's a bit like flying."

The branch beneath them that seemed so sturdy before gives a devastating and sudden crack, and Evan grants him a faint smile, soft and sad around the edges, before promptly tipping backwards with his hand outstretched. Regulus instantly lunges forward, crying out his name, but he doesn't manage to save Evan the way Evan always saved him, every time.

Their fingers only just brush before hands clamp down on Regulus all over from behind. Cold hands. Clawed hands. Cadaverous hands, dripping with blood, his blood as his skin is ripped into. He screams and fights and calls for Sirius and James to come save him, begging them, but they don't look down, they don't care, they don't stop laughing—

"—okay, shh, I promise you're okay." The words break through, snatching him right awake with an abruptness that startles him, and he automatically tries to lash out, but he's being held down. It only makes him thrash harder, flailing and fighting against the grip. "I know, I know, I'm sorry. Just—just breathe. You're going to hurt yourself if you don't relax. As soon as you relax, I'll let you go, I swear."

It takes a bit for those words to actually register and even longer for Regulus to digest them. When they finally do take shape in his brain in a way he can process them, and make sense of them, he slowly settles down, breathing hard as the world comes back into focus. His vision is blurry from tears, gritty from lack of sleep, and there's a light bathing the room in reality, assuring him that he's here, and not there.

"Regulus? Are you—do you want me to let you go now?"

"Yes," Regulus rasps. "Please."

Sirius does instantly, rolling away quickly like he might need to get out of range, just in case, and Regulus can't even blame him for that. Regulus doesn't do anything, though. He just sits up, panting as he scoots back to press his back against the wall and draw his legs up to his chest, wrapping his arms around them. Clumsily, he wipes his tears away and takes a long moment to calm down, to breathe.

Sirius settles down across from him, watching him with tension around his eyes, looking very, very tired. "It was just a nightmare, Reggie."

"I know," Regulus says quietly.

"Do you want to talk about it?" Sirius asks.

"Was I calling out for you?" Regulus mumbles, and Sirius nods carefully. "James, too?" Another nod, and Regulus heaves a sigh as his shoulders slump. "It's not—I don't even really dream about either of you. Not exactly. It's—it's this recurring nightmare. Evan is always there. We're in a tree."

"You fall?" Sirius guesses.

Regulus swallows. "Evan does. I can never save him."

"That's not your fault," Sirius declares firmly. "What happened to Evan wasn't your fault, Regulus. Nothing that happened in the arena was your fault, but especially not that."

"I made him laugh," Regulus whispers. "No one ever thinks to look up, not until there's a sound, and I made him laugh. He would still—he'd be alive if—"

"Regulus," Sirius cuts in, pained, his throat rising and falling as he slowly shakes his head. "He wouldn't be, regardless of how he died. It's a brutal truth, but it is the truth."

"He could have won," Regulus croaks.

Sirius' lips press into a thin line, but he takes a deep breath, then slowly lets it out. All he says is, "I'm sorry, Reggie."

"Yeah," Regulus mutters, dropping his gaze, "me too."

"He didn't blame you. He wouldn't," Sirius murmurs.

Regulus huffs out a weak laugh and lifts his gaze, finding Sirius as sincere as Regulus has ever seen him. "You didn't even know him. I didn't even know him, Sirius, not really."

"Alright, maybe not, but…" Sirius purses his lips, then looks at him gently, like he might shatter. "I know what it is to have a best friend—a really good one, in fact—and they tend not to blame you for the things you can't forgive yourself for."

The thing is, Regulus might actually shatter after hearing that, because it somehow stings and soothes him all at once. What falls out of Regulus' mouth is a choked, "It's not fair," because it's not. It isn't fair that everyone else gets to have what he can't, what he's lost, what he doesn't have the will to take.

"I know it's not," Sirius agrees, his eyes sad. "I know."

And that's the thing, isn't it? Sirius does know. The games took plenty away from him, too, even if Regulus didn't see it all. He knows for sure now anyway. He even knows that all the games after that he mentored for, especially this one, took things from Sirius as well. He even lost his best friend, briefly, along with his brother—getting them back can never fully make up for that, and Regulus knows it.

He's not so sure that it ever will for him either.

~•~

Pandora cooks breakfast, for which Sirius is thankful, because he desperately does not want Remus to be too busy doing that to spend time with him. It's something light and quick they're all probably better off eating together in a group setting, but Regulus has been off since his nightmare and isn't ready to leave his room, and James has—for no apparent reason—taken three showers back to back and can't be convinced to abandon his fourth. James and Regulus, along with Pandora, have insisted that Sirius spend his morning with Remus, and he can't stop himself from giving into the urge to do so.

They've sequestered themselves away in Sirius' room, and Sirius is draped over him dramatically, randomly releasing fussy, garbled noises of displeasure like he may be dying. Every time, Remus snorts fondly into his hair and massages his scalp until he shuts up again.

Sirius would like to spend his morning with Remus having vivacious, messy sex made of desperation, because that feels very suitable for their dreadful predicament, but Remus had vetoed that option with immense and undeniable regret. Sirius has checked twice to see if Remus has changed his mind, but Remus insists that it's best if they don't. He swears up and down that it would only make them feel worse, and the sex itself would be drenched in loss and them preemptively missing one another, which would only add to the pain.

So, Sirius lets it go. After all, Remus is more experienced with sex and such, and it's not like he would insist on it anyway if Remus is saying no. He just wants Remus to know he is very down for instant gratification, even if it leads to him getting his feelings hurt more than they are already.

They've both been quiet, but Sirius has kept an eye on the clock, his stomach dropping out from underneath him every time he checks it to see more time slipping away. They're running out of time, and Sirius doesn't know what to do. He doesn't think there's anything he can do, though not for a lack of internal debate and mental plans drawn up that had to be repeatedly discarded because they wouldn't actually work.

"What if," Sirius starts, very carefully, but he doesn't even get to voice the full thought before Remus interrupts.

"Won't work."

"You don't even know what I was going to say."

"Something about you packing me in your bag and carrying me out of here, or just sneaking me away, or kidnapping me and hoping no one notices," Remus says.

Sirius lifts his head and rests his chin on Remus' chest, squinting at him suspiciously. "Can you read my mind?"

"Every dirty, naughty, shameful thought," Remus quips immediately, lips twitching. "Every time you see me, it's a steady stream of: okay, okay, remain calm, there he is, be normal, just be normal, fuck, how do I be normal?"

"Um." Sirius blinks at him and raises his head up, genuinely feeling a little uneasy. "Wait, can you actually read my—"

"Fuck's sake, no," Remus cuts in with a choked laugh, his eyes lighting up. "Is that what you think? Genuinely?"

"Pretty much," Sirius admits, his face getting hot. Remus looks so fond. "That, or some version of it that's close, basically. I can't help it. You make me feel like I'm going to explode."

"I told you, I like you just as you really are, Sirius," Remus murmurs, tugging his hand from where it's buried in Sirius' hair for the sole purpose of working it back in there, scratching gently at his scalp. There's a faint smile on his face, a little nostalgic. "Do you want to know something?"

"Yes," Sirius answers immediately.

"I actually had to work up the courage to touch your hair the first time that I did," Remus informs him. "I was—nervous. I wanted to very, very much, but I was still relearning how to let myself have the things I wanted, so I started out slow, with just the very ends, working up to winding a few strands around my finger, and then, finally, I just—went for it. Even just that felt like an act of rebellion. I was scared, and thrilled, and then the only thing that mattered was how it felt to touch you. Every time, Sirius, you matter more."

Sirius swallows harshly, his eyes stinging. He blinks rapidly and whispers, "I'm going to miss you so fucking much."

"Every time you do, every time I cross your mind, take that as a reminder to treat yourself with care," Remus whispers back, his eyebrows furrowed. "That's just me being there to tell you to be kind to yourself, to eat if you haven't, to rest if you need it, to slow down and do it one-day-at-a-time. That's all it is."

"You'll think of me, too, won't you?" Sirius asks.

Remus snorts weakly. "Constantly, I assure you."

"Then I assure you," Sirius mumbles, "that's just me being with you as a reminder that you deserve better than what you have. Never forget that, Remus. Never forget that you deserve good things, and I so desperately want you to have them."

"Deal," Remus croaks.

"I'm—" Sirius takes a deep, shuddering breath, his stomach cramping with fear. "I'm scared I'll forget. I won't mean to, but what if—Remus, what if I—"

"Sirius—"

"What if I get it—all of this with you—mixed up? What if I invent memories we never had, or forget the ones we do have? I don't want to do that. I don't know how to stop it. I don't—"

"You won't," Remus cuts in. "And, if you do, that's okay. It's okay. Any memory you lose, I'll hold onto. Any memory you invent is just—it's real in some other life, how about that? And—and you can ask James or Regulus for help, you know. I'm aware that you're determined to take care of them, but don't be afraid to let them take care of you, too. They want to, okay? That means something."

"Okay," Sirius rasps. He bites the inside of his cheek, trying to stave off the devastation creeping in like a vice around his throat. "You're sure I can't just steal you away?"

"Sadly, no," Remus tells him, sighing. "I have a tracker in my thigh, and it would send out a notification if I cut it out. Don't think it hasn't crossed my mind, because it has, but—" He swallows. "I'd never get far. They'd come for me. I'd be dead before I ever made it out of the Hallow. And—and my dad… Sirius, he's still alive. They could kill him if I—if I even dared to—"

"Okay, hey, okay, I'm sorry," Sirius interrupts quickly, trying to soothe the rising pitch of distress in Remus' voice. He reaches up to cradle Remus' cheek, smiling at him softly. "It's okay, Remus. I understand. I'm—fuck, I'm so sorry."

"I used to think about it a lot, you know. I used to come up with plans on how to break out and get away. I was—well, I was rather obsessive about it, actually, and then I just…stopped doing it. I don't even know when. Just, one day, I realized I had essentially given up and given in," Remus explains, and Sirius doesn't think he's ever heard anything more tragic in his life. It doesn't feel right, the mere concept of Remus Lupin giving up and giving in to anything. "I don't know when I lost hope, Sirius, but I know exactly when I got it back. The precise moment I met you."

"I'll remind you as many times as you need," Sirius murmurs, his throat feeling thick. "I meant what I said. I have to come back here every year, and whatever it takes, I will make sure I see you again. I promise, Remus."

"If you can't," Remus starts.

"There is no can't," Sirius says sharply. "I will."

Remus' face softens. He smiles slightly. "Okay."

Sirius relaxes a little. "Okay." They stare at each other for a long beat, and then Sirius exhales explosively. "What's going to happen to you? I mean, do you just…stay here?"

"No," Remus says, grimacing slightly. "Servants who aren't on assignments are kept in Azkaban. It's a prison where we reside until we're chosen and approved for assignments. Only a few servants never go there, those that are on assignment full-time at Riddle's castle. The rest of us have to remain there."

"What's it like?" Sirius asks cautiously. "Azkaban, I mean."

"It's…" Remus falls silent, tension threaded throughout his body, something blocked in his neutral expression that makes Sirius almost sure Remus won't tell him. There are a lot of things Remus doesn't feel comfortable talking about, and Sirius doesn't want to push, even if he is curious. Still, in the end, Remus surprises him. "It's cold. So cold and—and hollow. It's dead silent in the cells, because—well, because we have to keep on our masks, even there, and the silence is… It makes it impossible not to hear the screams from the lower levels. That's where they, um, experiment and—well. Yeah."

Sirius feels his heart sink just thinking about Remus being there. Remus clearly has said as much as he can, so Sirius forces himself not to ask further questions, and maybe there's a part of him that's terrified to know more. The thought of Remus in those conditions makes his skin crawl and every cell in his body scream out in protest.

"Will you have any assignments?" Sirius asks, strained.

"I don't know," Remus murmurs, and he heaves a sigh when Sirius' eyes sink shut. His fingers scrunch in Sirius' hair, giving him a gentle shake, encouraging him to open his eyes. When he does, Remus is smiling, just a bit. "Don't worry about any of that, Sirius. Let's just…be here together, yeah?"

"Yeah, okay," Sirius rasps, darting his eyes towards the clock and instantly feeling a wave of tears assualt him when he sees how much time they have—or don't have, really.

"Sirius," Remus says softly.

"It's too soon," Sirius croaks. "I—I don't want to go. For the very first time, I don't want to go, and it's entirely your fault, because I don't want to leave you."

"I'm sorry, sweetheart," Remus whispers.

"We didn't have enough time," Sirius chokes out, squeezing his eyes shut as he buries his face down into Remus' chest, helpless to the sobs that wrench out of him.

Remus strokes his hair, and that is all.

~•~

James has had six showers. Every time he got out, he'd last maybe ten minutes before getting right back in. The steam had worked wonders on his leg, and it's the only thing that has been able to work the chill out of his bones. He'd dreamed of Vanity last night, trying to keep her from freezing, but he hadn't been warm enough, and she'd frozen before shoving her icy fingers right into his chest. He's been shivering ever since.

Still, the showers did help, and he doesn't have a seventh, mostly because the pads of his fingers have gotten wrinkly in a way he doesn't like. He goes out to the kitchen instead, trying to let Pandora's chatter warm him up. It does, a bit.

"Not too long now, James, and you'll be home," Pandora tells him from where she's sitting next to him at the table. She made him a steaming cup of tea, which he's been sucking down, letting it warm him from the inside out.

"Will I ever get to see you again?" James mumbles.

Pandora gives him a gentle smile. "Well, you'll see me for the victory tour, of course, and you'll see me every year for the reaping. I arrive a little early, so there'd be no harm in stopping by to say hello, if that's something you'd like."

"Yeah, I—I think I really would," James tells her, completely sincere. He smiles at her weakly. "You're my friend, Pandora."

"I… Well, I know that may come as a surprise, considering my position, but I want you to know that I am truly honored to be your friend, and Regulus'," Pandora says softly. "You're more than Victors, to me. Please never think differently."

"I couldn't," James says simply, because he really couldn't. Pandora has made sure of that. He reaches out and grabs her hand, hesitating only for one moment before lifting it and pressing a careful kiss to the back of her fingers. He smiles at her sheepishly when he lets go. "I only just learned what that meant last night, but I really do admire you and all that you've done for us, so I think it's fitting that you're the first person I ever do that to. Thank you, Pandora, for everything."

Tears flood Pandora's eyes pretty much instantly, and James' smile drops as his eyes bulge, but she chokes out a wet laugh and flaps her hands, sniffling. "No, it's—don't look so worried, I'm just very—I'm emotional, I suppose. You mean so much to me, James. You and Regulus. Sirius as well. You all—you can't possibly know what all of you mean to me."

"I think we have an idea," James murmurs gently. "You're important to us, too."

That sets Pandora off all over again, and she stands up swiftly to swivel around the table, waiting only long enough to get his permission before hugging him while he's still in his chair. He leans into her, helplessly fond. She still smells like lemons.

When she lets him go, Pandora laughs and mutters under her breath about needing to go fix her makeup, squeezing his shoulder before sweeping off. James thinks she just needs a moment, so he watches her go with a soft smile. She's right, he didn't expect to care for her as much as he does, but he's never been more grateful to be wrong.

It's special, what Pandora represents for him. Her and Dorcas. Gideon and Fabian, too. Though the Hallow may be hollow, there are still Hallows with so much life and goodness inside them that it fills him with this unrelenting hope that he's more than happy to cling to. This is what he means about believing that there's good in people, in this world, even this world that has so much pain and horror in it that finding a hint of good seems impossible. But it's not, and that's important to him.

James sits at the table and finishes his tea, but he doesn't linger for long. Sirius is with Remus, as he should be, and James thinks he would literally die before interrupting them. They deserve their time together. He's still restless, though, not particularly wanting to be alone, and of course there's always a part of him that wants to be near Regulus.

He hasn't seen him since the interviews. The moment they made it back to the suite, they separated and didn't find their way back to each other. That's sort of their thing, isn't it?

Really, James supposes it's fitting that he's the one to seek Regulus out again, to keep trying in spite of all the reasons there's no point. If anyone knows how to weaponize optimism, it's him. He's still…him, even after everything. Somehow, that makes living just a little easier.

Taking a deep breath, James uses his cane to help haul himself out of his chair, shuffling down the hall and pausing briefly outside of Sirius' door. He doesn't listen. He just stands there, feeling a wave of protectiveness wash over him, his fingers itching with the need to shelter Sirius—and Remus—from the loss they're enduring. He wants to, but he can't.

Swallowing, James continues, stopping only once he's outside Regulus' door this time. His stomach wriggles around with nerves, but he gathers his courage and knocks. "Reg? It's, um, James. I mean, obviously you know it's me. Are you…there? Well, you might be on your balcony, so you probably can't even hear me, but I just—"

"I'm here," Regulus calls, his voice muffled like he's not close to the door this time.

"Oh." James blinks, genuinely startled that one, Regulus isn't out on the balcony, and two, he's actually willing to respond to James at all. Clearing his throat, James fiddles anxiously with the handle of his cane. "Would it be alright if I came in?"

There's a long, long beat of silence that stretches on so much that James is pretty sure it's going to be a no, which he would respect, but Regulus surprises him by saying, "Yes, okay."

Hesitantly, James eases the door open and slips inside, shutting it behind him. He immediately figures out why Regulus sounded so far away. He isn't out on the balcony, but he's standing in the doorway of it, leaning against the open door and looking outside, his back to James. He doesn't turn around, and neither of them speak for a long moment.

Finally, James tentatively asks, "Saying goodbye to the view?"

This, for some reason, is the wrong thing to say. He hears Regulus' sharp intake of breath and sees his entire body go stiff with tension, and he doesn't know what he's done wrong. He always gets it wrong with Regulus, no matter how hard he tries. Every single fucking time.

"Yeah," Regulus says, clipped, "something like that."

"Sorry if I—sorry. I don't know what I said, but I'm sorry," James mumbles wearily, his shoulders slumping.

"Don't worry about it," Regulus responds, the tension slowly draining from his shoulders. His voice still has an edge to it, though. "Why are you here, James? What do you need?"

James feels his heart drop when he realizes that Regulus is doing this, allowing James in, only because he thinks that James needs something from him. And James doesn't want that to be what this is about. He doesn't want Regulus to ignore his own discomforts in the endeavor to take care of him, regardless of what he actually wants.

"Don't—do that. You don't have to do that, Regulus," James says with a frown. "You don't have to prioritize my needs over your own, especially when they clash with your own."

"Shut up, James," Regulus replies dismissively. "I can't give you anything else, but I can give you this. This is something I can do, so I'll do it. What do you need?"

You, James thinks. Sirius. My parents. Gideon, and Fabian, and Peter. Irene and Mathias. Vanity and Hodge. World peace.

"I just…" James trails off, because obviously Regulus can't give him any of that, and James doesn't expect him to. "I don't know. We're going home today. Soon. I just—I suppose I wanted to talk to you before we left, that's all."

"Took a lot to get here, didn't it?" Regulus murmurs.

"Yeah," James says quietly. "Yeah, it did."

Regulus heaves a sigh. "It'll be nice for you. Seeing your parents, I mean."

"It will," James agrees carefully, even as his heart jumps and his fingers tingle with the reminder that he'll be seeing his mum and dad again today. But Regulus… Well. "Er, what about you? Are you, um, excited to…see yours again?"

"Ecstatic," Regulus says flatly, and James winces. Regulus has a very complicated relationship with his parents, James knows that, so he isn't entirely sure how to navigate this conversation with him. With Sirius, it's easier, because Sirius hates their guts. Regulus, James knows, doesn't. At least not entirely.

James bites his lip. "Will they…be angry with you? For…our…"

"Love story?" Regulus asks wryly. "Yes, most likely. They won't care that we did it to survive. They won't care that we didn't have a choice. They really despise you, you know."

"Yes, I know. I take it as a compliment." James pauses, then coughs. "Er, no offense."

Regulus releases a soft, quiet laugh that doesn't last very long but still lights James up from the inside out anyway. "None taken, I promise. It is a compliment, I suppose. In any case, I don't really—care. I just don't have it in me to care what they're going to think or how they'll act. If I'm disowned the same as Sirius, then so be it. If not, well, sure. Their opinion has never seemed more meaningless than it does now."

"Is that…a good thing?" James checks cautiously.

"It's…" Regulus pauses, then hums. "No, I don't think so. I don't think it's a bad thing either. It just…is."

"Right," James says. "Well, is there anyone else you're the least bit excited to see?"

"Barty," Regulus replies instantly, no hesitation, a low note of yearning in his voice that makes James instinctively grind his teeth. He shoves the reflexive response of jealousy down as far as it will go, because even if it is Barty, James is grateful that Regulus has someone he's eager to get back to. He doesn't have anyone else, not even his fucking parents, so James smothers his jealousy and decides to be grateful for Barty instead. "I can practically hear you fuming back there."

James clears his throat. "No, that's—it's good. I mean, really, it's good that you have him."

"Trying to be the better man?"

"Trying to be a better man. It's a choice that I never want to stop trying to make. It's—harder than it should be sometimes. Harder than it used to be."

"You're a good man," Regulus says softly. "Better than most, even without trying. It's okay if you don't get it right every time. It's like you said, they can never take who you are away from you, and I promise you, you are good. Never doubt that."

"I love you," James blurts out, the words sort of just tumbling from his lips, because he feels so—so full. Just so full of so many things, good and bad, and that's how it comes out of him. Love. Every time, it's always love. Regulus can't say things like that to him, things that make him want to fold in half and fucking cry, and not expect this response.

Regulus ducks his head forward, his shoulders pulled taught, and James can hear him taking in a measured breath before slowly releasing it. He doesn't reply. He doesn't say anything at all.

"I'm—I'm sorry. That was—I'm sorry," James stutters, shaking his head as he squeezes his eyes shut. "I just—I only said it because it's true, not because I expect anything from you. I don't, Regulus, not even when we get home."

"When we get home," Regulus rasps, "I think we're both going to need…time. And space. I think it's best if we don't—if we—"

"I won't push," James cuts in firmly, eyes snapping open. He sets his shoulders, because he needs Regulus to hear this, to know it. "I promise I won't push, okay?"

Regulus deflates a little, exhaling all at once. "Thank you," he whispers. And then, "Just—I know that's not enough, but that's all I've got, and I'm sorry. I'm so fucking sorry that I—"

"Stop. Regulus, stop," James cuts in, his chest feeling tight, because he can see how much Regulus is struggling with this, with all of it. "That's enough. It's more than enough. You're enough, okay? Hey, look at me. Can you look at me?"

Regulus is silent for a beat, breathing again for a long moment before stepping back and shutting the balcony door. He still hesitates, and the moment of hesitation absolutely breaks James' heart. But, inevitably, Regulus does turn to look at him, and his expression immediately fractures as soon as their eyes meet, his breath hitching as he goes very still.

James forgets instantly what he was going to say, because Regulus is looking at him with wide eyes full of pure wonder, something reverent in his gaze. "Reg? What? What is it?"

"Your glasses," Regulus says, and his voice cracks. James' hand not on his cane flies up automatically to touch the corner of his frames, startled slightly to remember that they're there, perched on his nose like they never left. They still feel the same. "You got your glasses back."

"Yeah, I—" James never really gets to finish, because Regulus closes the distance between them ridiculously fast and has James' face in his hands in seconds, kissing him like it's the very first time, and the last, and maybe it is.

It doesn't take James very long to shift gears, immediately and wholeheartedly on board with this, everything else ceasing to exist pretty much instantly. His cane clatters carelessly to the floor as his arms fly up to slip around Regulus' waist, dragging him closer. Regulus goes stiff against him instantly, and James hastily drops his arms, not touching, which allows Regulus the space to relax, to sink into him. He does, in increments, making a small sound into the kiss, something weak and desperate that makes James tremble.

Regulus is kissing James so fiercely, so deeply, that James can feel where his glasses press against his face, going a little wonky from the force of it.

It lasts as long as it takes for James' leg to buckle, which is not nearly long enough, in his opinion. He doesn't even give a shit about the rising pain in his leg, because he's felt worse, and it's so muted—a dull throb in the background—that he can literally ignore it. Well, he can until his leg apparently decides it's done holding all his weight and just—gives out.

James curses sharply as they break apart, because he stumbles and nearly falls; the only reason he doesn't collapse is because Regulus catches him quickly, holding him up with a grunt. It's artless and messy as they trip towards the bed, James letting out a long stream of furious expletives the whole way there, utterly raging about his predicament.

He's not sure what's pissing him off more; the fact that he has the injury at all, or the fact that his leg is failing him when he's trusted in it his whole life, or the fact that a kiss that they started on their own, in private, got interrupted with a reminder of what they'd both rather forget.

"Are you okay?" Regulus asks as he helps James ease down on the edge of the bed, staring at him with wide eyes.

"I'm fine," James snaps. "Just fucking grand."

Regulus swallows. "I'm sorry. I shouldn't have—"

"No, no, you absolutely should have," James corrects quickly. "In fact, if you wanted to, you could—"

"I'm getting your cane," Regulus cuts in firmly, not quite meeting his gaze as he draws back to do exactly that.

James throws his hands up and mimes strangling some invisible entity towards the sky, or the universe, because there has to be some deity out there getting a kick out of fucking with him and making him miserable. He groans and flops back on Regulus' bed, fighting the ridiculous urge to kick and flail and scream at the top of his lungs. Oh, he's so fucking angry about this. They were kissing. It was—they were—

"James," Regulus mutters, nudging him with his cane.

James snatches it away and tosses it over the side of the bed as he bolts right back up and grits out, "Please, please do not let my leg get in the way of what we were just doing."

"I'm not," Regulus mumbles, then heaves a sigh when James presses his lips into a thin line. "I swear I'm not, James. There are countless ways we could do—what we were doing, and more, that wouldn't be an issue for your leg. It's not that."

"So, what is it?" James asks wearily.

Regulus swallows. "I shouldn't have done it to start with. It doesn't—nothing has changed, alright? I still can't. Fuck, I couldn't even let you touch me. I shouldn't have done that. It was wrong. I'm sorry."

"Why did you?" James murmurs.

"I couldn't help it," Regulus admits, a strain in his voice as he reaches out and gently touches the side of James' glasses. His face softens as he straightens them on James' face, and he looks so adoring that James' heart fucking riots.

James leans closer, looking up at him. "I'm not upset that you did. Far from it, in fact. If you want, we can just kiss, and I won't touch you. We can—I mean, it doesn't have to…mean anything."

"James," Regulus says flatly, arching an eyebrow at him, but James remains stubborn. Regulus sighs. "I know you, you idiot. Of course it'll mean something, especially to you, and…" He holds James' gaze, his voice a lot quieter as he exhales and confesses, "It'll mean something to me, too. It'll mean too much, and it'll hurt, and aren't we hurt enough?"

"Yes, exactly. It already hurts, so this won't change anything," James whispers. "I know it doesn't change anything, love, and I don't expect it to. I don't need it to."

Regulus closes his eyes, flexing his fingers before drawing his hand away from James' glasses. "It'll only be good for as long as we're doing it, and then you'll regret it."

"Will I?" James murmurs. "I don't think I will. I think I'll be grateful that we did, even if it doesn't get us any closer to what we want. If you don't want to, that's one thing. If you're holding back because you're trying to protect me, that's something else entirely."

"Obviously I want to," Regulus snaps, as if insulted by the insinuation that he doesn't, which is a far cry from all the times he denied wanting James at all. It's still so shocking to see him being upfront and honest about his feelings, but James is realizing that Regulus was never lying to him before. He genuinely didn't know. "I just…"

"You want me? I'm here. I'm right fucking here, love," James breathes out. His heart thumps heavily in his chest, because Regulus tips himself forward, as if he's slowly being reeled in. "Use me. Have me, then discard me. Hurt me. I don't care, Regulus. You can do anything to me, and I'll thank you for it every time."

Regulus' breath audibly hitches, and he sways forward, his fingers twitching restlessly. There's so much restraint packed into his frame that it's almost painful to look at, and James, perhaps foolishly, wants to pluck at that restraint and bite down on it, worry it between his teeth, and relish in the taste when it finally snaps. Every part of him craves it, wanting so badly for Regulus to, in so many words, just fucking lose it and stop holding himself back, regardless of consequences.

Distantly, James knows that Regulus holds back for a reason, because he has trauma to navigate, because he can only go so far and give so much before they're stranded with nothing, no closer to what they ache for, never close enough. But that's—okay. Well, it's not, but James has made his peace with it and will continue to, and this… He just wants whatever Regulus will give him. Whatever Regulus can give him. James will take it, anything, and never demand more.

James took it when it was ignorance, and James took it when it was derision, and James took it when it was confusing, and James will take it when it hurts, gladly. Regulus has held a dagger to his throat, and some part of James had hoped he'd use it, just to have that from him, too.

"I don't want to hurt you anymore," Regulus whispers, and despite his words, he's moving closer like the temptation is too hard to resist, which maybe goes to James' head a bit. He keeps forgetting that Regulus actually wants him, that he has any allure to Regulus at all, and rediscovering that is a rush every single fucking time.

"I want you to," James admits bluntly, utterly breathless, gazing up at him in awe. "Hurt me. Just fucking ruin me."

"James," Regulus mumbles, as if in disapproval, but he's still not stopping his slow approach, so James figures he has no need to be ashamed of what he's saying.

"Think about it, love. A slap across the face is just a hand cradling a cheek with too much force," James says, his mouth dry. "I can take it. I swear I can take it. I might even like the way it stings, so long as it's your hand that leaves the mark."

Regulus swallows. "You deserve better."

"Oh, trust me, this will do for now," James assures him, his entire body singing with anticipation as Regulus braces his knee on the edge of the bed next to James' thigh.

"What if I can never give you better?" Regulus asks, still hesitating, his gaze guarded.

"You're the best I'll ever have, however I can have you, however briefly," James whispers, keeping his hands flat to the bed, fingers shaking. "And what about you? Don't you deserve this?"

"No," Regulus replies instantly, sounding certain.

"You do, you absolutely do, and you'll have it. If you want it, you'll have it," James declares, meaning that down to his fucking soul, and then his soul is alight because Regulus seems to give in, his hands reaching out to frame James' face.

"I'm sorry," Regulus rasps.

"I'm not," James whispers, craning forward as far as he can go, groaning helplessly when Regulus meets him halfway and kisses him.

And there it is. The snap. Regulus' restraint shrivels into ash with a sizzle James swears he can hear where Regulus' palms cradle his cheeks. It's pretty much instant, as if his resistance has been on a slow boil for a long time now, maybe a decade. The mere thought makes James' head spin with a mixture of delight and relief and yes, yes, yes. Regulus clutches at his hair and pulls, yanking James' head back to rise up slightly and kiss him from a higher angle, like a benevolent god breathing life into James' lungs.

He doesn't stop. He isn't stopping, and James feels like he's levitating as soon as it really hits him that it's actually happening, that they're actually doing this. He knows it's a bad idea; he just doesn't care.

Regulus turns out to be quite the needy thing, much to James' internal delight. He's fucking clingy, and he's demanding, even when they're just kissing. It's messy and desperate between them, Regulus steadily trying to get closer and kiss him deeper, a low whine escaping him every time James dares to separate even an inch for a small sip of much-needed oxygen.

"Okay, okay," James chants breathlessly, flexing his fingers into the bedsheets, not really having much of a choice but to tip his head to the side so Regulus can latch onto his throat, because apparently pulling away from James would be a crime of some sort. "Is this—it's just kissing, right?"

"Just kissing, just this, and don't—don't move, James. Stay just like this," Regulus mumbles into his skin, like a warning. "I want you right here. Right here..."

Dazed, James chokes out a laugh and wheezes, "Yeah, alright. Whatever you want, love."

"You are so—" Regulus doesn't even finish, because he's made his way back to James' mouth, and he seems more preoccupied with that than talking.

James feels simultaneously drunk and intensely clear-headed, lost in the sensation of Regulus all around him and still mentally capturing every moment to hold onto forever. Regulus cards his fingers through James' hair, tugging roughly enough that James' entire body prickles. A shudder ripples through him, and he clenches his fingers on the sheets, feeling like an engine seconds from combustion, seconds from bursting into flames.

They don't slow down, they don't stop, they just let the world wash away from them, regardless of how much it's going to hurt when it inevitably crashes back down on them once more.

It'll take a while, but later—much later—James will look back on this and wonder, sadly, if it was a parting gift, too.

~•~

Remus has seen Sirius in various states of despair, but this is somehow much worse. Maybe it's because all of the things that were wrong before ended up mostly working out; he got his brother and his best friend back. But this?

There's no happy ending to this.

Frankly, Remus finds it particularly crushing that he's so familiar with Sirius' despair, even more so than his joy. By a wide margin, Remus was far more exposed to Sirius' pain than his happiness, and it doesn't feel fair to him. He's thankful for every bit of Sirius that he got to have, but he'll always ache for the fact that he saw more tears than smiles.

"Why—Remus, why are you grabbing that?" Sirius croaks, watching him with wide, watery eyes as he picks up his mask from where he originally sat it down on Sirius' stand. Usually, he keeps it in the kitchen, but he'd come straight to Sirius' room as soon as he got in this morning, barely remembering to take the mask off at all before he went in.

"Sirius," Remus says softly, "I'll have to put it back on when you all leave. I have to wait here for them to come retrieve me to travel back to Azkaban. I don't know exactly when that will be, so I have to wear it as soon as you go."

Sirius' lips press into a thin line, and then he looks away as he blinks hard, swallowing thickly and taking a deep breath. He gives a jerky nod, then squeezes his eyes shut, looking pained.

"Come here," Sirius croaks, opening his eyes and waving him over, his face blotchy and red in a way Remus takes no delight in at all. He's a mess, even like this, and still beautiful, but Remus wants the blush he loves, the sweet one. Sirius isn't in the state to give it to him as he outstretches his hand and wiggles his fingers. "Let me hold it."

"My mask?" Remus murmurs, admittedly a little bewildered even as he shuffles over to pass it to Sirius.

"The mask. Not your mask," Sirius corrects sharply, and Remus tucks his lips in, thinking it's best that he doesn't mention that this mask is quite literally his, because it's fitted to his face, built and made for him and him alone.

"What are you doing?" Remus asks, stiffening as Sirius brings the mask up to his own face. He immediately hates the sight of it framed on Sirius, his stomach lurching.

Sirius doesn't answer him, but he thankfully doesn't try to fully put the mask on. No, he just brings it to his face and proceeds to—kiss the inside of it. Like, a loud, smacking smooch that makes Remus blink at him.

"There," Sirius declares decisively, giving a firm nod as he holds out the mask again. He catches Remus' gaze and says, without a hint of shame or embarrassment, "This way, every time you have it on, I'm giving you a kiss."

Remus stares at him, his chest pulsing with a strangled mix of fondness and pain. Oh, how he loves this man. Swallowing, he croaks, "Quickest way to make me never want to take it off."

Sirius releases a hoarse laugh that seems to scrape out of him, and the tears are building in his eyes again. They're rimmed with red and puffy, his eyelashes clumped together. Remus reaches out to take the mask, and as soon as he has it, Sirius is colliding into him and wriggling into his arms, not for the first time, but possibly the last. Remus wraps his arms around him, holding onto his mask behind his back, and he presses a kiss to Sirius' cheek as he burrows in closer.

"I have to go," Sirius chokes out.

"I know," Remus says gently.

Sirius holds onto him for a bit longer, then gives a quiet and rather adorable sniffle before shifting to lean on Remus, apparently determined to stay attached the whole way out the door. Remus adjusts, keeping one arm around him as they shuffle along, heading out into the main room.

Pandora, Regulus, and James are already there, waiting by the door. James is leaning on his cane, looking at Regulus with unabashed focus, like that's all he can see. Alternatively, Regulus is looking anywhere but James, so he sees the moment that Remus and Sirius come in. Remus finds himself oddly warmed by the sympathy that flashes in his eyes.

"Right," Pandora declares loudly, her voice shaking a bit. Her gaze is so fucking sad. "I have to go ahead to—to let them know to get the train started, and I won't be traveling with you, so this is—this is…goodbye."

"Ah, come here," James mumbles weakly, waving her over with a soft smile, and she instantly shuffles over to sort of just sag into his arms.

"Regulus," Remus says quietly, "can I have a word?"

"Um." Regulus blinks at him, darting a glance towards Sirius, who is frowning, mostly likely from the displeasure of having to let go, because that is what Remus is insinuating, yes. A beat later, Regulus gives a careful nod.

Remus' lips twitch faintly when Sirius huffs in mild protest at the fact that Remus genuinely does detach away from him, but as always, he lets Remus do as he wishes. It's nice the way he turns away and shuffles over to murmur to James and Pandora, who seem to be checking on him, while Remus and Regulus cross the room to get far enough that they won't be overheard.

"I'm not going to say anything, but I don't think I really have to," Remus says quietly, holding Regulus' gaze. He briefly breaks from it to look over at Sirius, and Regulus follows his glance before meeting his eyes again. "You know what I'm asking, don't you?"

"Yes," Regulus whispers.

"So, you will?" Remus checks, wanting confirmation, even though a part of him already knows.

Regulus swallows. "I'll…try. If he lets me, I will, but that task is usually granted to James, and James only."

"I'm not asking James. I'm asking you. James—I don't have to ask. But you…" Remus sighs. "You're a lot like Sirius about these things, thinking of the act of taking care of people like it's currency, and you can go bankrupt; or like an obligation, a task that you can fail. That's not what it is. It's a choice, Regulus. I'm asking you to make it."

"Okay," Regulus rasps, blinking a little rapidly and nodding carefully. "Yes, okay, I will."

"Good," Remus murmurs, "because that means something, and it'll mean a lot to both of you if you let it. He deserves that, after everything, and so do you."

"I—thanks," Regulus blurts out, stilted, cringing a little bit as soon as it falls out of his mouth. "For—thank you for—"

"I know," Remus cuts in, because Regulus is struggling. He gives him a faint smile and nods, because he does know that Regulus is thankful for him taking care of Sirius.

"And for the—when you, um—you know, what you did while I was—when I couldn't—" Regulus falters, then just seems to give up, looking genuinely dejected that he can't figure out how to properly express his gratitude for Remus helping with his fear of water. It's somehow sad and amusing all at once.

"Well, what are friends for, right?" Remus says lightly, and Regulus sort of just gives a weary nod, but Remus takes it for what it is. He hums. "Now, if you'll excuse me, I'm going to go kiss your brother until he has to leave."

Regulus doesn't even protest, complain, or wrinkle his nose, which is how Remus knows this is a solemn moment for them all, but especially himself and Sirius.

Remus stays true to his word, though. The second he's within range, Sirius sneaks right back to his side, and Remus cups his jaw to kiss him. He doesn't care that the other three are close by. Some part of him is strangely grateful that this moment is seen by others, known, bared to the light so it's more real. If Sirius ever needs to ask, James and Regulus will know.

They do break apart when Pandora clears her throat, assuming she wants their attention, but that's not it at all. She's focusing on Regulus, so much affection and sadness in her eyes, all at once, that it's genuinely heartbreaking. Regulus is visibly wary, but even he caves under the force of The Pandora Effect.

Regulus slowly, cautiously, reaches out to grab Pandora's hand, his touch delicate like he might snatch it away quickly, but he doesn't. He brings her hand to his mouth and presses a careful kiss to the back of her fingers.

Pandora beams at him, watching him kiss her hand so tenderly that it somehow makes them both look more fragile, like they're being so careful because they're more likely to break. Regulus is softer with Pandora than Remus has ever seen him with anyone, which—he thinks—is why Regulus has tried so hard to keep her at arms-length. But that's The Pandora Effect. She wriggles her way into your heart every single time, just the same as she cradles you in hers.

Regulus drops her hand immediately after, but Pandora looks so fucking pleased anyway.

"You don't even have to let him go," James announces, walking forward and legitimately just dragging both Remus and Sirius into a hug with one arm unprompted.

Remus isn't expecting it to hit him as hard as it does, honestly, but it slams right into his chest and nearly barrels him over. All he can remember is how James spoke to him every day from the very beginning, treating him with such kindness and warmth, like a friend he was delighted to make even though Remus never had anything to offer him but himself. For James, that was enough. Just Remus was enough.

James is warm against them, and he smells strongly of eucalyptus shower-gel and shampoo. Remus holds his back with one hand, the other around Sirius' waist, and Sirius' free arm wraps around James' back, too. Their fingers overlap between James' shoulders, even their pinkies holding onto each other, not ready to let go.

"Okay, I have to go," Pandora says, sounding choked-up. James draws back, and she's right there, waiting. "Can I…?"

"Yes, come here," Remus replies, keeping his arm held out and waving her closer with his hand.

She doesn't make Sirius let go either, not that anyone really could; she just sinks into them both and holds on for a long moment. Remus has never really noticed until now, but he practically swallows her with his size, making it easy for him to rest his chin on the top of her head. She squeezes them, then takes a deep breath and lets go.

Pandora doesn't linger, giving out a last round of goodbyes and rushing out to go handle what she needs to, regretfully informing them that they have maybe twenty minutes before they need to follow. Sirius stays latched onto Remus' side, and regardless of whatever issues they may have, Regulus and James sort of drift off to give Sirius and Remus their privacy. They're not talking or looking at each other, just sort of standing next to each other with so much tension between them that it's like a third person joining them.

"They're hopeless," Sirius mutters with a heavy sigh, shaking his head and turning in Remus' arms to face him like he doesn't even want to look at them.

"They'll figure it out, eventually," Remus says quietly.

"You think so?"

"I think…that's the law of average. It's all about balance, you know. There can't be too much of one thing, not even bad things. Someday, somehow, good will come."

Sirius' lips curl up. "Optimistic of you."

"Well, I have my proof, don't I? All the awful shit I've dealt with, and then one day, with no warning, there you were," Remus murmurs, gently stroking up and down Sirius' back.

"I'll be back. I'll—I'll see you in a year," Sirius croaks, his hands sliding up Remus' chest slowly.

"Okay," is all Remus says, because he doesn't want to argue with Sirius about this. He doesn't let himself hope for it, or expect it, because he knows better. "You know, a lot can happen in a year."

"I know," Sirius whispers, flexing his fingers on Remus' shoulders before slowly grappling his way down Remus' arms. He gives a tight smile as Remus arches an eyebrow at him in blatant curiosity. "Like you said, a lot can happen in a year. I could forget the shape of you, the smell of you, the way your hair falls and the shade of your eyes. I want to memorize you."

Remus' heart clenches. "That's not exactly what I meant."

"What did you mean?"

"I just… Sirius, I want you to know you're under no obligation whatsoever to wait for me in any capacity. You—"

"Remus," Sirius cuts in, an edge to his tone.

"You could meet someone," Remus insists, his voice low and fervent. "And, if you do, that's okay. That's—" He swallows down the bitter taste of jealousy and envy. "Just don't hold yourself back from anyone or anything, certainly not for me. Don't hold yourself to the standard of savior, because you're not, Sirius. You're not my savior, and I don't need you to be."

The muscle in Sirius' cheek twitches from where he's visibly clenching his jaw. "There won't be anyone else. You already know that I—I don't feel that way about people."

"You can accept pleasure," Remus reminds him. "There's no shame in it. That's yours, remember?"

"No, you don't—" Sirius grimaces and shakes his head, heaving a sigh. "Perhaps I wasn't clear before. I mean I literally don't feel that way for people. Sexually, I mean. I—I didn't even feel that way for you, not at first. It took a bit of time, and it took trust. The sex part of it, at least. And I still don't—well, I never want to have sex to have sex. I only want sex because it's with you. Does that make sense at all?"

Remus sits on that for a second, then nods. "Yeah, it does. That's okay," Remus tells him, because it is. It's not his job, or anyone's job, to tell any other person who or how they're allowed to want, or not want. "Just—if there is anyone that you click with in the next year, I don't want you to—"

"Remus, I know what you're trying to say, I really do, and it's very noble of you," Sirius interrupts, "but you're the only one I want, alright? It's as simple as that. I'm going to think about you every day. I'm going to miss you." He exhales shakily, blinking hard. "I will miss you so much, all the time. There's no space for anything else, because I want our something. And I will wait for it. I'd wait forever, if I had to."

"Well, in that case, a year is nothing. It's a blink," Remus whispers, his voice thick as he leans forward to press their foreheads together, eyes drifting shut.

"A year. We can do a year," Sirius whispers back, and Remus tries to convince himself to agree, because they have no choice either way. They're going to spend a year apart regardless, and maybe even longer, because even now, Remus doesn't hold onto the hope that they will see each other again.

So, if this is all they have, then Remus intends to make the most of it. He draws Sirius closer, holding onto him as he brings their mouths together, kissing him slow and sweet and steady, cherishing each second of it. The kiss drags out as if they have all the time in the world, and Remus pours every bit of the love he feels for this man into it, unable to say it. He refuses to say it just because he's scared he'll never get another chance; some rebellious part of him insists that, if he doesn't say it, then he'll have to see Sirius again just to tell him.

They kiss, unhurried and unhindered, and then they break apart to cling to each other. Remus squeezes his eyes shut and buries his face into Sirius' hair while Sirius tucks his face into Remus' shoulder. In silence, they breathe, and that is all.

And then, inevitably, they have to let go.

Neither of them want to, that much is clear, but they have no other options. Sirius wavers the second they split apart, swaying forward again like he's going to fall right back into him. Remus swallows thickly and steps back, hungrily studying Sirius' face even as he backs up towards the door.

"Bye, Remus," Sirius says softly, so soft it's a mere breath.

"Bye, sweetheart," Remus murmurs, his voice thick and his chest aching and his eyes stinging.

Sirius takes in a shuddering breath, face red in the worst way, from strain, from hurting. He looks away, then ducks his head and whips around, swiveling past James and Regulus to reach for the door like he's rushing to escape all at once.

Remus watches them go, feeling as if his chest is splitting open. The door opens, then shuts. Sirius hadn't looked back.

Slowly, Remus turns and walks to the side of the room, standing one step in front of the wall, unobtrusive and nothing more than a shadow. He raises his mask and puts it back on, clipping it to his face, where it seems to strangle him more now than it ever has. He blinks the tears out of his eyes, puts his hands behind his back, and ducks his head.

And that is all.

~•~

The train ride home is long, and silent.

Regulus isn't speaking, and neither is Sirius, so James doesn't either. He doesn't break the silence; he doesn't really know how. There are tarts on the table, and James doesn't look at them. Just two weeks ago, he rode a train into the Hallow and found it in himself to smile, to invite laughter and warmth in the heavy reality that had draped over all of their shoulders then. He remembers it, teasing Regulus, laughing uproariously when Regulus tossed a tart at Sirius' head.

It feels like a lifetime ago. James feels like all of those people are gone. He aches for them, for the people they were before all of this started, and he doesn't think they'll ever get them back. They are still them—James, Sirius, and Regulus—just as they have always been, because nothing can take that from them, but they have been altered, they have been shaped by cruel, capricious hands; for all that they are still them, they can never again be the same.

The thing is, that is what life is, in reality. Life is just death and rebirth, consistently, over and over in small capacities that build into something noticeable over time. It's supposed to be gradual; you are not the same as you were the year prior, or ten before that, or as you were when you came into this world, but you are you in your ever-changing shape, growing and learning and living. Even stagnant, there is a shift within you, something you don't always realize until you think to look back and see how far you've come, a constant journey.

It's not supposed to be like this. Yes, everything can change in a split second, and you with it, but it isn't something that's ever meant to go to depths such as these. Two weeks, only two weeks, and they're unrecognizable to who they were, in the way people are only supposed to be after years.

Some things remain. There is comfort in that. There is comfort in knowing that some things can never be changed, or taken away, no matter what else is.

The passage of time feels unreal. James genuinely struggles with it. He knows how much Sirius struggled with his memory after returning from the arena. For James, he thinks his struggle is with time, and his own placement in the world. There are moments where he doesn't know where he is, lost in himself and immediately going right back to the arena, needing to be drawn back here and the flow of time.

He feels that way when the train stops, not entirely sure how much time has passed, not entirely convinced that they haven't just arrived in the Hallow, where he'll have to prepare to go into the arena and fight to get Regulus home. He doesn't know. He can't be sure, not completely.

"I have to go speak to the mayor," Sirius rasps as they all stand up, each of them moving cautiously as if none of them can fully believe this is real. "I'll get everything in order for both of you to receive your winnings as Victors, and you'll both be assigned houses of your own in the Victor Village. You don't have to be there for it, so if you want to—"

"Can I come with you?" Regulus cuts in. He looks Sirius right in the eye, holding his gaze. "I don't want to see them yet."

"Yeah, Reggie, that's fine," Sirius murmurs. "We'll, ah—if you want, I can—I'll go with you."

Regulus nods carefully. "Thank you."

"You don't have to come," Sirius says, looking directly at James now. "You should go see your parents. They'll probably be waiting for you at the gate."

"You'll—once everything is handled, you'll come, right?" James asks, feeling ridiculously guilty for it, his gaze darting towards Regulus, who is staring down at his fingers.

"Yeah, of course," Sirius whispers. "Come on, James, let me help you off the train. You get off first, Regulus."

So, that's what they do. Regulus walks ahead of them, heading for the doors and disappearing through them first. James and Sirius are much slower to disembark, because James has been sitting without moving for hours, and his leg is not very happy with him. It's frustrating, because his leg hurts if he uses it too much, and it hurts if he doesn't use it enough.

It's stiff and aching, causing him to lean on Sirius and his cane hard as they make their way down the aisle of the train. It had been a bitch getting on the train, though Sirius hadn't let him fall, and it's equally difficult getting off. Again, Sirius doesn't let him fall; he helps James to the bottom step, gets off first, then stands on the edge of the platform to hold his hand out to James, keeping him steady as he makes it over. It causes a spike of pain in his leg that has him grinding his teeth and pausing as he waits for it to dull again.

When James looks up, his stomach drops right out from underneath him, because he loses time and gains too much of it all at once, nothing making sense.

It's snowing.

There's snow on the ground, and there are flurries gently coming down, and how is that possible? It was snowing when they left. Shouldn't it be spring? Has winter come and gone and come back around? It doesn't make sense.

It takes him a moment to piece it all together. Spring is on its way, and this is still the winter he left behind. It's hard for him to fathom how so much could have happened, so much change in and around him, but the season is still the same. It's only been two weeks. Winter is still here.

Regulus has snow in his hair, and he's beautiful. He's standing in front of them, waiting, and there's snow in his hair just like there was on his fifteenth birthday. For a second, James feels like he goes in and out of time, yanked back and forth between the past and the present; Regulus flickers in front of him, fifteen and close, twenty-five and never close enough.

"You'll be alright?" Sirius asks, drawing his attention. "Do you want us to walk you to the gate?"

James shakes his head. "No, I've got it. You two go on."

Sirius nods warily, and after a moment, he lets go. James adjusts to his cane, nodding back before slowly making his way forward. Regulus joins Sirius; they have to go the other way, up the path. James looks back, unable to help it, and he feels his heart lurch and give a gentle keen when he sees Regulus looking back, snow in his hair, holding James' gaze with lovely eyes. Those eyes of his.

Together, all at once, they look away.

The walk to the gate is slow and arduous. The snow isn't quite sticking to the ground, just a soft dusting that blankets it, but he feels unsteady despite that. He doesn't want to fall, and he's worried his cane might slip out from underneath him with only slush on the ground to brace against. Every stilted step is measured and careful, and he doesn't rush.

The gate isn't open when he gets there, but he only has to press the buzzer on the side he's on once before it swings open. It's framed by a large brick wall, and the gate itself is made of metal with no way to see through it or around it. He waits patiently on the other side, his heart racing, and then he chokes out a harsh breath the moment he sees his parents standing eagerly on the other side.

Some part of him had been afraid that they wouldn't be.

But they're there.

Right there.

James doesn't even get to take one step. As soon as they see him, Effie and Monty are rushing right for him. He gets to suck in one deep, gasping breath before they're on him, wrapping him in their arms from either side, holding him up as he instantly sags into them both. He clutches at them desperately, and when he exhales, it comes out as a sob.

They hold him, and he is home.

Chapter End Notes

starting from the top:

hiiii, evan <3 NO LET ME STOP THATS SO CRUEL 😭 he's dead, and i still found ways to keep him around lmaoooo. honestly, you'd miss him otherwise. trust me on that.

sirius comforting regulus about evan and using james "the best best friend" potter to do it>>>> pandora my beloved <3 getting hand-kisses of admiration, as she deserves!!! she is so, so special to me. The Pandora Effect is real let me go ahead and talk about jegulus really quick.

so like, james and regulus making out. regulus MEANT he was Kissing That Man as soon as he saw him in his glasses again 😭 he really said: My Trauma Is Just Gonna Have To Wait. he's so valid for that, actually. that kiss was EARNED, he's been missing james in his glasses since CHAPTER TWO. he deserved that. they both did, honestly.

that being said, the kissing doesn't...change anything. like, they're still not in a good place, so that was just. self-indulgence. that was them literally coming to the decision to hurt together, because the other mattered more to them than the chance to avoid more pain. oh, they're so in love, im SICK

now, onto the wolfstar. oh, this wolfstar angst RIPPED ME TO SHREDS, because this entire time they've been sweet and—well, not happy, but very healthy and so incredibly in love. it just HURTS 😭😭😭 and look, i know a lot of you were hoping that there would be some way that they could help save remus from the hallow, but that's just. not realistic. for right now, dorcas doesn't even know remus EXISTS, and she would be the only one with a true way to help him escape. remus wouldn't have escaped anyway, because that would have gotten his father killed. the hallow—riddle especially—has no qualms about using people they love to keep someone in line.

so, yes, remus was left behind. it fucking sucks, but it is what it is. that does NOT mean that remus' presence in this is just gone. it's not. we actually have a remus POV next chapter, and we learn more about his backstory in chapter 33. but yes, you'll probably miss him, which is purposeful, because sirius also misses him. we are all holding hands and missing remus lupin rn.

for those of you who do just want the reassurance (even though it's probably obvious), SPOILERS AHEAD, sirius and remus do indeed see each other again and get to reunite, i promise <3

HONORABLE MENTIONS:

-james blurting out "i love you" bc he Feels A Lot
-regulus literally being unable to resist james, which is so valid of him, bc i would ALSO fold like a lawn chair for that man
-sirius saying "i want to memorize you" and the layers of that, knowing his memory issues
-the return of "lover boy" and evan still being a little shit, even when dead lmaoooo
-sirius asking about azkaban, oh the irony
-remus returning the favor and asking regulus to help take care of sirius
-regulus just agreeing that he and remus are friends (and also trying so, so very hard to thank him, that poor man, he was STRUGGLING)
-james reuniting with his parents <3

this wasn't as rambly as usual, but im kinda tired, so it's all ive got. i do want to take the time to thank you all for your supportive comments and feedback. i do read them all and adore each one!

Three Months Later

Chapter Notes

hello, all!

warnings for this chapter:

-references to past deaths
-implied spice 🌶 (fade-to-black)
-descriptions of a needle being used (briefly, but explicitly)
-depictions of torture/experimentation (overall brief and skippable, but explicit nonetheless)
-mentions of blood

i will be putting an in-depth warning for those of you who want/need it in the end notes, which is valid!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Lily hits the mat with a grunt, all the breath getting pushed from her lungs all at once from the impact. Kingsley stands over her, eyebrows raised.

"You don't fight fair," Lily complains.

"Yes, well, war isn't fair either," Kingsley reminds her.

Lily purses her lips. "I just asked where you got the earring. You could have just said you didn't want to tell me."

"On your feet, Red," Kingsley says, holding his hand down towards her. The earring she's referencing glints in his right ear, gold and glimmering under the overhead lights. He didn't have it yesterday. Lily has her suspicions on how he got it.

"You know, Sybill will like it," Lily points out lightly as she reaches up to grab his hand, letting him haul her to her feet.

Kingsley just hums, expression neutral.

"Has she seen it yet?" Lily tries again, bouncing on the balls of her feet as they shift further apart. Kingsley doesn't answer her; he just shakes out his arms. "She'll think it's sexy."

"Lily," Kingsley says, his voice low and smooth, but there's a tiny smile twitching at the corner of his mouth.

Lily laughs. "What? She will."

"You're in a good mood today," Kingsley notes, bringing his hands up loosely in front of him.

"Mm, well, your earring just gave me good news," Lily says, breaking out into a grin as she brings her hands up as well. Kingsley heaves a sigh, and she rushes him.

Despite all the training Lily has done the last three months, she still can't beat Kingsley, though not for a lack of trying. Lily takes training very seriously, rarely—if ever—goofing off and always focusing rigorously. This isn't a game; this is preparation for what's to come, and she's not taking it lightly. Kingsley is her main trainer, but she's done a lot of work with Poppy, especially with the medical side of things in mind. It's hard and draining, but satisfying, too.

It gives her purpose.

Though, every time her back hits the mat, Lily does find herself ever so briefly wondering what the fuck she's even doing. Sometimes she asks herself that just to remember her answer, the same one each time. For Remus. For her family. For the war, so that one day—someday—everyone will know peace, and everyone will be free.

That's love, in its own way, she thinks. Love for things that she does not actually have, so it cannot be taken from her. All that she fights for is a strength, not a weakness.

Just how Dumbledore likes it.

"Better," Kingsley praises when Lily, after hitting the floor, immediately rolls to her feet with no pause, still at the ready.

"I know," Lily says, holding herself still as he gets closer, waiting for the opening. Kinglsey never gives her one; his form is perfect, and there is no doubt in her mind that he is the best fighter compared to literally anyone else within the Phoenix. He keeps a cool head, too, even in a fight, which likely makes him invaluable to Dumbledore as well. There's a reason Kingsley has such a high position within the Order.

"You're thinking too much," Kingsley murmurs. That's his thing. He's always calm, always focused on whatever task he's been given, duty-driven and goal-oriented. Nothing gets to him, no matter the situation. Nothing.

"I can't help that my brain is always working, King," Lily replies, exasperated. "But I am improving, right?"

Kingsley nods. "You are. Even today, you've shown signs of improvement. Do you want to stop and head to the range?"

"Yes!" Lily blurts out immediately, perking up.

"I thought you would," Kingsley says, a fond smile flashing across his face as he drops his hands.

"So, the earring," Lily muses, raising her eyebrows at him as they head out of the training room.

"Let it go," Kingsley mutters.

Lily squints at him. "Absolutely not."

Kingsley doesn't reply, his hand coming up to tug at his earlobe as they make their way through the compound, heading down to the lower levels. His fingers curl around the earring, blocking it from sight, but Lily realizes with rising interest that he drops his hand as soon as Sybill comes into view. She has her suspicions about how he got it, but she now has her suspicions about why he got it. She was teasing before, about Sybill, but maybe…

"King!" Sybill gasps in delight as soon as she notices. Her eyes brighten immediately as she rips away from Wren—who she was walking down the hall with—to rock forward and gape at Kingsley's ear. She rears back, staring at him in disbelief, as if she's never seen him before. "Is that an—"

"Shh," Lily hisses quickly, shooting her a look and glancing around. They'll just take it from him if they find out about it, and Sybill isn't exactly being quiet.

"You're so sexy," Sybill informs Kingsley, just as Lily knew she would. "I want one. Did you do it yourself? Will you do me?"

"Oh, I'm sure he would love to do you," Lily says in wry amusement, because she knows that look in Kingsley's eye, and yeah, her suspicions are correct. She wonders how long… Her heart gives a small pang. She hopes it hasn't been a long time, at least not before her training started, because that would mean he had to see Lily and Sybill together.

"Lily and I have to go," Kingsley announces smoothly, darting a look towards Lily that tells her to keep her mouth shut. She does. Kingsley's a grown man; he can handle this himself. He flashes Sybill a grin, the kind that makes knees wobble. "I can come by your room after, if you want."

Sybill beams at him. "That'd be lovely."

"What about you, Evans?" Wren calls out, giving her a slow look up and down the length of her body, her intentions very clear. "You need a room to come to after?"

Lily chuckles. "Not this time, Wren, sorry."

"But we miss you," Wren complains, laughing through a groan as she pretends to stomp her feet.

"It's true, we do," Sybill confirms, reaching up curiously to poke Kingsley's ear, still enthralled with the earring. Kingsley holds very still and lets her do what she likes. "Miranda and Ember are about to start climbing the walls."

"Ah, sorry, you know how busy I've been," Lily says with a grimace of apology. It wasn't a joke when she said that the women she sleeps with—or used to—would be disappointed if she stopped. They are. Lily hasn't had time for any of them the last three months. "Here's an idea, just a thought, but have any of you considered, you know, fucking each other?"

"No one does it like you, Lily," Sybill says cheerfully.

Lily winces slightly, stealing a glance at Kinglsey, who remains remarkably neutral through hearing that. It's possibly not that big of a blow purely because Sybill looks like she wants to bite his ear at the moment, though that is surely because of the earring. She's so strange. Lily finds her delightful.

"Right, well uh, we have to go." Lily coughs and gives out half-hearted platitudes while Sybill and Wren call after them to beg off their duties and stay a little longer. Despite the temptation, Lily and Kingsley remain strong and continue on.

They're silent for a bit, and as soon as Lily opens her mouth, Kingsley says, "Not a word, Red," so Lily closes it again and does her best to stifle her laugh.

Lily focuses again when they enter the gun range, because this is where she excels. This is her bread and butter, so to speak. With practice, she's become very efficient with guns, which may have something to do with the fact that she uses her own free time to get better with them. Sometimes, when she leaves the infirmary after her shift, she comes here. She pulls guns apart and puts them back together, over and over and over. She reels back the target and shoots until she never misses, no matter what gun she's holding.

She'd worried she would be afraid of guns, because she's been shot before, but she's not. Or maybe she is, and the obsessive way she's been about guns is how she controls that fear.

Kingsley doesn't speak to her as he sticks up the paper with the vague silhouette of a person on it for both of them, reeling each of them back until the numbers almost aren't visible. He chooses the gun she'll work with first, and they separate to go to their own stalls, a divider keeping them apart.

"Right hand, left shoulder, head—in that order," Kingsley calls out.

"You got it," Lily says, then lifts her gun, not even hesitating to pull the trigger. It's quick, three shots back-to-back before Kingsley can make it through his, even though they started at the same time. He finishes only seconds after her, but those seconds matter when it's life or death.

Lily doesn't miss one shot.

It continues like this for a while, Kingsley calling out orders and Lily completing them faster than he can. They cycle through various guns, Kingsley replaces the target paper multiple times, and then—towards the end—Lily is taken to a table and timed on reloading each and every gun.

"Alright, you're done for the day, at least until your shift at the infirmary," Kingsley says.

"Yeah, alright." Lily sticks around to help him lock the guns back up anyway, then sort of blocks him before he can quickly escape. "So…"

Kingsley heaves a sigh. "Don't make a big deal out of it."

"You like her," Lily says, grinning. "King, you actually—I mean, you really like her. You got an earring for her!"

"I—" Kingsley's face twitches, and then he sighs as he lifts a hand to shield his eyes, as if embarrassed. "Oh, that's so stupid. This was so stupid. I am so stupid."

"No, no, no," Lily rushes to correct. "It wasn't stupid. It was cute. It's—it's really cute. You're not stupid, Kingsley."

"I don't even know if she likes men," Kingsley says wearily, dropping his hand.

Lily nods quickly. "She does. You absolutely have a chance, okay?" She reaches out and knocks her elbow into his, catching his gaze. "How long have you…?"

"Lily," Kingsley says, strained.

"Oh, fuck, you've fancied her even while I was sleeping with her?" Lily blurts out, distressed. She stares at him with wide eyes, but he just looks away. "Fuck's sake, King, why didn't you say something? I would have—"

Kingsley grimaces and mutters, "Look, I'm not proud of it, but that's how I figured it out, alright?"

"What?" Lily asks, confused.

"I, uh, didn't know," Kingsley explains, heaving a sigh. He shrugs at her a little helplessly. "I mean, Sybill and I have been friends for years, and sure, I always thought she was brilliant, but I also used to think she was really fucking weird."

"She is weird," Lily points out.

"Yeah, I didn't know I was into weird until…" Kingsley frowns and gestures to her. "It took me a bit, honestly, because I couldn't figure out what bothered me about it so much."

Men, Lily thinks in despair. She shakes her head, fighting a smile at the bewildered look on his face, like it still baffles him a bit. "Alright, but why didn't you say something? It was bothering you, yeah? If I would have known…"

"I have no say in who Sybill is with, or isn't, just because I like her. I didn't figure it out until it was too late, and that was on me, not you or her," Kingsley says simply.

"Yeah, but I still…" Lily sighs. "Well, if it makes you feel any better, it didn't mean anything."

"Yeah, Red, it never does with you, does it?" Kingsley murmurs, eyebrows furrowed.

"What's that supposed to mean?" Lily asks with a frown, admittedly a bit betrayed that Kingsley seems to be turning the conversation to her…issues, or whatever.

Kingsley arches an eyebrow at her. "You know what I'm saying. Nothing means anything to you, not with anyone. And I don't just mean romance or sex, because that's your prerogative to navigate how you wish; I'm talking about how you don't let yourself get close to anyone. You don't—care. Not really."

Lily purses her lips, looking away. She knows Kingsley is worried for her, because of how distant she is, but she doesn't really care. It's better for her not to care. She likes Kingsley, sure, but they're not friends. That's not what this is.

Really, Lily likes plenty of people in the Phoenix, or affiliated with them, but not enough that it would be a blow to lose them. If Kingsley was running with her, chased, covered in blood, and he shoved her away to tell her to keep running, she would. She wouldn't hesitate. She wouldn't look back. She wouldn't break down and let herself get shot.

Not like she did with Remus.

As if he can read her mind, Kingsley quietly says, "I know that what happened with Remus was—"

"Don't talk about him," Lily cuts in sharply, so sharp that Kingsley instantly stops. His eyes are sad, and she hates it.

He was there that day, five years ago. He gunned down Aurors to pick her up off the ground, to save her, and her tears weren't for the gunshot wound in her shoulder, but for Remus. She had been chanting his name, begging Kingsley to go save him, and he promised he would try as soon as he got her to safety. And he did. As soon as she was safe, he left to go try, while she was carted off to the Phoenix by the team he was working with.

Kingsley never found Remus. Dumbledore told her that day in the infirmary. When she demanded to know if he had been captured—refusing to stay at the Phoenix if he was, fully intending to claw her way into Hallow right by herself to save him, if she had to—Dumbledore regretfully informed her that Remus had been executed, as had her family.

Kingsley, who was in the other bed with a gunshot wound to his leg, had watched her weep in silence. He told her that he had tried, and he was sorry, and she thanked him. It was the last words she spoke for a long, long time; when she did speak again, it was to ask Kingsley for help on getting outside, because she couldn't take it anymore, couldn't stand feeling smothered underground anymore, and Kingsley got her a radio and told her to do what she had to do.

Lily and Kingsley have a lot of history. He was the first person she was actually comfortable with in the Phoenix, and perhaps that was because he saved her, because he actually put in the effort to at least try and save Remus. He's a good man, and though she doesn't allow herself to get too close to him, or anyone, she has unwavering respect for him.

"You don't talk about it," Kingsley says quietly. "You never talk about it, what happened that day. Sometimes I think you never moved past it, Lily."

I haven't. How can I? Lily thinks, her stomach twisting like gnarled roots at the base of an overturned tree. She doesn't know how she could ever move past it, when it ended the way it did. It was their fault—hers and Remus'. He could never stay out of trouble, and she could never leave well enough alone.

They were a recipe for disaster from the very beginning, her and Remus. Chaos twins, but in the worst way possible; quietly. No one saw them coming, until they did.

"Dorcas is here, isn't she?" Lily asks abruptly, holding his gaze as she brazenly and carelessly changes the subject. He narrows his eyes, and she hums. "She gave you the earring, then?"

Kingsley stares at her for a long moment, but she doesn't look away, making it very clear that —as always—she won't be leaving well enough alone. He sighs. "Yeah, she's here."

Lily grins.

~•~

Dorcas tracks Slughorn all the way through the room as he beats a hasty retreat, finally released by Dumbledore. He's been unable to meet her eyes, constantly fidgeting every time she speaks, freezing in fear when she addresses him. She made him squirm throughout the meeting. She enjoyed it.

"I must ask," Dumbledore says softly, drawing her gaze to him as the door shuts, "whatever did you do to frighten him so?"

"He didn't say?" Dorcas asks.

Dumbledore shakes his head. "I imagine he was too afraid to."

"Well, that's satisfying," Dorcas admits, mildly amused. "I told him that he had two options; either come here, or get his brains blown out. I may have implied that I would have been disappointed by him choosing the first. Or, rather I told him I would, because I didn't feel the need to lie to him about it."

"Recruitment is meant to be a choice, Ms. Meadowes. We don't threaten the lives of our allies."

"He wasn't exactly an ally at the time, now was he? Besides, don't pretend that you never operate under the rule that the ends justify the means. Was it not you that told me the risk of recruitment was necessary to win the war, regardless of what losses we would face along the way?"

"That may be so, but coercion is not a burden I have ever asked you to bear," Dumbledore murmurs.

Dorcas rolls her shoulders lazily. "It's not one too heavy, I assure you. Quite light, actually."

"You blame him," Dumbledore notes.

"I blame them all," Dorcas corrects.

Dumbledore hums. "Resentment addles the mind more than you know, Ms. Meadowes. Keep a clear head."

"Don't question my methods, so long as I get things done. If you don't like it, find someone else," Dorcas informs him sharply, and he doesn't respond. "Ah, but you can't, can you? No one does what I do as effectively as I can."

"You have made yourself quite useful," Dumbledore agrees, almost sounding fond.

Dorcas ignores that. "How is Molly?"

"Adjusting well," Dumbledore says. "She's an asset to the infirmary and seems to get on delightfully with Arthur, though she does insist upon joining the war efforts more… forwardly. She would like to be in the field."

"Will you let her be?"

"No."

"You mentioned a new field medic. Not her, then?"

"Lily Evans."

"Ah," Dorcas murmurs, working to keep her expression neutral. She inclines her head. "Wise choice, sir."

Dumbledore smiles. "Yes, I thought so, too."

"I want to know what happened to them," Dorcas demands, leaning forward on her elbows as she holds his gaze over his desk. "Gideon and Fabian. Where did it go wrong?"

"You're assuming I know?" Dumbledore asks.

Dorcas scoffs. "Of course you know. You always know, and honestly, half the time I don't care to know all that you do. I only care to know what I need to. But this? I have to know this, and you're going to tell me."

"I fear that this knowledge is too great for you to bear."

"I don't care. Tell me."

"I can't risk the progress your position provides for this war," Dumbledore says simply. "I won't."

"I have been in this for years," Dorcas hisses, slamming her hand down on the desk. He doesn't flinch. "I have given it my all since Alastor Moody recruited me, and I have never, not once, questioned you or my orders. My position is not at risk, not unless you continue to refuse me now."

"Ms. Meadowes—"

"Answer me, or I walk away."

Dumbledore regards her for a long moment, his eyes clear and calm. "You are in far too deep to walk away now."

"You underestimate me," Dorcas replies coldly. "I won't be manipulated. Keep your thinly veiled threats; we both know what's at stake here. You need me. If I walk away, I don't get far. Don't make the mistake of thinking that will stop me. I'm not above coercion, but I refuse to fall prey to it."

"Have you considered that I wish not to tell you for your own sake?" Dumbledore asks, almost gentle about it, but she doesn't soften a bit. He sighs. "If you insist."

Dorcas leans back. "Go on, then."

"The Prewetts were tasked with gathering very important intel from one of my informants. The information allowed us to intercept and obtain a shipment of biological warfare only the Hallow has ever had access to," Dumbledore explains. "It included the history and the formula, which was something we could not afford to pass up. In doing so, it notified Tom Riddle that the information had somehow been leaked. He knew it was a Hallow, seeing as only Hallows have access to the city, as far as he knows. Unfortunately, the loyalty of the Hallow is so great that it's quite noticeable when there's disloyalty, specifically when it is bold disloyalty."

"No," Dorcas whispers.

Dumbledore holds her gaze. "You're very bold, Ms. Meadowes."

"No," Dorcas chokes out, her whole body feeling like it's numb, like maybe she's floating somewhere beyond it. Her eyes are prickling with heat and building tears.

"You were a suspect," Dumbledore murmurs, "but, as I told you, I cannot risk the progress your position provides for this war."

Dorcas glares at him through her tears. "You—you made them take the fall for me, because I'm worth more to you than they were. You—you killed them. You—"

"Fabian and Gideon Prewett knew the risks, just as you do," Dumbledore says softly. "They were willing to fight and die in this war, just as you are. You and all that you provide this cause were at risk, as was my informant, and so I did what had to be done to keep you both alive. To lose either of you would be a blow to our efforts that we desperately did not need then, now, or in the future."

"You're at severe risk of losing me now," Dorcas croaks, balling her hands into fists.

Dumbledore shakes his head. "I'm not. Though you are hurt and grieving, it's as you said; you do not fall prey to coercion, and that means you are here because you believe in this. You don't need to blame yourself. You are not at fault."

"No, you are," Dorcas snarls.

"The greater good unfortunately builds itself on the foundation of sacrifice," Dumbledore says quietly. "You can't see that right now, and I don't need you to. All I need is for you to do what you always have. Get things done."

"And if I don't?" Dorcas rasps.

"You will," Dumbledore tells her.

Dorcas swallows and blinks hard, taking in a deep breath before it shudders on the way out. She looks him right in the eyes and says, "Fuck you."

"You're dismissed," Dumbledore murmurs, turning his head to gaze at the painting on the wall, the one that's been there for as long as Dorcas has been around to see it every time she stepped foot in his office. A portrait of a young girl, her eyes a twinkling blue that matches Dumbledore's. Dorcas wrenches to her feet and heads to the door without looking back, only pausing with her hand on the handle when he calls out to her. "Oh, and Ms. Meadowes?"

Dorcas doesn't grant him with a response, standing in place with her shoulders tense, grinding her teeth.

"I will be in touch soon," Dumbledore says, and Dorcas squeezes her eyes shut before turning her head and giving him a jerky nod, then exits the room and slams the door shut behind her on her way out.

For a long moment, Dorcas can only stand there and breathe, and exist with this knowledge, and wrestle with the reality that she can do nothing about it.

There are no good people in war, Dorcas knows that. She has never dared to claim that she is a good person, especially in the midst of this war that she's planted herself firmly in the middle of. There are a lot of things that sit heavy on her heart, things she will never be free from the weight of, but Gideon and Fabian… They were good men. They were her friends.

Dumbledore is not a good man, and Dorcas has never fallen for the illusion that he is. Riddle is worse. That's the horrible reality of it; the lesser of two evils. At least, regardless of what it takes to get there, Dumbledore wants the world to be a better place. That's what sets him apart from Riddle, who wants the world to stay just as it is, at its worst.

When Dorcas joined the Order of the Phoenix, she did so with the knowledge that Dumbledore would do whatever was necessary to get what he wanted—what they all want—and she wants the same thing, so she appreciated this about him. It has never affected her so starkly until this moment, until Fabian and Gideon, and now it leaves a sour taste in her mouth.

Riddle is careless with lives. Dumbledore weighs them. Dorcas is briefly, viscerally grateful that they are against one another, rather than working together. She's thankful now more than ever that Dumbledore was not born a Hallow.

Sometimes, Dorcas wonders if being a Victor in his own games long, long ago shaped him into the person he is today, the person who can and will choose who lives or dies, if a situation arises where the choice needs to be made. She doesn't know his full story, only what she learned over the last few years, but she knows that he won his games, and she knows he killed Gellert Grindelwald, the Master of the Hallow at the time.

She knows, now, that he is responsible for the death of Fabian and Gideon. She wishes, fretfully and desperately, that it was enough to make her walk away, but it isn't. To do that would be to live on in ignorance, choosing to do nothing when she can actually make a difference. To walk away from him and all that he stands for would be to walk right to Riddle's side, and she will never, never do that. She can't.

Not that Dumbledore would let her get far if she tried, honestly. Dorcas is smarter than that. If she is not with them, she is a threat. After all, she knows far too much, and putting the cause at risk is not something Dumbledore stands for. She could possibly make it as far as the train to board it, but she has no doubt that she wouldn't make it home. Maybe that should scare her, but it doesn't.

Sighing heavily, Dorcas sets her shoulders, swipes her face, and starts making her way through the compound.

People in the Phoenix are used to her by now. There aren't that many Hallows in the Order. Shocker. Dorcas is one of the few; most of everyone else either escaped from their districts, or were born in the Phoenix and have been living here their whole lives. The latest Hallow to join up—even through coercion—is Slughorn. She catches sight of him in the Great Hall as she goes through, chattering merrily to a few people sitting with him at the table, laughing and drinking.

The sight makes her blood boil, honestly, but she doesn't engage or interrupt. Slughorn has clearly adjusted to his place in the Phoenix, though some people had implied that it wasn't a simple process. Apparently, he was shunned for quite a bit for some of the stupid shit that fell out of his mouth, all coming from a place of privilege and entitlement—the Hallow special, if you will. Dorcas knows these people, and she knows many of them well by now. She doesn't doubt that Slughorn was put in his place and had a very, very rude awakening waiting for him.

Dorcas stops by the infirmary to at least see Molly—and Arthur, technically, since he's here as well. It's fortunately quiet when she comes in. There's a child on one of the beds, coughing pitifully in his sleep as his mother—Dorcas assumes, at least—gently strokes his hair, looking worried.

"Dorcas!" Molly says brightly when she sees her, and then she's bustling over to pull a startled Dorcas into a hug.

Tentatively, Dorcas returns the gestures, her heart sinking as she realizes that she doesn't deserve it. Dumbledore may have made the choice to throw Fabian and Gideon under the bus, but he did that so she wouldn't be run over; her and his secret informant. Dorcas didn't make the call, but she's at least partially responsible, though she always has been. After all, it was her that recruited them in the first place.

Molly seems better than the last time Dorcas saw her. Frankly, Dorcas is a little surprised that Molly seems so pleased to see her, considering Molly did once threaten to kill her and fully intended to carry through on said threat. Dorcas doesn't really blame her for that. It came from a place of grief and pure desperation. She even apologized afterwards, which was nice.

Dorcas is also quite sure that Molly draws comfort from her because she reminds her of home as another Hallow. Molly can never go home again, at least not before the war is over; she knows too much now, and as close as she was to Gideon and Fabian, she would be at risk.

"Hi, Molly," Dorcas murmurs as they break apart. "I just wanted to come check on you and see how you're adjusting."

"Really well, all things considered," Molly tells her, taking a deep breath. "Don't much like being underground, if I'm honest, but I'm…getting used to it. Arthur's been a gem."

Dorcas glances at the man in question, who smiles and waves as soon as she catches his eye. He's filling out some sort of paperwork, so she just waves back and focuses on Molly again, who looks at him fondly. "That's good. I just—I wanted to say I'm sorry that I missed the funeral held for Fab and Gid."

"I'm sorry you did as well," Molly murmurs. "It was lovely. Dumbledore was so kind; he gave a speech, you know, and everyone was so—just so respectful about them."

"It's nothing less than they deserved," Dorcas croaks, swallowing past the lump in her throat. Just the thought of Dumbledore talking about them… It makes her sick to her fucking stomach. "Molly, I want you to know that if I had the choice—if I had been given the choice—they would still be alive. I'm sorry. I'm so sorry."

Molly blinks rapidly, her eyes misty, and she squeezes Dorcas' hands with a wobbly smile. "I know, Dorcas. You meant a lot to them, please never forget that."

"Right," Dorcas whispers, giving a pained smile. "Ah, as lovely as it is to see you, I was also hoping to speak to Poppy. Is she in, by chance?"

"She's in her office," Molly says, nodding towards it. "Go on, go see her. I have to get back to work anyway."

Dorcas lets Molly squeeze her hands one more time, then pulls away to head towards Poppy's office. She knocks, waiting for the call to let her in, and then she slips through the door. Poppy looks mildly startled to see her, but pleased.

"Ah, Dorcas, when did you get in?" Poppy asks.

"Early. I've been in a meeting with Dumbledore," Dorcas explains, sitting in the chair in front of her desk.

Poppy nods. "And Minerva?"

"She's here. Waiting for you in your room, I imagine. Probably sleeping, honestly, because she was dead on her feet when we got in," Dorcas says with a grimace.

"Ah," Poppy says with a sigh, shaking her head in clear disapproval. "She never rests properly, that woman. She's such a stubborn thing, you know. A bit stupid, really."

Dorcas' lips twitch. Only Poppy would dare to insult Minerva in any way, because most people know better. Poppy is the only one who can get away with it. "Well, no offense, Poppy, but you're hardly one to talk, are you? How long have you been in the office this time?"

"Anyway," Poppy says, pursing her lips, "what can I help you with, Dorcas?"

"Uh huh." Dorcas stifles a laugh, shaking her head fondly when Poppy narrows her eyes at her playfully. "I'm glad you asked. Like I said, I had a meeting with Dumbledore. He brought up biological warfare shipments the Order stole underneath Riddle. I'm assuming you were there."

Poppy straightens up, serious in seconds. "I was."

"Biological warfare," Dorcas says slowly. "That implies a virus, doesn't it? But weaponized. Is that what it is?"

"It's a bit broader than that. Basically, it's the use of biological toxins or infectious agents such as bacteria, viruses, insects, and things such as that—usually to kill masses of people on a large scale," Poppy clarifies. "In this case, it's specifically involved with insects, particularly Hallow-made. I've never seen anything like it before. It doesn't get worse than this."

"What is it?" Dorcas asks.

"One second." Poppy rolls her chair back and stoops over the safe behind her, cupping her hand around the keypad to shield it. There's a long sequence of beeping—very long—as she puts in the code, then the safe opens with a hiss and a click. She pulls something out and shuts the safe again before rolling back to the desk and sitting down a vial of—

Dorcas blinks, her lips tipping down as she stares at the vial, feeling a tug in her mind that insists she knows what that is already. It takes her a moment of staring at the shimmering liquid in the vial, thick and green, and then it clicks. Her eyes dart up in alarm. "Horcrux Hornet venom?"

"So it is," Poppy confirms with a sigh. "We found it in various forms; both inside the hornets and extracted from them, and we collected a formula indicating that Riddle has plans to have it made into a gas with the same deadly, infectious agents. It is the quickest, most violent form of biological warfare that the world has ever seen."

"I don't—but why?" Dorcas blurts out in shock, just in knee-jerk disbelief that anyone would willingly do that. Who the fuck would want to do that? Well, Riddle, obviously. She doesn't know why she's so surprised.

"It baffles us all," Poppy declares wryly, her lips twisting in distaste. "Slughorn has informed us that Riddle has a fascination with them—the Horcrux Hornets, and their venom. Apparently, Riddle is immune to them, because he doesn't experience fear, and they only respond to fear."

Dorcas scowls. "But he's weaponizing the venom outside of that. That's a risk, is it not?"

"One doesn't just create biological warfare to this extreme without creating a failsafe, if they're smart. We found notes implying it, but something that important—it's being handled in the Hallow. District one was tasked with weaponizing the Horcrux Hornets, but the cure, or whatever immunity he intends to create, he wouldn't risk it falling into the wrong hands. We know it's happening, but not what it is, or how it's made, so we can't replicate it. Not yet, anyway. I'm working on that now, or trying to. So far, I have…nothing."

"Right, but what is the purpose of having something like this as a weapon to begin with?"

Poppy sighs. "Well, in liquid form, he could easily use the biological toxins in the venom to infect a district's water supply, for instance. It would be the quickest, most efficient plague in history. In gas form, he could just release it in a district, or let it be used in future games, especially if he works out how to contain and control it. He could easily and swiftly kill masses with this, should he feel the need to."

"Lovely," Dorcas croaks as a bolt of fear shoots down her spine. "And—and we know nothing about the cure? Or immunity? Or…both?"

"Nothing yet," Poppy murmurs wearily. "I'm doing my best."

"No, of course you are," Dorcas says quickly, swallowing as she stares at the vial, goosebumps breaking out along her skin. "I don't doubt it. Thank you for telling me."

"If you hear anything—"

"Don't worry, I'll let you know if I do."

"Thank you." Poppy nods and scoops up the vial, watching Dorcas stand. "Heading out?"

"Can't stay long," Dorcas murmurs. "I have a few things to handle back in the Hallow anyway. Minerva is staying for a bit, though, so don't worry about that."

"Who's taking you back?" Poppy asks.

Dorcas shrugs. "Edgar, I think. Not fussed either way. Minerva needs her rest as it is."

"You're damn right," Poppy agrees sternly, then continues to grumble under her breath about Minvera's apparent lack of regard for her health, fussing even as they say their goodbyes and Dorcas takes her leave.

The information she just learned weighs on her all the way out of the infirmary and towards her room, the last stop she'll make to grab her bags before she goes. It's a frightening thing, knowing what sort of power Riddle has, knowing what his plans are. He doesn't care about risks; he never has. It scares her, but she thinks he's preparing for war. What scares her more is the lengths he'll go to in the endeavor to win.

Dorcas is tired and emotionally drained and tense, so she can't be blamed for the yelp that rips out of her when she walks into her room and is immediately swept into a pair of arms. She gets one second to see Lily's sparkling green eyes—not so different from the Horcrux Hornet venom, actually—and her broad grin before she's being kissed.

Instinctively, Dorcas kisses her back, because she has always kissed Lily back. She even sinks to it with a floodgate of relief crashing through her, because it lets her mind empty out of all the complicated, painful things that fill it. Lily's always been good at that, drawing her out of her own head.

Though, really, Dorcas knows it's an exchange between them, both of them getting lost in each other so they don't have to be lost in the things that plague them, at least for a little while.

So, it's easy to get caught up in it. Easy to slide her hands in Lily's hair, tugging her closer as the kiss deepens. Easy to back up when Lily walks her up against the wall. Easy to moan, to arch closer, as Lily nips her bottom lip and slides cool hands under her shirt, fingers flirting with her hip bones.

"Tell me you brought cigarettes," Lily says breathlessly as soon as they break away from each other.

Dorcas huffs out a weak laugh. "You know, I'm starting to get the idea that you only have anything to do with me because I supply your habit."

"Our habit," Lily teases, "and no, that's not the only reason. You're also full of fun information I just so happen to want."

"Oh, I have nothing for you this time, so don't even try it. I can't stay long anyway," Dorcas mutters.

Lily clicks her tongue. "Pity. Suppose we'll have to make this quick, then."

With that, Lily dips down to catch Dorcas under her thighs and haul her up in her arms, turning to carry her off to bed. Dorcas admittedly gets caught up in kissing her again, because it has been a while now, and it feels good.

It's not until Lily is laying her out on the bed and settling between her spread thighs that Dorcas has a passing thought. One that's like a smack to the face. Just a quick flash of a memory, blonde hair instead of red, the last person Dorcas was with before this. Marlene.

Dorcas does her absolute best to smother the thought, the reminder, because it shouldn't matter. It can't matter. She's not doing anything wrong, obviously, and yet the mere thought of Marlene makes her chest clench and completely takes her right out of the moment.

That may have something to do with the fact that Dorcas never got to say goodbye. She went back and forth on seeing Marlene off before she left, after the end of the games, an inner battle she couldn't figure out how to win. It would mean something, she thought, and they had agreed to be friends, just friends, nothing more; they could never be more, because it would put Marlene at risk. Gideon and Fabian are proof of that. Maybe after the war, if it's ever over, maybe then…

But no, Dorcas didn't get to say goodbye. She decided it was a bad idea, and then still ended up running to the train station, only to arrive too late. Marlene was already gone.

That was probably for the best.

"What?" Lily murmurs, drawing back to look down at her with her eyebrows furrowed. "What is it?"

"Nothing." Dorcas clears her throat. "Nothing, I'm fine."

"Your enthusiasm just evaporated, so clearly you're not fine. If you don't want to, Dorcas, that's okay. It's—"

"No, no, it's not—that. It's not you. I just…"

"You…" Lily raises both eyebrows and searches her face, and then her eyebrows raise higher. "There's someone else? You met someone? Oh, fuck, Dorcas, tell me everything."

Dorcas heaves a sigh as Lily scrambles up and beams at her with excitement dancing in her eyes, looking delighted. "Oh, stop it. I'm not—yes, I met someone, but we're not together or anything, obviously."

"Obviously," Lily allows, nodding. "A Hallow?"

"A Victor," Dorcas says. "Marlene McKinnon. You were here when she was in her games. Did you…watch?"

Lily squints thoughtfully, then nods. "Yeah, I think I saw some of it, maybe. Blonde girl? Threw someone into a fire?"

"That's the one."

"She's fit."

Dorcas bites her lip. "You have no idea."

"Ooh," Lily says with a laugh, grinning, "did you two…?"

"Yes. It was amazing. We—" Dorcas sighs and looks down at her fingers. "We got close, I suppose. She's—she's really brilliant, Lily. I mean, really."

"Caught feelings, did you?" Lily asks quietly.

"So many feelings. All of the feelings." Dorcas groans and drags her hands up and down her face, then drops them miserably, not even caring if she's smeared any of her makeup. She looks up to see Lily watching her sympathetically, because she already understands. Of course she does. "We agreed to be just friends. Or, well, she sort of left it open-ended, like the option to be more was there, but I—I refused. I had to. We can only be friends. I can't drag her into all of this, Lily. I won't."

Lily's lips tip down into a frown, and her eyes visibly dim as she sighs. "Fuck, Dorcas, I'm sorry. That's—shit."

"Yeah," Dorcas agrees glumly, and they don't say anything else for a while. They don't really have to.

That's the thing. It's easy with Lily, because this has never been an issue for them. The truth is, a part of Dorcas does love Lily, and will always love Lily, but she knew from the very start when they first fell into bed together that it was a love that could only grow to a certain point and go no further. They're both of the same mind on that, all too aware of what risks come with getting too close to someone else.

It's sad, really. Lily's far worse than Dorcas is, honestly. She won't even let herself care—or she won't admit to herself that she does. Dorcas knows she does. For someone trying so hard to be removed from basic compassion and connection, Lily loves so loudly anyway. It bleeds out of her and coats all those around her, and she doesn't even see it. Lily does everything in her power not to care, not to love, like if she does, it will cause her to shatter. But she can't stop it. She can only repress it, and Dorcas knows that's only going to hurt her in the long-run, if she continues to find safety in that.

But Dorcas isn't much better. She doesn't fool herself into thinking she doesn't care, or that she's not allowing herself to love, but she's all too aware that she can't let that matter. It can't be more important than her responsibilities. She can love and care as hard as she wants, but she can't allow it to go anywhere. It won't save anyone. It just endangers them.

"Well, if it cheers you," Lily muses, "I have good news."

"You mean that you're training to be a field medic?"

"Yes. Isn't it brilliant?"

Dorcas frowns. "It's dangerous, Lily. Very fucking dangerous."

"The whole world is dangerous no matter what we're doing, Dorcas," Lily retorts. "At least this way, what I'm doing actually fucking matters."

"I just—" don't want you to get hurt, Dorcas doesn't finish. Can't finish. Even just thinking it scares her, like it's adding to the possibility. Lily may not admit that she cares, but Dorcas has no such issues. Of course she cares about Lily. They may not be in love, but they have a bond. It was built on the exchange of cigarettes and swapped information neither of them were supposed to know, as well as stolen kisses and sneaking to the surface to blow smoke and wait for a better world. "Just be careful, Lily. Who else is going to smoke with me in the Phoenix when I stop by if you're not around?"

"I could say the same to you," Lily murmurs. "Your position is no less dangerous, Dorcas."

"No," Dorcas says softly. "No, it's not."

A long, tense silence stretches between them.

"So…" Lily coughs and scratches at her eyebrow, a sheepish smile curling her mouth. "About those cigarettes…"

Dorcas busts out laughing, almost against her will, and Lily's smile stretches into a full grin. She's so beautiful. Truly, truly gorgeous. Emerald eyes and flushed cheeks, thick-thighed and wide hips, broad shoulders with a tattoo of a flower in between the blades—a pink petunia, specifically. Dorcas asked why once, but Lily didn't answer, and Dorcas only had to ask one time to know never to ask again. Secrets and chilling stories live in Lily's eyes sometimes, and Dorcas often wants to coax them out of her, just to know, just to get closer.

Lily looks pleased, and she perks up as Dorcas rolls off her bed and stumbles to her bag, digging around to pull out two cartons of cigarettes. Twenty packs. It should keep her stocked up for a while, and really, it's the least Dorcas could do.

"Worship me, Evans," Dorcas declares.

Lily snatches the cartons like they're made of gold, then lifts her gaze to Dorcas', her mouth parting a little as she touches the very tip of her tongue to her top lip. "Take off that pretty little outfit, and I'll do just that."

"I really can't stay long, Lily."

"Oh, you know I can be quick and still make it good. You can tell me about Marlene, if you like."

Dorcas starts a little in surprise, blinking. "While you're…?"

"Sure, why not? Spare no details." Lily sits the cartons aside and reaches out to grab Dorcas' wrist to reel her in slowly, her voice softening and dropping to a lower, more sultry register that does admittedly cause heat to stir in between Dorcas' hips. "Tell me all about her."

"She—she told me I was flawless, you know. Said that I'm beautiful, always," Dorcas whispers, her mouth dry as Lily tugs her in between her spread legs.

Lily's lips twitch up and she tugs Dorcas' hand to her mouth, pressing a soft kiss to her palm. There's a smile teasing at the corners of her lips. "Oh, she wasn't playing fair."

"No, she really wasn't," Dorcas agrees, a strain in her voice, her legs feeling a little weak and wobbly just from the memory of Marlene's mouth, and now Lily is doing something so irrevocably distracting and sinful, holding her gaze and wrapping her lips around Dorcas' pointer finger to scrape her teeth teasingly over the soft pad of it. Dorcas feels it between her fucking legs, and her whole body twitches.

She can see Lily's eyes light up, can practically hear Lily thinking gotcha, the seductive little shit. Dorcas isn't even upset, really. She'd like to be lost for a little while anyway.

After all, there's so much to get away from, isn't there?

"Come here," Lily whispers, kissing her finger and easing her right into bed, and Dorcas goes willingly, happily, because she is not immune to Lily Evans' wiles and she's all riled up just fucking thinking about Marlene McKinnon.

And away, away, away they go. Lost in each other.

Lost together.

~•~

"—one of the poor bastards, and it doesn't even matter which one, in any case. Don't suspect they'll survive anyway."

"Our orders weren't specific?"

"Nope. Anyone will do."

"Alright. This one, then. He's been giving me funny looks for ages. I swear he's glaring at me sometimes, and if I didn't know any better, I'd think he was cursing me out in his head."

That's exactly what I'm doing, you fucking cunt, Remus thinks as he raises his gaze to see two guards standing outside his cell, peering at him through the bars. He glares. Purposefully.

"Oh, he's absolutely giving you shit in his head," one of them says, looking amused.

"Well, he'll wish he hadn't." The other one reaches out with their baton-taser and knocks on the bars. "On your feet."

Still glaring, Remus reluctantly pushes to his feet, a shudder rippling through him as the cold seems to seep into his bones even deeper with movement. He feels creaky, aching all over, weak and ever so slightly faint. The cell door slides open with a clang, and the guards sweep in immediately to cuff his hands, grabbing him by one arm each to shove him out.

Remus stumbles along, staring straight ahead as he's led lower and lower through the prison, passing cell after cell on the way. Their steps echo through the eerie silence, ringing in his ears. His heart is sinking as they go lower, because he knows what this is. He knows where he's going.

The screams always drift up from down below. He usually tries to ignore them, but he has a feeling he'll be unable to ignore his own.

They take him in a room with a metal chair nailed down to the floor in the middle of it. A man is already there, sitting on a rolling stool next to it, a stand next to it as well. Remus can see a syringe and something else that looks like an oxygen mask sitting on it; he stares at it as he's led to the chair.

"Remove his mask, please," the man on the stool orders. He might be a doctor, or a scientist, or both, by the looks of him.

Remus tries not to tense up too much as the guards force him into the chair, pinning his arms down and cuffing each wrist. They cuff each ankle as well, then push his head back against the headrest and strap him into that with the padded strap that's already built in. Only then do they remove the mask on his face, and he immediately licks his dry lips, rolling his jaw and sipping in a breath of stale air.

"Got the carriage ready?" the possible doctor asks. When the guards just stare at him, he huffs. "For his body, if he doesn't make it. We lost four yesterday, and the guards on rotation held up the entire process by not having the carriage ready."

"Er," the first guard says.

The possible doctor scowls and points at the door. "Go get the fucking carriage ready. Useless bastards." The guards scowl, but they do as they're told, leaving the room while muttering under their breath. The possible doctor looks at Remus in exasperation. "Really, you think I'd have better working conditions, considering what I'm working with. Genuinely, they do not pay me enough for this shit."

Remus doesn't respond, of course. He's tempted to. He hasn't heard his own voice in… months, he's assuming. It's not clear, because it's not as if they have fucking clocks or calendars in Azkaban. But it's been a while, he's sure.

The possible doctor just sighs and shakes his head as he reaches out to pick up the syringe. Inside it, there's a dark orange—nearly blood-red, in fact—liquid that looks thin and swirly, about the consistency of water, even though it resembles fire. Remus automatically tenses up as the man carelessly tugs his sleeve up to reveal the bend of his elbow.

"Best not to fight it too much," he mutters wearily. "Never seemed to help the others, anyway. Hold still."

Remus doesn't really have a choice in the matter, seeing as he's strapped to the fucking chair. Every part of him screams out in protest, wanting to fight, but he can only watch with his heart racing as the needle slides into his vein.

As soon as the plunger starts pushing down, it's agony.

It's pure fire licking at his nerve-endings, eating away underneath his skin, acid burning right through his body. Remus screams. He can't help it. He's never felt anything like it in his life, a searing pain so stark that it's all he knows.

"Fuck, fuck, no, don't—"

Remus is throwing himself against his restraints in the attempt to get his hands free and rip his fucking skin off, but it's not his hands that break out. The strap on his head wasn't prepared for him to absolutely lose it and put so much pressure on it, so he flings himself forward as he convulses in the chair.

Mindless with desperation and pain, Remus quite literally just slams to the side, tilting over the arm of the chair. He clips the stand beside him—or, well, his face does, actually—but he genuinely can't feel it through the pain of everything else. All he knows is that his insides are melting and something is dripping down his face, and maybe that's just the skin sliding off his skull, because he's boiling, he's on fire, he's—

"Just. Hold. Still," someone yells, and Remus knows nothing, can't make sense of anything past the flames eating through muscles and tendons and bones. Surely he's collapsing into ash. How is he solid? How—

Remus is slammed back in the chair, held in place as he thrashes, and then he can't move again. The whole world is out of focus, and there's blood in his eyes, in his mouth.

He thinks it's his.

"Let's see. Deep breath now." The words don't really make sense to Remus, and he can barely hear them, but there's a clear mask coming down to frame his nose and mouth. It's a closed dome, like an oxygen mask, and there's a black canister attached to the bottom of it with the hazard symbol on it right beside the Hallow emblem.

If Remus were in the right state of mind, he would find that fitting. The Hallow is a hazard, isn't it?

As it is, Remus can't think of anything. It's just pain. Pure torture. The mask settles around his mouth and nose, pressing in so hard that his screams are muffled. He can taste them; they're tangy and sour with fear, and anguish.

There's a click, then a strange puff noise, and Remus' eyes focus long enough to see a small cloud of bright green fill the mask. He doesn't mean to inhale it, he really doesn't, because he's sure it's a bad idea to do so, but everything hurts and it's so hard to breathe, and he's gasping. He's gasping.

Remus inhales.

The pain gets worse. So much worse. It reaches a peak that splits his brain in half, and he's dying, he's so sure that he's dying. He can only be dying, and he doesn't want to, fights so hard not to, rebelling against the mere thought because—because—

Somehow, through everything, through the pain and what must be death, Remus finds it in himself to cling to one last lucid thought before everything fades away.

Sirius, Sirius, Sirius, SiriusSiriusSirius—

Chapter End Notes

for those of you who are here to know where to skip the torture/experimentation: when it becomes remus' POV, i recommend just stopping reading or scrolling down to the comments as soon as Remus is led down from his cell. like, when he's being strapped to the chair, just call it a day, ya know?

for those of you who want the in-depth warning beforehand: remus is taken out of his cell by guards and brought to a room in the lower levels of azkaban. he's strapped to a chair, and a doctor injects him with a red liquid that really hurts him. in his pain, he tries to break his restraints and only manages to break the one at his head, hitting his face against the tray next to him. he's strapped back in and forced to inhale a green mist, and the pain gets worse. he thinks he's dying, and his last thought is of sirius.

for those of you who need the reassurance: no, remus is not dead, i promise. what happened to him was Very Necessary for the plot, i assure you.

right, let me do a quick rundown:

kingsley and sybill my beloveds <3 also, lily!!! so, we got a little more backstory from her side of things, just a teensy bit. turns out, our girl was shot. between that and being told remus and her family are dead (dumbledore... ill get to him in a second), she's quite obviously traumatized in her own ways. trying her best to keep her distance, refusing to connect with anyone, things like that. Not Good. very Not Good, honestly. and yet she's still out here killing it, being a total badass in her training. i love her <3 also it will never not be entertaining to me that she's out here singlehandedly keeping the women in the Phoenix satisfied 😭😭😭 lily, please, i just want one chance oh, and kingsley calling her out. they're friends, your honor. but shhh, lily doesn't know that. imagine being in denial about having FRIENDS. lily, im begging you, after you give me a chance, Go To Therapy. and the sad part is, she's such a good friend too??? like, she's just so happy about everyone else being happy, and she's kind and just. god, im in love with her.

next up, dorcas!!! oh, she's an icon. the way she fed dumbledore his own wrinkly ass on a platter? queen shit. i want to marry that woman. she LITERALLY said "fuck you" to dumbledore. starts snapping like im at a poetry reading now, long ago, i said that fabian and gideon's deaths would make sense, and that it wasn't just for shock value. now you know what i meant. as it turns out, dorcas was at risk, so dumbledore had them take the fall for her—and for his secret informant. that's so fucked up. it's soooo fucked up.

the worst part is that it was...necessary. like, SOMEONE had to take the fall, and it couldn't be dorcas or the secret informant (to be revealed later, but go ahead and place your bets now). fabian and gideon just got the raw end of the deal. it's horrible, but it was—in dumbledore's mind—a necessary sacrifice.

see, the thing is, there's A Lot going on with dumbledore and his history and how it plays into the story. like, we found out that he was once a Victor, and he's the one who assassinated the previous master of the hallow—grindelwald. there's a lot of questions that come with that, like what district was he from? why did he kill grindelwald? what made him rebel and run away to start the order of the phoenix? and yes, all these questions will be answered in due time.

hating dumbledore for what he's doing is valid, but it's also valid to wonder WHY the fuck he's doing it. like, i didn't just make him the Bad Guy, ya know? he's obviously doing Bad Guy shit, but it's not just because he's a Bad Guy, if that makes sense.

anyway, moving on. lily and dorcas. hm. now listen, im a dorlene guy at heart, so you don't have anything to worry about in that regard. it's just that lily is literally just that sexy and powerful. they're friends, and dorcas isn't in a relationship, so she didn't do anything wrong. don't worry, there's A LOT more dorlene in the future. also lily and someone else, though im not currently at liberty to say, for Spoiler Reasons.

finally, remus. oof. that was roooough. i really fucking hated it, honestly, because i love him dearly and never wish to see him in pain. (that's why the scene was kinda short. no way i was dragging that shit out). however, it WAS necessary for the plot. like, that had to happen, for ~reasons~ you'll find out later.

oh, and i wanted to mention the horcrux hornet venom, too. i told you it'd be important to the plot lmaoooo. it definitely plays a pretty big part.

alright, that's mostly it, i think. next chapter we see regulus, sirius, and james again and see how they're doing after time has passed. (i know some will be pissed about the time jump, but it was also necessary)

Gifts

Chapter Notes

hello, everyone!

warnings for this chapter:

-references to/depictions of aquaphobia (fear of water)
-references to nightmares (brief and vague)
-references to violence (brief and not in present time)
-references to child abuse (walburga and orion)
-references to past deaths
-depictions of time displacement (james' issue with time, i don't know what term fits for it??? but basically he struggles to know when/where he is at times, and it's depicted in this chapter twice, though not heavily and quickly resolved)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Evan, mid-lecture about the benefits of climbing, abruptly stops to say, instead, "Wakey-wakey, Regulus."

"What?" Regulus asks, blinking at him.

"Fuck's sake," Evan grumbles, scowling. "He interrupts me every time. He's so fucking annoying, you know."

Regulus stares at him in confusion. "Who?"

"Come on, wake up," Evan insists, rolling his eyes, and Regulus opens his mouth to ask what the fuck is wrong with him when the tree branch snaps, making him jolt, and then his eyes split open as the whole world swirls into focus.

There's a body next to him, warm and solid. Disoriented, the first thing Regulus rasps is, "James?"

"No, still not him," Barty says, coming into view as he props up and leans over to peer down at him, eyebrows raised. He looks faintly amused. "After all these months, you'd think you would stop asking by now."

"Fuck off," Regulus mutters, reaching up to knuckle at his eyes as he shudders through a yawn.

"You were jabbering on about Evan again," Barty informs him.

"He finds you very irritating, you know," Regulus says as he drops his hands, lips twitching slightly. "I think it pisses him off that you interrupt us."

"Lovely. Genuinely, nothing pleases me more than being a thorn in the side of the hot ghost that lives in your dreams."

"Well, he dies, usually, but you keep interrupting."

Barty hums. "In that case, he should be thanking me. Anyway, you get particularly chatty before you start screaming your head off, so I know now to wake you up before then."

"Right," Regulus sighs out, pushing up on his elbows and shifting to sit on the side of his bed, rolling his shoulders. "Time for me to get up, I suppose. You, too."

"No bath?" Barty asks quietly.

Regulus shakes his head a little stiffly. "Not now. Later today, after I've gone out."

"Bad day?" Barty murmurs.

"It's fine," is all Regulus says. "I'm going to brush my teeth. You can see yourself out."

"Ah, Regulus, your chivalry knows no bounds," Barty replies dryly, but he's still amused. "I do so love when you demand I come lay beside you through the night, mistake me for another man the next morning, and then immediately kick me out afterwards. Truly, you know how to make a man feel special."

"Glad to be of service," Regulus quips back as he pushes to his feet. "Now, get out."

"Prick," Barty calls after him.

"Bitch," Regulus responds, then heads right across the hall to enter his bathroom and shut the door.

For a long moment, Regulus just stands there and breathes, flexing his fingers, and then, with a sigh, he turns on the tap and grabs his toothbrush.

His eyes crawl over to the bathtub, scowling automatically as soon as he looks at it. As extravagant as it is, he fucking hates it. Even after months, bathing is still the bane of his existence. He does it; what's a long, grueling process that always leaves a puddle of water on the floor and makes him feel like he's failing as a human being, but he does it. He is clean, by the end, and that's all that matters.

He doesn't always bathe alone, which helps on the really bad days. Well, no, he always bathes alone. He'll never be able to bathe with another person in the tub with him, where they can touch him, where he can feel their fingers on his skin. But someone will be there when he needs them. Barty usually sits on the toilet and chatters away, not bothered by his nudity and fully unafraid to make lewd, teasing comments even when Regulus is crying, which Regulus honestly appreciates. Sirius, for obvious reasons, doesn't come into the bathroom when Regulus is bathing, but he'll sit outside the door—much like Remus did—and talk to him the entire time, no questions asked.

There are a lot more days where he goes at it alone, where he can come in contact with water without immediately going back to the river. Those are the good days. When Barty stays over, he always tries to catch the bad days beforehand, rather than let Regulus struggle to figure out how to ask for help. Either way, Regulus has come a long way. Progress is progress, as they say.

Regulus never showers. He'll never shower again.

When Regulus resurfaces from the bathroom, his mouth fresh and changed for the day, Barty is still lazing about in his bed, the idiot. Regulus sighs.

"Don't you have somewhere to be?" Regulus asks flatly.

"Yes, but I'm ignoring it," Barty says simply.

"Go to work, Barty."

"But I hate it there."

Regulus shakes his head and moves over to his desk to cut on his lamp and slap open his journal. It automatically falls open on the last page he wrote on, the latest flower not quite conforming to the binding pressing the stem flat. Regulus runs his fingers over the petals, swallowing, then flips to the next page and picks up his pen.

"Roses are red, my dad is a prick, don't make me go to work, I'd rather die," Barty whines.

"That doesn't even rhyme," Regulus mutters.

Barty grunts. "Poetry doesn't have to rhyme. You taught me that. Anyway, it's better than whatever you're writing about, no doubt. Make a note of it, would you? I'm a genius."

"Roses are red, get out of my bed, do as I said, or I'll remove your fucking head," Regulus snaps, even as he twists his wrist and writes Barry's stupid poem in the margin, signing it with an idiot who, sadly, thinks he's a genius.

"I fucking hate it, though, just so you know," Barty grumbles as he rolls out of bed. "He's just going to lecture me as soon as I come through the door, as if I care about making stupid hinges all day. And it's so hot. And my arms hurt by the end. And I don't even want to be a blacksmith, but does he care about that? Nooo, of course not. He's just—oi, are you even listening to me, Regulus?"

"Mhm," says Regulus, who is not.

In fairness, it's not as if Regulus has never heard any of this before. He knows all about Barty's distaste for his father, and Barty's distaste for working as a blacksmith under his father, and also just Barty's general distaste with pretty much everything. Regulus can't really blame him; he knows better than most the complex feelings one has for shit parents.

In Barty's case, his mother is the one he tolerates everything for. If not for her, Regulus is quite sure Barty would have spit in his father's face and never stepped foot to the forge again. Barty's dad may be shit, but his mum is lovely.

As Barty putters around, he continues to prattle on and complain, while Regulus tunes him out, uninterested. He no longer offers Barty money, because Barty stopped taking it when his dad began demanding to know where he got it and what he did to get it, leading to a massive argument that upset his mum. Regulus knows not to offer now, even though he has plenty and doesn't mind giving Barty enough to keep his family fed, even his sorry excuse for a father.

"Alright, alright, I'm heading out now," Barty announces.

Regulus swivels in his chair to face him. "Coming by again?"

"Not tonight. I'm going over to Casey's."

"Oh, are you now?"

Barty grins and wiggles his eyebrows. "They want to blow off some steam, and I'm more than willing to provide. You can come, if you want. They said I could bring along a friend."

"I think I'll pass. You have fun, though," Regulus murmurs.

"You need to get out more," Barty says with a sigh. "I'm not saying sex would fix all your problems, but it would at least take your mind off of them, and you deserve orgasms."

Regulus huffs out a weak laugh because Barty says it so earnestly that it's literally funny. Coming from Barty, that's genuinely a compliment and also basically an admission of how much he worries about Regulus. Wishing orgasms upon people is how Barty shows his love —oh, and giving orgasms, generally, but they don't do that anymore.

No, they just…sleep next to each other sometimes. It's sort of humiliating, honestly. They used to get up to all sorts of filthy things when the mood struck them, and now their thing is laying next to each other without touching, because it helps Regulus sleep. He struggles to do it alone after the arena, but he also still can't stand to be touched, most of the time, at least until he's really tired, close to sleep, but having a body next to him helps. Barty has learned the hard way not to touch him, especially without warning.

Four and half months have passed, and Regulus is still too paranoid to risk sleep if he doesn't have a body next to him, just so he can trick his brain into thinking he's safe. His brain believes it, too, and that's why every time he wakes up, it's James he thinks is there.

"Believe it or not, I'm doing just fine without orgasms, Barty," Regulus assures him. "You go on and have as many as you like, though. Don't let me stop you."

Barty frowns, hesitating in the doorway. "You'll be alright tonight, right? Because I can cancel—"

"Absolutely do not cancel," Regulus cuts in. "I'll be fine, and if not, Sirius will be around to pester me. He's supposed to stop by today. Don't leave Casey disappointed. They give me a free journal every month, so you better make it good for them. Do that thing with your mouth that you do."

"You'll have to be more specific." Barty breaks out into a grin and winks. "I do many things with my mouth."

"Except shut up, sadly," Regulus says, and Barty mock-glares at him before tapping the doorway and complaining about having to go to work. They exchange goodbyes, and then Barty takes all noise with him when he goes, leaving behind quiet.

Regulus turns back to his journal and picks up his pen.

There is a rabid beast in me

I am a bruise — the soft rot of a peach

Small and split open

The seam of me screams

I was once a star — but never bright

The velvet night swallowed me

It always has

I let it still

Better to be swallowed

Than to swallow

Blood

The sight of movement outside his window catches Regulus' attention, making him lift his gaze, a gentle tug in his chest that lets him know what he will see before he even looks. This is how it goes, every day; he knows this with the same steady certainty that he knows the sun will set, and it will rise again. There is something in him that is aware, always so very aware, of James, especially when he is close by.

Regulus leans forward slightly, braced on his elbows beside his journal, holding his breath as he catches sight of James' messy head down below, where he stands on Regulus' stoop. He lingers, just as he always does, every single day, and then he comes back into view as he starts walking away. Regulus hastily sits back in his chair, picking up his pen and pretending to write, though he isn't. He's learned his lesson by now; James always looks back, unable to resist stealing one glimpse through the window. Today is not a day that Regulus feels strong enough to meet his gaze.

Carefully, Regulus peeks through his eyelashes very quickly, allowing himself to lift his head again when he sees that James is nearly at his house—right across the fucking street. James still lives with his parents, rather than moving out into the house provided for him after the games, like Regulus did. They're all still in the Victor's Village, four of the houses assigned, only three used. Regulus' parents in the house Sirius got after he won his games; James and Sirius in the house Effie got after she won hers; Regulus in his own after he won his.

As soon as James slips back into his house, Regulus slams his pen down and darts out of his chair, pounding down the stairs at, frankly, a truly ridiculous speed. He's breathless by the time he reaches the door, and he's swift when opening it just a little and darting his hand out to stoop down and grab what James left behind, what he leaves behind every morning, without fail.

The flower is blue today.

Regulus leans against the door and stares down at it, his heart hammering away in his chest—from the running, obviously, and nothing else. He drags his thumb gently over the soft, thin petals in full bloom of songbird blue, his heart swollen in his chest like it has been stung. It throbs.

After four—nearly five—months of James consistently leaving a flower on Regulus' doorstep literally every day, you would think it would stop affecting him so much. It hasn't. Every morning, it steals his breath. Every morning, it makes him ache. Every morning, it holds his heart hostage.

As always, Regulus wanders into the kitchen with his nose buried into the flower, inhaling the scent of it, the scent of earth and something sweet; inhaling like he can find a trace of James lingering underneath it all, even if he never does. He twirls it against his nose until it makes him sneeze, which is somehow satisfying, and then he drops the flower into the vase on his windowsill facing the backyard, pushing it towards the back of the banquet. Just like every other day, Regulus plucks two flowers from the front that James left for him days and days ago, then darts off back upstairs.

It's practically a routine, at this point. Regulus uses one of the flowers to replace a dying one in his previous journals that he's already filled, and the second flower goes in between the page he's writing on today. The flower—it's pink—sits on the desk as he picks up his pen again.

Another flower in bloom

It speaks for you — soft

Softer than you've ever spoken

There is strength in your voice

Loud and shameless — bright

So bright, like the sun, even now

The flowers grow towards you

I hear you — and I

Listen, listening, I am listening

I cannot drown you out

I no longer wish to try

Like the flowers in bloom

I grow towards you

I grow — if I cannot climb

~•~

James stops into the kitchen to kiss his mum on her cheek, squeezing her shoulder as he does. Effie leans into it with a smile, but she doesn't step away from the stove.

"Very quick today," Effie notes.

"Yes, well, I didn't spend twenty minutes debating on whether I should knock or not this time," James says sheepishly. He heaves a sigh. "I have to head out, so there was no time for it, really. I'm meeting Mary at the school."

"Taking Sirius with you?" Effie asks.

"If he wants to go," James tells her, shrugging. "He probably will, if he has no plans to bother Regulus today."

Effie hums. "You'll both be home in time for dinner, yes?"

"We wouldn't miss it," James teases, leaning over to rub his head all over her shoulder, chuckling when she huffs in mock offense and ruffles his hair.

A few minutes later, James walks through the house and finds his dad in the main room, chucking chopped logs into the fireplace. The sight of it makes James' heart clench, as it always does. James never chops wood for his parents anymore; Monty handles that now, even though it must be brutal on his back and knees. He does it without complaint, though, and puts the hatchet away somewhere James doesn't have to see it when he's tending to his flowers.

"Oh, I've got it," Monty mumbles when James moves over to crouch down beside him with a grimace, helping him toss the last few logs into the fireplace. "James—"

"Ah, it's fine, Dad," James cuts in quickly, ignoring the twinge in his leg and the truly grotesque pop his knee just gave when he dropped down. He's twenty-six, and sometimes his body makes noises that sound like he's much, much older. It is both horribly funny—to him, at least—and mildly depressing (to basically everyone else, except Mary, who laughs along with him and says they can start a band, because she has a bad elbow that cracks every time she bends it).

"Thank you," Monty says graciously when the last log goes in, and then he reaches out to pass his hand over James' hair, rubbing his head affectionately. His parents are full of little touches like that, randomly reaching out to touch him as if to make sure he's really here, even to this day. James soaks it up every single fucking time.

"Come on, old man, let me help you up," James teases, then turns right around and needs his dad to help him up, which makes him burst out laughing when Monty looks smug.

"I am in my prime, I'll have you know," Monty declares. "Tell me, young man, what's your excuse?"

"Mum!" James calls. "Dad's making fun of my leg again!"

"Flea," Effie calls sharply, and James grins as Monty throws up both hands, his eyes twinkling in amusement despite the way he pretends to grumble.

James stifles a laugh as he heads to the stairs and Monty sweeps into the kitchen to appease his wife, declaring that their son is a dirty, rotten liar who only intends to drive them apart. The stairs, as always, are not James' favorite invention in the world, but he skips the fold-out seat Sirius built and installed for him that runs on a mechanism along the railing to ride him up when his leg is giving him too much trouble. It's not too bad today, and he knows his limits by now, after nearly five months of learning them.

James has a mild limp when he reaches the top, but he's walked it out by the time he reaches Sirius' room. He doesn't bother to knock, because they've never really knocked, honestly. Sirius is awake, tugging on a shirt over his head.

James wolf-whistles.

"Keep it your pants, Potter," Sirius mutters as he shakes his hair out of his face.

"I'm afraid I might not be able to. You are a vision," James says mock-breathlessly, fanning his face.

Sirius' lips twitch. "Damn right I am. Hottest bitch on the block, and don't you forget it."

"Eh, well…" James bears his teeth in a grimace and tips his head from side-to-side. "I mean, Regulus is right across the street, so…"

"You're biased, Romeo," Sirius says, rolling his eyes.

James snorts. "Yeah, yeah. Speaking of Regulus, are you planning to see him today?"

"Yes," Sirius replies, narrowing his eyes. "Why?"

"Calm down, I'm not going to try and tag along," James mutters, exasperated. Sirius is fiercely territorial of any and all time he spends with Regulus, and just—territorial in general, though he never stands in the way of them seeing one another if that's what they want to do, except they…never do. "I was just asking because I'm meeting up with Mary again today, and I thought maybe you'd like to come with."

Sirius' eyes light up. "Oh, I'd love to, if I've the time. How long are you staying, do you think?"

"For a few hours, at most. I was thinking of stopping by and helping at the market again afterwards, unless Mary has some other plans I can crash," James admits.

"I'll see how my day goes, yeah?" Sirius says.

James nods. "Yeah, just thought I'd offer. Mum is making breakfast, by the way."

"Should've led with that," Sirius blurts out, then practically shoves James out of the way to rush out of the room, singing out greetings and demands for food as he crashes down the stairs and no doubt bursts into the kitchen. There's a pause of silence, then, "James, they're kissing again!"

"Euphemia and Fleamont Potter!" James bellows as he marches out of the room, hopping up onto the railing of the stairs and sliding his way down with a grin, making sure to ease himself down rather than jump when he reaches the bottom. He sets his face into a scowl before entering the kitchen, arms crossed in disapproval as he pins a scolding look on his parents, who are glancing between him and Sirius with twin looks of amusement. "We don't accept such filth in this house. All overt displays of affection are prohibited and enforced with the threat of eviction."

"Flea, be a dear and spit in my mouth," Effie says.

"Anything for you, my love," Monty replies immediately, leaning in with a grin while Sirius and James start protesting loudly and rushing forward to pull them apart.

"Rebels," Sirius hisses, squirming his way between them and shaking his head. "Absolute heathens, the both of you."

"You can't wrangle our passion," Monty says.

"Nor can you replicate it. You could only be so lucky to have what we have," Effie adds, fighting a smile.

James coughs to cover a laugh. "Sirius, I don't know how we can keep living in these conditions."

"It's torture," Sirius agrees dramatically. Effie holds out a full plate to him, and he brightens instantly. "Well, would you look at that? Suddenly, I'm so happy to be here."

"Stockholm syndrome," James whispers.

"I'm never leaving," Sirius announces, which only further proves James' point. They share a look, then have to look away so they won't dissolve into laugher.

There is this warmth and laughter and love stored in the kitchen like the familiarity of the spice rack, and James can feel it shaping itself into his mind, a memory in the making, one he will cling to when he needs to remember, when he needs the reminder.

The one thing James can't ignore is the emptiness at his side, just a little colder than every other part of him, a carved out space begging to be filled. Regulus would fit there, leaned up against him, tucked under his arm and whispering bitchy remarks in James' ear to leave him in stitches. Regulus would fit here, with James, with this family. Regulus would fit so well that his absence is felt; James feels it, always.

After all this time, you'd think he'd be used to it by now.

~•~

Sirius and James have claimed portions of the backyard for themselves, and though it goes unspoken, it's very much known that what's theirs is theirs, and theirs alone.

Sirius, Effie, and Monty do not mess with James' flowers in any way, and they do not knock down beehives or hornet nests, and they do not leave tools that can be picked up and used as weapons out for James to see or grab—this was all learned through trial and error. James, Effie, and Monty do not come inside Sirius' shed, and they do not move his tools around, and they do not make requests for him to build anything specific, only grateful for whatever he gives them—this also was learned through trial and error.

That's life, though. A whole lot of trial and error.

The last time Sirius was over at Regulus', he saw the pens and pencils scattered all over his desk in his room—the one that Sirius built for him—and made the mental note to build something to hold them. It's nothing fancy, not the most intricate thing he's ever built, but it will work. Just a wooden container big enough that the pens and pencils should clink into with ease, hanging out for easy access at the top, the outside carved into in nonsensical patterns because Sirius got bored. The varnish has made it all shiny and smooth.

Sirius builds things again. Makes things. Anything, really. It started with making James a cane, so he could get rid of the one the Hallow provided him with. The first one was alright, but Sirius thought he could do better, so he made a second one, then a third, and a fourth, as well as a fifth, which James is using now when he needs his cane. Sirius is currently working on the sixth, improving each time he does it, a little attached to the routine of it. James keeps them all.

In any case, making the first cane sort of broke through something in Sirius, and then suddenly it was like he couldn't stop making things. Clothes, trinkets, furniture—it doesn't matter, he does it all. He knits, he carves, he works with glass and plastic and clay and wood. He just…tinkers, basically all of the time. Most things, he doesn't finish. Some things, he still breaks. A few things, he finishes to perfection, then destroys before anyone can ever see it, in a fit of rage and emotion that overwhelms him. But he never stops; he always goes back to build again, and something about that soothes him.

It wasn't easy, picking it back up after ten years. That first cane he made was honestly shit, even though James used it with no issues. Maybe Sirius is just dramatic, but to him, the sight of it made him want to gouge his eyeballs out, so he'd insisted on doing better the second time around. That's pretty much how he's gotten good again, old habits and his relentless determination to expect better from himself. The sound of derision in his head that mocks his failures still takes the shape of his mother's voice, even to this day.

On the way out the door of the shed, pen-holder in hand, Sirius taps his biggest project in the corner, under the sheet. He still finds new things to do to it, and likely will until it's finally put to use. James and Regulus' bookshelf is there—the one mentioned only once, from some other life, and he's made it in this one for them to have whenever they're ready. Sirius believes they will be, someday. He dares to hope so, at least.

It's not a very long trip to get to Regulus' house, seeing as he's right across the street. Not as far from their parents as Sirius would like, but close to him, so he deals with it. He'd wanted to toss Walburga and Orion out and leave them homeless, but Regulus had asked him not to —begged him not to, really, which is the only reason Sirius didn't.

They were hard on Regulus after he got back, too hard, so it was no surprise that he eventually snapped. It had taken less than a week, just a few days of Walburga telling him to take a shower, refusing to have a son who didn't have proper hygiene, who wouldn't present himself properly; then, when Orion dared to try and drag Regulus into a shower, fully-clothed and screaming his head off so loud that Sirius heard it all the way down the street and immediately came running, everything sort of just—went to shit, honestly. Sirius had burst in on Regulus quite literally choking Orion to death, and he did admittedly consider just… letting him do it.

In the end, he didn't, because he knew Regulus would only be more fucked up from it, and honestly, dealing with the Aurors and repercussions would be a fucking chore. So, Sirius pulled him off—the only one who could, because he was the only one strong enough to, though Walburga had been making an attempt, to no avail. Regulus was lashing out and rather feral at the time, so Sirius had to genuinely drag him away. That very same day, he helped Regulus move out, and their parents haven't had anything to do with them since.

They're afraid, Sirius knows that. Afraid of their own children, which Sirius finds some sort of fucked up, poetic justice in. After all, their children were once frightened of them; now they know how it feels to be on the other side of it. Their sons are murderers, and they never really seem to grasp the full horror of such a thing until it's their lives at risk.

In any case, Regulus is both better and worse off for essentially being disowned, the same as Sirius. It hurts him, but it's for the best, because Walburga and Orion don't care about the trauma either of them have in the aftermath of the games; they never did, and why would they? It's not as if they cared about the trauma Sirius and Regulus carry in the aftermath of their childhood, the trauma they caused.

It's gotten better, though. Two months ago, Sirius coaxed Regulus over to Andromeda's to visit her and properly meet Ted and Nymphadora. Andy—despite all the years that's gone by where Regulus never visited or acknowledged her at all, due to Walburga and Orion forbidding it—welcomed Regulus in without batting an eye, not commenting on his limp, greasy hair or his frail, willowy frame barely holding itself together from the exhaustion. It was a bad time, two months ago, but with time, things have slowly gotten better.

Sirius knows the cycle. He's lived it. Things are very bad, then they get a little better, and then they get much worse, and then they're just okay, and then it's unbearable, and then somehow, inexplicably, it's really good. Over and over, so it goes. Regulus and James—and Sirius—are good now, all at the same time, which is very rare, but it won't last forever. It just gets further and further apart, letting them learn how to live with it.

"Reggie!" Sirius calls, knocking on the front door and poking his head inside to wait for the habitual granting of entry. Regulus has never, not once, refused to let him inside.

This time, there's silence.

Sirius does not panic, not like the very first time he got this response. Regulus never refuses him if he's around, but he's not always around. Sometimes, he's just—gone. No one knows where he goes, and no one can find him. Sirius maybe had a legitimate breakdown the first time this occurred, so now Regulus tends to leave a note, just in case.

And yep, there it is. A note in the kitchen, where it always is, reading: Don't have a meltdown, I'll be back —R.A.B.

Sirius turns and immediately heads back out to go up the stairs, letting himself into Regulus' room. It's an invasion of privacy, technically, but also not really because Regulus likes it. Sirius knows he does, knows he likes to come home and find Sirius invading his space like there's nothing holding him back from doing so, a sure sign that they're okay. He sits down the pen-holder on the desk, his lips briefly twitching when he sees the closed journal with a pink flower sticking out the top like a bookmark, not pressed between the pages just yet, meaning he'll probably write some more later.

Sirius doesn't read Regulus' diaries. He respects that boundary, despite his curiosity, and he's aware that Regulus would lose his collective shit if Sirius did. Regulus is the same way about his writing that James is about tending to his flowers and Sirius is about building.

With a sigh, Sirius throws open Regulus' window and perches on the edge of his bed, taking out his pack of cigarettes to light one up, peering up at the sky as he waits for Regulus to come back, looking at the clouds and missing the moon.

~•~

There's a tree on the edge of the mayor's property, neighboring the mortuary in district six. A tall tree with thick, swooping limbs and a hefty trunk, gnarled roots practically cemented into the ground at the base, like seats for Regulus to perch on. It's an old tree, probably fifty years old, quiet and solitary as it overlooks the aftermath of death.

Technically, the tree is on the mayor's property, though Regulus doubts the mayor ever sees him out here, because he's never once come out to complain. The mortuary being close by might have something to do with that.

No one comes to the mortuary, except for the mortician, but even he only shows up when it's necessary, when someone has died and there's a body to tend to, a funeral to plan. Regulus is generally alone out here, him and the tree.

Most people don't like the reminder of death. It's a morbid thing, isn't it? Something that sends a shiver up the spine, looking at the building where grief and loss bleeds out the windows, where death clings to the walls. Regulus knows better. Death is everywhere, so there is no avoiding it.

In any case, Regulus likes this tree. He thinks Evan would have liked to climb it. Regulus never has, even though he tells himself each time he comes that he will, he'll finally do it, he'll grab on and keep going until he reaches the top.

Regulus never even leaves the ground.

The tree has indentations in the bark from where he's thrown daggers into it repeatedly, because he spends a lot of time just doing that. Maybe it shouldn't soothe him, but it does. He thinks it always will.

It's hot out now that summer has barreled its way in. Regulus isn't a fan of it, frankly. He sweats more in the heat, naturally, which means there's more of a need to bathe. But, at the same time, he's never cold at night, which he actually likes. He associates cold nights with the arena.

With a grunt, Regulus snatches his dagger from the tree and steps back, his chest heaving from the force in which he just threw it, his body delightfully ache-y. He's always careful not to cut himself, because the first—and only—time that he did, he ended up vomiting violently, which he found incredibly ridiculous, seeing as it was only a small bit on his finger. Like an idiot, he'd stuffed his finger in his mouth to instinctively soothe the small cut; as soon as the taste of iron hit his tongue, it was over for him. He hasn't made that mistake again.

Regulus thinks about tossing his dagger again, but stops and squints up at the sky against the harsh blare of the sun beating down on his sticky skin. He's been out here for hours, so if Sirius did decide to come over, then he's no doubt waiting for him. Regulus is wary of keeping him waiting too long, the memory of how bad that went over the first time never too far away from his mind. Sirius had not handled it well.

So, with mild reluctance, Regulus blows out a deep breath and sweeps his hair back from where it hangs soggy and damp over his forehead, trying to cling to his sweaty skin. Yeah, he's going to have to bathe tonight. The thought makes his stomach turn over, so he ignores it for a bit longer.

It's a bit of a walk to get back to the Victor's Village. Regulus passes where Barty is, but he doesn't stop, unwilling to be a catalyst to another explosive fight between him and his father. He bypasses the market, unwilling to interact with people.

After the market, he passes the school, which he steals glances at, telling himself he's not trying to see James, even though he is. He knows through Sirius that James spends a lot of time there with Mary, and Sirius also goes as well when he has the chance. Sirius has invited him multiple times, swearing Mary won't mind, promising that it would be good for him.

Regulus never goes, but he'd be lying if he said he hasn't thought about it, if only to see James. The only issue is the children. Regulus can barely function around grown adults, so he knows he'd be a lost cause around kids. Nymphadora is turning out to be an exception, but he doesn't want to test the theory with other children.

Finally, Regulus makes it back to the Victor's Village, walking the same path under the street lights, even though they're not lit up, the same path he's walked for years. He has to pass his old house—where his parents are—and he dares to take a glance. He doesn't see anything, of course. Sometimes, he does. Sometimes, his mother is leaving to go out, or his father can be seen walking past a window. Sometimes, he misses them. Sometimes, he wonders what he's even missing.

As soon Regulus opens the door and steps inside, Sirius is there, pulling him into a stiff hug that makes Regulus' whole body tense as a bolt of confusion shoots through him. Sirius never touches him unprompted, or without a clear sign of warning so that Regulus can pull away if he needs to, and on the really bad days, he knows not to touch at all. The fact that Sirius is hugging him before anything else sets him on high alert immediately, as does the panic in Sirius' eyes when he lets go.

"Hey, Regulus. Just letting you know, James left after you did, but he should be home soon," Sirius says, holding his gaze, clearly trying to convey something that Regulus is honestly just —not getting. What the fuck is he on about?

"What?" Regulus asks, baffled. Is this, like, a bad day of some sort for Sirius? "James isn't —"

"In fact, why don't I go get him?" Sirius cuts in hastily. "He'd like to know you two have a visitor, I'm sure."

Regulus somehow gets more stiff, and he holds his breath for a beat while Sirius looks at him, practically pleading with him to go along with this with his eyes. So, Regulus exhales and slowly nods. "Yes, I'm sure he would. Who's the visitor?"

"The Master of the Hallow himself," Sirius declares, somehow managing to sound delighted by this, despite the fact that there's no smile on his face. "He's in your kitchen."

"Ah," Regulus says, hoping like hell that it doesn't sound like he's just been punched the way it feels. He swallows thickly, clears his throat quietly, then sets his shoulders. "Well, I suppose I shouldn't keep him waiting, then. I'll keep him company while you bring James home."

"Alright, sure," Sirius replies lightly, like it's no big deal, but he drags Regulus back into a hug, and this time, Regulus reflexively hugs him back, holding tight. Sirius ducks his head to whisper in his ear. "I'll be quick. James lives here and you love him very much, am I clear?"

"Got it," Regulus breathes out, and Sirius gives him a squeeze before pulling away, heading for the door.

For a second, Regulus just breathes, and then he starts moving towards the kitchen. He's not…afraid, exactly, just cautious. It confuses him why Riddle would show up here, but maybe it shouldn't. After all, what he and James did no doubt pissed the man off, but it's been months. It's over now, pretty much. Sure, there's the victory tour coming up in a month and a half, but that's the last Riddle will ever have to see or hear of James and Regulus, because it's not like they're going to be mentors. Sirius is too beloved by Hallows to be replaced, and he wouldn't let them take his place anyway.

In the kitchen, there are two armed Aurors standing on either side of the doorway as Regulus steps inside, which honestly puts him on pins and needles immediately. He thinks about the dagger strapped to his side, under his shirt, and forces himself not to even form the thought that he could use it.

Riddle is indeed in his kitchen, just casually sitting at the table with a closed briefcase right in front of him. He doesn't smile when Regulus comes in, but he does raise his hand and flick his fingers, which makes the Aurors file out.

"Regulus, thank you for joining me," Riddle says, his voice smooth and clear.

"I apologize for making you wait," Regulus murmurs as he moves to sit across from him as soon as Riddle gestures for him to do so, commanding the space around him like he owns it all. "I wasn't expecting a visitor today, or I wouldn't have."

"That's quite alright. Sirius was a nice host while I waited," Riddle replies. He flicks his gaze over Regulus, critical and sharp. "You look…overheated."

"Yes, well, that tends to happen in the summer."

"Perhaps it would help if you were dressed appropriately for the weather."

"How silly of me, sir, I never even thought of that," Regulus says flatly, staring at Riddle blankly, because he doesn't care for whatever verbal spar Riddle is trying to drag him into. They both know he's covered in scars; they both know exactly why he's still in a long-sleeve shirt, even now.

Riddle's lips turn up at the corners, but it seems more like a muscle spasm than a sign of amusement. He reaches out and rests his hand on his briefcase, lightly tapping it with one finger. "I must admit, I was ever so slightly disappointed when I arrived and found that both you and James weren't here to welcome me, or even either of you. Perhaps it was foolish, but I at least expected you to be out together."

"I'm his lover, not his keeper," Regulus replies. "We do have other things to do during the day besides staying up under one another all the time, just like any other couple."

"Ah, you'll have to forgive my confusion. I was under the impression that your love for each other was different from everyone else's," Riddle announces, tilting his head.

Regulus' mouth goes dry.

"Trouble in paradise?" Riddle asks, watching him closely.

"No," Regulus says softly. "Everything is fine."

"Fine? Just fine?" Riddle continues.

Regulus struggles not to grind his teeth as he corrects, "Perfect, actually."

Riddle regards him for a long, long time in complete silence, his finger steadily, rhythmically tapping on the briefcase. His eyes are a deep brown, objectively striking, but the empty echo of them makes them look like bottomless pits. They're so cold and sharp, like shards of ice stained with rust, or blood. The sight makes Regulus feel nauseous.

"You know, Regulus, when I first saw you at the introduction parade, you intrigued me," Riddle admits.

"Did I?"

"Yes, because I thought I saw myself in you. The determination in your eyes spoke of hidden strengths. Most tributes show fear, but I did not find any in you that day. You surprised me by turning out to be weaker than them all."

"Sorry to disappoint," Regulus says stiffly.

Riddle just hums. "You're not the first, you will not be the last. As it stands, we're not alike at all, but I do think we both share an appreciation for speaking bluntly with no illusions of what's being discussed. Let's speak freely now, Regulus."

"Of course," Regulus agrees.

"I do not subscribe to the silly notion that love—" Riddle's lip curls in distaste around the word, "—can be comparable from person-to-person. That it can be greater between one pair of lovers than the next. Everyone believes they invent love, just from the depths that they feel it, but this is not the case. Yours and James' love, for example, has no need to be held in higher esteem than anyone else's. Just like any other couple, you said. Yes, just so. We agree on that."

"I never claimed that it was greater," Regulus tells him.

"Maybe not in so many words, but that is nonetheless the shield you picked up when you were under fire." Riddle taps, taps, taps away on the briefcase. "Whether or not I do, the people in the Hallow believe in that silly notion, Regulus, and that is the one thing that keeps you and James alive."

Regulus doesn't react to this, forcing himself not to, because he knew this already. They're speaking freely, right? Clearly they are, because Riddle sure is. "The people of the Hallow are why that silly notion exists to begin with."

"That may be so," Riddle allows, "but it is now your responsibility, and James', to keep that silly notion alive. Your willingness to die for each other at the end of your games can only be sourced from an act of love that creates obsession within everyone else, because they feel as if they can never experience that same, great love. So they idolize it. They cherish it. They would go to desperate lengths to see it flourish. You will show them that it has."

"I'm aware of what's expected of me," Regulus croaks, because he is, because he's not stupid.

Riddle shakes his head slowly and tap, tap, taps away. "I'm not so sure that you do, because there can be no doubt, Regulus. There can be no person that looks upon you and James and has even a flicker of it, even one moment to think that, perhaps, what you and James did—what James did, specifically—was born not out of a greater love that doesn't actually exist, but out of defiance. Because, if it was defiance, then that means opposition gets results—and that, too, is a silly notion, and this is one I refuse to allow people to believe in."

"What would you have me do?" Regulus whispers.

"Convince them," Riddle says simply. He pauses, then opens his briefcase with two clicks, lifting the top but not reaching inside. He holds Regulus' gaze over it. "Convince them all, and do so without allowing even one person to think it comes from a place of fear. Better yet, convince me."

"You said you don't believe in the silly notion."

"Then I press upon you the importance of changing my mind, Regulus. Even if I do not believe in it, I want to see that you do. James—I have no doubts that he does. But you…well, I think we have this in common as well. Prove me wrong again."

"Okay," Regulus murmurs.

"Are you afraid?" Riddle asks.

Regulus holds his gaze. "No."

"I do so hope, when the time comes, you will learn to lie better," Riddle murmurs, hand dipping into his briefcase before he pulls out a jar and sits it down between them.

Inside it, there's a Horcrux Hornet sitting lazily at the bottom, its glowing green pouch casting a sickly, shimmering glow on the inside of the glass. The Horcrux Hornet is still only for a second before the wings flutter and it flies right at the glass towards Regulus, responding to the fear that digs claws into his skin and leaves the taste of blood in his mouth.

Riddle closes his briefcase.

~•~

James watches fondly as Mary's class shrieks and runs for the door as soon as the bell signals that the day is done, bursting from the school to run home, or run right to their parents that are waiting for them outside.

James never went to this school, but Sirius and Regulus did before Sirius finished his games and they came into the Victor's Village and had access to personal tutors the same way that James did.

Mary also went to this school, then ended up becoming a teacher, as well as joining administration. She teaches art throughout the morning to the children from ages five to ten, then switches to the children from ages eleven to sixteen.

James usually comes in and essentially works as her assistant when he has the time and it's a good day for him. She can always find him something to do, whether that's cleaning up after the children or just passing out papers when she'd rather not get out of her chair. Though it goes unsaid, they both know why he shows up—not only because he adores Mary and enjoys spending her lunch break with her (which is where this all started), but because the children soothe something in him.

See, it started by accident. For the first two months, James didn't really see…anyone, excluding his parents and Sirius. He only ever left the house to bring Regulus a flower every single morning. Sirius, of course, never pressured him, but he also never failed to try and help, and one day he convinced James to come along and have lunch with him and Mary.

So, James went, and he felt better for it. He kept going back, even when Sirius didn't have the time or was busy with something else; so long as Mary let him show up, he went. Eventually, one day, she seemed to pick up on the fact that he didn't really want to leave, even when lunch was over, so she invited him to the classroom. He was wary, but he went, and he instantly lit up around the kids.

The younger ones generally don't watch the games—their parents tend not to let them, if they can help it—so most of them didn't even know about what he'd done in the arena, and they treated him as they would any other adult that was kind to them and worked hard to make them laugh. The older ones do watch the games—their parents usually can't stop them, when they reach a certain age and fully grasp what the fuck they are—so they do know about his time in the arena. But there's an instinctive tact that even children have about this subject, especially when they're at risk of one day entering the arena themselves. Of course, not always, though.

James has been asked questions—hard questions, invasive questions, even rude questions because children are children and that is what they do—but Mary generally handled it for him and kept her kids respectful. If not, he figured out the politest response, which was that he just didn't want to talk about it and he needed them to respect that, and they did. Kids aren't unreasonable, really. They're just curious. To a degree, they're even scared for their own fates. James gets it.

In any case, spending time with Mary and children has worked wonders for the state of his life. Of course it can't really fix everything, and he still has more bad days than good ones, but he is so fucking thankful to have this anyway. The sound of a child's laugh, their innocence, the comfort they can bring just by giving a hug or telling him they're happy to see him; it makes him feel more alive, somehow.

He sees Vanity in them, sometimes. Catches the sight of her out of the corner of his eye when he hears a delighted gasp. Looks for her when a beetle crawls over his shoe. Sees her in the smile of one young girl and the tears of another.

He tries not to see Hodge, but he's there, too. Boys pretending to be princes. Boys trying to find their way in the world. Boys celebrating their fifteenth birthday, because they get the chance to. Some of them remind him of Regulus, and that's when he works out that Hodge reminds him of Regulus—a Regulus that never happened, a young boy in the arena just trying to survive, lost and never making it home. Regulus could have been Hodge, if Sirius didn't volunteer for him.

"James?"

Jolting, James gives a harsh blink and whips his head around to stare at Mary in surprise. For a second, he doesn't know when he is. Before the arena, during, or after? Who's alive and who's dead and where's his hatchet? Where's Regulus?

This still happens to him, frequently. The flow of time feels out of order and disjointed, and sometimes he has to find his place in it, because the current can snatch him when he's least expecting it to. Things trigger it, of course, like a cold night or a hatchet on the ground or too much pain in his leg, but it can also just happen randomly. He's talked to Sirius about it, who has confessed that it's similar to his issues with his memory.

"Sorry, what, did you say something?" James mumbles, settling back down in the present, in the classroom, in the summer.

"I just asked if you wanted Bingley and I to walk you home, or if you were going to the market today?" Mary murmurs.

James smiles reflexively and glances over at Bingley, who is grabbing his bag from the cubbie at the back of the classroom. Bingley is Mary's little brother, quite literally half her age at thirteen. It's the first year he'll be in the reaping, and Mary has been fretting about it, seeing as she's just aged-out. Like Sirius, James has no doubts that she would volunteer for her little brother, if that's what it came to, but she can't.

Bingley is a funny kid, always cracking jokes and playfully complaining about having his sister as his teacher, even though it's clear that he actually loves it, and her.

"No, uh, I think I'll go to the market," James muses, waving her off. Mary and Bingley usually walk him home—or almost home—when he's still hanging around at the end of the day, because they head in his direction anyway. Really, technically James walks them home, but he knows as well as they do that it's actually for his benefit. He likes not being alone.

"Well, if you're sure, come on so I can lock up," Mary instructs, jerking her head to get James moving. "I can't wait around for you all day, Potter. Oi, get a move on, Bing Bing."

"Coming, coming," Bingley grumbles as he rushes to follow James out into the hall. James waits with him as Mary locks up the classroom, swinging his cane lazily around, doing tricks with it to make Bingley grin. James takes it with him wherever he goes most of the time, if he leaves the house, even though he doesn't always need to lean on it and he knows his leg will be fine. It's a sense of security should the need for it ever arise.

Mary blows a few curls out of her face as she joins them in walking down the hallway, and the heat is so bad that James can't blame her for pulling it back from her face and tying it up on top of her head in a beautiful mass of tight curls.

He asked her once if she thought about cutting it, because she kept complaining about how hot she was during the summer, and she explained that she hasn't had her hair cut since she was nine and told her mum that she was a girl and wanted longer hair. James, on the other hand, gave in and sheepishly asked his mum to cut his hair just a little, but it's starting to grow out again. Meanwhile, Sirius shrieked and ran in the opposite direction when Effie offered to do the same for him. Monty laughed so hard he pulled something in his back, because he is indeed an old man.

Sirius and Mary love to get together and complain about the effect the heat has on hair and makeup and even outfit options. James thinks about Regulus, who can always be found in a long-sleeve shirt and slacks, no matter the temperature. It makes his heart clench, because he'd thought to ask why one day, and Sirius hadn't quite answered, but the look on his face was explanation enough. The scars on Regulus' neck are still visible, always visible, and James had felt like a fool to not realize that Regulus had scars just like them in other places as well. He's never seen them, but he'll never forget the sight of Regulus coming out of that river, ripped into and bloody.

"James! James!"

At the sound of Sirius frantically calling his name, James' head snaps up as he grasps his cane and automatically steps in front of Mary and Bingley, on guard instantly. But it's just Sirius running right towards him, panic in his eyes.

"What? What is it?" James blurts out.

"You—you need to come with me right now," Sirius gasps out, not even telling Mary and Bingley hello as he usually would, which means this is not a joke.

"Is everything okay?" Mary asks sharply, standing in front of Bingley with her arm wrapped back around him.

"Sorry, Mary, no time to explain. James, come on," Sirius insists, already backing up.

James doesn't need to hear anything else. He doesn't hesitate to start running, the adrenaline pushing him to keep up as Sirius sprints back towards the Victor's Village with James hot on his heels. He wants to know what's going on, but they're both running too hard and too fast to really talk. James' leg will no doubt be pissed at him for this later, but at the moment, he doesn't particularly care.

They don't slow down until they make it into the Victor's Village, and then Sirius is hastily snatching James to a more sedate pace as he leads him up the street. They're walking now, but quickly, and Sirius is gripping James' arm tight.

"Sirius, what's happening?" James wheezes.

"Riddle is here. He's at Regulus', with him, right now," Sirius explains, his tone short and clipped. His face is alarmingly neutral, but he doesn't sound pleased. James feels his heart drop as his fear surges. "He may have implied that he didn't like the idea of you and Regulus not being an actual couple, so I may have implied that you two live together and are a very real, very happy couple, so you are going to go in there and act accordingly for the betterment of—everyone."

James' eyes bulge as he hisses, "You did what? Sirius, I haven't so much as spoken to your brother in nearly five months!"

"Well, if Riddle doesn't know that already, I'd like to keep him from finding out, so just—go with it," Sirius hisses back, throwing him a sharp look that lets James know he's absolutely not fucking around.

And yeah, alright, that's fair. It's a very intense situation, and James doesn't want anyone in danger any more than Sirius does. That doesn't stop his heart from racing as Sirius drags him to the door and lets them inside without so much as a stutter. James tells himself it's from the running.

James hasn't ever been in Regulus' house, for obvious reasons. He's been to Regulus' house, or at least to the front door, but that's all, so this is his first look. He doesn't know what he was expecting, but it's more bare than he thought it would be. It feels empty and echo-y, like it's gutted, like there are no signs of life cradled within the walls.

Like it's hollow.

The first thing James makes note of are the two Aurors standing outside a door past the stairs. They don't react when Sirius gestures to the door, and they don't protest when Sirius opens it and leads them inside.

Riddle sits at the table, immediately visible, while Regulus' back is to the door. There's a briefcase closed in front of Riddle and jar sitting between him and Regulus. James comes to a screeching halt as soon as he sees what's inside.

Vespa.

No, not Vespa. Vanity wouldn't keep Vespa in a jar. Where did Vanity even get a jar? Where's Vanity? Why is Vespa trying to fly? Who's afraid?

James is. James is afraid. It takes him a moment to realize it, because fear isn't helpful in the arena. But of course he's afraid; he's in the fucking arena. Isn't he? Is he?

Where is he?

When is he?

The flow of time yanks him back and forth, and he exhales, trying to plant his feet. It helps that he's somewhere he's never been before. Not before the arena, or during, so it can only be after. It's hot, absurdly hot, so it can only be summer. The victory tour hasn't happened yet. Riddle is here. The Horcrux Hornet in the jar is not Vespa, and Vanity is dead.

Regulus has not turned around, but his shoulders are tense. He surely heard them come in, but he's still facing Riddle, who is watching James and Sirius with critical eyes. It feels like a test, and James remembers that, in a way, it is. He needs to pass it, so he smiles and walks forward without looking at the jar again, ignoring the muffled flutter of thin wings and the dull thump as the Horcrux Hornet hits the glass over and over.

The curls at the back of Regulus' neck hang heavy, damp with sweat. James focuses on them as he gets closer, and then he drapes his hand over Regulus' shoulder delicately as he leans down to kiss the top of his head like he does it every day.

He does not. Obviously.

"Sorry I'm late," James says, lifting his head to look at Riddle with a smile. "We weren't expecting visitors today."

"Oh, that's quite alright, James," Riddle says, inclining his head as he pushes to his feet. "Regulus was the perfect host, and we just had a lovely chat. I'm afraid I can't stay longer."

"A shame," James murmurs, gently squeezing Regulus' shoulder, which is as stiff as a board under his hand. "Why don't I walk you out?"

"Yes, I'd like that." Riddle reaches out and taps the top of the jar. "I'll be leaving you two with this gift. It makes for a marvelous nightlight."

To that, James can't figure out how to respond, but he pulls away from Regulus slowly, not trying to move too fast. James leads Riddle right out of the kitchen, trying to act like he's comfortable here, like he knows this place in his sleep.

The Aurors follow behind them, guns in hand, and James forces himself not to react to the danger. It's hard, his instincts screaming out in protest at leaving his back open to a threat.

"Have a safe trip back to the Hallow, sir," James says cordially, nodding politely as he opens the front door.

"I will," Riddle tells him. He stops across from James and regards him for a moment, then cocks his head. "Quick question, James, which cabinet does Regulus keep his coffee in? I would have liked some, but it slipped my mind to ask."

Trick question, James thinks before promptly answering, with easy confidence, "Regulus doesn't drink coffee. He doesn't keep it anywhere, or I'm sure he would have offered."

"Hm." Riddle gives him a thin smile. "You're smarter than they give you credit for, you know."

"Yes," James agrees, holding his gaze. "I know."

"And yet, you're still the fool," Riddle says softly, lightly clicking his tongue, and then he leaves with the Aurors following close behind.

James swiftly closes the door, blowing out a deep breath before pressing his forehead to the wood and squeezing his eyes shut. For a long moment, he just stands there and breathes, his heart still thumping hard in his chest, his whole body shaking as he comes down slowly from the adrenaline and fear.

Eventually, James convinces himself to turn around and go back into the kitchen, entering cautiously, very unsure about his welcome. He always thought—or hoped—that the first time he stepped foot in Regulus' house, in his space, would be because Regulus invited him in. And now, after everything, that's been taken from them, too.

Sirius is crouched down beside Regulus' chair, murmuring low and fervent in his ear, not touching but clearly checking on him. Regulus is letting him, nodding slowly, his head ducked forward. James can't hear them, but Sirius glances over when he notices him coming back in, and Regulus lifts his head and swivels to look at James as well.

It's the first time they've properly looked at each other since getting off that train and going in separate directions nearly five months ago. James has seen him through his window many times while dropping off a flower every morning, but that's about it. Regulus rarely looks back.

The first time he did, James knows it was an accident. He remembers it fondly. He'd turned back to steal a quick glimpse of Regulus, just one, and at the same time, Regulus had lifted his head and stopped writing to glance out the window. James had watched as Regulus caught sight of him, then immediately fell out of his chair, only to pop back up seconds later, see James still there, and slowly sink back down again.

Sometimes, Regulus looks back on purpose. He makes a point to look at James, or James thinks he does, at least. On those days, James stands in place and doesn't move until Regulus looks away again. On those days, James feels like his heart is going to beat right out of his fucking chest.

Most days, though, Regulus doesn't look. That's okay. He always leaves his curtains open so James can look, and that means something. It has to, doesn't it? James hopes so.

"I'm sorry for—intruding," James blurts out, his mouth dry as he takes in every detail of Regulus' eyes, closer to them than he's been in months. "I didn't—Sirius said—"

"No, it's fine. You didn't—we didn't really have a choice," Regulus mutters, huffing out a weak laugh and looking away with a grimace as his eyes sink shut.

And how fucking awful is that? They never have the choice, do they? Everything between them is circumstantial, but maybe it's always going to be that way when they're never making choices for themselves. Maybe it's always going to be this way, period. Maybe this is all they get to have.

"Is he gone? Riddle?" Sirius asks, standing up.

James nods. "Yeah, he's gone."

"Did he say anything to you?" Regulus murmurs, looking over at him with a sharp gaze. It's been a while since James has been under the intensity of it like this. Perhaps it's ridiculous, but it flusters James. Makes him feel nervous and fluttery.

"He just asked which cabinet you kept your coffee in and—"

"I don't—"

"And I told him you don't drink coffee," James finishes quietly, which makes Regulus stare at him, visibly startled. James clears his throat. "Then he told me I was smarter than people give me credit for, yet still a fool. Very charming, isn't he?"

"Something like that," Regulus says flatly.

Sirius crosses his arms. "And what did he say to you?"

"Nothing I didn't already know, really." Regulus heaves a sigh and reaches up to pinch the bridge of his nose, looking very, very tired. When he drops his hand, he slumps back against the chair and sweeps his hair back from his face. Fuck, but he is so unbearably beautiful. "Basically, he's expecting James and I to keep playing up our love story on the victory tour. He said we—mostly me—have to convince everyone and him, and that I have to make it believable. He doesn't want anyone to get the idea that defiance will get them anywhere. There was…a threat behind it, so it's—well. We can't fuck it up."

"Okay," Sirius says carefully. "Well, you're right, we did know this already. He just wanted to remind you in person?"

"I think he wanted me to realize how crucial it is that I don't fuck it up," Regulus says. "I also think he wanted to make it clear that he doesn't believe it wasn't an act of defiance, and if things are going to work out for us, I need to change his mind."

"You don't think we can?" James asks wearily, because Regulus looks very fucking worried at the moment.

With a hoarse laugh, Regulus tips his head back and looks at the ceiling as he rasps, "I think his mind is already made up."

"We'll figure it out, Reggie," Sirius murmurs. "When the time comes, you and James will—you'll do what needs to be done. It's going to be okay, I promise."

"How long?" Regulus demands bluntly. "Tell me, Sirius, how long is it going to be this way? How far are we going to have to take this? Will he have to move in? Will we have to get engaged, get married, adopt children?"

Sirius looks away, swallowing.

James tries not to let it sting to hear Regulus speak of all those things like he doesn't want them. James wants them, but not like this. Not this way. He thinks that's what Regulus is upset about, not what he's actually referencing. Or he hopes.

"Neither of you will ever have to mentor," Sirius mumbles, his eyebrows furrowed. "Unfortunately, you're always going to be under the Hallow's thumb."

"So, basically, we're stuck together forever?" Regulus asks, an edge to his voice.

"Thanks for making that sound like torture, Regulus. Really appreciate it," James snaps, unable to help it.

Regulus cuts him a sharp look. "Don't start. This isn't about us. This is about the fact that we have no fucking choice. It's our life, James. It's ours, and they're controlling it. How the fuck can you expect me to be okay with that?"

"I don't. I'm just—" James sighs and shakes his head, his shoulders sagging. "Nevermind. You're right, I'm sorry."

"Reggie, stop being a prick," Sirius mutters with a frown. "It's not his fault, and really, you could do a lot worse."

"But I'm not—I haven't even—fuck off, you don't get it," Regulus insists, clearly frustrated.

"I do. Trust me, I do," Sirius says softly. "Look, I know it's fucked up, alright? But we don't know the future, or how any of this will go. It could be twenty years, or the Hallow could be swept up in something new and shiny from the very next games, and you two will fade into the background. I don't know. We don't know. What we do know is that we're all in danger if we don't put in the work on the victory tour, so that's what we need to focus on first. Agreed?"

"Yes," Regulus mumbles, deflating a little.

"Yeah," James agrees, subdued.

Sirius sighs again, world-weary and sad. "Dorcas should be arriving with Pandora in a month to get you two ready for the on-screen interview to kick off the victory tour. Until then, we keep our heads down and stay out of trouble."

"Fine," Regulus snips, sounding bitter, and then he pushes to his feet and swipes the jar off the table with the Horcrux Hornet in it in one swift motion. "Now, if you'll both excuse me, I'm going to go bury this in my backyard."

James has his cane up in hand and snaps it out in seconds, pressing the length of it across Regulus' chest to stop him right in his tracks. Regulus does stop, stiffening as he turns his head to stare at James, who stares right back.

"No, you will not," James declares sharply. "If you don't want it, I understand, but I'll take it."

"You're not taking it. It's fucking dangerous," Regulus grits out, glaring at him. "I'm going to wrap it, put it in a box, then bury it so deep that no one will ever find it."

"Just try it," James warns, holding his gaze, not backing down an inch. "I'm not letting you leave this room with it."

"Letting me?" Regulus retorts. "You can't fucking stop me."

"Hey now," Sirius warns, sounding wary.

James flexes his fingers around his cane. "Give it to me, Regulus. I'm not joking."

"It's not safe, James. If it gets out—"

"I won't let it out, but I'm not letting you fucking bury it either. Just—for fuck's sake, stop being stubborn and give it to me. I'll take care of it so you don't have to worry about it."

"You think I'll worry about it less when it's around you?" Regulus asks with an incredulous scoff. He shakes his head and carelessly shoves James' cane down.

"Please," James whispers, swallowing harshly as he looks at Regulus, meeting his eyes. Regulus visibly wavers, his face softening pretty much immediately.

"It's not safe," Regulus murmurs, lips tipping down.

"Please, Regulus," James begs, genuinely begging at this point, a lump forming in his throat. "Vanity wouldn't—she wouldn't want it buried. Please just—I need it, alright? I need it."

James sees Regulus give in. Something in him soars, because Regulus' gaze goes gentle with building compassion, and James thinks that Regulus can't refuse him what he needs. There's something about that. Something special.

"Okay." Regulus takes a deep breath and holds the jar out, though he doesn't let it go when James grabs onto it. "Don't open it, James. Just be careful, alright? I mean it. Promise me."

"I promise," James replies instantly. Regulus hesitates, but then lets the jar go and steps back. James holds it to his chest in one arm. "Thank you. I'll go now. Sorry for…"

Regulus snorts weakly when James gestures awkwardly to his cane, which he sort of used against Regulus. "Don't worry about it. For what it's worth, it was…nice to, ah, see you again."

James fights a smile, but he loses, and he's more than happy to, especially when Regulus' cheeks turn red. Regulus clears his throat, loudly, then turns around and sweeps off into his kitchen, muttering under his breath as he goes. James watches him go with a goofy grin, only to tuck his lips in as soon as he sees Sirius staring at him in an unimpressed fashion.

"Go home, James," Sirius says.

"Right, yep, doing that," James replies quickly, dutifully nodding his head and backing up. "You coming?"

"I'll be over in time for dinner," Sirius tells him, and James nods before leaving.

On his way out, he tries to snatch one more glimpse of Regulus before he goes, but the only thing he sees is a bouquet of familiar flowers sitting on a windowsill.

~•~

Just like every other night, Sirius crawls out of his window to perch on the roof before bed. He lays back against the tiles and blows out a deep breath, trying to let go of the mounting tension from the entire day.

Oh, what a day it's been.

"Remus," Sirius mumbles, "you are not going to believe the day I just had. Honestly, I don't even know where to start…"

Sirius sprawls out and shares his thoughts with the moon, gazing up at it with a deep, ever-growing yearning snarling and snapping its jaws in his chest. The moon is beautiful, a glowing dome in the dark that blankets the earth, and it's still a poor substitute for Remus. But it's all he has.

For now, it's all he has.

Chapter End Notes

HE. BRINGS. HIM. FLOWERS. EVERY. SINGLE. DAY. 😭😭😭 JAMES PLS IM BEGGING YOU I AM ON MY KNEES PLEASEEEEE

anyway.

so, new characters unlocked!!! barty, hello barty, you're a good friend, barty <3 he really is, though. he and regulus just Get Each Other, and they take care of each other. like there's love there, but they're not In Love, if that makes sense? like an ex that you tried to date and it was nice but you turned out better as friends, but not best friends because then you'd just end up dating again, except both of you just like where you are now. yeah, that's regulus and barty.

the evan mention!!! evan finding barty annoying 😭😭😭 GOODBYE. even when one of them is dead, they still find ways to be little shits to each other.

forever funny to me that regulus was technically barty's sugar daddy for a while, paying his bills and keeping his family fed. not even for sexual favors, but just because. regulus ily king also regulus and his sad boy poetry 😭😭😭 this is me poking fun at me bc i wrote it. i know it's Sad Boy Poetry, that's the point. you can point and laugh, i do it every time i look in the mirror. but really, it's adorable that regulus is writing poetry about james again. his trauma as well, yes, but that's Good For Him. cathartic. healing. not drawing any parallels between myself and the fact that i write or anything, ofc not.

also², the way regulus literally SPRINTS to get the flowers that james leaves him 😭 he's a runner, he's a track star!!! thats so cute pls. he has a little crushhhhh. he's in loveeeee. he has no idea how to handle it, but it's true.

effie and monty my beloveds <3 they mean the world to me. i love them so much. we see more of them in the future, i promise. also just them being the best parents>>> walburga and orion could NEVER speaking of walburga and orion, they can burn in a fire <3 and then james. i told you we'd see, like, growth and healing. like, he talks to sirius about his issues, and he does things that make him feel better, and he learns to navigate the things he struggles with. even regulus is doing better in increments (though he doesn't see it that way).

nearly five months of james and regulus Not Interacting outside of the intricate ritual of Flower Giving and Flower Keeping, but it was healthier for them that way. they've been dealing with a lot of their own shit to be worried too much about love, honestly, and you can't blame them for that. plus, it's just like. acclimating back into everything post-arena, finding a routine, getting through bad WEEKS, taking steps to get better. all good signs, believe it or not.

however, the riddle visit... HOLD ON ILL GET TO THAT IN A MINUTE.

first, mary my beloved <3 yes, she exists. yes, we will see more of her. yes, she is trans. yes, she is amazing. yes, she had a little brother in just lovers named bingley as well. yes, we will actually have more than one scene with her (and barty, too, actually).

okay, so, riddle. oh, That Man. FEEL FREE TO SHIT ON HIM HE'S JUST EVIL THERE'S NO GRAY AREA HE'S JUST A BAD DUDE!!! however, writing this exchange between him and regulus was interesting bc riddle is so...sinister??? he's got some nefarious shit going on.

and yes, leaving a horcrux hornet was a threat, a very fucked up one, because there's literally no way to kill it, seeing as fiendfyre ants (the only thing that can kill them) are hallow-made and don't exist in districts. so like riddle essentially trapped a plague in a jar and Made Them Keep It as a sign of like. his power over them. rest assured though that the jar does NOT get opened. no one dies to it.

oh, and shoutout to sirius <3 HE'S BUILDING AGAIN!!! remember when he couldn't, when he only thought he broke things 😭😭😭 the fact that he could build again for james, but hadn't managed to for regulus... but also, it just shows how far sirius has come. remus lupin your impact>>>

HONORABLE MENTIONS:

-sirius calling james "romeo" it gave me a chuckle
-barty's little poem that regulus actually wrote down
-the tree on the edge of the mayor's property (this is Important later, i just really love foreshadowing)
-regulus still being obsessed with daggers
-sirius and regulus still being close
-regulus not having his parents in his life but gaining the tonks' <3

-monty and effie flirting
-THE FUCKING BOOKCASE FOR JEGULUS
-sirius talking to the moon like he's talking to remus 😭😭😭
-regulus waking up and immediately thinking/hoping it's james next to him 😭😭😭
-regulus falling out of his chair the first time he saw james out his window, taking a peek, then hiding again 💀 yeah, that's about it. thoughts?

The Moon's Secret

Chapter Notes

hello, everyone!

warnings for this chapter:

-references to death
-very brief references to common issues we've seen so far (nightmares, issues with time, aquaphobia is mentioned like once, i think??? just like, it's all so light compared to anything we've seen so far that you likely won't even bat an eye)

...that's literally it. yeah, im pretty sure that's it. very short list for a change. don't get used to that lmaooo

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The victory tour is scheduled like this:

It kicks off towards the last part of the final week in the fifth month after the previous hunger games, starting with the on-screen interview set in the district of the previous Victor—or in this case, Victors. The very next day, the Victor(s) and their mentor set out for district twelve, where they will start on the tour. They go back from district twelve, stopping in all the ones on the way back to the Hallow over the course of three days, skipping their own along the way.

When they make it to the Hallow, they'll have an interview there with Rita, then settle in for the night. The following day, they'll travel to a very big party at Riddle's castle, stay that night, then go home the following day.

So, for a week, six months after the hunger games, Regulus is going to be pretending to be madly in love with James, except he is madly in love with James, so this really shouldn't be that difficult for him to pull off.

But it is.

Neither of them like it, that they're forced into this, that they don't get the chance to do it their own way. Regulus is bitter, because he wouldn't want to give any of this to the Hallow if it was true anyway. This is supposed to be theirs: whatever it is, whatever it could be, it should belong only to them.

Regulus doesn't want it to be a necessity. Or a performance. He wants it when he's ready, when they both are, and now isn't the time. Six months isn't nearly enough time.

Not when Regulus still sleeps with a dagger under his pillow, clutched in his hand. Not when Regulus still talks to his dead best friend in his sleep most nights, never managing to save him when he falls. Not when Regulus still cries when he bathes, and shies away from touch, and can't work out how to give James everything he deserves.

But, well, here they are anyway.

Pandora and Dorcas are a whirlwind when they arrive together, and Regulus is startled to realize that he's actually happy to see them. They're all doing this at the Potters' place, which is particularly awkward for Regulus, purely because he has to spend time around Effie and Monty, who have known him since he was a little kid and still have the ability to make him feel like one with something as simple as a smile. They're kind to him, warm and welcoming, treating him as they always have, like he didn't spend ten years avoiding them at all costs, then a week in a death arena with their son, alternatively threatening his life and flirting with him in rotation.

Regulus blushes every time they speak to him.

Dorcas and Pandora absolutely charm Effie and Monty with ease. Dorcas flirts with Effie, much to James and Sirius' joint chagrin, and Pandora flutters around Monty with basically a million questions about the book he was reading when they swept in, much to his delight. Regulus sticks close by Sirius, who he's most comfortable with, which would have made him scoff in disbelief only a year ago.

Things change, even the things you least expect to. Regulus could have never imagined in a million years that he and Sirius would be close again, like they once were, and they're…not, not really. It's different, after all this time, after all they've been through. But it's… It's really good, despite everything. Honestly, it's the best part of Regulus' life now.

Regulus had admittedly worried that he and Sirius would drift apart back home, but neither of them allowed that to happen. Maybe that's due to Remus' influence on them both, Regulus can't be sure, but they took to caring about each other with that special brand of Black stubbornness that they once used to keep their distance. Sirius is there when Regulus needs him, always. Regulus is there when Sirius comes to him for a reminder that Remus was real; he never forgets, he says, never forgets one second of the time they spent together, but he likes the reminder anyway. Regulus is happy to give it to him.

Sirius tells him sometimes, off-hand, that he loves him. Casual, light, on his way out the door, usually. Just a quick call of, "Love you, Reggie!" as he carries on, like it's something he feels the need to remind Regulus of, every once in a while.

After all this time, Regulus still hasn't managed to say it back.

In any case, Regulus doesn't get to hover around his brother for very long before Dorcas finishes up with James and sweeps him off to get him ready. Dorcas goes all out, even doing his makeup, which she didn't really do much of last time, and Regulus hasn't had a full face of makeup since he was thirteen and Sirius did it for him one night when they were bored.

She trims his hair a bit, with his permission, fluffing his curls and making them all bouncy and shiny. She puts on mascara without poking him in the eye, and expertly applies eyeliner with the same care, then draws little stars in the corner of his eyes by the wings, seeming pleased with her work.

"You didn't do all of this to James," Regulus mumbles, squinting at her suspiciously.

"Yes, I did, my love. You just refused to look at him," Dorcas informs him, arching an eyebrow. Regulus…can't argue with that, so he stays silent. "What's that all about, hm?"

"What?" Regulus asks.

Dorcas sighs. "You and James. You seem on outs, which isn't very helpful for what's about to come, you know."

"We're not… It's just complicated," Regulus says. She stares at him boldly, and he groans in frustration, starting to lift his hands and scrub them over his face, but she catches his wrists quickly and glares at him. He drops them hastily, clearing his throat. "Look, it's just…hard, alright? Maybe I'm—I'm scared, I don't know. No, I do know, I am scared, but I just—" He takes a deep breath and gazes at her helplessly. "Have you ever been afraid to look at someone, because you know you'll never want to look away as soon as you do?"

"Yes," Dorcas says softly. "It should comfort you to know that he's always looking back."

"I don't want him to see me," Regulus whispers.

"I think it's a little late for that," Dorcas murmurs, gently.

Regulus swallows thickly and looks away.

James nearly breaks his fucking neck to do a double-take as soon as Regulus is led out again. If he was a dog, his ears would be standing straight up in intense interest. Sirius whacks him on the back of his head in what seems to be a reflex, most likely because James is doing absolutely nothing to hide the fact that he's currently undressing Regulus with his eyes. James takes the gentle tap upside the head like he has earned it, because, in fairness, he sort of has. His parents are in the room, for fuck's sake. To his credit, James does look mildly abashed as he drags his gaze from Regulus, only to end up staring at him again only five seconds later.

Pandora snaps her fingers in front of his face and says, "Yes, he's pretty, we get it, but I need your focus."

"Can you all just—leave me alone?" James grumbles, frowning down at his fingers. "You're all so mean. Stop bullying me. This is bullying. I'm being bullied. Mum—"

"Alright, that's enough," Effie declares, walking behind James' chair to rub his shoulders. "No one's coming into my house and bullying my baby. Let him be."

James leans his head over on his mum's arm and looks very smug, gazing up at her with undeniable adoration. She smiles down at him and winks, while Sirius shares a look with Monty, both of them stifling a laugh. Regulus stares down at his shoes and tries not to feel so alone in a room full of people.

Everyone stops teasing James after that, and even Sirius doesn't make a fuss when James keeps stealing glances at Regulus, like he can't help it. Regulus figures he can't, because he's in the same predicament, just much more covert about it.

Dorcas did indeed doll James up. His face is clean-shaven, which makes his jawline so much more potent and causes Regulus' stomach to go all wobbly. She didn't cut his hair, probably because it was cut months ago and didn't need it. She took his glasses, too, which makes Regulus want to rip the sky apart, because it reminds him of the arena, and it also makes the full-force of James' eyes feel so intense that Regulus genuinely cannot stop fidgeting. She did his eyes, too. Oh, why did she do that?

He has glittery, golden suns on each eyelid, just the arc of one like a horizon that dips with each blink. It's entrancing, utterly fascinating, as well as ridiculously pretty paired with his eyelashes. Oh, his eyelashes...

James has always had full eyelashes, thick and long and dark, but they're so pretty now that Regulus is sort of pissed about it. He doesn't want the Hallow to see that. They don't fucking deserve to see James, not now when he's wearing makeup, and not any other time when he's not. Regulus wants to keep him out of sight, so no one can look at him, ever.

Still, Regulus steals covert glances as Pandora prattles on about what they're expected to do and say, yada yada yada, and he assumes that he's being sneaky enough that no one notices him, only to end up quite caught. There's a moment where Regulus shifts his gaze away and finds Monty looking right at him, clearly catching him right in the act of internally drooling over his son, and the sad part is, it's not even the first time.

Regulus knows for a fact that Effie and Monty were aware of his crush on James when he was a child. Looking back, he now knows that they thought it was cute, but back then, they never called attention to it. They were even gentle with him about it, especially because he was so shy. James, of course, never teased Regulus in front of them, or else Regulus suspects that Effie and Monty would have had a talk with him about not being a little shit about the whole thing.

In any case, Regulus is once again caught, all these years later, like some things will never change. Monty's lips twitch, and Regulus' whole face feels like it's on fire. He looks away and tries his absolute best not to look back at James again, but he is a weak man and fails in less than five seconds flat.

For a moment, all Regulus wants to do is fall at James' feet and tell him how lovely he is. Just that, that's all he wants to do, that would be enough. It would be enough to fall at the altar of James Potter and worship him.

"Is that okay, Regulus?" Pandora asks.

"What?" Regulus blurts out, his head snapping around to find quite literally everyone staring at him.

Pandora slowly raises her eyebrows. "I asked if you were fine with that?"

"With…" Regulus can feel his face burning all over again, and he can't stop fucking fidgeting, because the weight of James' gaze on him is like an actual caress. "Sorry, um, with what?"

"Distracted, are we?" Pandora teases, her eyes crinkling as she smiles. "I know James is pretty, but I need your focus, too."

Regulus scowls. "You know what—"

"No, no, it's okay! This is good. Very good," Pandora insists cheerfully. "Channel that energy into the interview, and it's going to be just fine. Dorcas, you're marvelous."

"Thank you," Dorcas replies, sounding satisfied.

"I would just like it on the record that I would be like this regardless of whether or not Dorcas got ahold of him," James announces, like it's important to him that everyone is aware that he's distracted by Regulus no matter his state.

"We know, James," Pandora and Dorcas chorus back at the same time, with the same level of exasperation.

"I am in Hell," Sirius mumbles mournfully. Effie makes a soft, cooing noise and pats his shoulder gently, and he leans into her pretty much exactly like James did earlier.

Pandora once again launches into a whole spiel about how this interview is supposed to go, and Regulus does better with listening this time. Before, she was asking him if he was okay with James giving him a kiss on screen, because this is just the sort of conversations they have out loud, apparently. Regulus glares at her until she wisely and quickly moves along, never getting her answer either way, which is probably rather irritating for her, because she seems determined to plan everything down to the very last detail.

It's not very long before the camera crew arrive, so James and Regulus are ushered outside and left to stand in front of Regulus' house to better give the impression that they live together, while Sirius stands with Dorcas and Pandora behind the camera crew, and Effie and Monty stay in their house. While the cameras and screens are set up and such, Regulus and James are sort of just…left alone while everyone else bustles around like chickens with their heads cut off.

"So…" James coughs. "You look nice."

Regulus doesn't look at him. He can't.

"Thank you, James, you look nice, too," James says, then makes a pfft noise and waves his hand casually. "Oh, it's nothing, really. I woke up like this."

Regulus' entire face twitches, and he struggles to fight the smile tugging ruthlessly at his lips. He genuinely can't reply for fear of opening his mouth and either releasing a helpless laugh, or a smile splitting across his face.

"Great weather we're having, isn't it, James? Nice and sunny, but also a bit breezy." James hums and nods his head dutifully, as if in agreement. "Just marvelous, really, Regulus. You're absolutely right to point it out. The breeze is nice."

Regulus reaches up to swipe his hand over his mouth, trying to tuck away the growing grin, sincerely struggling not to break out into laughter. James makes a mhm-mhm noise as if they're still carrying on a conversation.

"And how are you today, James?" James continues, and then he shrugs and clicks his tongue. "Oh, can't complain, I suppose, since I'm here with you." He gasps and presses his hand to his chest. "Why, James, you are so sweet, just the sweetest; oh, how you make me swoon—"

Regulus cracks. He can't help it. His head ducks forward as he loses it, his shoulders shaking as his laughter builds up and bubbles over, light and airy in his chest. As much as Regulus tries to smother it, he literally can't.

"You're laughing. Why are you laughing?" James asks in mock offense, putting his hands on his hips. "What? Do you have something you want to say?"

"No, nothing. You've said it all for me," Regulus says, shaking his head as he steals a glance at James out of the corner of his eye, still unable to fully look at him.

James is grinning in triumph, which makes it even more difficult. "I just thought I'd get all the awkward tension out of the way quickly. Did it work?"

"Well, calling attention to it does bring it back to the forefront, you know," Regulus says wryly.

"I think acknowledging it makes it easier to handle, actually," James counters, shifting to turn and stand directly in front of Regulus, gazing at him softly. "Really, how have you been?"

For a long moment, Regulus doesn't even know where to start. They've seen each other, of course, at least once a day because James still brings a flower every morning, without fail. But, in the past month, it's been just like all the ones before it, especially in the aftermath of Riddle's visit. A much-needed distance—for Regulus, at least—because the reality that they have no agency over their own…love story, or whatever, has been even heavier since Riddle made that clear to them.

Regulus has been tangled up in knots about this interview, about the week they're about to endure, but now that it's here and now that James is here, in front of him and making him laugh, Regulus realizes that he's missed him.

So, Regulus just—admits it, just meets James' ridiculously lovely eyes, and whispers, "I've missed you."

"Oh," James says, a breath punching out of him as he blinks rapidly and looks so very startled, like that possibility never even crossed his mind. "Yeah, I—I know the feeling. I've missed you, too. I just—I mean, I'm only across the street, though. Not—I don't mean that you had to see me, just that you could have if you wanted, at any time. If I did anything to make you think that you couldn't, or that it had to mean something for you to be able to, then I'm—"

"No, you didn't," Regulus cuts in quickly. "It's not anything you did, James, or didn't do. It's me. It's still just…me."

"Oh," James repeats thoughtfully, and he searches Regulus' gaze for a long moment before his face softens. "Well, that's okay, Reg. I don't expect anything from you, you know that."

"Maybe you should," Regulus mumbles.

James purses his lips. "All I expect from you is for you to do what's best for yourself."

"Yes, uh, about that…" Regulus huffs out a weak laugh and lifts a hand to rub his temple. "I don't really know what that is, you see, and I've been trying to figure that out, but it's taking a really long time—and I don't just mean with…us; I mean with everything, because it's—it's all really—"

"Hard," James fills in quietly, nodding at him in visible understanding, like he actually gets it—and why wouldn't he? After all, he was in the arena, too. "It's very fucking hard."

"Sirius helps, but…" Regulus flicks his gaze over to where Sirius seems to be trying to soothe a frazzled Pandora and swallows as his chest goes tight.

"I, uh—I struggle, too, so I—I get it," James murmurs.

Regulus exhales slowly and holds his gaze. "But you still bring me a flower every day. Every single fucking day, James, no matter what else is going on or how you feel."

"Should I…not?" James asks, almost cautious. "It's—I mean, if you'd like me not to, you know I'll stop."

"Some days, I wake up and I don't want to move. I don't want to speak. I don't even want to think. All I want to do is—lay there, just lay there and never get up again, so I don't really understand how you do it," Regulus says.

"Funny you would say that," James replies gently, his lips curling up. "I've been tempted to ask you the very same thing, because every day, without fail, you're at that window. What gets you up when you don't want to?"

"I—Because I—" Regulus stutters to a stop, blinking at James, who waits curiously. The thing is, there's a lot of answers to that question. Sometimes, just knowing that he's going to see Sirius can get him out of bed on days when it's the last thing he wants to do; sometimes, it's the thought of the promise he made to go visit Andromeda, Ted, and Nymphadora again; other times, it's because Barty is there to nudge him awake and coax him out of bed. But those things have failed before. There have been times when not even those things were enough to combat the crushing weight that kept him pinned to his bed, and all that was left was a flower.

One lone flower should not have that much power, and yet it does. At the start of the day, when it feels like the end of his life and he's so very exhausted with everything, when all else fails, it's that flower James brings to him every morning that gets him out of bed. Because Regulus has to make sure that it's there, every day, desperate to find it on his doorstep time and time again while terrified that, one day, it won't be.

"There are days where I wake up and instantly want to go back to sleep, or just stuff my head under my pillow and never resurface, but I get up anyway, because I know you're going to be at that window," James explains. "You're always there, no matter what, so I drag myself up and bring you a flower. If that's all I do in a day, at least I've done that. Maybe that's a strange thing to have as a consistent source of motivation—"

"No," Regulus interrupts forcefully, and James blinks, looking mildly startled. "No, James, it's not. It's—well, actually, this is a bit ironic, I suppose, but that flower is why I get up, even on the days when it's hardest to do so."

"Oh," James says softly.

Regulus frowns slightly. "Don't take that to mean you have to, alright? It's not a standard you have to hold yourself to, and if you don't do it, or just…can't, that's okay. I just—I want you to know that I appreciate that you do it."

"Thank you for keeping your curtains open," James blurts out, fidgeting with the lapel of his suit jacket. "You don't have to do that, and I'm sure there are days when you'd rather close them, but you keep them open, and maybe it's foolish of me to think that it's for my benefit, but—"

"It is," Regulus confirms.

James blinks harshly, the column of his throat rising and falling as he searches Regulus' gaze. His voice is so soft when he whispers, "You really miss me?"

"Yes," Regulus admits bluntly, despite the way the truth makes his heart thump heavily in his chest. What a terror it is to open himself up and let himself be seen. He swallows, too, and sighs a little wistfully. "And now I miss your fucking glasses. Why do they take them from you every time?"

"I—" James blinks, then huffs out a weak laugh. "Well, Dorcas let me keep them as long as I agreed not to wear them on camera or at the party when we reach the Hallow. I—I still have them. They're here, in my pocket."

Regulus watches James gently tap the side of his jacket with a frown. "Alright, sure, but why can't you wear them? I suppose it made a bit of sense in—in the arena, but—"

"I think it's just how I presented myself to the Hallow before, or how I was presented," James explains. "It's what they're already used to, and it's more…digestible that way? I think? Maybe it's a mental thing, too. For me, I mean. When I have them off and I'm wearing contacts, I'm not fully comfortable, and I shouldn't be while…all of this is going on."

"You prefer it this way?" Regulus asks.

James nods carefully. "I think so. It's a physical reminder, maybe, that this is—separate, do you know what I mean? I've worn my glasses in every other portion of my life, except for when I'm presenting myself to the Hallow, so it helps keep it all from blending… And, um, it sort of helps me figure out the timeline, if that makes sense? Like, I'm not wearing my glasses, so it can't be before the arena, but I also have my cane, so it has to be after the arena."

"Oh," Regulus murmurs, eyebrows furrowed. "Is—is that something you struggle with? Knowing…when you are?"

"Yeah," James replies. "Frequently. Time is—stupid."

Regulus feels his lips twitch at how petulant James sounds about it. It makes him want to reach out and soothe away the pout on James' face until he's smiling again. "Yes, I'd say so. Is there—I mean, can I…do anything?"

"No. It's sort of just…one of those things," James says with a weary sigh, resigned to it. "I can usually work it out from context clues, and fairly quick, too. Sometimes Sirius has to tell me, so I suppose if I ever ask, you could as well."

"Okay," Regulus agrees.

"Five minutes!" Pandora calls out in warning.

James blows out a deep breath, glancing away, then back at Regulus again. "Right. Happy couple time. Um, should we talk about…boundaries, I suppose? Is there anything—"

"Blanket permission," Regulus cuts in firmly, setting his shoulders and holding James' gaze. "You have blanket permission to do anything, James. We can't afford to fuck this up, so…go for it, I suppose."

"Go for it," James repeats, eyebrows shooting up.

The idea of James going for it, as it were, makes Regulus want to curl in a tight ball and shrivel into himself. He doesn't—even now, touching is... It's hard. He has his moments, his good days, but most of the time, he can't stand to be touched. It's the same as shying away from dead things, repulsed by rot; he is a corpse that forgets he is dead until someone touches him and reminds him he's not alive. He doesn't want James to brush up against that.

He also has no choice, because danger is breathing down their necks, and they can't outrun it. They can only keep moving forward and never turn to face it. To do so would be defiance. Regulus doesn't feel the urge to be defiant anymore. Compliance is safe. Compliance is quiet grief and unspoken tragedies. He does not want to raise his voice. He does not want to speak at all.

Regulus clears his throat. "For the next week, when it's required, you can be as sappy and romantic and affectionate as you like. Don't hold back. I want them sick of us by the end."

"Alright, but still, is there anything you don't want me to do, not even to put on a show?" James insists.

And of course, here James is, stopping in place and planting his feet despite the heavy breathing echoing in their ears, whispering promises of further detriment. He gives Regulus options. He gives Regulus the space to choose, always. Regulus will never be able to express what that means to him.

"Oh. Um." Regulus swallows. "Just—I mean, I'm okay with... Hands. We can—hold hands. That's... Yeah, that should be fine." He pauses, then grimaces slightly because he already knows that's not going to be enough. Of course not. "It's—James, it's okay to touch me over the next week. On camera, at least. That's...separate for me, too. Just—maybe no kissing? Not—not a lot, anyway. Cheek is fine. Maybe just let me initiate most things. Is that okay?"

"That's okay," James assures him quietly, and Regulus really hopes that James doesn't take it personally. It's not him. It's Regulus. Of course it is.

Regulus nods. "And—and it's important to remember that this isn't real. I'm not saying—I know you know that, and I'm sorry, but I'll do what needs to be done when those cameras are on, when people are watching, but when they're not…"

"Don't worry, Regulus," James murmurs, averting his gaze to the side, "I won't get the wrong idea."

"James," Regulus says weakly, because the distinction is important to him. All of this with James over the next week, it's not... It can't be anything. Not yet. Not like this. They're not ready.

Shaking his head, James gives him a tight smile. "I'm not upset with you. I'm just really fucking pissed off that—that we don't have a choice in the matter. You shouldn't be forced into this, and I—I shouldn't either. Trust me, there's no chance I'll get the wrong idea about this. I know what we are."

"A great, big tragedy," Regulus mumbles, and James just nods in silent agreement. Regulus' stomach turns over like it's tumbling down a hill, his heart squeezing violently in his chest. "We could be—I mean, do you still think that, someday, we could...?"

"Regulus," James says gently, his gaze so soft.

"Ignore me. That was—stupid. Sorry." Regulus cringes a little and looks away. Five minutes with James, and he's a little idiot in love again. Someone save him.

James laughs, quiet and breathless, and his eyes are bright when Regulus peeks at him again. "Love, I haven't ignored you since your fifteenth birthday. Trust me, I'm not about to start now."

Regulus knew that. He did. And yet, his face still burns. Oh, he's so pathetic. James. Fucking James. Regulus hates him, but oh how he loves him so.

"It's—this is going to be difficult for me," James announces, clearing his throat. "I—I'm going to struggle, I think, and I don't want to take that out on you. I really don't. So, just, if you would, don't ignore me either, please? Can we just get through it together?"

Regulus' heart sinks, because he doesn't know if he'll be able to manage that, or get it right. He doesn't know if he can. All he can say is, "I'll try," and he hopes James knows that he really, truly will.

The problem is, he's going to fail. He knows he will.

He always has.

~•~

Sirius doesn't remember his victory tour. Not one second of it.

He's spoken to Effie about it in preparation for this one, because he genuinely has no recollection outside of small snatches of memories that he's not entirely sure are real. He knows it happened, and he knows Effie was there with him the entire time, but that's about it.

So, Sirius is sort of visiting all the districts for the first time, too, even though he's technically already done it once. Effie has done it four times—once when she was a Victor, once as Bellatrix's mentor, once as Narcissa's, and once as Sirius'. She gave him a basic rundown of what to expect, slipping back into a mentor role like she never even left, for which Sirius was grateful, because he really needed her guidance on this one.

In any case, he feels mostly prepared by the time they leave for district twelve, their very first stop on the tour. It's the day after the interview, which had gone well. James and Regulus were disgustingly lovey-dovey throughout, but as soon as the cameras were off, they went their separate ways again.

Pandora and Dorcas will be with them all the way back into the Hallow, and Pandora has sat James and Regulus down to coach them so thoroughly that they could probably give their speeches in their sleep.

It's not going to be a good time, regardless, because they'll have to face strong reminders of people they killed, and people they lost. Pandora got the full list, so she knows each tribute from each district. The ones that Sirius is worried about are the ones he's known this entire time.

District eleven is where Vanity and Hodge were reaped from, where Marlene is. District nine is home to Emmeline, who had Evan and Juniper as tributes. District five had Irene and Mathias, which is where Frank is. District three might be hard, too, because that's where Peter was from.

Two probably won't be hard, because that was Axus and Willa. One, of course, was Mulciber and Avery, but Sirius suspects that will be particularly difficult for him and Regulus for reasons that have nothing to do with the fallen tributes and everything to do with the fact that it'll be a bit of a family reunion if Lucius gets Narcissa and Bellatrix there. Four, seven, eight, ten, and twelve should be the simplest.

District six is home, which they won't properly see again until the week is over. Just one week. They can handle a week.

District twelve, Sirius assumes, won't be an issue at all. The tributes who died from there never even spoke to James and Regulus, really. So, when they arrive, it's mostly just jitters from doing something for the very first time. In no way, shape, or form should district twelve be impactful at all.

It doesn't take Sirius very long to realize that this will not be the case.

Before James and Regulus have to stand up and give their speeches, there's lunch with the mayor and the mentor of the fallen tributes, and it's held in the mayor's office. Sirius isn't very close with the mentor of this district, some man named Figgins, who drinks more than he talks and has been a mentor for at least thirty years; Sirius thinks he and Effie got on well enough, back in their day, but that's all he knows.

It's as they're all moving through the front hall of the mayor's office that things go awry. Sirius doesn't much like the mayor, if he's honest. A man who cares more about the reputation of his district than the people in it, too concerned with fitting into what's expected of them, blithering on about a new order since he was given the position. He's fairly new to it, or newer than most, because he's young, only a bit older than them, from what Sirius can tell, but he acts like he's of great importance and far more distinguished than them.

Sirius is admittedly tuning him out, and in doing so, he's flicking his gaze over the pictures on the wall, and one catches his eye and makes him do a double-take so hard that he genuinely comes to a screeching halt. The group keeps walking, but Sirius is frozen in place, staring at a picture of Remus with wide eyes, his heart racing.

The man—Mayor Vernon—keeps on talking, but Sirius eases towards the picture. It's as he gets closer that he realizes, no, that's not Remus. It's a man strongly resembling him—or rather the man that Remus strongly resembles. The plaque underneath the picture reads Lyall Lupin and thanks him for thirty plus years of service as an Auror.

"Sirius?"

Jolting, Sirius exhales sharply and whips his head around to find Regulus standing right beside him. Sirius clears his throat and looks over to see the others still walking ahead, but here Regulus is, waiting. "Sorry. I… Um. I—"

"Oh," Regulus murmurs, gazing at the picture and apparently reading the name on the plaque. He blinks, then looks at Sirius again. "Yes, okay."

"What?" Sirius mumbles weakly.

Regulus arches an eyebrow at him. "You know what. Just go, Sirius. I'll handle the others."

"Thank you," Sirius breathes out, already backing up.

"Don't rush. We'll be fine," is Regulus' only response, and Sirius nods gratefully before he's gone.

Seeing as Sirius has no fucking clue where Lyall lives, or anything about district twelve overall, he's a bit lost from the start. Fortunately, Sirius knows how to charm people and get exactly what he wants, so he talks to every person he comes across and gathers enough information to hopefully point himself in the right direction.

Eventually, Sirius is walking slowly up a set of rickety steps, his breath held as he approaches a sea-foam green door with a brass knocker that he just—stares at for a few moments in rising distress. He's never used a fucking door-knocker before. Is that a thing? Do people actually use that? People generally just knock directly on the door, right? But is it there just for decoration, or should he really use it? Does it matter?

Sirius stands there for a solid five minutes, probably, just debating on whether or not his style of knocking would give Lyall a bad impression, then realizes he's being a bit of an idiot, because the man likely won't give a shit how Sirius knocks when Sirius starts talking about his son.

So, Sirius takes a deep breath, gathers his courage, and reaches out to knock, then stands there and internally spirals into a bit of a panic, because what if he knocked too hard? Too many times? Really, the knocker is right there, and isn't it very annoying to have that, only for no one to use it? Can he do both? Maybe he should do both. Maybe—

The door opens before Sirius can settle on what counts as proper etiquette when knocking on the door belonging to the man whose son you're head over heels in love with.

Lyall, like Remus, is a tall man. He's older than the picture in the office, his hair graying and his eyes framed by wrinkles. He looks stern, and Sirius can see where Remus gets that guarded expression of his from. Lyall, also like Remus, is incredibly handsome—aged like fine wine, as that saying goes.

"Hello," Sirius greets, struggling not to cringe because of how formal he sounds. "Um, hi, I know you don't know me, but my name is Sirius Black. I'm…"

"The mentor to this year's Victors," Lyall fills in, when Sirius trails off awkwardly. Poor Lyall looks like he has absolutely no idea what would bring Sirius to his door, which is fair, because if not for Remus, Sirius would have no reason to be here. "Is there something I can… help you with, Mr. Black?"

"Sirius, please," Sirius says quickly, stuffing his hands in his pockets and clearing his throat. "I—I was hoping I could come in, if that's not too much of a bother. I'd just like to talk to you about something important. I'm aware that's confusing, sir, and I understand if you'd rather not, but I really do think you'll be grateful that you did."

Lyall regards him for a long moment in complete silence, visibly bemused, then steps back and murmurs, "You've caught me at a good time. Come on in."

"Thank you," Sirius replies, following Lyall further inside.

Past the little hall from the front door, where there's a coat rack, the main sitting room waits. Sirius can see the kitchen off to the side, quaint and cluttered, and two separate halls that he presumes leads to rooms. The sitting room has two chairs with a side-table between them, a lamp resting on top of it, and a framed picture of a much younger Remus being hugged from behind by a beaming woman that Sirius is quite sure is Hope Lupin. Sirius' breath catches when he looks at it, because only one glance tells him that Remus got his freckles and hair from his mum, and they both look so fucking happy in the picture that it leaves him breathless.

It's the sort of photo that you'd find in happy, loving homes with whole families that aren't trapped together by all their broken parts, nothing like what Sirius comes from. It's the sort of photo that Effie and Monty have all over their house. It's the sort of photo that wouldn't make you think that anything ever went wrong, that this family ever knew tragedy, or loss.

"I don't mean to be rude," Lyall says carefully, drawing his attention, "but I'd appreciate knowing what you're here for."

Sirius opens his mouth, closes it, then does it all over again on repeat as he tries to figure out how to start. His legs are jumping up and down restlessly. "Right. So, I—well, honestly, I'm not sure how to explain. I suppose I should just—come right out and say it."

"That's generally a good place to start, yes," Lyall agrees.

"I know your son," Sirius blurts out, and then they both just sort of stop and stare at each other. Lyall isn't moving, doesn't even seem to be breathing, and neither is Sirius. There's an emotion flickering in Lyall's eyes, but Sirius can't put a name to what it is. The silence stretches on, and Sirius finally can't take it anymore, his exhale exploding out of him as he promptly begins to ramble. "I mean, I got to know him. Your son, I mean. Recently, when I was in the Hallow. We got to know each other, to be more precise, which was—"

"Wait, just." Lyall holds up a hand, and Sirius snaps his mouth shut. Lyall's fingers are ever so slightly trembling, even as he stares at Sirius steadily. "My son. You…know him."

Sirius swallows and nods. "Yes. Remus. We got to know each other, like I said. He was assigned to our suite as a servant, but I made him take his mask off. Wait, no, I—it's—that came out wrong. I—I did try to, at first, with good intentions, but in the end, he made the choice to take it off himself, and—and he was free to just do as he pleased in the suite, so he did, and we spent a lot of time together. We talked a lot, which is how I know about you, and he—he's just brilliant, Mr. Lupin, truly."

"He's…" Lyall trails off for a long moment, seeming to need a moment to process, and he reaches up to swipe his shaking hand over his mouth. Whatever emotion exists in his eyes, it just keeps getting brighter. "Is he—well? Is Remus okay? Just, I need to know if—if my son is…"

"Well, er, being a servant isn't the most…glamorous thing, for obvious reasons, but he's—despite everything, he's as okay as he can be, sir," Sirius says softly. "He's kind, and passionate, and he hasn't let the past five years make him forget his worth. When I was with him, I saw many smiles and heard plenty of laughter, if that comforts you at all."

Lyall's eyes sink shut. "It does. You cannot even begin to imagine how much it does."

"He talked about you and his mum with—just so much love, Mr. Lupin," Sirius murmurs, his heart clenching when Lyall's eyes flutter open, shining a bit, wet with unshed tears. "I think he would like you to know that he loves you, and misses you, and he hopes you're…doing well, too. I know circumstances are unfair, but if I could give you this—give him this—then I had to at least try. I'm sorry if I've overstepped, but—"

"You have not. You—thank you." Lyall reaches out and hovers his hand over where Sirius has his arm propped up on the chair, and after a beat, he rests his hand on Sirius' arm and gently squeezes it. "Thank you. Thank you so much."

Sirius takes a deep breath. "I plan to see him again when I go back to the Hallow for the next hunger games. It's still six months away, but I would be more than willing to take a letter to him, if you wanted to write one. Or if you just wanted me to tell him something, I would."

"You plan to see him again?" Lyall asks as he draws his hand away, eyebrows furrowed in confusion.

"I—well, yes, sir," Sirius admits. "I intend to make it happen, whatever it takes. Bribery, if necessary. I, um, have a way with the Hallows, anyway. I'm sort of…good at manipulating them to do what I want, and for Remus, I will."

Lyall blinks, staring at him, then nods slowly. "Well, that's… Ah, I'll hardly stop you. From what I understand, Remus has a bit more freedom while with you, yes?"

"Yes, sir," Sirius says. "I don't really…like servants." He pauses, then his eyes bulge. "Wait, I didn't mean it like that. I meant that I don't like how servants are treated, and I—I don't allow it in our assigned suite, where it's safe for them to be treated as they should be. It's—Remus isn't the first that I insisted on getting to have basic human rights, but he is the first that actually allowed himself to fully agree. Usually, the danger it poses holds most people back, and I can't blame them for that, but Remus was…different."

"I always feared that he would get into trouble he could not get out of, and now that he has, I feared that everything that made him who he was would be…taken from him," Lyall confesses quietly. "To know that this is not the case, to know that he's still…" Lyall exhales and looks up to hold Sirius' gaze, lips curling at the corners. "You've given me a gift I can never repay, Sirius, and I—I cannot even begin to express what it means to me. I would like to write him a letter, if you meant it when you offered to take it to him."

"I meant it," Sirius confirms immediately. "I'll get it to him, sir, I promise. I think it would be very good for him."

Lyall swallows. "It's a risk. I'm sure you know this, but I feel the need to point it out, if only because I sincerely doubt that my son would want you to endanger yourself, even for this. If you're discovered giving this letter to him, you would both be punished, or possibly killed."

"I know," Sirius says, his voice steady and unwavering. "I'll be careful, of course, but the risk is worth it for him, and I can only hope that you'll agree. If—if it's discovered, you would also be in danger, Mr. Lupin. I can't force you, and I would understand if you'd rather not; I'm sure Remus would as well."

"No," Lyall murmurs. "If you're willing, then I want to. My son was always so brave, even to his own detriment, and I can stand to be brave for him now. There are things I never got the chance to say to him, things he deserves to hear, so if you're absolutely sure about doing this…"

"I am," Sirius assures him.

"Very well." Lyall leans forward and pushes himself out of his chair, blowing out a deep breath. He moves over to a bookshelf in the corner and shuffles things around to grab something, bringing it to Sirius. "This is a photo album, if you'd like to flip through it while I write the letter. Just give me a moment."

Sirius grabs the photo album and nods at Lyall. "Of course. Take your time."

Lyall gives him a faint smile and wanders off down the hall to the left, presumably to go write the letter to Remus in the privacy of his own room, which Sirius can't begrudge him.

To pass the time, Sirius does indeed flip through the photo album, grateful that he's alone, because he's pretty much infatuated from the very first page. It's photos upon photos of Remus growing up, all the way from a baby to an adult. Lyall, Hope, and other people feature in the pictures as well—one girl pops up a lot that Sirius believes is Lily, based on her red hair and green eyes and how close she and Remus seem to be.

In most photos, Remus is smiling. None of his baby pictures, though, because he was apparently a baby who never smiled, always scowling or crying, which Sirius finds ridiculously adorable. But, as he grows through the pictures, he starts to smile more and more, looking so young and delighted by life. There's a lot of laughter captured in the moment, and Sirius reflexively smiles every time he sees it.

Sirius finds a quick favorite. A picture of Remus and Lily, he's pretty sure. It's clearly a photo they took themselves, just from the angle. They look young, probably around sixteen or seventeen, if Sirius had to guess. In it, Lily is holding Remus by the jaw and sticking her tongue out towards his ear, like she intends to lick it, and Remus' face is scrunched up into a smile that, for some reason, brings tears to Sirius' eyes. He releases a wet laugh, stroking the edge of the photo reverently, his heart feeling swollen and bruised in the best and worst way both.

It's just—well, this could have been around the time Sirius was in the arena, or afterwards when things were so fucking hard for him. It hurts, in a way, to see people living with such ease, as if the world wasn't falling apart, because at that time, that's how it felt for him. In the same breath, something about it soothes Sirius, too, just to know that Remus had this, to know that he was happy and loved.

Remus, unsurprisingly, was heartbreakingly handsome throughout his youth, and there is absolutely no doubt in Sirius' mind that he had people falling all over themselves for him. Sirius fell all over himself for Remus, so really, he gets it. That doesn't mean he's very pleased to come across a photo of Remus and some boy who he must have been dating at the time, because they're kissing in it. Sirius purses his lips and glares at the picture, then flips to the next page with a huff.

Towards the end, the pictures become more spaced out and, eventually, Hope stops showing up in them at all. Remus' warm smiles start to take on an edge, something a little sharp in his grin, as if he's always ready for a fight, no matter what's going on. There's one candid of Lily and Remus both smoking, touching the very tips of their burning cigarettes together as they flip off the camera, so Sirius assumes someone else took it. And, finally, there's the very last photo.

In it, Remus looks as old as he ever gets in any of the photos, nothing past twenty, since he was captured at that age. He's sleeping in the picture, with Lily right next to him, both of them sprawled out with their mouths slack and their limbs thrown over each other carelessly.

Sirius stares at it for a very long time. He's never seen Remus sleeping, never had the chance to, and he'll never see it in person. It's a crying shame, because Remus is lovely while sleeping, at least when he's resting comfortably. He looks gentle, like the kind of person who would smile as soon as you made eye-contact with them.

Sirius misses Remus so much that it's pitiful. He misses Remus all the time, no matter what he's doing, and he only needs to be alone and get still for a few minutes before his mind is turning to every memory of them that he has. He hasn't forgotten any of it, not one second, and he thinks he could forget everything else and still remember Remus.

The sound of Lyall shuffling back into the room makes Sirius gently shut the photo album and sit it aside, straightening up as Lyall moves back to his chair. Lyall's eyes are red-rimmed and a little puffy like he's been crying, which tugs at Sirius' heartstrings something awful, but he doesn't call attention to it, because he thinks Lyall would prefer it if he didn't.

"Remus doesn't trust very easily," Lyall murmurs, "but I know he must trust you to have told you about his mother. It's not something he's ever talked about very much. Losing Hope was hard for him, hard for us both, and knowing that he told you about her lets me know that he trusts you, so I'll do the same."

"Thank you," Sirius replies quietly. "I would never do anything to hurt Remus. You can trust that, Mr. Lupin."

"It's all a parent wants, just to know that their child has people who care for them," Lyall croaks as he holds out the envelope, unmarked and sealed. Not all parents, Sirius thinks, but he doesn't say it. "I appreciate you more than you'll ever know."

"You're a good father, sir." Sirius reaches out to take the letter gingerly, offering Lyall a tiny smile. "In fairness, it's very easy to care about Remus. He's…something special."

"I wholeheartedly agree," Lyall declares, but his lips press into a thin line. "Unfortunately, not many people would be able to look past what he's done to see that. I cannot thank you enough for doing so, despite the people that he killed."

Sirius drops the letter, his fingers fumbling it and going slack as he rears back, eyes growing wide. The letter hits the floor in front of his boots, and Lyall freezes.

"Oh," Lyall says softly, looking stricken, "you didn't know… I thought—well, he told you so much that he'd never told anyone, and you said you both talked a lot, so I just assumed that this was something he trusted you with as well."

"No," Sirius rasps, "he—he failed to mention that part."

Silence falls on them like a guillotine, and Sirius' brain can hardly make sense of this. Remus killed people? What the fuck? That's not—that doesn't make any sense. Remus was never in the games. Why would he—what reason would he ever—

Is this why he's a servant? Was murder his crime? Well, fuck, Sirius genuinely did not see that coming. How could he see this coming? Remus never even hinted—

"Sirius," Lyall starts, very carefully, "I—I know that this seems bad and puts him in a negative light, but you have to understand that it's not what you think. Please allow me to explain the full story before you—"

"Ah, no," Sirius cuts in quickly, blowing out a deep breath as he shakes his head. "No offense, sir, but I don't think that would be a good idea. I think he should have the chance to explain, despite how badly I'd like to know."

Lyall eyes him warily. "You're still going to visit him?"

"What? Of course," Sirius says, baffled. "Why wouldn't I?"

"You just found out my son is a murderer," Lyall informs him, raising his eyebrows slowly.

Sirius blinks. "Mr. Lupin, I'm also a murderer. I've killed twelve people."

For a beat, they just stare at each other in silence as that settles between them, because this is the world they live in, where saying something like that can be true without it being absolutely fucking insane. Well, it is insane, but it's also very normalized. It's just…the way the world works.

And, really, Sirius has no room to judge, does he? That's the truth. He has killed twelve people, at the tender age of sixteen. It's a fact he can never be free from. Of course, he was in a situation where he had no choice, where it was either that, or die, and he has no idea what circumstances Remus was in when he became a murderer.

He doesn't know the details; the reasons behind it; how many people, or even how he did it. Maybe it's foolish, but Sirius doesn't particularly care. He didn't see it coming, but it's not as if it changes anything. Sirius still misses Remus with every breath, still loves him with every cell in his body, and still has all plans to see him again as soon as he can.

"Well, you just seemed…quite upset," Lyall says awkwardly.

"Not because of the murder thing," Sirius mutters, waving his hand carelessly. He pauses. "That makes me sound rather mental, doesn't it? I just mean, I know that whatever it is, however it happened, it wasn't something inexcusable. No, I was just surprised, honestly, and I do feel like maybe he should have mentioned it. Not that I'm entitled to any information he isn't comfortable sharing, but I do think it's something you tell someone before you have sex with them, at the very least."

It takes a second for the words to catch up with Sirius, and then his eyes bulge as heat creeps up into his face. Lyall's eyebrows are raised very, very high.

"Oh, fuck—I mean, shit—wait, sorry, excuse my language, sir," Sirius chokes out, his voice going high from his rising panic as his heart takes off sprinting in his chest. "I wasn't—I shouldn't have said that. I don't know why I said that. Please don't think I took advantage of Remus. I swear I didn't. It was very mutual, and actually I was super nervous and not really sure about the whole thing—er, sex, I mean, because I'd never even done it, but I trusted Remus, and he was just so lovely—"

"Sirius—"

"I—I didn't force him, I would never, and he had full freedom to do whatever he liked, or didn't. He could have just—beat me up, if necessary. I'm pretty sure I told him that once, actually, and hey, now I know he could have just fucking killed me, so there's that. Shit, sorry, the cursing again. I'm just—I don't mean to be disrespectful in your home, sir, I swear. I'm just panicking a bit, currently, and—and trying to explain that I didn't, in any way, coerce your son into having sex with—"

"Sirius," Lyall interrupts yet again, louder this time.

"I'm in love with him," Sirius blurts out, then inhales sharply and tangles his fingers together in his lap, staring at Lyall with wide eyes. His face feels like it's about to melt off.

"My word," Lyall says faintly, and then a quiet chuckle slips out of him, but it keeps building until he's laughing so hard that he leans back in his chair and cradles his stomach. It's a full-bellied laugh, echoing throughout the empty house that shouldn't be empty at all. It takes Lyall a bit to calm down, and once he has, he genuinely has to rub tears out of his eyes as he shakes his head. "Oh. Oh, hell, I needed that."

"Mr. Lupin?" Sirius asks cautiously.

"Please call me Lyall, Sirius. You've absolutely earned it," Lyall declares, gazing over at him with a fondness that Sirius is not at all prepared for. He looks—warm. Pleased, even. "I bet Remus is endlessly entertained by you."

"I—well, yeah, pretty much," Sirius admits sheepishly. "He thinks I'm a mess. I think he's right."

Lyall hums, shaking his head again, amused. "I should tell you, I did work out that there was something going on between the two of you, just from how you spoke about him. Your love for my son is not subtle."

"I wasn't trying to make this about me," Sirius murmurs.

"You're fine, Sirius," Lyall replies kindly. "It's comforting, in fact, to know that he's loved. It also—doesn't surprise me in the least, not with my son in mind. He's surely aware that it's something he shouldn't do, but…" Lyall's face softens in a mixture of pain and pride. "Well, Remus has never been good at doing what he should. As concerning as it is, I'm grateful to know that hasn't changed about him."

Sirius clears his throat and leans down to pluck the letter back up carefully. "Right, well, sorry for…um, you know."

"Don't worry about it," Lyall says wryly. "He's Remus. I expect nothing less from him, honestly." Sighing, Lyall glances at the clock, then focuses on Sirius again. "If you want to make it back before your tributes get on stage, which I recommend to avoid any suspicion, then you should leave now. I'll be watching where it's televised from here—a bad hip keeps me home, most days, so this was nice. I'm very grateful to have met you, Sirius, and thank you for loving my son as you do."

"Right, yes, okay," Sirius agrees, pushing to his feet. He tucks away the envelope and surges forward to shake Lyall's hand as soon as he offers it. "Thank you, Mr. Lup—um, Lyall."

"I doubt we'll ever see each other again," Lyall murmurs as he drops Sirius' hand, "but I wouldn't mind being wrong about that. If you're ever in the area, you're welcome here."

Sirius smiles, unable to help the pleased surge of triumph that gives him, just because he's gotten Lyall's approval. "If I am here, I'll be sure to stop by."

"Alright, go on now," Lyall says with a chuckle.

With a deep breath, Sirius nods at him, says goodbye, then turns to go. He feels the weight of the letter in his pocket the whole way out the door.

Chapter End Notes

okay, starting from the top!!!

the first part of this chapter was basically just regulus pining after james like a lovesick little idiot. he's soooo in love, it's adorable. literally just staring at james with stars in his eyes, utterly enamored. this poor man. like, i pity him, and i also Get Him. i would be no different than him about james. i AM no different 💀

HELP the whole bit where they're just Looking At Each Other bc they're looking especially pretty. GOODBYE. literally just get married already.

pandora and dorcas my beloveds <3 dorcas' little talk with regulus... Remember That. particularly the "i don't want him to see me" also that's just so valid of regulus. i, too, fear being perceived.

regulus blushing every time effie and monty speak to him 😭😭😭 no bc they watched him THREATEN TO KILL THEIR SON MULTIPLE TIMES!!! and also flirt with him. and also try to die for him. like??? how do you look them in the eye after all that? i would spontaneously combust.

also james is just so... like, he is absolutely the type to just carry on a conversation with himself and be silly to make other people laugh. i adore him. he means so much to me, you don't even KNOW.

regulus being like: hey you're not giving up on me, right? please don't do that. and then the instant cringe... BABE GET A CLUE THE MAN BRINGS YOU A FLOWER EVERY DAY???? he's got problems.

in his defense, he's in a difficult position, because he's still working through his shit, so like. he knows they're Not Ready, but he also...wants to be, someday, which is progress. he's in that stage where he's like, terrified he's too late or taking too long, like he's so close, but never close enough...

yeah, you know. it's a whole theme with this fic.

james talking about it being hard for him—yeah, we see more on that over the next few chapters. it's one of those things where, like, he has to figure out the healthiest way to handle it and actually Do That, except he's stubborn and easily distracted lmaoooo. you'll see what i mean soon enough.

ONTO REMUS!!!

first, sirius seeing a picture of remus' dad and his first instinct being to do something so compassionate and comforting by giving them at least one thread of communication they never had in the last five years??? sirius black, come here, im kissing your forehead rn.

he's just so, so lovely. i adore him so much. like, he loves remus SO MUCH and it kills me 😭😭😭 the whole interaction between lyall and sirius was so, so funny to me. literally like Meeting The Parent and trying to leave a good impression. sirius was trying SO HARD, and he was so nervous. he's so cute, i love him.

and then the bomb drop. lyall really just outed his son for being a murderer, like??? lyall??? maybe don't just bring that up in casual conversation??? 😭😭😭 in his defense, it's like a Known Thing in his district, so it's not this big huge secret to him, and he knows how big of a deal it was for remus to tell sirius about his mother (we find out more about that later), so like. murder literally was not that big of a leap for him.

however, remus did in fact conveniently forget to mention that he's a murderer. and remus "be gay, do crime" lupin IS indeed a murderer. the last question to be answered is why, and what the fuck happened??? which we do see the answers to very soon, i promise!

lmaoooo sirius being like "i don't care that he's a murderer, so am i, he isn't special" GOODBYE 😭😭😭 he literally just. processed it and immediately went, yeah but you don't have all the facts, i love him 🥺 he's so valid for that, actually.

also sirius dissolving into a nervous mess the moment he slips up and says he and remus have had sex, then just panicking and blurting out that he's in love with him??? sirius, my love, you are Everything to me. he's marvelous. if you think he can't become more of a mess, literally Just Wait 😭😭😭 right, HONARABLE MENTIONS:

-james' flower being the thing that gets regulus out of bed and motivated when all else fails 😭😭😭
-effie being a mentor to bellatrix, narcissa, AND sirius (we learn more about the history of the Victors from the Black family later)
-dorcas being a great stylist and friend
-pandora always doing her best for them <3 put some respect on her name, she is holding this team together
-sirius panicking about how to knock on a door
-regulus seeing the picture of lyall and immediately covering for sirius so he can go
-sirius and regulus being close 😭
-regulus keeping his curtains open so james can see him (remembering after the arena right now)
-sirius making lyall laugh and actually making a good impression on him yeah that about sums it up!

A Bad Day

Chapter Notes

hello, all!

warnings for this chapter:

-references to past deaths
-references to past child deaths
-mentions of ptsd/ptsd-responses (nightmares, paranoia, hallucinations, lashing out)
-james' issues with time (it's not light, it's quite bad, and ill put an in-depth warning in the end notes for those who need it or want it explained)
-depictions of grief
-references to past violence
-references to past panic attack (brief and not described in detail)
-references to past child abuse (not regulus and sirius this time)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Dorcas' breath catches the moment she lays eyes on Marlene, who immediately meets Sirius in a tight hug.

She looks—well, frankly, she looks like the polar opposite of a Hallow in ripped-jean shorts and a loose, black t-shirt with the sides cut off all the way down to the hem, showing her bare sides and the dark sports bra underneath. It reveals the muscles in her arms, in her legs, and her golden hair is piled into a lopsided, messy bun on top of her head. There's dirt under her fingernails and the random, yellowing bruise in various spots on her legs and arms, like she's active, like she's vivacious, like she's doing things a little too rough and doesn't plan to stop.

Back in the Hallow, people would see her like this and scoff. They would call her 'poor', despite the fact that she's not; she can't be, as a Victor. They would call her 'messy', or 'thrown away', or something equally insulting.

Meanwhile, Dorcas nearly chokes when she inhales her own spit, because she'll be damned if that is not the most attractive woman she's ever seen in her fucking life. Holy shit, that's not even fair. Oh, this does not look good for Dorcas, not at all. She hasn't seen Marlene in six months, basically, and she told herself she was going to keep her wits about her and be normal when meeting her again, but one glance at Marlene looking like she just rolled out of bed and did some manual labor lets Dorcas know she's going to fail miserably.

Sirius and Marlene murmur to each other off to the side while Pandora, Regulus, and James meet the mayor, and Dorcas stands back, her heart racing as she waits for Marlene to notice her while debating if she should run and hide on the train before that ever happens. There's a point where Pandora is clearly entertaining the mayor the most, which frees James and Regulus to go to Sirius and Marlene when Sirius raises his hand and waves them over.

"Um. Hello," James says softly, more meek than Dorcas has ever seen him. His shoulders are hunched forward, and he doesn't seem able to look Marlene directly in the eyes.

Not for the first time, Dorcas' mind turns to Vanity and Hodge, and James' heartbreaking involvement in their respective last moments. This is clearly hard for him, just being around Marlene, their mentor, and the guilt practically drips off of him from all over. It's clearly not very easy for Marlene either, because something passes through her eyes when she looks at him, and for a brief moment, her jaw clenches and her fingers twitch at her sides like she's considering doing something violent.

In the end, Marlene exhales and looks at Sirius, who nods gently, and then Marlene steps forward and holds her hand out to James. "Hello. Nice to meet you."

It's very stiff and awkward between them, but James does reach out to shake her hand. It's over quickly, and maybe that's for the best, because Regulus is starting to look twitchy. He gets like that, Dorcas has noticed. Anything he perceives as a threat makes him restless, and do not let it be a threat he feels is directed towards James or Sirius, because then things are in high chances of going from bad to worse. Dorcas has never seen a more hostile, dangerous group of people in her life.

Because Dorcas gets things done, and she can see that this is very hard for Marlene and James, specifically, she sweeps forward and says, "What, no hello for me, Marlene?"

Marlene's head whips towards her, finally realizing she's there, and she stands taller immediately. Her fingers twitch again, but this time, Dorcas is quite sure it's not because she wishes to do anything violent. "Dorcas."

"In the flesh," Dorcas muses, stopping just short of Marlene and wondering if it would be too much if she went in for a hug. Friends hug, don't they? Oh, fuck it.

Despite knowing it's an incredibly bad idea, Dorcas steps forward and holds out her arms in offering, leaning in and fully preparing for it to be awkward or awful, or for Marlene to dodge her entirely. Marlene does not, and it isn't awkward or awful. In fact, Marlene meets her halfway, and it's wonderful.

Dorcas is very close to Marlene's height, only a teensy bit taller, so they sort of just—match, somehow. Or maybe that's just how it feels to Dorcas. Either way, wrapping her arms around Marlene is the most natural thing in the world, so fucking right that the idea of letting go feels wrong. Marlene smells warm, like sunshine and…motor oil, for some reason? It's good, something homely and foreign all at once.

"I didn't expect to see you," Marlene says quietly when they break apart, much to Dorcas' internal dismay. "I wasn't sure if the stylists traveled on the victory tour."

"I had the free time," Dorcas murmurs.

Marlene clears her throat and nods. "Well, that's—I mean, I'm glad. It's good to see you again."

"I wanted to… I actually came to see you off—before you left the Hallow, I mean," Dorcas blurts out, her heart lurching forward in her chest with a low keen when she sees Marlene's eyes light up with surprise. "I was going to say goodbye, but I just—I waited too long and showed up too late, is all."

"Maybe don't wait next time, yeah?" Marlene teases, breaking out into a broad grin that maybe makes Dorcas' knees go all wobbly; whatever, it's completely fine.

"I won't," Dorcas says, and she hopes it's not a lie, because even though they can't be… anything, she can't resist wanting to keep Marlene in her life, even at a distance.

Pandora comes bustling over and gathers everyone up, ushering them along with the mayor of district eleven, a kind woman who leads them to a room with refreshments and snacks, but not a full meal. There's no need, seeing as twelve fed them all, but each district is required to provide drinks and at least some food options for the Victors during the tour.

Dorcas is only just now learning firsthand how cruel that is, especially in districts where poverty is more prominent. Of course, various people at the Phoenix who escaped from districts have talked to her about these things before, but it's one thing to hear about it and another to see it.

The mayor ends up getting on well with Pandora and James, who sticks with her and seems desperate to avoid Marlene at all costs. Regulus, unsurprisingly, hovers around Sirius like his personal shadow. He does that a lot, too, Dorcas has noticed. Just gravitates towards his brother without even seeming to realize it, like an instinctive thing. When he doesn't, Sirius looks for him, never fully settling until he knows where his little brother is and what he's doing.

Sometimes it sort of breaks Dorcas' heart, honestly. It's just that it's blatantly a familial thing, just checking in with the person you're comfortable with in only the way family can be, but it's mixed with something else, too. A constant, unending undercurrent of worry, needing the reassurance that the other is there, that they're close by, that they're safe.

Marlene spends time with Sirius—and Regulus, because he is hovering—while Dorcas sticks with James, Pandora, and the kind mayor. If Mayor Matilda notices that more than a few people are avoiding each other—James and Marlene, James and Regulus, Dorcas and Marlene—then she doesn't mention it or seem to mind. Genuinely, she is a very nice woman.

It's not that Dorcas particularly wants to avoid Marlene, mind you, it's just that doing so is for the best. She's thankful just to get to see her, though, to lay eyes on her once again and know that she is okay. Just that is enough. It has to be.

At some point, Pandora and James get into a very deep, very convoluted conversation with Mayor Matilda about types of soil—a shared interest among them, apparently—and Dorcas slowly inches away and sneaks off, because she genuinely has no idea what they're fucking talking about.

She slips off instead out the side door that Mayor Matilda ever so kindly informed her earlier she could use to take a smoke break, if she wanted. Dorcas does, in fact, want.

She only gets through one half of her cigarette before the door opens and Marlene walks out, which honestly shouldn't be a surprise. Somehow, it is. Somehow, it startles Dorcas that Marlene would join her, would seek her out, would be at ease with her enough to purposefully spend time with her. She doesn't know why that's so shocking, here in Marlene's home district, but compared to the Hallow, it is. This is where Marlene is from, where she grew up, and Dorcas is just a girl from the Hallow. A place that takes the saying all that glitters is not gold to the next level. A growing cesspool of despair and rot that hides within pretty smiles and pretty jewels.

This, here, is real beauty. Marlene is real beauty.

"Long day?" Marlene asks lightly, coming to lean against the rail of the porch beside her.

"It's barely started," Dorcas says with a sigh. "We have to go all the way to district nine today. Eight, seven, five, and four the second day. Three, two, one and then into the Hallow on the third day, where I'll have very little time to get James and Regulus ready for their interview."

"Didn't you volunteer to be along for the ride?" Marlene asks in faint amusement, arching an eyebrow.

Dorcas makes a tch noise and takes another pull on her cigarette, blowing smoke lazily towards the sky with her head tipped back. "Yes, I did, but let me grumble in peace."

"As you like," Marlene murmurs, lips twitching.

"How have you been?" Dorcas asks, watching her curiously, helplessly wanting to know every little thing about her.

Marlene takes a deep breath, then blows it out and rolls her shoulders in a lazy shrug. "Oh, you know, same old thing, just a different day. I've been helping my dad at the factory lately; he works with most of the other men in the district to build engines and other such things, usually for the Hallow. My cousin just recently had a baby, cute little thing, but my mum's been an emotional wreck because I never hold him. I, ah, painted Mrs. Chevolik's house—she's Hodge's mother—and now she brings me peanut brittle every week."

"Is it good?" Dorcas asks, because that's the first thing that falls out of her mouth.

"It's absolutely awful," Marlene announces, and they stare at each other for a beat before breaking out into laughter. "No, I'm not joking, Dorcas. It's genuinely so bad. I hate it anyway, because it gets in my teeth, and I despise anything tasting even faintly of caramel. But I eat it with a smile every time. It makes her so happy, and it was Hodge's favorite, so I—I think she appreciates having a reason to make it."

Dorcas isn't laughing anymore, and neither is Marlene. That sits between them, heavy, and then Dorcas looks away as she swallows down the lump in her throat. "Why don't you ever hold the baby?"

"Maximus is a calm baby, don't get me wrong, but I just… I don't know, he's so small, and I'm not—" Marlene halts, then clears her throat. "Well, like I told you, I don't always know how to be gentle."

"You do," Dorcas murmurs. "You're capable of being gentle, Marlene. You eat peanut brittle that you hate, just to make a mother happy, and if that's not gentle, I don't know what is."

"Sometimes," Marlene whispers, "being gentle is a chore."

"Yeah," Dorcas replies, remembering the way Slughorn's face felt under her fingers, when she dug her nails in. "Yeah, it can be." She sighs. "And the factory? Do you enjoy it?"

"It's hot, and it's grueling, but it's…satisfying," Marlene muses, and Dorcas hums to encourage Marlene to continue, taking another puff from her cigarette as she listens. "Most of it is mindless work, once you know the whole process and figure out how to work the machines. It's—I can waste entire days in there, not even thinking the entire time. Can be a bit dangerous sometimes, though. I actually nearly cut off my finger last month. Look, see?"

"Fuck's sake, Marlene," Dorcas says in exasperation as Marlene shoves her hand in Dorcas' face and shows off the scar on the outside of her thumb.

Marlene grins at her, all teeth. "Stitched it myself, then went right back to work."

"Idiot," Dorcas mutters fondly, shaking her head as she blows out some more smoke, pointing it away from Marlene.

"I don't like looking at the scar, though," Marlene admits, peering down at her thumb with a frown. "It healed all wonky, so it looks weird to me, and it also makes me feel stupid when I look at it, because technically, it was my fault, but you didn't hear me say that. If my dad asks, I was not nodding off while running the compactor, deal?"

"You fell asleep—"

"Listen—"

Dorcas wheezes out an incredulous laugh and starts coughing, the smoke building in her lungs when she doesn't exhale it fast enough. She coughs her way through it, catches her breath, then says, "I don't even want to hear it. Be more careful while handling heavy machinery, Marlene."

"You sound like my mother." Marlene's face scrunches a beat later. "Oh, I hate that I just said that."

"No, me too," Dorcas assures her, then grins when Marlene wrinkles her nose in further distaste. "But at least your mother sounds like a sensible woman."

"She's not. She's easily frazzled and has no idea what's going on at any given moment," Marlene corrects, her eyes softening with unbridled love. "She just—feels a lot, if that makes sense. Not a thought behind her eyes, really, but in the best way. She's…all heart. Mental as she is, I love her dearly."

Sounds like Sybill, Dorcas thinks, biting back the words before they fall recklessly from her mouth. "She sounds lovely."

"Mhm." Marlene pokes at her thumb again, sighing. "She sends me off with a band-aid every day like I'm a fucking toddler, because she knows the scar agitates me. I told her I lose it within an hour, and she still does it anyway. I hate that she wastes them like that, though. I'm going to have to think of something, or else she'll just use them all."

"Hm." Dorcas regards her for a long moment, then finishes off her cigarette. As she blows the last exhale of smoke, she tugs the ring off her left thumb—a simple silver one with black engravings all the way around—and then she steps forward to wriggle it on Marlene's thumb, pushing it down where it fits perfectly over her scar, save for one tiny portion that peeks out just a bit above the ring. "What about that? Does that suffice?"

"Oh, Dorcas, I can't take that. It's yours. It's—"

"Shut up. It covers it, doesn't it? Does it work for you?"

Marlene stares down at it for a bit, then glances up and meets Dorcas' eyes. Softly, she says, "You know, it really does."

"Well, there you go," Dorcas murmurs, feeling her heart twist around vibrantly in her chest just thinking about the fact that Marlene will have it, will keep it, will wear it and have a bit of Dorcas with her always. Maybe she'll think of Dorcas every time she rubs her finger over it.

"You didn't have to do that," Marlene whispers.

Dorcas swallows. "What are friends for, right?"

Marlene sways closer, and only now does Dorcas realize how close they actually are, and it's too late to do anything about it, because Marlene is kissing her, just like that. Friends. Yeah, they've got this friend thing down really well, don't they?

Dorcas kisses her back, and it's not because she's used to kissing Marlene back, but because she can't stop herself from doing it. She shouldn't, she knows better, and she still can't help it. Marlene's mouth is a line of heat against hers, pressing in and peeling her lips apart, not gentle or teasing at all. It's not as if Dorcas is sinking into it, getting lost, but rather like she's resurfacing, like she's coming alive.

Like this, none of her responsibilities matter. She doesn't know about the war, or care about the danger, or think about the risks. It's just Marlene's mouth against hers, Marlene's tongue swiping into the seam of her mouth desperately, eagerly, like she wants it so very much.

Oh, but so does Dorcas.

When Marlene's hand cradles her cheek, Dorcas can feel the cool line of the ring on her thumb against the heat of her skin.

"And you?" Marlene breathes out, pulling back to gaze at her with bright eyes and a swollen mouth. "How have you been?"

It all comes crashing back down on Dorcas, then. Seeping in like a pipe just burst. A room filling with water, but there's no windows and no exit. I've been awful, full of grief for those that are gone that I'm partially to blame for. I've been preparing for war. I've been lost, lost, lost. I've been thinking of you.

"Oh, you know, same old thing, just a different day," Dorcas croaks, licking her lips before carefully pulling away from Marlene and shakily fumbling for another cigarette.

Marlene waits for Dorcas to continue, to give her more, but Dorcas doesn't.

Dorcas can't.

Marlene looks down and twists the ring around her thumb, and they don't say anything else. Despite everything, the silence is comfortable.

It usually is, between friends.

~•~

Things go awry the moment James is on the stage and lays eyes on Vanity's family.

The thing is, this was difficult to do in district twelve, and James didn't even fucking speak to those tributes, not once. Just seeing their families on the two platforms towards the back of the crowd, standing front and center, had hurt him. It's cruelty at its finest, making those people who have lost their loved ones stand up and face the people that lived.

It's particularly devastating when James did know the fallen tributes. He knew Vanity. He spoke to her, laughed with her, did everything he could to protect her; he lived and she didn't.

And Hodge… Well, not only did James live, but he also killed him. He is the reason that Hodge is dead, and it doesn't matter if it was an accident, doesn't matter if he likely wouldn't have made it to the end anyway. None of that matters, surely not to the people who wanted Hodge to come home to them.

Vanity's mother, father, and three siblings—Divan, Curio, and Hoosier—stand in tribute to her. Her siblings are all younger, two of them are twins, and Curio resembles Vanity the most. James looks at all of them, and he feels like he's going to crumble into dust, like he's caving in from the inside out.

The only person standing in tribute for Hodge is who James presumes is his mother. A frightfully young woman—can't be more than ten years older than James—which means she had Hodge quite young, and it also means she has a lot of life left to live without her son. There is no father or other siblings. She is crying before a word is spoken.

James does, in fact, have the speech he's meant to give memorized, as does Regulus. The issue is, James is stuck. Behind the families are large screens displaying the tribute profile, so there Vanity is, there Hodge is, looking right at him with clear, innocent eyes. He has forgotten what they actually looked like, because they are dead and vengeful when he sees them in his nightmares. But, like this, nothing but a memory on a banner, they are young and bright. Still dead anyway.

Regulus is squeezing James' hand almost to a violent point, and James knows—he knows, okay? He knows that he needs to speak. He knows that he needs to start the speech. Thank you District Eleven for the warm welcome; we are delighted to be here. The tributes who hailed from here upheld all that you stand for with integrity and respect. You have every right to be proud of—

But that's the thing, isn't it? Vanity and Hodge weren't representatives for their districts, not really. Sure, that's what the Hallow likes to perpetuate to further dehumanize them, but that's not it. Vanity and Hodge were children that had their futures stolen from them—and James, one of the thieves. Their families are not proud; what is there to be proud of? What happened was not noble. It was a tragedy.

"I…" James' voice sticks in his throat, and that one sound echoes out across the dead silent crowd. Regulus is strangling his hand, at this point. James can feel pressure building in his chest, in his head, and Hodge's mother is weeping, silently. Curio has Vanity's eyes. "I'm—I—"

"James," Regulus whispers, speaking low, intimate, trying to keep him on track.

James releases a strangled noise and, for the very first time in his life, he pulls away from Regulus. He quite literally just snatches his hand from Regulus' grip and shuffles away from him, getting closer to the microphone as words start spilling out of him in a rush that he can't figure out how to stop.

"I'm sorry," James chokes out, looking right at Hodge's mother, forcing himself to witness her grief, knowing he is the cause of it. "I'm—I am so sorry. I—I know that can't make up for the loss of your children, because nothing will ever make up for it. They were too young, and it was not fair. Hodge—he was just scared. He was scared, and trying to survive, and it's not fair that he didn't. He should have never been there; he should have never been forced into that arena. I didn't mean to push him; I—I never wanted to hurt him. I'm sorry. He didn't deserve that, not any of it. I carry my regret with me every day, but I know it pales in comparison to your grief. I would give anything for him to be fifteen."

Hodge's mother reaches up to cover her mouth, her eyes squeezing shut as tears spill steadily down her cheeks. She never makes a sound. Behind her, on the screen, Hodge smiles.

"And Vanity—she—" James' eyes burn as he looks to her family, unable to speak for a moment from the surge of emotion that suffocates him. Curio has Vanity's eyes, and they're full of tears. "She wasn't just a fellow tribute, not to me. I tried to protect her, and I failed, and I'm sorry. She was incredibly intelligent, and so bright, and I—I miss her. Every time I see a bug, I miss her. Every day, I miss her. She deserved better, and I'm sorry she didn't get it. I'm sorry I couldn't save her. She should have gotten to live, to grow up, and what happened to her was wrong. She was—she was so young and she—she—"

James can't finish, can't figure out where it ends, because all of it is so unfair and so fucked up, and he's crying too hard to locate the words that deserve to be spoken for Vanity and Hodge. Words that won't even bring them back. Words that wouldn't have kept them going in the first place.

Maybe it doesn't matter, because Regulus is suddenly right there, tugging James away from the microphone and basically shoving his head down in the crook of his neck. James slumps against him and hides there, weeping, barely hearing the calm, steady words that fall out of Regulus' mouth.

Something about James' guilt. His grief. A flimsy cover for all that James has said already, for all the ways in which James has just spoken out of turn, gone off script, brought them closer to danger in his need to do what's right.

James is crying, and he doesn't know when he is. It feels like Vanity and Hodge have just died, and the world is crumbling down around him again. Time warps around him, and he is not wearing his glasses, and Regulus is whispering in his ear as he ushers him off the stage, out of sight.

In the distance, faint and background, the previously silent crowd are chanting, over and over, "Hallow is hollow."

~•~

James is not doing well. He's rattling against Regulus and crying so hard that he's not breathing properly. He's not keeping it together, and Regulus doesn't know how to help. Regulus' skin is crawling because James is pressed up against him, and he hates feeling this way. For James, he tolerates it.

"Sirius. Sirius," Regulus hisses frantically, feeling helpless and inadequate, mindlessly rubbing James' back as he stares over at his brother desperately.

Unfortunately, Sirius is discussing damage control with Mayor Matilda, offering advice as her district continues to get more and more restless and rowdy by the second. According to Mayor Matilda, there has never been issues between those in the district and the Aurors, but the growing dissent is a cause for concern. Sirius and Pandora are talking with Mayor Matilda to basically coach her on how to best handle this situation, no doubt trying to cover up and smooth over how severely James just fucked up.

The thing is, Regulus doesn't even blame James. He can't blame James. Vanity was too young, and so was Hodge, and everything they went through wasn't fair. They should have never been there; they should have never died.

Regulus isn't angry. He is scared, though. There is a chance that James just brought trouble down on their heads, even though Regulus did his absolute best to fix it. He tried. He really tried, despite the fact that it made him hate himself more. He should have stood by James, regardless of fear, regardless of consequences. James deserves someone who would stand by him through anything, no matter what.

James makes a sort of weak, helpless noise against Regulus, a fucking wreck from head-to-toe, and Regulus responds to his distress like he's preparing for battle. He wants to fight it, whatever it is that's upsetting James, but he can't. This isn't something he can kill, and it leaves him feeling lost and useless and terribly out of his depth.

"Sirius!" Regulus calls, louder and more frantic this time.

That thankfully snatches Sirius' attention immediately. He abandons Mayor Matilda with Pandora in less than a second, which doesn't seem to matter anyway, because seconds later, Mayor Matilda is quickly ushering off to the stage to address her district and calm them again.

"Okay, okay, hey," Sirius says, his voice soft as he stops next to them and carefully reaches out to put his hand on James' shoulder, ducking his head closer to him. "James, listen to me. I need you to listen to me, alright? You're in district eleven. It's six months after the hunger games. You're not in the arena. You're on the victory tour."

This does not seem to matter to James. He doesn't calm down.

"We're going back to the train," Sirius declares, lifting his head and meeting Regulus' gaze. "Now. We need to go now. We need to get him away. Keep a firm hold on him."

"Keep a—what? Sirius, what?" Regulus blurts out.

"Just trust me," Sirius grits out. "Come on."

And so, they go. Sirius calls something to Pandora, who is apparently staying behind for a bit to speak to Mayor Matilda again. On the way out, they pass Dorcas and Marlene, who watch them go by with wide eyes. Marlene is looking right at James, all traces of lingering anger nonexistent. There's respect there, in her gaze, as well as shock. There's something in Dorcas' eyes that Regulus can't put a name to, something strangely calculating, but he doesn't have the time or the focus to figure out what it means.

About halfway to the train, Regulus understands what Sirius means about keeping a firm grip on James. With no warning whatsoever, James just—loses it. He goes from sobbing to lashing out like his life depends on it, fighting against them and trying to get away.

Sirius curses as starts dragging James along faster, making Regulus rush to keep up. They don't let go until they're on the train, and as soon as they have, Sirius is pushing Regulus back so they give James a wide berth.

He's like a bull unleashed in a figurine shop. Dazed and confused and crashing into things. Everything he bumps into, he shoves away from him, breaking things and knocking them over. Sirius continues to steadily push Regulus back every time James swings out in their vicinity, and Regulus peers around his shoulder, his heart lodged in his throat.

It's bad. Very fucking bad. Regulus can tell that James is out of touch with reality, with time, right now. He doesn't think James knows where he is, or who is with him. Multiple times, he says Regulus' name. He goes on a tangent about looking for his hatchet, chanting where is it, where is it, where is it? He starts looking for it, and at one point, he legitimately just tips the table in the middle of the train car over, sending dishes clattering and shattering on the floor.

Regulus feels—small. He isn't sure why, exactly. Maybe it's because Sirius is standing in front of him, one arm reaching back to keep Regulus there, shielded, like there's a threat in the room with them. There is. It's just James, and yet, there is.

It ends when James' leg gives out. There's no warning for that, either. James' leg just abruptly buckles, sending him right to the floor, thankfully not in a pile of glass. As soon as James is down, he drags himself back against the wall of the train car and curls into himself, hunched down and eerily quiet.

Sirius peels away from Regulus to go to James, kneeling just out of range, murmuring low to him. Again, he tells James where he is, when he is, and what he is doing. He assures James that he is not in the arena. He does it again and again, until James finally responds.

Slowly, stiltedly, Sirius coaxes James out of the corner and to his feet, keeping him steady as he limps. James takes one look at Regulus and immediately starts crying again.

Regulus can only stand there, feeling numb as Sirius leads James out of the compartment, towards where they're sleeping in their own separate train cars, or where they will when they're traveling through the next two nights.

Hands shaking, Regulus moves over to pick up the table. His mind is blank and his eyes are burning. Time passes. He's not sure how much, but he moves around to clean up what bit of the mess that he can. It's like a tornado came through, but it was just James.

Regulus feels like he's going to be sick. He remembers in the arena, saying that he didn't want James to be changed. Looking back now, he realizes how naive that desire was. How unfair it was, to a degree, even though he couldn't help it. He was so in love, even then. I loved you there, he thinks. I love you here, he thinks as he picks up glass.

Sirius eventually comes back, alone. He sees Regulus cleaning up, takes a deep breath, then moves over to help. They're silent for a long time, but it's Sirius who speaks first.

"I knew this was going to be hard for him," Sirius whispers, squeezing his eyes shut. "This district, specifically. Hard for you, too, no doubt, but I—I didn't know how to fix it. I don't think this is something I could have ever fixed."

"You helped him," Regulus murmurs, swallowing thickly. His chest feels too small to contain all he is inside it. "You knew exactly what to do. That's more than I did."

"Don't do that, Reggie," Sirius says softly, looking as exhausted as Regulus feels.

Regulus can feel his eyes itching, his breath shaking in the walls of his throat. "I didn't even know he—I mean, I'm assuming that this is fairly common, since you were so familiar with it."

"It's not always this bad," Sirius tells him quietly. "He just… Well, it's worse when he's having a bad day. Most of the time, when he can't figure out when he is, he's sort of calm. The first time was when he discovered the hatchet outside. He thought he was back in the arena, got confused and scared, nearly took my fucking head off. But it's—it gets better, with time. Less and less the further away from the arena you get. These things pass, eventually, for the most part. It will for you, too."

"But it never goes away," Regulus whispers. "Not completely."

Sirius sighs. "No, it doesn't."

"I wasn't there for him. I wasn't there for you, and I haven't been there for him," Regulus croaks, feeling his stomach lurch with that reality. Because it's true, and this time, he chose it.

"Stop it," Sirius orders firmly, holding his gaze. "I didn't let you be there for me, mostly because I didn't know how, and I was scared. That's—it's done, alright? You're here for me now, and that means something. And—and even if you weren't here for me, if you couldn't be, that would be fine. We're okay. We're always going to be okay, me and you, no matter what."

"I should have been there for you," Regulus insists.

"Yes, well, I shouldn't have left you behind," Sirius replies, and Regulus deflates a little, feeling like an exposed nerve, tender and raw. "We both have things we regret, and we both wish we could have done things differently than we did, but we're here now anyway. That's enough, isn't it? For me, it is."

"Yes, it's enough," Regulus says softly, staring down at his hands, at the broken teacup lying in his palms. "But James… I haven't—he deserves more. He deserves better."

"You know," Sirius croaks, "Remus taught me something very important about what it is to give anyone anything. He can't bring me flowers every day. He can't sleep with me at night and hold me through the nightmares. He can't be with me where anyone can see. He has no possessions, nothing he owns, and even his time isn't his to freely give. He can't give me everything, and yet, he has given me something that no one else ever has. All that anyone else could offer is meaningless, because they're not him, and that—simply that Remus is the one I love—outshines anything else. Has it ever crossed your mind to think that maybe, just maybe, you give James what no one else can just by being you?"

"It's not about what I can give him. It's about how I will do it," Regulus says. "I don't know how. I'm not—I can barely stand to be touched, and I can't even fucking shower, and I ask for too much while always giving so little, and I'm scared—I'm so—Sirius, I'm so scared—"

"Okay, Reggie, it's okay," Sirius cuts in quickly, shuffling over to gently pluck the glass out of his hands, which is for the best because Regulus was unconsciously curling his fingers around the shards, dangerously close to drawing blood, and then all of this would have gotten so much worse. "Listen to me, you're not required to do anything with James, not ever. Just—I mean, all of this acting for the Hallows is one thing, but the truth behind it is something else. Stop putting so much pressure on yourself, okay? James isn't. He doesn't expect anything from you. If you're ready someday, then brilliant. If you're not, if you never are, then that's—that's a tragedy, yes, but it's not your fault, or his."

"I want to love him right," Regulus chokes out, "and I don't know if I'll ever be able to."

He thinks he could have, once, but that was a long time ago.

~•~

They find out by the time they get to district ten that the live feed for the tour was cut right at the end of Regulus' speech smoothing over James' mistake, so no one watching saw the entire district come very close to a riot before their mayor stepped on stage and calmed them all down.

District ten was easier, admittedly, because again, James and Regulus never interacted with the tributes. They stood on stage, held hands, and gave their speeches like what happened before in district eleven never actually did.

It felt hollow, in the aftermath, James thought. All those people, all those gazes latched right onto him and Regulus, somehow they felt accusing, even demanding. James feels a deep sense of moral obligation to do more, to say more, to address the fact that all of these people didn't deserve to die, to call attention to the fact that the Hallow is in the wrong.

But he can't.

In retrospect, James realizes how big of a mistake it was to lose it like that in district eleven. It hits him later, but his parents are still in danger if he fucks this up. Sirius and Regulus, too. Their parents. Anyone they all care about.

By the time they reach district nine, James feels like an empty shell, scraped out with painful grooves on the inside of his chest cavity. It's not helping that he and Regulus have to present themselves as a couple on camera, holding hands and standing close, sharing looks and warm smiles. It's all fake. It's all meaningless, as hollow as everything else.

When the cameras aren't on, Regulus will barely have anything to do with him. Won't talk to him. Won't look at him. After he lost it on the train, James can't blame him, even if it hurts.

It's not something James is proud of, when it gets that bad. It scares him, honestly, and leaves him a nervous wreck after the fact. He's just—he doesn't mean for it to happen, and he can't stop it. The very first time, he'd swung a hatchet at Sirius and pretty much instantly had a panic attack as soon as he realized what he'd done. For three days, he wouldn't let Sirius near him, and he shied away from his own parents, but Sirius had a really bad nightmare one night that had James calming him down, reassuring him that the hallucinations weren't real, holding him through his lashing out.

That sort of reminded James that it's not his fault, because it's not Sirius' fault. It's an exchange, the way they take care of each other, the way they look out for one another. James has taken hits from Sirius that brought tears to his eyes from how much it hurt, and he never let that stop him from going back to take care of him when he needed it. So, James lets Sirius take care of him, too, because he does need it. Sometimes, he needs it more than he knows how to handle.

But Regulus… Well, he's never seen that, something James has been secretly grateful for. James knows it's a bit hypocritical of him to be ashamed, considering he doesn't fault Sirius or find what he goes through shameful at all, but it's a lot harder when it's you over anyone else. James is so kind, but at times, he doesn't know how to grant himself that same kindness.

So, yes, on his worst days, James is ashamed. Sometimes, he's even ashamed of his leg, of his nightmares, of this ever-present loneliness that seems to exist in his very bones, even when he's surrounded by the people he loves. He thinks, sadly, that the world is always going to feel a little more lonely without Vanity in it. Without Peter. Irene. Mathias. Hodge. Evan.

But, with Sirius' help, he works on being kinder to himself. He reminds himself that his struggles aren't something to be ashamed of. It's hard, yes, but he's doing his best, and that's something to be proud of. Some days, it's easy to believe that, to really feel it. Other days, it's nearly impossible to. The bad days are when it's hardest, and it's been a bad day. He's worried it's a bad day for all of them, and he's scared it's going to get worse for Regulus, especially.

District nine is going to be another tough one, James is sure. He doesn't need to talk to Regulus to see that it's weighing on him. He's already more tense, more withdrawn, the moment they arrive. This was Evan's district.

Emmeline and Sirius greet each other warmly, with a hug, and then she makes a point to go directly to Regulus and request rather bluntly to shake his hand. Regulus, already so on edge, doesn't respond or take her hand. Emmeline doesn't seem offended by it.

It's towards the evening when they arrive, so they do the speeches first. Regulus clings to James' hand throughout the entire thing. Juniper has a family on her stage, parents and siblings. Evan has no one. His stage is empty.

When it's Regulus' turn to speak, he just—doesn't. He doesn't step closer to the microphone. He doesn't even open his mouth. His gaze is latched onto the stage where no one stands; he looks a million miles away, like he's not even here, like maybe he's over there on that stage for Evan, standing in tribute to him, suffering the grief of his loss. The district is quiet, so quiet, and James fumbles through Regulus' portion of the speech for him. When they leave the stage, James has to tug Regulus along, because he resists, still looking back at Evan's empty platform, and James has to give a forceful pull to make Regulus trail after him.

They get dinner out of the way with Emmeline and the mayor, which is where they find out that Evan genuinely had no one. He was an only child, and his parents passed away in the same year, when he was only nineteen. Not that he was ever close to his parents, because apparently it's just a known fact that they were abusive as he grew up. He didn't give them funerals, and he left his childhood home empty and abandoned when he got the chance. He never had friends. Just one. Just Regulus.

After the meal, they get to linger a little bit in the district before they disembark to travel through the night to district eight. They'll sleep overnight in the train, then start on the rest of the tour tomorrow. Emmeline approaches Regulus to talk to him in front of everyone, completely shameless.

"I want to take you somewhere," Emmeline informs Regulus, holding his gaze.

"Em," Sirius says warningly, "he's not really—"

"I think Evan would have liked you to see it," Emmeline cuts in, staring right at Regulus. "Of course, you don't have to, I can't make you, but if you're up to it—"

"Yes," Regulus murmurs, "I'll go."

"Reggie," Sirius starts.

"I'll be fine. I'll meet everyone back on the train," Regulus tells him, shaking his head, and then he leaves with Emmeline without pausing to look back.

Sirius is clearly worried, but he's right there with Pandora to charm the mayor, while James stands off to the side with Dorcas. They all end up going back to the train, Pandora going to the conductor to let them know to wait and Dorcas slipping away into her own train car. James sits with Sirius in heavy silence, waiting for Regulus to come back.

"He'll be fine," James mumbles, eventually, because Sirius is growing more concerned by the minute.

"Right, but—but Evan is just…a really sore subject for him," Sirius says quietly. "Emmeline is lovely, don't get me wrong, but she can be a bit blunt at times, so I just worry…"

"Regulus likes blunt people," James points out. "He doesn't like…fake things."

Sirius glances at him, and his face softens. "Hey. I haven't really asked. How are you doing with…all of this? With Regulus, I mean."

"You want to talk about that?" James asks wearily.

"If you need to," Sirius says simply, "or just want to."

James swallows, looking down at his hands as he fiddles restlessly with his fingers. "Do you want to know the worst part about it, Sirius? The absolute worst part of all of this? It's horrible, but there's a part of me that—that is just so happy to hold his hand, to have him close, even knowing it's just a performance. Of course I hate it, that it's not a choice, but I can't help it. I just—I love him, you know. I really do. It's wrong, being even a little bit grateful, I know that, but I'm—"

"Human," Sirius murmurs, and he gives James a sad smile when he looks up, startled. "You're human, James. Of course you're going to be happy about being with someone you love, in any capacity—that's just being human, alright? But, the thing is, past all the feelings, you know the reality of it. You're not happy about the circumstances, and you're respectful. That's important, especially to him."

"It hurts, too," James rasps. "I'm not—Sirius, I don't blame him, but sometimes I—I get so angry, because it's—none of this is fair, and I just want to—I want it to be different, and I want to fix it, and I want to try because that's all I know how to do, but I'm so tired, most days, and there's a part of me that wishes he would try so I could take a break, and I know that's not right, not fair to him, I know that—"

"James," Sirius interrupts gently, reaching across the table to cover his hand and essentially shut him up. Sighing, Sirius shakes his head. "Look, it's alright to feel like that, yeah? Just, I want you to know that he—he does try, in his own way. It's very different from how you do, not as easy to notice, but he does. And I need you to hear me on this, okay?"

"Okay," James croaks.

Sirius nods and holds his gaze. "Just like he is under no obligation to do anything, neither are you. You're not required to keep holding on, if it's best for you to let go. He wouldn't want you to, and he wouldn't blame you for it. Or if you just need the break, that's okay, too. If you need to take a step back, if you need distance, all of that is okay."

"It's not fair," James whispers, his eyes burning. "It's just letting them win, and I—I don't want to do that. I don't want to give in, Sirius. Maybe—maybe it is defiance, maybe that's what a part of it always was, because I think I'd burn the Hallow down if that would give us the chance we should have gotten to have. I still want that chance, even now. I still love him. I can't just—stop. I don't know how."

"Oh, James," Sirius sighs out, looking rather fond, his lips curling up in the corners. "That's not at all what I meant, but it's nice to hear anyway. Really reassuring, as his older brother and whatnot. A bit sappy, honestly, but—"

"Fuck you," James says with a weak chuckle.

"I didn't mean you had to…give in, as you put it," Sirius tells him. "I just meant that you can take your time, and you can stop putting pressure on yourself, just like him. You don't expect anything from him, but you expect everything from yourself. You've got to stop that. It's only hurting you."

"Hypocrite much?" James asks wryly.

"Don't you start. We're not talking about me. And don't deflect—Remus taught me to see the signs of that, you know."

"Drat. Remus' infinite wisdom comes back to bite me again. When you see him, tell him I have suffered for it."

"I'll be sure to," Sirius says, lips twitching at the corners as his eyes fill with that immediate fondness he always gets whenever Remus comes up in conversation—which is often, because Sirius sometimes never shuts up about him. Frankly, James finds it adorable. "But I meant it, what I said."

Sighing, James nods. "I know. I just… I don't know. I'm scared it's always going to be this way between me and him, because I don't think we'll ever have our chance for as long as we're still entertainment for the Hallow, and you said—you said it could be a long time. And I don't know the future. It's shit. All this jumping around in time I do, and I never get to jump ahead."

"Well, you know, we get there when we get there," Sirius mutters with a sigh, patting the back of James' hand in a clear sign of solidarity. James' heart pangs when he remembers that Sirius is enduring an entire year without even getting to see Remus. Time is cruel to him, too.

Time is cruel to them all.

~•~

Regulus likes Emmeline. She's very blunt. She doesn't talk to him like he makes her uneasy, and she doesn't treat him like he's going to break every time she mentions Evan, even if maybe, just a little, he's worried he will.

In any case, he doesn't. He actually likes hearing about Evan from her. Emmeline is honest, admitting that they were never friends and, in fact, once got into a terrible argument in school when they were both fourteen—turns out she and Evan were the same age, the same age as Regulus—that ended with her calling Evan a prick and shoving all his textbooks off his desk, to which he retaliated by tripping her when she walked by.

They never spoke again after that, not until Emmeline became his mentor, and Regulus is learning that Emmeline has no use for holding back the things she wants to say. She admits that she went right to Evan and told him, before he could even ask, that their past argument when they were children would have no impact on her duties as a mentor. Evan apparently liked that, and pretty much immediately respected her after that.

They never became friends, not really, Emmeline says, but she doesn't deny that she cared for him as a mentor, just the same that she did for Juniper. She isn't scared to say that it had hurt when they died, and Regulus is grateful to hear it, to know that someone out there other than him hurts for Evan, too.

"Evan got a job tending to the cattle," Emmeline tells him as she walks down a long, winding dirt road with thick red clay with a smattering of dust that stirs in the heated breeze. It makes Regulus want to cough, but he refrains, walking beside her with his hands stuffed in his pockets. "It's good, honest work, I suppose, if you're into that sort of thing. I don't really think Evan was, but he was allowed to live in the top part of the barn on the farm."

"The barn," Regulus echoes incredulously.

Emmeline shrugs. "It was his choice, rather than going back home. In any case, he really spruced the place up. It was tidier than my house, and I have cleaners that come by twice a month. All of his things have been discarded or donated now, but the real reason I'm bringing you here isn't because of anything he actually owned. See, there was something everyone knew about Evan Rosier, and it was that he loved to climb. That's the real reason he got this job."

"I'm not following," Regulus admits.

"When we were all kids, really little, we'd come play out in the fields here. It never bothered the moo-moos—"

"Sorry, the what?"

"The moo-moos. Cows." Emmeline shoots him an odd look, like he's the strange one. "What the fuck do you call them?"

"Cows?" Regulus says slowly, bewildered.

"How dull," Emmeline murmurs. "Well, in district nine, we call them moo-moos, and Evan did, too. Anyway, when we were kids, we'd come running out here after school, and the moo-moos didn't mind, so the owners of the farm didn't care much either. They had kids—lost all three to the games over the years, a pretty hard loss, but that's besides the point. The point is, we all came out here, but Evan? He didn't come out here to play. He came out here to climb."

"Well, no wonder he didn't have friends," Regulus says wryly, and Emmeline snorts, her lips twitching. He can almost see Evan's grin in his head.

It becomes apparent what Emmeline is talking about when they finally break past the fields, because the property is lined with trees all the way around. Regulus isn't surprised at all that Emmeline is leading him to the tallest one.

"This was his favorite tree," Emmeline announces when they come to a stop in front of it. "Everyone knew it. We all thought he was fucking mental to love it so much, and he climbed it practically every day. I came out here once, about a year ago now, not too long before his name was called, and that's where he was. Just perched in the tree, throwing acorns and swinging his legs, looking pleased as pie to be right where he was."

Regulus stares at the tree. It's alarmingly tall, and the first branch isn't low enough to be in range to just swing up on it, meaning Evan—the fucking lunatic—hauled himself up using the cavities of the trees, or the random mounds in the bark that serve as footholds. When Regulus tips his head back, he half-expects to find Evan sitting in a branch above them, grinning down at them from up high.

He's not there. He's never there.

Regulus can picture it, though, in startling clarity. In fairness, he's been seeing Evan in trees since he met him, and now he sees it often in his dreams. They talk a lot, him and Evan. Or Evan's ghost. Regulus tells him secrets that he's never told another soul. Evan is his best friend, so why shouldn't he?

It's strange, the way grief takes shape in people, different for everyone. For Regulus, after so many conversations with Evan in his dreams, the sting of losing him has almost become gentle. It hits him worse on some days, compared to others. Most of the time, it doesn't feel so heavy, his grief. Really, he just misses Evan, and the way he copes with that are his dreams, he thinks. They always turn into nightmares by the end, but before that, he cherishes those moments where Evan is just chatting with him in ridiculous, convoluted metaphors as advice for all the problems in his life that Regulus does admittedly ignore most of the time.

Evan is always talking about the view. About climbing to that view, getting to it, and that view is always, inevitably, Sirius and James every fucking time. Regulus never moves from the branch, and it always breaks. But the view? Evan lives and dies by the promise that the view is worth it.

What was Evan's view? This was his favorite tree, ergo this was his favorite view.

Regulus heaves a sigh. "I have to climb it."

"The tree?" Emmeline asks, startled.

"Unfortunately," Regulus mutters, grimacing. He glances over at her, but she just shrugs and sweeps her hand out in the universal gesture of be my guest.

"Aren't you afraid of heights?" Emmeline muses as he approaches the tree very cautiously.

"No," Regulus snaps defensively, then pauses and kicks lightly at the base of the tree. In a mumble, he confesses, "Yes."

Emmeline coughs. "You'll be able to get back down, right? Without falling, I mean. Because I don't fancy Sirius having a go at me for letting his baby brother climb a tree and get stuck, or worse, fall and break his neck."

"Thank you, Emmeline, for making me feel better about this decision," Regulus says flatly.

"I try," Emmeline replies, amused. "No, but genuinely, should I go get a ladder, or something?"

"That feels like cheating."

"Well, who's going to know?"

Evan is going to give me so much shit for this the next time I see him in my dreams, Regulus thinks precisely five seconds before he looks over at Emmeline and mumbles, "A ladder, you said?"

Emmeline grins.

Fifteen minutes later, Regulus is cheating on tree-climbing, which rather ridiculously makes him feel mildly guilty, but he's very sure that's the only way he's getting up in this tree. Emmeline holds the ladder for him, keeping it steady, and he's still uneasy the higher he goes.

It doesn't go as high as he needs it to. He can see the tallest branch above him, and he knows for a fact that's where Evan would have gone every time, because it's the last place Regulus wants to be. He's wisely not looking down to see how far down Emmeline is right now, and he spends probably five minutes at the top of the ladder, just clinging to it.

"Regulus?" Emmeline calls up.

"Just—just give me a minute!" Regulus calls back down, taking a steadying breath as he reaches out and places his hand on the branch. Under his breath, he mutters, "Evan, you fucker, if this kills me, I'm—well, maybe that's karma. Right. Okay."

So, Regulus coaxes himself off the ladder, bitching at Evan the entire time, even though he's not there. Something about it soothes him. He can hear Evan's voice in his head like an echo, laughing at him, insulting him and encouraging him the entire way. Eventually, Regulus is perched on the branch, feeling so stiff that he's pretty sure he'd drop like a stone to the ground if he so much as tipped to one side too much.

Next, Regulus is supposed to stand up and climb higher, climb to that top branch, climb to the view that Evan climbed for every day. Evan deserves that. Regulus can do that for him, after all that Evan did for him, and maybe—just once—he can feel Evan's presence somewhere other than his dreams.

All he has to do is climb.

Regulus doesn't move.

As much as he tries, as hard as he wills himself to do it, Regulus can't get his body to unlock. He begs himself, he berates himself, he starts and stops over and over. He starts shaking, and his frustration manages to climb higher within him, and then he's suddenly crying very, very hard.

Regulus turns his head away and covers his mouth, squeezing his eyes shut and crying silently. The branch is sturdy under him, and it does not break. He goes no higher. When he chokes out an apology, Evan isn't there to accept it.

A bit later, Regulus takes the ladder back down, his eyes gritty and his chest feeling more hollow than ever. If Emmeline heard his breakdown, or noticed that he cried, she doesn't mention it. She puts away the ladder, then walks him all the way back to the train.

"Reggie? What happened? Are you alright?" Sirius blurts out the moment Regulus enters the compartment.

"Fine. We can go now. There's nothing for me here," Regulus rasps, then ducks his head and goes to his train car, not looking at anyone on the way.

No one bothers him that night, for which he's grateful. Even when the train starts moving, Regulus is left to his own devices. He sees James, Sirius, and Pandora file to their own rooms eventually, their voices murmuring on the way past. Dorcas must already be in bed.

Regulus turns over and tries to sleep.

He doesn't manage to do that either. It's clearly a bad night, and usually, he has Barty's help with that, or he just…doesn't sleep. But, tonight, Regulus really wants to. A part of him is afraid to, but another part of him is desperate to see Evan in his dreams and apologize, because he tried. He really did, but he couldn't do it, and he needs Evan to know.

Evan is dead, Regulus' brain reminds him. He doesn't know anything anymore. All he knew was that no one thought to look up, and you proved him wrong. Why? Why would you do that? He had no one, no family, no friends—just you, and you dragged him down. You drag everyone down, because you don't know how to climb. What the fuck is wrong with you?

Regulus doesn't know. Too much is wrong with him. So much that he isn't sure where to start.

The night ticks on. The train doesn't rattle; it rides smoothly, like a cloud on tracks. Regulus tries to sleep, but he can't, and it's making him restless. As the hours drag by, the shadows in the corner of the room start to take shape, and the fear starts to sink into him like the cold, ruthless hands from the river. He's so close to being paralyzed from panic in this bed, his heart racing and the memories coming to get him.

Gasping, Regulus bolts up from the bed and practically dives for the door, darting out into the aisle between rooms. It's as quiet and dim out here as it was in his room, so he's still shaken. He swallows, staring at the room across from him. It's Dorcas'. Next to hers is Pandora's. Across from Pandora's is Sirius'—next to Regulus'—and on the other side is James'.

All these options, some wiser than others.

